Sometimes, on Sundays, I heard the bells, the Lincoln, Acton, Bedford, or Concord bell, when the wind was favorable, a faint, sweet, and, as it were, natural melody, worth importing into the wilderness. At a sufficient distance over the woods this sound acquires a certain vibratory hum, as if the pine needles in the horizon were the strings of a harp which it swept. All sound heard at the greatest possible distance produces one and the same effect, a vibration of the universal lyre, just as the intervening atmosphere makes a distant ridge of earth interesting to our eyes by the azure tint it imparts to it. There came to me in this case a melody which the air had strained, and which had conversed with every leaf and needle of the wood, that portion of the sound which the elements had taken up and modulated and echoed from vale to vale. The echo is, to some extent, an original sound, and therein is the magic and charm of it. It is not merely a repetition of what was worth repeating in the bell, but partly the voice of the wood; the same trivial words and notes sung by a wood-nymph.

At evening, the distant lowing of some cow in the horizon beyond the woods sounded sweet and melodious, and at first I would mistake it for the voices of certain minstrels by whom I was sometimes serenaded, who might be straying over hill and dale; but soon I was not unpleasantly disappointed when it was prolonged into the cheap and natural music of the cow. I do not mean to be satirical, but to express my appreciation of those youths' singing, when I state that I perceived clearly that it was akin to the music of the cow, and they were at length one articulation of Nature.

Regularly at half past seven, in one part of the summer, after the evening train had gone by, the whippoorwills chanted their vespers for half an hour, sitting on a stump by my door, or upon the ridgepole of the house. They would begin to sing almost with as much precision as a clock, within five minutes of a particular time, referred to the setting of the sun, every evening. I had a rare opportunity to become acquainted with their habits. Sometimes I heard four or five at once in different parts of the wood, by accident one a bar behind another, and so near me that I distinguished not only the cluck after each note, but often that singular buzzing sound like a fly in a spider's web, only proportionately louder. Sometimes one would circle round and round me in the woods a few feet distant as if tethered by a string, when probably I was near its eggs. They sang at intervals throughout the night, and were again as musical as ever just before and about dawn.

From XVII. SPRING

One attraction in coming to the woods to live was that I should have leisure and opportunity to see the spring come in. The ice in the pond at length begins to be honey-combed, and I can set my heel in it as I walk. Fogs and rains and warmer suns are gradually melting the snow; the days have grown sensibly longer; and I see how I shall get through the winter without adding to my wood-pile, for large fires are no longer necessary. I am on the alert for the first signs of spring, to hear the chance note of some arriving bird, or the striped squirrel's chirp, for his stores must be now nearly exhausted, or see the woodchuck venture out of his winter quarters. On the 13th of March, after I had heard the bluebird, song-sparrow, and red-wing, the ice was still nearly a foot thick. As the weather grew warmer, it was not sensibly worn away by the water, nor broken up and floated off as in rivers, but, though it was completely melted for half a rod in width about the shore, the middle was merely honey-combed and saturated with water, so that you could put your foot through it when six inches thick; but by the next day evening, perhaps, after a warm rain followed by fog, it would have wholly disappeared, all gone off with the fog, spirited away. One year I went across the middle only five days before it disappeared entirely.

When the ground was partially bare of snow. and a few warm days had dried its surface somewhat, it was pleasant to compare the first tender signs of the infant year just peeping forth, with the stately beauty of the withered vegetation which had withstood the winter, -life-everlasting, golden-rods, pinweeds, and graceful wild grasses, more obvious and interesting frequently than in summer even, as if their beauty was not ripe till then; even cotton-grass, cat-tails, mulleins, johnswort, hardhack, meadow-sweet, and other strongstemmed plants, those unexhausted granaries which entertain the earliest birds,—decent weeds, at least, which widowed Nature wears. I am particularly attracted by the arching and sheaf-like top of the wool-grass; it brings back the summer to our winter memories, and is among the forms which art loves to copy, and which, in the vegetable kingdom, have the same relation to types already in the mind of man that astronomy has. It is an antique style, older than Greek or Egyptian. Many of the phenomena of Winter are suggestive of an inexpressible tenderness and fragile delicacy. We are accustomed to hear this king described as a rude and boisterous tyrant; but with the gentleness of a lover he adorns the tresses of

At the approach of spring the red squirrels got under my house, two at a time, directly under my feet as I sat reading or writing, and kept up the queerest chuckling and chirruping and vocal pirouetting and gurgling sounds that ever were heard; and when I stamped they only chirruped the louder, as if past all fear and respect in their mad pranks, defying humanity to stop them. No you don't—chickaree—chickaree. They were wholly deaf to my arguments. or failed to perceive their force, and fell into a strain of invective that was irresistible.

Summer.

The first sparrow of spring! The year beginning with younger hope than ever! The faint silvery warblings heard over the partially bare and moist fields from the bluebird, the song-sparrow, and the red-wing, as if the last flakes of winter tinkled as they fell! What at such a time are histories, chronologies, traditions, and all written revelations? The brooks sing carols and glees to the spring. The marshhawk sailing low over the meadow is already seeking the first slimy life that awakes. The sinking sound of melting snow is heard in all dells, and the ice dissolves apace in the ponds. The grass flames up on the hillsides like a spring fire.—"et primitus oritur herba imbribus primoribus evocata." 1—as if the earth sent forth an inward heat to greet the returning sun; not vellow but green is the color of its flame;the symbol of perpetual youth, the grass-blade, like a long green ribbon, streams from the sod into the summer, checked indeed by the frost. but anon pushing on again, lifting its spear of last year's hay with the fresh life below. It grows as steadily as the rill oozes out of the ground. It is almost identical with that, for in the growing days of June, when the rills are dry, the grass-blades are their channels, and from year to year the herds drink at this perennial green stream, and the mower draws from it betimes their winter supply. So our human life but dies down to its root, and still puts forth its green blade to eternity.

Walden is melting apace. There is a canal two rods wide along the northerly and westerly sides, and wider still at the east end. A great field of ice has cracked off from the main body. I hear a song-sparrow singing from the bushes on the shore,—olit, olit, olit,—chip, chip, chip, che, char,—che wiss, wiss, wiss. He too is helping to crack it. How handsome the great sweeping curves in the edge of the ice, answering somewhat to those of the shore, but more regular! It is unusually hard, owing to the recent severe but transient cold, and all watered or waved like a palace floor. But the wind slides eastward over its opaque surface in vain, till it reaches the living surface beyond. It is glorious to behold this ribbon of water sparkling in the sun, the bare face of the pond full of glee and youth, as if it spoke the joy of the fishes within it, and of the sands on its shore,-a silvery sheen as from the scales of a leuciscus, 2 as it were all one active fish. Such is the contrast between winter and spring. Walden was dead and is alive again. But this spring it broke up more steadily, as I have said.

&quot;And first the grass appears, called forth by the early rains."

Varro, Rerum Rusticarum ii, 2.

<sup>2</sup> a genus of fish including the dace and the roach

The change from storm and winter to serene and mild weather, from dark and sluggish hours to bright and elastic ones, is a memorable crisis which all things proclaim. It is seemingly instantaneous at last. Suddenly an influx of light filled my house, though the evening was at hand, and the clouds of winter still overhung it, and the eaves were dripping with sleety rain. I looked out of the window, and lo! where yesterday was cold gray ice there lay the transparent pond already calm and full of hope as in a summer evening, reflecting a summer evening sky in its bosom, though none was visible overhead, as if it had intelligence with some remote horizon. I heard a robin in the distance, the first I had heard for many a thousand years, methought, whose note I shall not forget for many a thousand more,-the same sweet and powerful song as of yore. O the evening robin, at the end of a New England summer day! If I could ever find the twig he sits upon! I mean he; I mean the twig. This at least is not the Turdus 1 migratorius. The pitch-pines and shrub-oaks about my house, which had so long drooped, suddenly resumed their several characters, looked brighter. greener, and more erect and alive, as if effectually cleansed and restored by the rain. I knew that it would not rain any more. You may tell by looking at any twig of the forest, ay, at your very woodpile, whether its winter is past or not. As it grew darker, I was startled by the honking of geese flying low over the woods, like weary travelers getting in late from southern lakes, and indulging at last in unrestrained complaint and mutual consolation. Standing at my door, I could hear the rush of their wings; when, driving toward my house. they suddenly spied my light, and with hushed clamor wheeled and settled in the pond. So I came in, and shut the door, and passed my first spring night in the woods.

In the morning I watched the geese from the door through the mist, sailing in the middle of the pond, fifty rods off, so large and tumultuous that Walden appeared like an artificial pond for their amusement. But when I stood on the shore they at once rose up with a great flapping of wings at the signal of their commander, and when they had got into rank circled about over my head, twenty-nine of them, and then steered straight to Canada, with a regular honk from the leader at intervals. trusting to break their fast in muddier pools. A "plump" of ducks rose at the same time and took the route to the north in the wake of their noisier cousins.

For a week I heard the circling groping clangor of some solitary goose in the foggy mornings, seeking its companion, and still peopling the woods with the sound of a larger life than they could sustain. In April the pigeons were seen again flying express in small flocks, and in due time I heard the martins twittering over my clearing, though it had not seemed that the township contained so many that it could afford me any, and I fancied that they were peculiarly of the ancient race that dwelt in hollow trees ere white men came. In almost all climes the tortoise and the frog are among the precursors and heralds of this season, and birds fly with song and glancing plumage, and plants spring and bloom, and winds blow, to correct this slight oscillation of the poles and preserve the equilibrium of Nature.

As every season seems best to us in its turn. so the coming in of spring is like the creation of Cosmos 2 out of Chaos and the realization of the Golden Age.-

"Eurus ad Auroram, Nabathacaque regna recessit, Persidaque, et radiis juga subdita matutinis."

The East-Wind withdrew to Aurora and the Nabathaean kingdom,

And the Persian, and the ridges placed under the morning rays.

Man was born. Whether that Artificer of things. The origin of a better world, made him from the divine seed:

Or the earth being recent and lately sundered from the high

Ether, retained some seeds of cognate heaven.

A single gentle rain makes the grass many shades greener. So our prospects brighten on the influx of better thoughts. We should be blessed if we lived in the present always, and took advantage of every accident that befell us, like the grass which confesses the influence of the slightest dew that falls on it; and did not spend our time in atoning for the neglect of past opportunities, which we call doing our duty. We loiter in winter while it is already spring. In a pleasant spring morning all men's sins are forgiven. Such a day is a truce to vice. While such a sun holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return. Through our own recovered innocence we discern the innocence of our neighbors. You may have known your neighbor yesterday for a thief, a drunkard, or a sensualist, and merely pitied or despised him, and despaired of the world; but the sun shines bright and warm this first spring morning, recreating the world, and you meet him at some or Merula migratoria, the American robin

<sup>2</sup> a world

serene work, and see how his exhausted and debauched veins expand with still joy and bless the new day, feel the spring influence with the innocence of infancy, and all his faults are forgotten. There is not only an atmosphere of good will about him, but even a savor of holiness groping for expression, blindly and ineffectually perhaps, like a new-born instinct. and for a short hour the south hillside echoes to no vulgar jest. You see some innocent fair shoots preparing to burst from his gnarled rind and try another year's life, tender and fresh as the youngest plant. Even he has entered into the joy of his Lord. Why the jailer does not leave open his prison doors,-why the judge does not dismiss his case.—why the preacher does not dismiss his congregation! It is because they do not obey the hint which God gives them, nor accept the pardon which he freely offers to all.

. . . . . . . .

From XVIII. CONCLUSION

I left the woods for as good a reason as I went there. Perhaps it seemed to me that I had several more lives to live, and could not spare any more time for that one. It is remarkable how easily and insensibly we fall into a particular route, and make a beaten track for ourselves. I had not lived there a week before my feet wore a path from my door to the pond-side; and though it is five or six years since I trod it, it is still quite distinct. It is true, I fear that others may have fallen into it, and so helped to keep it open. The surface of the earth is soft and impressible by the feet of men; and so with the paths which the mind travels. How worn and dusty, then, must be the highways of the world, how deep the ruts of tradition and conformity! I did not wish to take a cabin passage, but rather to go before the mast and on the deck of the world, for there I could best see the moonlight amid the mountains. I do not wish to go below now.

I learned this, at least, by my experiment; that if one advances confidently in the direction of his dreams, and endeavors to live the life which he has imagined, he will meet with a success unexpected in common hours. He will put some things behind, will pass an invisible boundary; new, universal, and more liberal laws will begin to establish themselves around and within him; or the old laws be expanded, and interpreted in his favor in a more liberal sense, and he will live with the license of a higher order of beings. In proportion as he simplifies his life, the laws of the universe will appear less complex, and solitude will not be solitude, nor poverty poverty, nor weakness weakness. If you have built castles in the air, your work need not be lost; that is where they should be. Now put the foundations under them

• • • • • • •

1845-1847

1854

PRAVER

Great God! I ask thee for no meaner pelf, Than that I may not disappoint myself; That in my action I may soar as high As I can now discern with this clear eye.

And next in value, which thy kindness lends, That I may greatly disappoint my friends, Howe'er they think or hope that it may be They may not dream how thou'st distinguished me.

That my weak hand may equal my firm faith, And my life practice more than my tongue saith:

That my low conduct may not show, Nor my relenting lines, That I thy purpose did not know Or overrated thy designs.

1842

THE FISHER'S BOY

My life is like a stroll upon the beach,
As near the ocean's edge as I can go;
My tardy steps its waves sometimes o'erreach,
Sometimes I stay to let them overflow.

My sole employment 'tis, and scrupulous care,
To place my gains beyond the reach of tides.—

Each smoother pebble, and each shell more rare,

Which Ocean kindly to my hand confides.

I have but few companions on the shore; They scorn the strand who sail upon the sea:

Yet oft I think the ocean they've sailed o'er Is deeper known upon the strand to me.

The middle sea contains no crimson dulse,
Its deeper waves cast up no pearls to view;
Along the shore my hand is on its pulse,
And I converse with many a shipwrecked crew.

1849

INSPIRATION

If with light head erect I sing, Though all the Muses lend their force, From my poor love of anything, The verse is weak and shallow as its source.

But if with bended neck I grope Listening behind me for my wit, With faith superior to hope, More anxious to keep back than forward it,—

Making my soul accomplice there
Unto the flame my heart hath lit,
Then will the verse forever wear,—
Time cannot bend the line which God has writ.

I hearing get, who had but ears, And sight, who had but eyes before; I moments live, who lived but years, And truth discern, who knew but learning's

Now chiefly is my natal hour, And only now my prime of life; Of manhood's strength it is the flower, 'Tis peace's end and war's beginning strife. <sup>20</sup>

It comes in summer's broadest noon, By a gray wall, or some chance place. Unseasoning time, insulting June, And vexing day with its presuming face.

I will not doubt the love untold Which not my worth nor want hath bought, Which wooed me young, and wooes me old, And to this evening hath me brought.

1863

MINOR LYRIC POETS

WOODWORTH, DANA, FURNESS, and SMITH are prominent among the minor American poets and popular in the middle of the nineteenth century. They are each famous for one or two lyrics, some of which still retain their first appeal.

Samuel Woodworth, 1785-1842, born at Scituate, Massachusetts, was primarily a journalist. After an apprenticeship in printing, he removed to New York in 1809, and in 1823, with George P. Morris, founded the New York Mirror. He produced a volume of poems in 1818, and in 1825 a play, The Forest Rose, which was popular for twenty years.

RICHARD HENRY DANA, 1787-1879, was born at Cambridge, and after three years at Harvard he entered upon the study and practice of law. He was connected with the North American Review for five years from its founding in 1815. Although ill-health hindered his work, he published poems in 1827, 1833, and 1849, and occasionally lectured upon Shakespeare. Richard Henry Dana Jr. was his son.

WILLIAM HENRY FURNESS, 1802-1896, was born in Boston, graduated from Harvard, 1820, and was in 1825 installed pastor of the First Congregational Unitarian Church of Philadelphia, where he remained pastor for fifty years, and died. In addition to many theological works he published translations from German prose and poetry, and Verses: Translations and Hymns. 1886.

Samuel Francis Smith, 1808-1895, was born and died in Boston. He graduated from Harvard in the class with Holmes and entered the Baptist ministry. He wrote many hymns, The Morning Light Is Breaking being, aside from America, probably the best known. See Holmes, The Boys, p. 558, l. 29.

SAMUEL WOODWORTH

THE BUCKET

How dear to this heart are the scenes of my childhood,

When fond recollection presents them to view!

The orchard, the meadow, the deep-tangled wild-wood,

And every loved spot which my infancy knew!

The wide-spreading pond, and the mill that stood by it.

The bridge, and the rock where the cataract fell,

The cot of my father, the dairy-house nigh it,
And e'en the rude bucket that hung in the well—

The old oaken bucket, the iron-bound bucket,
The moss-covered bucket which hung in the well.

10

That moss-covered vessel I hailed as a treasure, For often at noon, when returned from the field,

I found it the source of an exquisite pleasure,

The purest and sweetest that nature can yield.

How ardent I seized it, with hands that were glowing,

And quick to the white-pebbled bottom it fell;

Then soon, with the emblem of truth overflowing,

And dripping with coolness, it rose from the well—

The old oaken bucket, the iron-bound bucket, The moss-covered bucket arose from the well.

10

How sweet from the green mossy brim to receive it,

As poised on the curb it inclined to my lips!

Not a full blushing goblet could tempt me to leave it.

The brightest that beauty or revelry sips.

And now, far removed from the loved habitation.

The tear of regret will intrusively swell.
As fancy reverts to my father's plantation,
And sighs for the bucket that hangs in the well—
28

The old oaken bucket, the iron-bound bucket,
The moss-covered bucket that hangs in the well!

1826

RICHARD HENRY DANA

THE LITTLE BEACH-BIRD

Thou little bird, thou dweller by the sea,
Why takest thou its melancholy voice,
And with that boding cry
Why o'er the waves dost fly?
O, rather, bird, with me
Through the fair land rejoice!

Thy flitting form comes ghostly dim and pale,
As driven by a beating storm at sea;
Thy cry is weak and scared,
As if thy mates had shared

The deep of the Thy mail

The doom of us. Thy wail,— What doth it bring to me?

Thou call'st along the sand, and haunt'st the surge,

Restless, and sad; as if, in strange accord
With the motion and the roar
Of waves that drive to shore,
One spirit did ye urge—
The Mystery—the Word.

Of thousands, thou, both sepulcher and pall,
Old Ocean, art! A requiem o'er the dead,
From out thy gloomy cells
A tale of mourning tells.—
Tells of man's woe and fall,
His sinless glory fled.

Then turn thee, little bird, and take thy flight
Where the complaining sea shall sadness bring
The spirit power more

Thy spirit never more.
Come, quit with me the shore,
For gladness and the light,
Where birds of summer sing.

WILLIAM HENRY FURNESS

EVENING HYMN

Slowly by God's hand unfurled, Down around the weary world Falls the darkness; oh, how still Is the working of Thy will!

Mighty Maker! Here am I,— Work in me as silently, Veil the day's distracting sights, Show me heaven's eternal lights.

From the darkened sky come forth Countless stars, a wondrous birth! So may gleams of glory dart. Through the dim abyss, my heart;

Living worlds to view he brought In the boundless realms of thought, High and infinite desires, Burning like those upper fires.

Holy truth, eternal right, Let them break upon my sight. Let them shine unclouded, still, And with light my being fill.

Thou art there. Oh, let me know, Thou art here within me too; Be the perfect peace of God Here as there now shed abroad.

May my soul attuned be To that perfect harmony, Which, beyond the power of sound, Fills the universe around.

1886

SAMUEL FRANCIS SMITH

AMERICA 1

My country,—'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,'
Of thee I sing;
Land where my fathers died,
Land of the pilgrims' pride,
From every mountain side
Let freedom ring.

My native country,—thee.
Land of the noble, free.
Thy name I love;
I love thy rocks and rills.
Thy woods and templed hills,
My heart with rapture thrills
Like that above.

<sup>1</sup> The poem is printed from an autograph version dated May, 1894, in the Stanford University Library.

1853

20

10

20

Let music swell the breeze,
And ring from all the trees
Sweet freedom's song;
Let mortal tongues awake,
Let all that breathe partake.
Let rocks their silence break,—
The sound prolong.

Our fathers' God,—to Thee, Author of liberty, To Thee we sing; Long may our land be bright With freedom's holy light, Protect us by Thy might, Great God, our King.

1832

1832

WILLIAM HICKLING PRESCOTT 1796-1859

With Prescott a comparatively new type of prose, history written with the intent to give pleasure, enters American literature. Prescott was born of distinguished ancestry, graduated from Harvard in 1814, and entered upon the study of law. An accident at college had left him with greatly impaired eyesight, which rapidly grew worse. He turned from law to literature and, carefully saving his strength, settled down to the study of Spanish-American history as his life work. His chief essays and books are Italian Narrative Poetry, 1824; The History of Ferdinand and Isabella, 1837; The Conquest of Mexico, 1843; The Conquest of Peru, 1847; Philip the Second, 1855-1858.

Prescott's choice of subjects connected with Spanish history was most natural. Possibly be-cause American historians had at hand a topic so picturesque as the discovery and occupation of America, we find in American literature a group of writers who have with unusual charm developed the romance of history. His style was to some extent modified by the limitations of his eyesight, for Prescott was obliged to compose and memorize whole chapters at a time before having them written out. His work, therefore, has some of the qualities of eloquence-flow, formal grace, and appeal through the ear. In company with other literary historians, he has the gift of selecting the dramatic moments in history and fixing them in unforgettable panoramic scenes. Though many discoveries have since his time been made in Spanish-American history, his method of taking documentary evidence for his foundation made his work as accurate as the documents then accessible to him would permit. The charm of his style has kept his books alive.

Biography: G. Ticknor, Life of Prescott, 1864; Rollo Ogden, W. H. Prescott, (AML) 1905; H. T. Peck, W. H. Prescott, (EML) 1905; Hilliard, (LJ). Criticism: R. Ogden, "Prescott the Man," Atlan.

93:320-37.

From HISTORY OF THE CONQUEST OF

BOOK III. CHAPTER VIII

MARCH RESUMED.—ASCENT OF THE GREAT VOLCANO.—VALLEY OF MEXICO.—IMPRESSION ON THE SPANIARDS.—CONDUCT OF MONTEZUMA.—THEY DESCEND INTO THE VALLEY.

Everything being now restored to quiet in Cholula, <sup>1</sup> the allied army of Spaniards and Tlascalans set forward in high spirits and resumed the march on Mexico. <sup>2</sup> The road lay through the beautiful savannas and luxuriant plantations that spread out for several leagues in every direction. On the march they were met occasionally by embassies from the neighboring places, anxious to claim the protection of the white men and to propitiate them by gifts, especially of gold, for which their appetite was generally known throughout the country.

Some of these places were allies of the Tlascalans, and all showed much discontent with the oppressive rule of Montezuma. The natives cautioned the Spaniards against putting themselves in his power by entering his capital; and they stated, as evidence of his hostile disposition, that he had caused the direct road to it to be blocked up that the strangers might be compelled to choose another which, from its narrow passes and strong positions, would enable him to take them at great disadvantage.

The information was not lost on Cortés, who kept a strict eye on the movements of the Mexican envoys and redoubled his own precautions against surprise. Cheerful and active, he was ever where his presence was needed, sometimes in the van, at others in the rear, encouraging the weak, stimulating the sluggish, and striving to kindle in the breasts of others the same courageous spirit which glowed in his own. At night he never omitted to go the rounds to see that every man was at his post. On one occasion his vigilance had well nigh proved fatal to him. He approached so near a sentinel that the man, unable to distinguish his person in the dark, leveled his crossbow at him, when fortunately an exclamation of the general, who gave the watchword of the night. arrested a movement which might else have brought the campaign to a close and given a respite for some time longer to the empire of Montezuma.

<sup>1</sup> near the modern city of Puebla
<sup>2</sup> Cortés had landed at Vera Cruz in April, 1519, and had in August begun his march to Mexico City, seat of the great Montezuma, the so-called emperor of Mexico. The inhabitants of the town of Tlascala, capital of the small republic of that name, had at first opposed Cortés but later submitted to him, and six thousand had joined him as allies in a march upon their rivals, the Cholulans. The Cholulans made a conspiracy against Cortés, which he avenged by a massacre of the inhabitants, which is a blot upon Spanish history. He is, as the selection begins, just leaving Cholula.

The army came at length to the place mentioned by the friendly Indians, where the road forked, and one arm of it was found, as they had foretold, obstructed with large trunks of trees and huge stones which had been strewn across it. Cortés inquired the meaning of this from the Mexican ambassadors. They said it was done by the emperor's orders, to prevent their taking a route which after some distance they would find nearly impracticable for the They acknowledged, however, that it was the most direct road; and Cortés, declaring that this was enough to decide him in favor of it, as the Spaniards made no account of obstacles commanded the rubbish to be cleared away. Some of the timber might still be seen by the roadside, as Bernal Diaz 1 tells us, many years after. The event left little doubt in the general's mind of the meditated treachery of the Mexicans. But he was too politic to betray his suspicions.

They were now leaving the pleasant champaign country, as the road wound up the bold sierra which separates the great plateaus of Mexico and Puebla. The air, as they ascended, became keen and piercing; and the blasts sweeping down the frozen sides of the mountains made the soldiers shiver in their thick harness of cotton, 2 and benumbed the limbs of both men and horses.

They were passing between two of the highest mountains on the North American continent—Popocatepetl, 3 "the hill that smokes," and Iztaccihuatl, 4 or "white woman," a name suggested doubtless by the bright robe of snow spread over its broad and broken surface. A puerile superstition of the Indians regarded these celebrated mountains as gods, and Iztaccihuatl as the wife of her more formidable neighbor. A tradition of a higher character described the northern volcano as the abode of the departed spirits of wicked rulers, whose fiery agonies in their prison-house caused the fearful bellowings and convulsions in times of eruption. It was the classic fable of Antiquity. 5 These superstitious legends had invested the mountain with a mysterious horror that made the natives shrink from attempting its ascent, which, indeed, was from natural causes a work of incredible difficulty.

4 north of Popocatepetl, and 16,705 feet high

The great volcan, as Popocatepetl was called, rose to the enormous height of 17.852 feet above the level of the sea-more than two thousand feet above the "monarch of mountains," the highest elevation in Europe. 6 During the present century it has rarely given evidence of its volcanic origin, and "the hill that smokes" has almost forfeited its claim to the appellation. But at the time of the Conquest it was frequently in a state of activity and raged with uncommon fury while the Spaniards were at Tlascala—an evil omen, it was thought, for the natives of Anahuac. 7 Its head, gathered into a regular cone by the deposits of successive eruptions, wore the usual form of volcanic mountains when not disturbed by the falling in of the crater. Soaring towards the skies, with its silver sheet of everlasting snow, it was seen far and wide over the broad plains of Mexico and Puebla-the first object which the morning sun greeted in his rising, and the last where his evening rays were seen to linger, shedding a glorious effulgence over its head that contrasted strikingly with the ruinous waste of sand and lava immediately below and the fringe of funereal pines that shrouded its base.

The mysterious terrors which hung over the spot and the wild love of adventure, made some of the Spanish cavaliers desirous to attempt the ascent which the natives declared no man could accomplish and live. Cortés encouraged them in the enterprise, willing to show the Indians that no achievement was above the dauntless daring of his followers. One of his captains, accordingly, Diego Ordaz, with nine Spaniards and several Tlascalans, encouraged by their example, undertook the ascent. It was attended with more difficulty than had been anticipated.

The lower region was clothed with a dense forest, so thickly matted that in some places

A soldier with Cortés; he later wrote a history of the conquest, published in 1632.
 The Mexicans wore "a close vest of quilted cotton so thick as to be impenetrable to the light missiles of Indian warfare. This garment was so light and serviceable that it was adopted by the Spaniards." Bk. I. Ch. 2.
 This yolgano, forty miles southeast of Mexico City.

&lt;sup>3</sup> This volcano, forty miles southeast of Mexico City, is 17.876 feet high and has a crater 2000 feet in

&lt;sup>5</sup> Enceladus, one of the hundred-armed giants that made war on the gods, was overcome by Zeus and buried under Mt. Aetna.

<sup>6</sup> Mt. Blanc, the highest mountain of the Alps, is 15,781 feet. Mt. Elbruz, the highest peak of the Caucasus, is 18,526 feet.

7 pronounced a-na'wak—a name given to that part of the central tableland near Mexico City it was scarcely possible to penetrate it. It grew thinner, however, as they advanced, dwindling by degrees into a straggling, stunted vegetation till, at the height of somewhat more than thirteen thousand feet, it faded away altogether. The Indians who had held on thus far, intimidated by the strange subterranean sounds of the volcano, even then in a state of combustion, now left them. The track opened on a black surface of glazed volcanic sand and of lava, the broken fragments of which, arrested in its boiling progress in a thousand fantastic forms, opposed continual impediments to their advance. Amidst these one huge rock, the Pico del Fraile, a conspicuous object from below, rose to the perpendicular height of a hundred and fifty feet, compelling them to take a wide circuit. They soon came to the limits of perpetual snow, where new difficulties presented themselves, as the treacherous ice gave an imperfect footing, and a false step might precipitate them into the frozen chasms that To increase their distress. vawned around. respiration in these aërial regions became so difficult that every effort was attended with sharp pains in the head and limbs. Still they pressed on, till, drawing nearer the crater, such volumes of smoke, sparks, and cinders were belched forth from its burning entrails and driven down the sides of the mountain, as nearly suffocated and blinded them. It was too much even for their hardy frames to endure. and, however reluctantly, they were compelled to abandon the attempt on the eve of its completion. They brought back some huge icicles —a curious sight in these tropical regions—as a trophy of their achievement, which, however imperfect, was sufficient to strike the minds of the natives with wonder by showing that with the Spaniards the most appalling and mysterious perils were only as pastimes. The undertaking was eminently characteristic of the bold spirit of the cavalier of that day, who, not content with the dangers that lay in his path, seemed to court them from the mere Quixotic love of adventure. A report of the affair was transmitted to the Emperor Charles the Fifth, and the family of Ordaz was allowed to commemorate the exploit by assuming a burning mountain on their escutcheon.

The general was not satisfied with the result. Two years after, he sent up another party, under Francisco Montaño, a cavalier of determined resolution. The object was to obtain sulphur to assist in making gunpowder for the army. The mountain was quiet at this time, and the expedition was attended with better success. The Spaniards, five in number, climbed to the very edge of the crater, which presented an irregular ellipse at its mouth, more than a league in circumference. Its depth might be from eight hundred to a thousand feet. A lurid flame burned gloomily at the bottom, sending up a sulphureous steam. which. cooling as it rose, was precipitated on the sides of the cavity. The party cast lots, and it fell on Montaño himself to descend in a basket into this hideous abyss, into which he was lowered by his companions to the depth of four hundred feet! This was repeated several times till the adventurous cavalier had collected a sufficient quantity of sulphur for the wants of the army. This doughty enterprise excited general admiration at the time. Cortés concludes his report of it to the emperor with the judicious reflection that it would be less inconvenient, on the whole, to import their powder from Spain.

But it is time to return from our digression, which may, perhaps, be excused as illustrating in a remarkable manner the chimerical spirit of enterprise—not inferior to that in his own romances of chivalry 1—which glowed in the breast of the Spanish cavalier in the sixteenth century.

The army held on its march through the intricate gorges of the sierra. The route was nearly the same as that pursued at the present day by the courier from the capital to Puebla, by the way of Mecameca. It was not that usually taken by travelers from Vera Cruz. who follow the more circuitous road round the northern base of Iztaccihuatl, as less fatiguing than the other, though inferior in picturesque scenery and romantic points of view. The icy winds that now swept down the sides of the mountains brought with them a tempest of arrowy sleet and snow, from which the Christians suffered even more than the Tlascalans reared from infancy among the wild solitudes of their own native hills. As night came on, their sufferings would have been intolerable. but they luckily found a shelter in the commodious stone buildings which the Mexican government had placed at stated intervals along the roads for the accommodation of the traveler and their own couriers. It little dreamed it was providing a protection for its enemies.

The troops, refreshed by a night's rest, succeeded, early on the following day, in gaining the crest of the sierra of Ahualco, which stretches like a curtain between the two great mountains on the north and south. Their progress was now comparatively easy, and they marched forward with a buoyant step, as they felt they were treading the soil of Monteguma

&lt;sup>1</sup> The romances clustering about the Cid (the great Spanish hero), Don Roderic, Charlemagne, Amadis, and others were most fanciful and chimerical.

They had not advanced far when, turning an angle of the sierra, they suddenly came on a view which more than compensated the toils of the preceding day. It was that of the Valley of Mexico, or Tenochtitlan, as more commonly called by the natives; which, with its picturesque assemblage of water, woodland, and cultivated plains, its shining cities 1 and shadowy hills, was spread out like some gay and gorgeous panorama before them. In the highly rarefied atmosphere of these upper regions even remote objects have a brilliancy of coloring and a distinctness of outline which seem to annihilate distance. Stretching far away at their feet were seen noble forests of oak, sycamore, and cedar, and beyond, vellow fields of maize and the towering maguey, intermingled with orchards and blooming gardens: for flowers, in such demand for their religious festivals, were even more abundant in this populous valley than in other parts of Anahuac. In the center of the great basin were beheld the lakes, occupying then a much larger portion of its surface than at present; their borders thickly studded with towns and hamlets, and in the midst, like some Indian empress with her coronal of pearls, the fair city of Mexico with her white towers and pyramidal temples, reposing, as it were, on the bosom of the waters the far-famed "Venice of the Aztecs." High over all rose the royal hill of Chapoltepec, the residence of the Mexican monarchs, crowned with the same grove of gigantic cypresses, which at this day fling their broad shadows over the land. In the distance, beyond the blue waters of the lake and nearly screened by intervening foliage, was seen a shining speck, the rival capital of Tezcuco, 2 and still further on, the dark belt of porphyry, girdling the valley around like a rich setting which nature had devised for the fairest of her jewels.

Such was the beautiful vision which broke on the eyes of the conquerors. And even now, when so sad a change has come over the scene:

The Tezcucans, who had been independent but were row subject to Montezuma, joined Cortés during the following year in his siege and capture of Mexico City. when the stately forests have been laid low, and the soil, unsheltered from the fierce radiance of a tropical sun, is in many places abandoned to sterility; when the waters have retired, leaving a broad and ghastly margin white with the incrustation of salts, while the cities and hamlets on their borders have moldered into ruins—even now that desolation broods over the landscape, so indestructible are the lines of beauty which nature has traced on its features that no traveler, however cold, can gaze on them with any other emotions than those of astonishment and rapture.

What, then, must have been the emotions of the Spaniards when, after working their toilsome way into the upper air, the cloudy tabernacle parted before their eyes and they beheld these fair scenes in all their pristine magnificence and beauty! It was like the spectacle which greeted the eyes of Moses from the summit of Pisgah, 3 and in the warm glow of their feelings they cried out, "It is the promised land!"

But these feelings of admiration were soon followed by others of a very different complexion, as they saw in all this the evidences of a civilization and power far superior to anything they had yet encountered. The more timid, disheartened by the prospect, shrunk from a contest so unequal, and demanded, as they had done on some former occasions, to be led back again to Vera Cruz. Such was not the effect produced on the sanguine spirit of the general. His avarice was sharpened by the display of the dazzling spoil at his feet, and if he felt a natural anxiety at the formidable odds. his confidence was renewed as he gazed on the lines of his veterans, whose weather-beaten visages and battered armor told of battles won and difficulties surmounted, while his bold barbarians, with appetites whetted by the view of their enemies' country, seemed like eagles on the mountains, ready to pounce upon their prey. By argument, entreaty, and menace, he endeavored to restore the faltering courage of the soldiers, urging them not to think of retreat, now that they had reached the goal for which they had panted and the golden gates were opened to receive them. In these efforts he was well seconded by the brave cavaliers, who held honor as dear to them as fortune; until the dullest spirits caught somewhat of the enthusiasm of their leaders, and the general had the satisfaction to see his hesitating columns, with their usual buoyant step, once more on their march down the slopes of the sierra

Prescott placed more confidence in the statements of the early Spanish and Mexican writers than do later historians. Some of these descriptions are perhaps somewhat exaggerated, but they are fundamentally true. See Encyclopedia Britannica, "Mexico"—Civilization.

&lt;sup>3</sup> a mountain, also called Mt. Nebo, northeast of the Dead Sea, from which Moses viewed Canaan, Deuteronomy iii, 27; xxxiv, 1

With every step of their progress the woods became thinner; patches of cultivated land more frequent; and hamlets were seen in the green and sheltered nooks, the inhabitants of which coming out to meet them gave the troops a kind reception. Everywhere they heard complaints of Montezuma, especially of the unfeeling manner in which he carried off their young men to recruit his armies and their maidens for his harem. These symptoms of discontent were noticed with satisfaction by Cortés. who saw that Montezuma's "mountain throne," as it was called, was indeed seated on a volcano with the elements of combustion so active within that it seemed as if any hour might witness an explosion. He encouraged the disaffected natives to rely on his protection, as he had come to redress their wrongs. He took advantage, moreover, of their favorable dispositions to scatter among them such gleams of spiritual light as time and the preaching of father Olmedo could afford.

He advanced by easy stages, somewhat retarded by the crowd of curious inhabitants gathered on the highways to see the strangers, and halting at every spot of interest or importance. On the road he was met by another embassy from the capital. It consisted of several Aztec lords, freighted, as usual, with a rich largess of gold and robes of delicate furs and feathers. The message of the emperor was couched in the same deprecatory terms as before. He even condescended to bribe the return of the Spaniards by promising in that event four loads of gold to the general and one to each of the captains, with a yearly tribute to their sovereign. So effectually had the lofty and naturally courageous spirit of the barbarian monarch been subdued by the influence of superstition! 1

But the man whom the hostile array of armies could not daunt was not to be turned from his purpose by a woman's <sup>2</sup> prayers. He received the embassy with his usual courtesy, declaring, as before, that he could not answer it to his own sovereign if he were now to return without visiting the emperor in his capital. It would be much easier to arrange matters by a personal interview than by distant negotiation. The Spaniards came in the spirit of peace. Montezuma would so find it; but should their presence prove burdensome to him, it would be easy for them to relieve him of it.

The Aztec monarch meanwhile was a prey to the most dismal apprehensions. It was intended that the embassy above noticed should reach the Spaniards before they crossed the mountains. When he learned that this was accomplished and that the dread strangers were on their march across the Valley, the very threshold of his capital, the last spark of hope died away in his bosom. Like one who suddenly finds himself on the brink of some dark and yawning gulf, he was too much bewildered to be able to rally his thoughts or even to comprehend his situation. He was the victim of an absolute destiny, against which no foresight or precautions could have availed. It was as if the strange beings who had thus invaded his shores had dropped from some distant planet, so different were they from all he had ever seen, in appearance and manners: so superior-though a mere handful in numbersto the banded nations of Anahuac in strength and science and all the fearful accompaniments of war! They were now in the Valley. The huge mountain screen which nature had so kindly drawn around it for its defense had been overleaped. The golden visions of security and repose in which he had so long indulged, the lordly sway descended from his ancestors, his broad imperial domain, were all to pass away. It seemed like some terrible dreamfrom which he was now, alas! to awake to a still more terrible reality.

In a paroxysm of despair he shut himself up in his palace, refused food, and sought relief in prayer and in sacrifice. But the oracles were dumb. He then adopted the more sensible expedient of calling a council of his principal and oldest nobles. Here was the same division of opinion which had before prevailed. Cacama, the young king of Tezcuco, his nephew, counseled him to receive the Spaniards courteously, as ambassadors, so styled by themselves, of a foreign prince. Cuitlahua, Montezuma's more warlike brother, urged him to muster his forces on the instant and drive back the invaders from his capital, or die in its defense. But the monarch found it difficult to rally his spirits for this final struggle. With downcast eye and dejected mien he exclaimed, "Of what avail is resistance when the gods have declared themselves against us! Yet I mourn most for the old and infirm, the women and children, too feeble to fight or to fly. For myself and the brave men around me, we must bare our breasts to the storm and meet it as we may!" Such are the sorrowful and sympathetic tones in which the Aztec emperor is said to have uttered the bitterness of his grief. He would have acted a more glorious part had he put his capital in a posture of defense and prepared, like the last of the Palaeologi, 1 to bury himself under its ruins.

Several things unnerved the monarch: the activity of Popocatepeti, an evil omen; the apparently superhuman daring of the Spaniards in crossing the mountains as they had done; the tradition that Quetzalcoati, a white god, was to send his brethren from the east to rule Mexico; and a prophecy made when Montezuma became king, that the empire would be desolated and the people enslaved.
Montezuma had lost all manly courage.

He straightway prepared to send a last embassy to the Spaniards, with his nephew, the lord of Tezcuco, at its head, to welcome them to Mexico.

The Christian army meanwhile had advanced as far as Amaguemecan, a well built town of several thousand inhabitants. They were kindly received by the cacique. 2 lodged in large, commodious stone buildings, and at their departure presented, among other things, with gold to the amount of three thousand castellanos. 3 Having halted there a couple of days, they descended among flourishing plantations of maize and of maguey, the latter of which might be called the Aztec vineyards, towards the lake of Chalco. Their first restingplace was Ajotzinco, a town of considerable size, with a great part of it then standing on piles in the water. It was the first specimen which the Spaniards had seen of this maritime architecture. The canals which intersected the city instead of streets presented an animated scene from the number of barks which glided up and down freighted with provisions and other articles for the inhabitants. The Spaniards were particularly struck with the style and commodious structure of the houses, built chiefly of stone, and with the general aspect of wealth and even elegance which prevailed there.

Though received with the greatest show of hospitality, Cortés found some occasion for distrust in the eagerness manifested by the people to see and approach the Spaniards. Not content with gazing at them in the roads, some even made their way stealthily into their quarters, and fifteen or twenty unhappy Indians were shot down by the sentinels as spies. Yet there appears, as well as we can judge at this distance of time, to have been no real ground for such suspicion. The undisguised jealousy of the Court, and the cautions he had received from his allies, while they very properly put the general on his guard, seem to have given an unnatural acuteness, at least in the present instance, to his perceptions of danger.

Early on the following morning, as the army was preparing to leave the place, a courier came, requesting the general to postpone his departure till after the arrival of the king of Tezcuco, who was advancing to meet him. It was not long before he appeared, borne in a palanguin, or litter, richly decorated with plates of gold and precious stones, having pillars curiously wrought, supporting a canopy of green plumes, a favorite color with the Aztec princes. He was accompanied by a numerous suite of nobles and inferior attendants. As he came into the presence of Cortés, the lord of Tezcuco descended from his palanquin, and the obsequious officers swept the ground before him as he advanced. He appeared to be a young man of about twenty-five years of age, with a comely presence, erect and stately in his deportment. He made the Mexican salutation usually addressed to persons of high rank, touching the earth with his right hand and raising it to his head. Cortés embraced him as he rose, when the young prince informed him that he came as the representative of Montezuma to bid the Spaniards welcome to his capital. He then presented the general with three pearls of uncommon size and luster. Cortés in return threw over Cacama's neck a chain of cut glass, which, where glass was as rare as diamonds, might be admitted to have a value as real as the latter. After this interchange of courtesies and the most friendly and respectful assurances on the part of Cortés. the Indian prince withdrew, leaving the Spaniards strongly impressed with the superiority of his state and bearing over anything they had hitherto seen in the country.

Resuming its march, the army kept along the southern borders of the lake of Chalco, overshadowed at that time by noble woods and by orchards glowing with autumnal fruits of unknown names, but rich and tempting hues. More frequently it passed through cultivated fields waving with the yellow harvest and irrigated by canals introduced from the neighboring lake, the whole showing a careful and economical husbandry essential to the maintenance of a crowded population.

Leaving the main land, the Spaniards came on the great dike, or causeway, which stretches some four or five miles in length, and divides

&lt;sup>1</sup> the family of most of the rulers of the Eastern Roman Empire from 1261 to the time of Constantine XII, the last emperor, who died with his troops when the Turks broke through the walls of Constantinople in 1453

chief
 a Spanish coin of the fourteenth century, worth about one-sixth of an ounce of gold, or about $2.50

lake Chalco from Xochicalco on the west. It was a lance in breadth in the narrowest part, and in some places wide enough for eight horsemen to ride abreast. It was a solid structure of stone and lime, running directly through the lake, and struck the Spaniards as one of the most remarkable works which they had seen in the country.

As they passed along they beheld the gay spectacle of multitudes of Indians darting up and down in their light pirogues, 1 eager to catch a glimpse of the strangers or bearing the products of the country to the neighboring cities. They were amazed, also, by the sight of the chinambas, or floating gardens—those wandering islands of verdure, to which we shall have occasion to return hereafter-teeming with flowers and vegetables and moving like rafts over the waters. All round the margin and occasionally far in the lake they beheld little towns and villages which, half concealed by the foliage and gathered in white clusters round the shore, looked in the distance like companies of wild swans riding quietly on the waves. A scene so new and wonderful filled their rude hearts with amazement. It seemed like enchantment; and they could find nothing to compare it with but the magical pictures in the Amadis de Gaula. 2 Few pictures, indeed, in that or any other legend of chivalry could surpass the realities of their own experience. The life of the adventurer in the New World was romance put into action. What wonder, then, if the Spaniard of that day, feeding his imagination with dreams of enchantment at home and with its realities abroad, should have displayed a Quixotic enthusiasm, a romantic exaltation of character not to be comprehended by the colder spirits of other lands!

Midway across the lake the army halted at the town of Cuitlahuac, a place of moderate size but distinguished by the beauty of the buildings-the most beautiful, according to Cortés, that he had yet seen in the country. After taking some refreshment at this place they continued their march along the dike. Though broader in this northern section, the troops found themselves much embarrassed by the throng of Indians, who not content with gazing on them from the boats, climbed up the causeway and lined the sides of the road. The general, afraid that his ranks might be disordered and that too great familiarity might diminish a salutary awe in the natives, was obliged to resort not merely to command but menace to clear a passage. He now found as he advanced a considerable change in the feelings shown towards the government. He heard only of the pomp and magnificence, nothing of the oppressions, of Montezuma. Contrary to the usual fact, it seemed that the respect for the court was greatest in its immediate neighhorhood

From the causeway the army descended on that narrow point of land which divides the waters of the Chalco from the Tezcucan lake, but which in those days was overflowed for many a mile now laid bare. Traversing this peninsula, they entered the royal residence of Iztapalapan, a place containing twelve or fifteen thousand houses, according to Cortés. It was governed by Cuitlahua, the emperor's brother, who, to do greater honor to the general, had invited the lords of some neighboring cities, of the royal house of Mexico like himself, to be present at the interview. This was conducted with much ceremony, and after the usual present of gold and delicate stuffs, a collation was served to the Spaniards in one of the great halls of the palace. The excellence of the architecture here also excited the admiration of the general, who does not hesitate, in the glow of his enthusiasm, to pronounce some of the buildings equal to the best in Spain. They were of stone, and the spacious apartments had roofs of odorous cedar-wood, while the walls were tapestried with fine cottons stained with brilliant colors.

But the pride of Iztapalapan, on which its lord had freely lavished his care and his revenues, was its celebrated gardens. They covered an immense tract of land, were laid out in regular squares, and the paths intersecting them were bordered with trellises supporting creepers and aromatic shrubs that loaded the air with their perfumes. The gardens were stocked with fruit trees imported from distant places and with the gaudy family of flowers which belong to Mexican flora, scientifically arranged and growing luxuriant in the equable temperature of the tableland. The natural dryness of the atmosphere was counteracted by means of aqueducts and canals that carried water into all parts of the grounds.

In one quarter was an aviary filled with numerous kinds of birds remarkable in this region both for brilliancy of plumage and of song. The gardens were intersected by a canal communicating with the lake of Tezcuco and of sufficient size for barges to enter from the latter. But the most elaborate piece of work was a huge reservoir of stone filled to a considerable height with water well supplied with different sorts of fish. This basin was sixteen hundred paces in circumference, and was surrounded by a walk, made also of stone, wide enough for four persons to go abreast. The sides were curiously sculptured, and a flight of steps led to the water below, which fed the aqueducts above noticed or, collected into fountains, diffused a perpetual moisture.

&lt;sup>1</sup> dug-out canoes <sup>2</sup> one of the great legendary heroes of the medieval romances of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries

Such are the accounts transmitted of these celebrated gardens at a period when similar horticultural establishments were unknown in Europe; and we might well doubt their existence in this semi-civilized land were it not a matter of such notoriety at the time and so explicitly attested by the invaders. But a generation had scarcely passed after the Conquest before a sad change came over these scenes so beautiful. The town itself was deserted and the shore of the lake was strewed with the wreck of buildings which once were its ornament and its glory. The gardens shared the fate of the city. The retreating waters withdrew the means of nourishment, converting the flourishing plains into a foul and unsightly morass, the haunt of loathsome reptiles; and the water-fowl built her nest in what had once been the palaces of princes!

In the city of Iztapalapan, Cortés took up his quarters for the night. We may imagine what a crowd of ideas must have pressed on the mind of the Conqueror as, surrounded by these evidences of civilization, he prepared with his handful of followers to enter the capital of a monarch who, as he had abundant reason to know, regarded him with distrust and aversion. This capital was now but a few miles distant, distinctly visible from Iztapalapan. And as its long lines of glittering edifices struck by the rays of the evening sun. trembled on the dark-blue waters of the lake, it looked like a thing of fairy creation rather than the work of mortal hands. Into this city of enchantment Cortés prepared to make his entry on the following morning. 2

1838-1843 1843

1 Prescott here refers in a note to five Spanish records

IOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY 1814-1877

Born at Dorchester, Massachusetts, and graduating from Harvard in 1831. Motley followed the few ambitious American vouths who were studying abroad, and found inspiration in Germany. He came home, practiced law, but entered public life. He was secretary of the American legation at St. Petersburg (now Leningrad) for a few months in 1841. In 1851 he went to Holland to gather materials for the History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic, published in 1856. Four years later came the first part of The History of the United Netherlands, completed in 1868. John van Barneveld appeared in 1874. From 1861 to 1867 Motley was United States Minister to Austria, and 1869-1870, Minister to England. Motley was a worthy representative of his country abroad, but becoming the victim of party politics with which he was in no way connected, he was recalled from England after about a year's service.

Motley's histories are fine examples of scholarly history made interesting. His style is vigorous and picturesque, and many of his narrative passages have almost the plot interest of a novel. Nearly all his work deals with the struggles of the Dutch against the oppression of Spain.

Biography and criticism: O. W. Holmes, J. L. Molley, a Memoir, 1898; Chubb; J. P. Grund, "Bismarck and Motley," No. Am. 167: 360-76, 481-96, 569-72; J. T. Morse Jr., "Centenary of the Historian," Nation 98:425-7; H. A. Bruce, "John Lothrop Motley—American," Outlook, 95:891-4.

From THE RISE OF THE DUTCH RE-PUBLIC 3

PART IV. CHAPTER II. [The Relief of Leyden]

The invasion of Louis of Nassau had, as already stated, effected the raising of the first siege of Leyden. That leaguer had lasted from the 31st of October 1573, to the 21st of March 1574, when the soldiers were summoned away to defend the frontier. By an extraordinary and culpable carelessness, the citizens, neglecting the advice of the Prince, had not taken Prescott here reters in a note to nve Spanish records of the conquest.

 Nov. 8, 1519. There follows a detailed account of the City of Mexico, the people, gods, customs, etc. Montezuma is persuaded to become the guest—really the prisoner—of Cortés. Learning too late of the Spanish desire for conquest and booty, and overcome with humiliation at his failure to maintain his people's supremacy, he refuses mediand overcome with humiliation at his failure to maintain his people's supremacy, he refuses medicine, and dies. The Aztecs unite, and drive Cortés, with the small remnant of his army, out of the city; but, weakened by tribal jealousies, the natives are later, after some terrible battles, defeated. In May, 1521, Cortés for the second time marches upon and successfully besieges Mexico City.

The Netherlands under Charles V of Austria and his son Philip II of Spain revealed the unnatural situation of a people of democratic instincts held in political servitude by a foreign power of different religious principles. They suffered all the terrors of the Inquisition at the hands of the cruel Spanish governor-general, the Duke of Alva, until in 1570, led by William the Silent, Prince of Orange, they rose in rebellion. The heroic endurance of the city of Leyden in resisting the Spanish siege is famous in history. Count Louis, of the house of Nassau—the reigning family in the Netherlands—a brother of the Prince of Orange, with help from France, made a successful counter attack from the French side and thus temporarily caused the siege of Leyden to be raised. He was killed in the battle of Mookerheyde, April, 1574. heyde, April, 1574.

advantage of the breathing time thus afforded them to victual the city and strengthen the garrison. They seemed to reckon more confidently upon the success of Count Louis than he had even done himself; for it was very probable that, in case of his defeat, the siege would be instantly resumed. This natural result was not long in following the battle of Mookerheyde.

On the 26th of May, Valdez 1 reappeared before the place, at the head of eight thousand Walloons and Germans, and Leyden was now destined to pass through a fiery ordeal. This city was one of the most beautiful in the Netherlands. Placed in the midst of broad and fruitful pastures, which had been reclaimed by the hand of industry from the bottom of the sea, it was fringed with smiling villages, blooming gardens, fruitful orchards. The ancient and, at last, decrepit Rhine, flowing languidly towards its sandy death-bed, had been multiplied into innumerable artificial currents, by which the city was completely interlaced. These watery streets were shaded by lime trees, poplars, and willows, and crossed by one hundred and forty-five bridges, mostly of hammered stone. The houses were elegant, the squares and streets spacious, airy, and clean, the churches and public edifices imposing, while the whole aspect of the place suggested thrift, industry, and comfort. Upon an artificial elevation, in the center of the city, rose a ruined tower of unknown antiquity. By some it was considered to be of Roman origin, while others preferred to regard it as a work of the Anglo-Saxon Hengist, raised to commemorate his conquest of England. 2 Surrounded by fruit trees, and overgrown in the center with oaks, it afforded, from its moldering battlements, a charming prospect over a wide expanse of level country, with the spires of neighboring cities rising in every direction. It was from this commanding height, during the long and terrible summer days which were approaching, that many an eye was to be strained anxiously seaward, watching if yet the ocean had begun to roll over the land.

Valdez lost no time in securing himself in the possession of Maeslandsluis, Vlaardingen, and The Hague. Five hundred English, under command of Colonel Edward Chester, abandoned the fortress of Valkenburg, and fled towards Leyden. Refused admittance by the citizens, who now, with reason, distrusted them, <sup>3</sup> they surrendered to Valdez, and were afterwards sent back to England. In the course of a few days, Leyden was thoroughly invested, no less than sixty-two redoubts, some of them having remained undestroyed from the previous siege, now girdling the city, while the besiegers already numbered nearly eight thousand, a force to be daily increased. On the other hand, there were no troops in the town, save a small corps of "freebooters," and five companies of the burgher guard. John Van der Does, Seigneur <sup>4</sup> of Nordwyck, a gentleman of distinguished family, but still more distinguished for his learning, his poetical genius, and his valor, had accepted the office of military commandant.

The main reliance of the city, under God, was on the stout hearts of its inhabitants within the walls, and on the sleepless energy of William the Silent without. The Prince, hastening to comfort and encourage the citizens, although he had been justly irritated by their negligence in having omitted to provide more sufficiently against the emergency while there had yet been time, now reminded them that they were not about to contend for themselves alone, but that the fate of their country and of unborn generations would, in all human probability, depend on the issue about to be tried. Eternal glory would be their portion if they manifested a courage worthy of their race and of the sacred cause of religion and liberty. He implored them to hold out at least three months, assuring them that he would, within that time, devise the means of their deliverance. The citizens responded, courageously and confidently, to these missives, and assured the Prince of their firm confidence in their own fortitude and his exertions.

And truly they had a right to rely on that calm and unflinching soul, as on a rock of adamant. All alone, without a being near him to consult, his right arm struck from him by the death of Louis, with no brother left to him but the untiring and faithful John, 5 he prepared without delay for the new task imposed upon him. France, since the defeat and death of Louis, and the busy intrigues which had followed the accession of Henry III, 6 had but small sympathy for the Netherlands. The

Leader of the Spanish forces; Walloons were inhabitants of French Flanders.

&lt;sup>2</sup> In the sixteenth century it was thought by some antiquarians that the Saxon conquerors of Britain came from Holland.

The relations between England and Spain had been very close. Philip II had been the husband of Queen Mary of England, and after her death had become suitor to Elizabeth. On the other hand, England depended greatly upon the Flemish trade, so that it was to her interest to remain neutral. Some of her soldiers were helping the Dutch, rather as soldiers of fortune than officially; often, as in this case, they were considered untrustworthy.

<sup>4</sup> Lord King of France, 1551-1589
5 Count John of Nassau

English government, relieved from the fear of France, was more cold and haughty than ever. An Englishman, employed by Requesens 1 to assassinate the Prince of Orange, had been arrested in Zeeland, who impudently pretended that he had undertaken to perform the same office for Count John, with the full consent and privity of Queen Elizabeth. The provinces of Holland and Zeeland were stanch and true, but the inequality of the contest between a few brave men, upon that handsbreadth of territory, and the powerful Spanish Empire, seemed to render the issue hopeless.

Moreover, it was now thought expedient to publish the amnesty which had been so long in preparation, and this time the trap was more liberally baited. The pardon, which had passed the seals upon the 8th of March, was formally issued by the Grand Commander on the 6th of June. By the terms of this document the King 2 invited all his erring and repentant subiects to return to his arms, and to accept a full forgiveness for their past offences, upon the sole condition that they should once more throw themselves upon the bosom of the Mother Church. There were but few exceptions to the amnesty, a small number of individuals, all mentioned by name, being alone excluded; but although these terms were ample, the act was liable to a few stern objections. It was easier now for the Hollanders to go to their graves than to mass, for the contest, in its progress, had now entirely assumed the aspect of a religious war. Instead of a limited number of heretics in a state which, although constitutional, was Catholic, there was now hardly a Papist to be found among the natives. accept the pardon then was to concede the victory, and the Hollanders had not yet discovered that they were conquered. They were resolved, too, not only to be conquered, but annihilated, before the Roman Church should be reëstablished on their soil, to the entire exclusion of the Reformed worship. ,They responded with steadfast enthusiasm to the sentiment expressed by the Prince of Orange, after the second siege of Leyden had been commenced: "As long as there is a living man left in the country, we will contend for our liberty and our religion." The single condition of the amnesty assumed, in a phrase, what Spain had fruitlessly striven to establish by a hundred battles, and the Hollanders had not faced their enemy on land and sea for seven years to succumb to a phrase at last.

<sup>2</sup> Philip II

Moreover, the pardon came from the wrong The malefactor gravely extended direction. forgiveness to his victims. Although the Hollanders had not yet disembarrassed their minds of the supernatural theory of government, and felt still the reverence of habit for regal divinity, they naturally considered themselves outraged by the trick now played before them. The man who had violated all his oaths, trampled upon all their constitutional liberties. burned and sacked their cities, confiscated their wealth, hanged, beheaded, burned, and buried alive their innocent brethren, now came forward, not to implore, but to offer forgiveness. Not in sackcloth, but in royal robes; not with ashes, but with a diadem upon his head, did the murderer present himself vicariously upon the scene of his crimes. It may be supposed that, even in the sixteenth century, there were many minds which would revolt at such blasphemy. Furthermore, even had the people of Holland been weak enough to accept the pardon, it was impossible to believe that the promise would be fulfilled. It was sufficiently known how much faith was likely to be kept with heretics, notwithstanding that the act was fortified by a papal bull, dated on the 30th of April, by which Gregory XIII promised forgiveness to those Netherland sinners who duly repented and sought absolution for their crimes, even although they had sinned more than seven times seven.

For a moment the Prince had feared lest the pardon might produce some effect upon men wearied by interminable suffering, but the event proved him wrong. It was received with universal and absolute contempt. No man came forward to take advantage of its conditions, save one brewer in Utrecht, and the son of a refugee peddler from Leyden. With these exceptions, the only ones recorded, Holland remained deaf to the royal voice. The city of Leyden was equally cold to the messages of mercy, which were especially addressed to its population by Valdez and his agents. Certain Netherlanders, belonging to the King's party, and familiarly called "Glippers," despatched from the camp many letters to their rebellious acquaintances in the city. In these epistles the citizens of Leyden were urgently and even pathetically exhorted to submission by their loyal brethren, and were implored "to take pity upon their poor old fathers, their daughters, and their wives." But the burghers of Leyden thought that the best pity which they could show to those poor old fathers, daughters, and wives was to keep them from the clutches

&lt;sup>1</sup> the new Spanish governor-general of the Netherlands successor to Alva

of the Spanish soldiery; so they made no answer to the Glippers, save by this single line, which they wrote on a sheet of paper, and forwarded, like a letter, to Valdez:—

Fistula dulce canit, volucrem cum decipit auceps. 1

According to the advice early given by the Prince of Orange, the citizens had taken an account of their provisions of all kinds, including the live stock. By the end of June, the city was placed on a strict allowance of food, all the provisions being purchased by the authorities at an equitable price. Half a pound of meat and half a pound of bread was allotted to a full grown man, and to the rest, a due proportion. The city being strictly invested. no communication, save by carrier pigeons, and by a few swift and skilful messengers. Sorties and called jumpers, was possible. fierce combats were, however, of daily occurrence, and a handsome bounty was offered to any man who brought into the city gates the head of a Spaniard. The reward was paid many times, but the population was becoming so excited and so apt, that the authorities felt it dangerous to permit the continuance of these conflicts. Lest the city, little by little, should lose its few disciplined defenders, it was now proclaimed, by sound of church bell, that in future no man should leave the gates.

The Prince had his headquarters at Delft and at Rotterdam. Between those two cities. an important fortress, called Polderwaert, secured him in the control of the alluvial quadrangle, watered on two sides by the Yssel and the Meuse. On the 29th June, the Spaniards, feeling its value, had made an unsuccessful effort to carry this fort by storm. They had been beaten off, with the loss of several hundred men, the Prince remaining in possession of the position, from which alone he could hope to relieve Leyden. He still held in his hand the keys with which he could unlock the ocean gates, and let the waters in upon the land, and he had long been convinced that nothing could save the city but to break the dikes. Levden was not upon the sea, but he could send the sea to Leyden, although an army fit to encounter the besieging force under Valdez could not be levied. The battle of Mookerheyde had, for the present, quite settled the question of land relief, but it was possible to besiege the besiegers with the waves of the ocean. The Spaniards occupied the coast from the Hague to Vlaardingen, but the dikes along the Meuse and Yssel were in possession of the Prince. He determined that these should be pierced, while, at the same time, the great sluices at Rotterdam, Schiedam, and Delftshaven should be opened. The damage to the fields, villages, and growing crops would be enormous, but he felt that no other course could rescue Levden, and with it the whole of Holland from destruction. His clear expositions and impassioned eloquence at last overcame all resistance. By the middle of July the estates fully consented to his plan, and its execution was immediately undertaken. "Better a drowned land than a lost land," cried the patriots, with enthusiasm, as they devoted their fertile fields to desolation. The enterprise for restoring their territory, for a season, to the waves, from which it had been so patiently rescued, was conducted with as much regularity as if it had been a profitable undertaking. A capital was formally subscribed. for which a certain number of bonds were issued, payable at a long date. In addition to this preliminary fund, a monthly allowance of fortyfive guldens 2 was voted by the estates, until the work should be completed, and a large sum was contributed by the ladies of the land, who freely furnished their plate, jewelry, and costly furniture to the furtherance of the scheme.

Meantime, Valdez, on the 30th July, issued most urgent and ample offers of pardon to the citizens, if they would consent to open their gates and accept the King's authority, but his overtures were received with silent contempt, notwithstanding that the population was already approaching the starvation point. Although not yet fully informed of the active measures taken by the Prince, yet they still chose to rely upon his energy and their own fortitude, rather than upon the honied words which had formerly been heard at the gates of Harlem and Naarden. 3 On the 3d of August, the Prince, accompanied by Paul Buys, chief of the commission appointed to execute the enterprise, went in person along the Yssel, as far as Kappelle, and superintended the rupture of the dikes in sixteen places. The gates at Schiedam and Rotterdam were opened, and the ocean began to pour over the land. While waiting for the waters to rise, provisions were rapidly collected, according to an edict of the

&lt;sup>1</sup> "The pipe sounds sweetly while the fowler beguiles the bird." Ovid.

&lt;sup>2</sup> A gulden was worth about forty cents of American money.

Maarden and Haarlem, which had endured terrible sieges, finally, after receiving pledges of safety, surrendered, only to suffer worse atrocities.

Prince, in all the principal towns of the neighborhood, and some two hundred vessels, of various sizes, had also been got ready at Rotterdam, Delfthaven, and other ports.

The citizens of Leyden were, however, already becoming impatient, for their bread was gone, and of its substitute malt-cake, they had but slender provision. On the 12th of August they received a letter from the Prince, encouraging them to resistance, and assuring them of a speedy relief, and on the 21st they addressed a despatch to him in reply, stating that they had now fulfilled their original promise, for they had held out two months with food, and another month without food. If not soon assisted, human strength could do no more: their malt-cake would last but four days, and after that was gone, there was nothing left but starvation. Upon the same day, however, they received a letter, dictated by the Prince, who now lay in bed at Rotterdam with a violent fever, assuring them that the dikes were all pierced, and that the water was rising upon the "Land-scheiding," the great outer barrier which separated the city from the sea. He said nothing however of his own illness, which would have cast a deep shadow over the joy which now broke forth among the burghers.

The letter was read publicly in the market-place; and to increase the cheerfulness, burgomaster Van der Werf, knowing the sensibility of his countrymen to music, ordered the city musicians to perambulate the streets. playing lively melodies and martial airs. Salvos of cannon were likewise fired, and the starving city for a brief space put on the aspect of a holiday, much to the astonishment of the besieging forces, who were not yet aware of the Prince's efforts. They perceived very soon, however, as the water everywhere about Levden had risen to the depth of ten inches, that they stood in a perilous position. It was no trifling danger to be thus attacked by the waves of the ocean, which seemed about to obey with docility the command of William the Silent. Valdez became anxious and uncomfortable at the strange aspect of affairs; for the besieging army was now in its turn beleaguered, and by a stronger power than man's. He consulted with the most experienced of his officers, with the country people, with the most distinguished among the Glippers, and derived encouragement from their views concerning the Prince's plan. They pronounced it utterly futile and hopeless. The Glippers knew the country well, and ridiculed the desperate project in unmeasured terms.

Even in the city itself, a dull distrust had succeeded to the first vivid gleam of hope, while the few royalists among the population boldly taunted their fellow-citizens to their faces with the absurd vision of relief which they had so fondly welcomed. "Go up to the tower, ye beggars," 1 was the frequent and taunting cry, "go up to the tower, and tell us if ve can see the ocean coming over the dry land to your relief"-and day after day they did go up to the ancient tower of Hengist, with heavy heart and anxious eye, watching, hoping, praying, fearing, and at last almost despairing of relief by God or man. On the 27th they addressed a desponding letter to the estates, 2 complaining that the city had been forgotten in its utmost need, and on the same day a prompt and warm-hearted reply was received, in which the citizens were assured that every human effort was to be made for their relief. "Rather," said the estates, "will we see our whole land and all our possessions perish in the waves, than forsake thee, Leyden. We know full well, moreover, that with Leyden, all Holland must perish also." They excused themselves for not having more frequently written, upon the ground that the whole management of the measures for their relief had been intrusted to the Prince, by whom alone all the details had been administered. and all the correspondence conducted.

The fever of the Prince had, meanwhile, reached its height. He lay at Rotterdam, utterly prostrate in body, and with mind agitated nearly to delirium, by the perpetual and almost unassisted schemes which he was constructing. Relief, not only for Leyden, but for the whole country, now apparently sinking into the abyss. was the vision which he pursued as he tossed upon his restless couch. Never was illness more unseasonable. His attendants were in despair, for it was necessary that his mind should for a time be spared the agitation of business. The physicians who attended him agreed, as to his disorder, only in this, that it was the result of mental fatigue and melancholy, and could be cured only by removing all distressing and perplexing subjects from his thoughts, but all the physicians in the world could not have succeeded in turning his attention for an instant from the great cause of his country. Leyden lay, as it were, anxious and despairing at his feet, and it was impossible or Water-beggars.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The Dutch patriots had been nicknamed Sea-beggars

the government, i. e., the representatives of the three estates or orders of society: the clergy, the nobility, and the common people for him to close his ears to her cry. Therefore, from his sick bed he continued to dictate words of counsel and encouragement to the city; to Admiral Boisot, commanding the fleet, minute directions and precautions. Towards the end of August a vague report had found its way into his sick chamber that Levden had fallen. and although he refused to credit the tale, vet it served to harass his mind, and to heighten fever. Cornelius Van Mierop, Receiver-General of Holland, had occasion to visit him at Rotterdam, and strange to relate, found the house almost deserted. Penetrating, unattended, to the Prince's bed-chamber, he found him lying quite alone. Inquiring what had become of all his attendants, he was answered by the Prince, in a very feeble voice, that he had sent them all away. The Receiver-General seems, from this, to have rather hastily arrived at the conclusion that the Prince's disorder was the pest, and that his servants and friends had all deserted him from cowardice. This was very far from being the case. His private secretary and his maître d'hôtel 1 watched, day and night, by his couch, and the best physicians of the city were in constant attendance. By a singular accident, all had been despatched on different errands, at the express desire of their master, but there had never been a suspicion that his disorder was the pest, or pestilential. Nerves of steel, and a frame of adamant could alone have resisted the constant anxiety and the consuming fatigue to which he had so long been exposed. His illness had been aggravated by the rumor of Leyden's fall, a fiction which Cornelius Mierop was now enabled flatly to contradict. The Prince began to mend from that hour. By the end of the first week of September, he wrote a long letter to his brother, assuring him of his convalescence, and expressing, as usual, a calm confidence in the divine decrees-"God will ordain for me," said he, "all which is necessary for my good and my salvation. He will load me with no more afflictions than the fragility of this nature can sustain."

The preparations for the relief of Leyden, which, notwithstanding his exertions, had grown slack during his sickness, were now vigorously resumed. On the 1st of September, Admiral Boisot arrived out of Zeeland with a small number of vessels, and with eight hundred veteran sailors. A wild and ferocious crew were those eight hundred Zeelanders. Scarred, hacked, and even maimed, in the unceasing conflicts in which their lives had passed; wearing crescents in their caps, with the inscription "Rather Turkish than Popish"; renowned far and wide, as much for their ferocity as for their nautical skill; the appearance of these wildest of the "Sea-beggars" was both eccentric and terrific. They were known never to give nor to take quarter, for they went to mortal combat only, and had sworn to spare neither noble nor simple, neither king, kaiser, nor pope, should they fall into their power.

More than two hundred vessels had been now assembled, carrying generally ten pieces of cannon, with from ten to eighteen oars, and manned with twenty-five hundred veterans, experienced both on land and water. The work was now undertaken in earnest. The distance from Levden to the outer dike, over whose ruins the ocean had already been admitted, was nearly fifteen miles. This reclaimed territory, however, was not maintained against the sea by these external barriers alone. The flotilla made its way with ease to the Land-scheiding. a strong dike within five miles of Leyden, but here its progress was arrested. The approach to the city was surrounded by many strong ramparts, one within the other, by which it was defended against its ancient enemy, the ocean, precisely like the circumvallations by means of which it was now assailed by its more recent enemy, the Spaniard. To enable the fleet, however, to sail over the land, it was necessary to break through this twofold series of defenses. Between the Land-scheiding and Levden were several dikes, which kept out the water; upon the level territory, thus encircled, were many villages, together with a chain of sixty-two forts which completely occupied the land. All these villages and fortresses were held by the veteran troops of the King; the besieging force being about four times as strong as that which was coming to the rescue.

The Prince had given orders that the Landscheiding, which was still one-and-a-half foot above water, should be taken possession of at every hazard. On the night of the 10th and 11th of September this was accomplished, by surprise, and in a masterly manner. The few Spaniards who had been stationed upon the dike were all despatched or driven off, and the patriots fortified themselves upon it, without the loss of a man. As the day dawned the Spaniards saw the fatal error which they had committed in leaving this bulwark so feebly defended, and from two villages which stood close to the dike, the troops now rushed in considerable force to recover what they had lost. A hot action succeeded, but the patriots had too securely established themselves. They completely defeated the enemy, who retired. leaving hundreds of dead on the field, and the patriots in complete possession of the Landscheiding. This first action was sanguinary and desperate. It gave an earnest of what these people, who came to relieve their brethren, by sacrificing their property and their lives, were determined to effect. It gave a revolting proof. too, of the intense hatred which nerved their arms. A Zeelander, having struck down a Spaniard on the dike, knelt on his bleeding enemy, tore his heart from his bosom, fastened his teeth in it for an instant, and then threw it to a dog, with the exclamation. "'Tis too bitter." The Spanish heart was, however, rescued, and kept for years, with the marks of the soldier's teeth upon it, a sad testimonial of the ferocity engendered by this war for national existence.

<sup>1</sup> steward or superintendent (of his household)

The great dike having been thus occupied, no time was lost in breaking it through in several places, a work which was accomplished under the very eyes of the enemy. The fleet sailed through the gaps; but, after their passage had been effected in good order, the Admiral found, to his surprise, that it was not the only rampart to be carried. The Prince had been informed, by those who claimed to know the country, that, when once the Landscheiding had been passed, the water would flood the country as far as Leyden, but the "Green-way," another long dike, three-quarters of a mile farther inward, now rose at least a foot above the water, to oppose their further progress. Fortunately, by a second and still more culpable carelessness, this dike had been left by the Spaniards in as unprotected a state as the first had been. Promptly and audaciously Admiral Boisot took possession of this barrier also, leveled it in many places, and brought his flotilla, in triumph, over its ruins. Again, however, he was doomed to disappointment. A large mere, called the Fresh-water Lake, was known to extend itself directly in his path about midway between the Landscheiding and the city. To this piece of water, into which he expected to have instantly floated. his only passage lay through one deep canal. The sea, which had thus far borne him on, now diffusing itself over a very wide surface, and under the influence of an adverse wind, had become too shallow for his ships. The canal alone was deep enough, but it led directly towards a bridge, strongly occupied by the enemy. Hostile troops, moreover, to the amount of three thousand, occupied both sides of the canal. The bold Boisot, nevertheless, determined to force his passage, if possible. Selecting a few of his strongest vessels, his heaviest artillery, and his bravest sailors, he led the van himself, in a desperate attempt to make his way to the mere. He opened a hot fire upon the bridge, then converted into a fortress, while his men engaged in hand-to-hand combat with a succession of skirmishers from the troops along the canal. After losing a few men, and ascertaining the impregnable position of the enemy, he was obliged to withdraw, defeated, and almost despairing.

A week had elapsed since the great dike had been pierced, and the flotilla now lay motionless in shallow water, having accomplished less than two miles. The wind, too, was easterly, causing the sea rather to sink than to rise. Everything wore a gloomy aspect, when, fortunately, on the 18th, the wind shifted to the northwest, and for three days blew a gale. The waters rose rapidly, and before the second day was closed the armada was afloat again. Some fugitives from Zoetermeer village now arrived. and informed the Admiral that, by making a detour to the right, he could completely circumvent the bridge and the mere. They guided him, accordingly, to a comparatively low dike. which led between the villages of Zoetermeer and Benthuyzen. A strong force of Spaniards was stationed in each place, but seized with a panic, instead of sallying to defend the barrier, they fled inwardly towards Leyden, and halted at the village of North Aa. It was natural that they should be amazed. Nothing is more appalling to the imagination than the rising ocean tide, when man feels himself within its power; and here were the waters, hourly deepening and closing around them, devouring the earth beneath their feet, while on the waves rode a flotilla, manned by a determined race, whose courage and ferocity were known throughout the world. The Spanish soldiers, brave as they were on land, were not sailors, and in the naval contests which had taken place between them and the Hollanders, had been almost invariably defeated. It was not surprising in these amphibious skirmishes. where discipline was of little avail, and habitual audacity faltered at the vague dangers which encompassed them, that the foreign troops should lose their presence of mind.

Three barriers, one within the other, had now been passed, and the flotilla, advancing with the advancing waves, and driving the enemy steadily before it, was drawing nearer to the beleaguered city. As one circle after another was passed, the besieging army found itself compressed within a constantly contracting field. The Ark of Delft, an enormous vessel, with shot-proof bulwarks, and moved by paddle-wheels turned by a crank, now arrived at Zoetermeer, and was soon followed by the whole fleet. After a brief delay, sufficient to allow the few remaining villagers to escape, both Zoetermeer and Benthuvzen, with the fortifications, were set on fire, and abandoned to their The blaze lighted up the desolate and watery waste around, and was seen at Leyden, where it was hailed as the beacon of hope. Without further impediment, the armada proceeded to North Aa; the enemy retreating from this position also, and flying to Zoeterwoude. a strongly fortified village but a mile and three quarters from the city walls. It was now swarming with troops, for the bulk of the besieging army had gradually been driven into a narrow circle of forts, within the immediate neighborhood of Leyden. Besides Zoeterwoude. the two posts where they were principally established, were Lammen and Leyderdorp, each within three hundred rods of the town. At Leyderdorp, were the headquarters of Valdez; Colonel Borgia commanded in the very strong fortress of Lammen.

The fleet was, however, delayed at North Aa by another barrier, called the "Kirk-way." The waters, too, spreading once more over a wider space, and diminishing under an east wind, which had again arisen, no longer permitted their progress, so that very soon the whole armada was stranded anew. The waters fell to the depth of nine inches, while the vessels required eighteen and twenty. Day after day the fleet lay motionless upon the shallow sea. Orange, rising from his sick bed as soon as he could stand, now came on board the fleet. His presence diffused universal joy; his words inspired his desponding army with fresh hope. He rebuked the impatient spirits, who, weary of their compulsory idleness, had shown symptoms of ill-timed ferocity; and those eight hundred mad Zeelanders, so frantic in their hatred to the foreigners who had so long profaned their land, were as docile as children to the Prince. He reconnoitered the whole ground. and issued orders for the immediate destruction of the Kirk-way, the last important barrier which separated the fleet from Leyden. Then, after a long conference with Admiral Boisot, he returned to Delft.

Meantime, the besieged city was at its last gasp. The burghers had been in a state of uncertainty for many days; being aware that the fleet had set forth for their relief, but knowing full well the thousand obstacles which it had to surmount. They had guessed its progress by the illumination from the blazing villages: they had heard its salvos of artillery on its arrival at North Aa; but since then, all had been dark and mournful again, hope and fear, in sickening alternation, distracting every breast. They knew that the wind was unfavorable, and, at the dawn of each day, every eye was turned wistfully to the vanes of the steeples. So long as the easterly breeze prevailed, they felt, as they anxiously stood on towers and house-tops, that they must look in vain for the welcome ocean. Yet, while thus patiently waiting, they were literally starving: for even the misery endured at Harlem had not reached that depth and intensity of agony to which Levden was now reduced. Bread, maltcake, horse-flesh, had entirely disappeared; dogs, cats, rats, and other vermin, were esteemed luxuries. A small number of cows. kept as long as possible, for their milk, still remained; but a few were killed from day to day, and distributed in minute proportions. hardly sufficient to support life among the famishing population. Starving wretches swarmed daily around the shambles where these cattle were slaughtered, contending for any morsel which might fall, and lapping eagerly the blood as it ran along the payement: while the hides. chopped and boiled, were greedily devoured. Women and children, all day long, were seen searching gutters and dunghills for morsels of food, which they disputed fiercely with the famishing dogs. The green leaves were stripped from the trees, every living herb was converted into human food, but these expedients could not avert starvation. The daily mortality was frightful-infants starved to death on the maternal breasts, which famine had parched and withered; mothers dropped dead in the streets, with their dead children in their arms. In many a house the watchmen, in their rounds, found a whole family of corpses,father, mother, and children, side by side, for a disorder called the plague, naturally engendered of hardship and famine, now came, as if in kindness, to abridge the agony of the people. The pestilence stalked at noonday through the city, and the doomed inhabitants fell like grass beneath its scythe. From six thousand to eight thousand human beings sank before this scourge alone, yet the people resolutely held out-women and men mutually encouraging each other to resist the entrance of their foreign foe—an evil more horrible than pest or famine.

The missives from Valdez, who saw more vividly than the besieged could do, the uncertainty of his own position, now poured daily into the city, the enemy becoming more prodigal of his vows, as he felt that the ocean might yet save the victims from his grasp. The inhabitants, in their ignorance, had gradually abandoned their hopes of relief, but they spurned the summons to surrender. Levden was sublime in its despair. A few murmurs were, however, occasionally heard at the steadfastness of the magistrates, and a dead body was placed at the door of the burgomaster, as a silent witness against his inflexibility. party of the more faint-hearted even assailed the heroic Adrian Van der Werf 1 with threats and reproaches as he passed through the streets. A crowd had gathered around him; as he reached a triangular place in the center of the town, into which many of the principal streets emptied themselves, and upon one side of which stood the church of Saint Pancras, with its high brick tower surmounted by two pointed turrets, and with two ancient lime-trees at its entrance. There stood the burgomaster, a tall. haggard, imposing figure, with dark visage, and a tranquil but commanding eye. He waved his broad-leaved felt hat for silence, and then exclaimed, in language which has been almost literally preserved. "What would ye, my friends? Why do ye murmur that we do not break our vows and surrender the city to the Spaniards?—a fate more horrible than the agony which she now endures. I tell you I have made an oath to hold the city, and may God give me strength to keep my oath! I can die but once; whether by your hands, the enemy's, or by the hand of God. My own fate is indifferent to me, not so that of the city intrusted to my care. I know that we shall starve if not soon relieved; but starvation is preferable to the dishonored death which is the only alternative. Your menaces move me not; my life is at your disposal; here is my sword, plunge it into my breast, and divide my flesh among you. Take my body to appease your hunger, but expect no surrender so long as I remain alive."

The words of the stout burgomaster inspired a new courage in the hearts of those who heard him, and a shout of applause and defiance arose from the famishing but enthusiastic crowd. They left the place, after exchanging new vows of fidelity with their magistrate, and again ascended tower and battlement to watch for the coming fleet. From the ramparts they hurled renewed defiance at the enemy. "Ye call us rat-eaters and dog-eaters." they cried. "and it is true. So long, then, as ye hear dog bark or cat mew within the walls, ve may know that the city holds out. And when all has perished but ourselves, be sure that we will each devour our left arms, retaining our right to defend our women, our liberty, and our religion against the foreign tyrant. Should God, in his wrath, doom us to destruction, and deny us all relief, even then will we maintain ourselves for ever against your entrance. When the last hour has come, with our own hands we will set fire to the city, and perish, men, women, and children together in the flames, rather than suffer our homes to be polluted, and our liberties to be crushed." Such words of defiance, thundered daily from the battlements, sufficiently informed Valdez as to his chance of conquering the city, either by force or fraud, but at the same time he felt comparatively relieved by the inactivity of Boisot's fleet, which still lay stranded at North Aa. "As well," shouted the Spaniards, derisively, to the citizens, "as well can the Prince of Orange pluck the stars from the sky as bring the ocean to the walls of Leyden for your relief."

1 the burgomaster (mayor)

On the 28th of September, a dove flew into the city, bringing a letter from Admiral Boisot. In this despatch, the position of the fleet at North Aa was described in encouraging terms. and the inhabitants were assured that, in a very few days at furthest, the long-expected relief would enter their gates. The letter was read publicly upon the market-place, and the bells were rung for joy. Nevertheless, on the morrow, the vanes pointed to the east, the waters, so far from rising, continued to sink, and Admiral Boisot was almost in despair. He wrote to the Prince, that if the spring-tide, now to be expected, should not, together with a strong and favorable wind, come immediately to their relief, it would be in vain to attempt anything further, and that the expedition would of necessity be abandoned. The tempest came to their relief. A violent equinoctial gale, on the night of the 1st and 2nd of October, came storming from the northwest, shifting after a few hours full eight points and then blowing still more violently from the southwest. The waters of the North Sea were piled in vast masses upon the southern coast of Holland. and then dashed furiously landward, the ocean rising over the earth, and sweeping with unrestrained power across the runed dikes.

In the course of twenty-four hours, the fleet at North Aa, instead of nine inches, had more than two feet of water. No time was lost. The Kirk-way, which had been broken through, according to the Prince's instructions, was now completely overflowed, and the fleet sailed at midnight, in the midst of the storm and dark-A few sentinel vessels of the enemy challenged them as they steadily rowed towards Zoeterwoude. The answer was a flash from Boisot's cannon, lighting up the black waste of waters. There was a fierce naval midnight battle: a strange spectacle among the branches of those quiet orchards, and with the chimneystacks of half-submerged farm houses rising around the contending vessels. The neighboring village of Zoeterwoude shook with the discharges of the Zeelanders' cannon, and the Spaniards assembled in that fortress knew that the rebel Admiral was at last afloat, and on his course. The enemy's vessels were soon sunk, their crews hurled into the waves. On went the fleet, sweeping over the broad waters which lay between Zoeterwoude and Zwieten. they approached some shallows, which led into the great mere, the Zeelanders dashed into the sea, and with sheer strength shouldered every vessel through. Two obstacles lay still in their path—the forts of Zoeterwoude and Lammen, distant from the city five hundred and two hundred and fifty yards respectively. Strong redoubts, both well supplied with troops and artillery, they were likely to give a rough reception to the light flotilla; but the panic, which had hitherto driven their foes before the advancing patriots, had reached Zoeterwoude. Hardly was the fleet in sight, when the Spaniards, in the early morning, poured out from the fortress, and fled precipitately to the left, along a road which led in a westerly direction towards The Hague. Their narrow path was rapidly vanishing in the waves, and hundreds sank beneath the constantly deepening and treacherous flood. The wild Zeelanders, too, sprang from their vessels upon the crumbling dike, and drove their retreating foes into the sea. They hurled their harpoons at them, with an accuracy acquired in many a polar chase; they plunged into the waves in the keen pursuit, attacking them with boat-hook and dagger. The numbers who thus fell beneath these corsairs, who neither gave nor took quarter, were never counted, but probably not less than a thousand perished. The rest effected their escape to The Hague.

The first fortress was thus seized, dismantled, set on fire and passed, and a few strokes of the oars brought the whole fleet close to Lammen. This last obstacle rose formidable and frowning directly across their path. Swarming as it was with soldiers, and bristling with artillery, it seemed to defy the armada either to carry it by storm or to pass under its guns into the city. It appeared that the enterprise was, after all, to founder within sight of the long expecting and expected haven. Boisot anchored his fleet within a respectful distance. and spent what remained of the day in carefully reconnoitering the fort, which seemed only too strong. In conjunction with Leyderdorp, the headquarters of Valdez, a mile and a half distant on the right, and within a mile of the city, it seemed so insuperable an impediment that Boisot wrote in despondent tone to the Prince of Orange. He announced his intention of carrying the fort, if it were possible, on the following morning, but if obliged to retreat, he observed, with something like despair, that there would be nothing for it but to wait for another gale of wind. If the waters should rise sufficiently to enable them to make a wide detour, it might be possible-if, in the meantime, Leyden did not starve or surrender —to enter its gates from the opposite side.

Meantime, the citizens had grown wild with expectation. A dove had been despatched by Boisot, informing them of his precise position. and a number of citizens accompanied the burgomaster, at nightfall, toward the tower of Hengist-"Yonder," cried the magistrate, stretching out his hand towards Lammen, "yonder, behind that fort, are bread and meat, and brethren in thousands. Shall all this be destroyed by the Spanish guns, or shall we rush to the rescue of our friends?" "We will tear the fortress to fragments with our teeth and nails," was the reply, "before the relief, so long expected, shall be wrested from us." It was resolved that a sortie, in conjunction with the operations of Boisot, should be made against Lammen with the earliest dawn. Night descended upon the scene, a pitch-dark night, full of anxiety to the Spaniards, to the armada, to Leyden. Strange sights and sounds occurred at different moments to bewilder the anxious sentinels. A long procession of lights issuing from the fort was seen to flit across the black face of the waters, in the dead of night, and the whole of the city wall, between the Cow-gate and the Tower of Burgundy, fell with a loud crash. The horror-struck citizens thought that the Spaniards were upon them at last; the Spaniards imagined the noise to indicate a desperate sortie of the citizens. Everything was vague and mysterious.

Day dawned at length, after the feverish night, and the Admiral prepared for the assault. Within the fortress reigned a death-like stillness, which inspired a sickening suspicion. Had the city, indeed, been carried in the night; had the massacre already commenced: had all this labor and audacity been expended in vain? Suddenly a man was descried, wading breasthigh through the water from Lammen towards the fleet, while at the same time, one solitary boy was seen to wave his cap from the summit of the fort. After a moment of doubt, the happy mystery was solved. The Spaniards had fled, panic-struck, during the darkness. Their position would still have enabled them. with firmness, to frustrate the enterprise of the patriots, but the hand of God, which had sent the ocean and the tempest to the deliverance of Leyden, had struck her enemies with terror likewise. The lights which had been seen moving during the night were the lanterns of the retreating Spaniards, and the boy who was now waving his triumphant signal from the battlements had alone witnessed the spectacle. So confident was he in the conclusion to which it led him, that he had volunteered at daybreak to go thither all alone. The magistrates, fearing a trap, hesitated for a moment to believe the truth, which soon, however, became quite evident. Valdez, flying himself from Leyderdorp, had ordered Colonel Borgia to retire with all his troops from Lammen. Thus, the Spaniards had retreated at the very moment that an extraordinary accident had laid bare a whole side of the city for their The noise of the wall, as it fell, entrance. only inspired them with fresh alarm: for they believed that the citizens had sallied forth in the darkness to aid the advancing flood in the work of destruction. All obstacles being now removed, the fleet of Boisot swept by Lammen, and entered the city on the morning of the 3d of October. Leyden was relieved.

The quays were lined with the famishing population, as the fleet rowed through the canals, every human being who could stand, coming forth to greet the preservers of the city. Bread was thrown from every vessel among the crowd. The poor creatures who for two months had tasted no wholesome human food, and who had literally been living within the jaws of death, snatched eagerly the blessed gift, at last too liberally bestowed. Many choked themselves to death, in the greediness with which they devoured their bread; others became ill with the effects of plenty thus suddenly succeeding starvation; -but these were isolated cases, a repetition of which was pre-The Admiral, stepping ashore, was welcomed by the magistracy, and a solemn procession was immediately formed. Magistrates and citizens, wild Zeelanders, emaciated burgher guards, sailors, soldiers, women, children,-nearly every living person within the walls all repaired without delay to the great church, stout Admiral Boisot leading the way. The starving and heroic city, which had been so firm in its resistance to an earthly king, now bent itself in humble gratitude before the King of kings. After prayers, the whole vast congregation joined in the thanksgiving hymn. Thousands of voices raised the song, but few were able to carry it to its conclusion, for the universal emotion, deepened by the music, became too full for utterance. The hymn was abruptly suspended, while the multitude wept like children. This scene of honest pathos terminated, the necessary measures for distributing the food and for relieving the sick were taken by the magistracy. A note dispatched to the Prince of Orange, was received by him at two o'clock, as he sat in church at Delft. It was of somewhat different purport from that of the letter which he had received early in the same day from Boisot-the letter in which the admiral had informed him that the success of the enterprise depended, after all, upon the desperate assault upon a nearly impregnable fort. The joy of the Prince may be easily imagined, and so soon as the sermon was concluded, he handed the letter just received to the minister, to be read to the congregation. Thus, all participated in his joy, and united with him in thanksgiving.

The next day, notwithstanding the urgent entreaties of his friends, who were anxious lest his life should be endangered by breathing, in his scarcely convalescent state, the air of the city where so many thousands had been dying of the pestilence, the Prince repaired to Leyden. He, at least, had never doubted his own or his country's fortitude. They could, therefore, most sincerely congratulate each other, now that the victory had been achieved. "If we are doomed to perish," he had said a little before the commencement of the siege, "in the name of God, be it so! At any rate, we shall have the honor to have done what no nation ever did before us, that of having defended and maintained ourselves, unaided, in so small a country, against the tremendous efforts of such powerful enemies. . . . "

1851-1855

FRANCIS PARKMAN 1823-1893

Pre-eminent among American historians who have written of their native land is Parkman. He was born in Boston and died near there. After he had graduated at Harvard and for a while studied law, his mind turned toward American life on the border in the previous century. Wishing to know Indians in their primitive state, he spent a summer with a Sioux tribe in the Black Hills and on the eastern Rocky Mountain slopes, impairing his health for the remainder of his life. He made many visits to Europe for documentary materials. and traveled much in America visiting the scenes of his narratives. His works include The Conspiracy of Pontiac, 1851; Pioneers of France in the New World, 1865; The Jesuits in North America, 1867; La Salle and the Discovery of the Great West, 1869; The Old Régime in Canada, 1874; Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV, 1877; Montcalm and Wolfe, 1884; A Half-Century of Conflict, 1892.

Parkman was pre-eminently the historian of the French in America. The Conspiracy of Pontiac was said by John Fiske to be "one of the most brilliant and fascinating books that has ever been written by any historian since the days of Herodotus." The book deals with relations between Englishmen and Indians, after France in 1760 had practically yielded Canada to England.

Parkman's histories present not only the romance of New World colonization but the conflict of two civilizations. The triumph of England resulted in making the North American continent, to the Rio Grande, an area for the extension of those free institutions that had been developing for a thousand years among Englishmen. His success came from exact knowledge gained in research, acquaintance with the topography of the scenes he describes, an understanding of the Indian mind, and a love, like Cooper's, for American themes. These elements led to the swift vividness of his style.

Biography and criticism: Henry Dwight Sedgwick, Francis Parkman, (AML) 1904; C. H. Farnham, Life, 1900; L. F. Abbott, "Francis Parkman," Outlook, 135:212-4; C. W. Alvord, Nation 117: 394-6; E. F. Wyatt. No. Am. 218:484-96.

From THE CONSPIRACY OF PONTIAC <sup>1</sup> CHAPTER XVI

MICHILLIMACKINAC

In the spring of the year 1763, before the war broke out, several English traders went up to Michillimackinac, some adopting the old route of the Ottawa, and others that of Detroit and the lakes. We will follow one of the latter on his adventurous progress. Passing the fort and settlement of Detroit he soon enters Lake St. Clair, which seems like a broad basin filled to overflowing, while, along its far distant verge, a faint line of forest separates the water from the sky. He crosses the lake, and his vovageurs 2 next urge his canoe against the current of the great river above. At length, Lake Huron opens before him, stretching its liquid expanse, like an ocean, to the farthest horizon, His canoe skirts the eastern shore of Michigan. where the forest rises like a wall from the water's edge; and as he advances northward, an endless line of stiff and shaggy fir trees, hung with long mosses, fringes the shore with an aspect of monotonous desolation. In the space of two or three weeks, if his Canadians labor well, and no accident occur, the trader approaches the end of his voyage. Passing on his right the extensive Island of Bois Blanc, he sees, nearly in front, the beautiful Mackinaw, rising, with its white cliffs and green foliage. from the broad breast of the waters. He does not steer towards it, for at that day the Indians were its only tenants, but keeps along the main shore to the left, while his voyageurs raise their song and chorus. Doubling a point, he sees before him the red flag of England swelling lazily in the wind, and the palisades and wooden bastions of Fort Michillimackinac standing close upon the margin of the lake. On the beach, canoes are drawn up, and Canadians and Indians are idly lounging. A little beyond the fort is a cluster of the white Canadian houses, roofed with bark, and protected by fences of strong round pickets.

<sup>1</sup> Great dissatisfaction prevailed among the Indians: the French had tactfully been their friends; the English were haughty; it was rumored that the English would seize all the Indian land. Making use of the Indian feeling thus aroused, French traders gradually aroused the Indians to oppose the English, and vaguely promised to help them.

The trader enters at the gate, and sees before him an extensive square area, surrounded by high palisades. Numerous houses, barracks. and other buildings form a smaller square within, and in the vacant space which they enclose, appear the red uniforms of British

A prophet, too, appeared among the Indians who urged them to rise up against the English outposts. All these things influenced Pontiac, the chief of the Ottawas, whose home was a village near Detroit. He was a man of such unusual intellect, courage, and strength of character, that his influence was felt far and wide among the Indian tribes. He foresaw the fate of the Indians if the English were left in control, and determined to make one great effort to restore the power of his race. Accordingly a plot was formed to attack at the same time all the scattered English fo ts of the western frontier, the combined garrisons of which numbered not more than five or six hundred men. In the spring and summer of 1763, therefore, a force made up of Delawares, Wvandottes, Shawnees, Mingoes, Chippewas, and other tribes, besieged Detroit, and in June made the attack here described on Fort Michilimackinac (pronounced mish'i-li-māk'i-nô).

soldiers, the gray coats of Canadians, and the gaudy Indian blankets, mingled in picturesque confusion, while a multitude of squaws, with children of every hue, stroll restlessly about the place. Such was Fort Michillimackinac in 1763. Its name, which, in the Algonquin tongue, signifies the Great Turtle, was first, from a fancied resemblance, applied to the neighboring island, and thence to the fort.

Though buried in a wilderness, Michillimackinac was still of no recent origin. As early as 1671, the Jesuits had established a mission near the place, and a military force was not long in following; for, under the French dominion, the priest and the soldier went hand in hand. Neither toil, nor suffering, nor all the terrors of the wilderness, could damp the zeal of the undaunted missionary; and the restless ambition of France was always on the alert to seize every point of vantage, and avail itself of every means to gain ascendency over the forest tribes. Besides Michillimackinac, there were two other posts in this northern region, Green Bay, and the Sault Ste. Marie. Both were founded at an early period, and both presented the same characteristic features, a missionhouse, a fort, and a cluster of Canadian dwellings. They had been originally garrisoned by small parties of militia, who, bringing their families with them, settled on the spot, and were founders of these little colonies. Michillimackinac, much the largest of the three, contained thirty families within the palisades of the fort, and about as many more without. Besides its military value, it was important as a center of the fur trade; for it was here that the traders engaged their men, and sent out their goods in canoes, under the charge of subordinates, to the more distant regions of the Mississippi and the northwest.

During the greater part of the year, the garrison and the settlers were completely isolated—cut off from all connection with the world; and, indeed, so great was the distance, and so serious the perils, which separated the three sister posts of the northern lakes, that often, through the whole winter all intercourse was stopped between them.

It is difficult for the imagination adequately to conceive the extent of these fresh-water oceans, and vast regions of forest, which, at the date of our narrative, were the domain of nature, a mighty hunting and fishing ground, for the sustenance of a few wandering tribes. One might journey among them for days, and even weeks together, without beholding a human face. The Indians near Michillimackinac were the Oiibwas and Ottawas, the former of whom claimed the eastern section of Michigan, and the latter the western, their respective portions being separated by a line drawn southward from the fort itself. The principal village of the Ojibwas contained about a hundred warriors, and stood upon the Island of Michillimackinac, now called Mackinaw. There was another smaller village near the head of Thunder Bay. The Ottawas, to the number of two hundred and fifty warriors, lived at the settlement of L'Arbe Croche, on the shores of Lake Michigan, some distance west of the fort. This place was then the seat of the old Tesuit mission of St. Ignace, originally placed by Father Marquette 1 on the northern side of the straits. Many of the Ottawas were nominal Catholics. They were all somewhat improved from their original savage condition, living in log houses, and cultivating corn and vegetables to such an extent as to supply the fort with provision. besides satisfying their own wants. The Oiibwas, on the other hand, were not in the least degree removed from their primitive barbarism.

These two tribes, with most of the other neighboring Indians, were strongly hostile to the English. Many of their warriors had fought against them in the late war, for France had summoned allies from the farthest corners of the wilderness, to aid her in her desperate struggle. This feeling of hostility was excited to a higher pitch by the influence of the Canadians, who disliked the English, not merely as national enemies, but also as rivals in the fur trade, and were extremely jealous of their intrusion upon the lakes. The following incidents, which occurred in the autumn of the year 1761, will illustrate the state of feeling which prevailed:—

At that time, although Michillimackinac had been surrendered, and the French garrison removed, no English troops had yet arrived to supply their place, and the Canadians were the only tenants of the fort. An adventurous trader, Alexander Henry, who, with one or two others, was the pioneer of the English fur trade in this region, came to Michillimackinac by the route of the Ottawa. On the way, he was several times warned to turn back, and assured of death if he proceeded, and, at length, was compelled for safety to assume the disguise of a Canadian voyageur. When his canoes, laden with goods, reached the fort, he was very coldly received by its inhabitants, who did all in their power to alarm and discourage

&lt;sup>1</sup> Jacques Marquette, 1637-1675, a Jesuit missionary and explorer, established the mission at St. Ignace about 1671.

Soon after his arrival, he received the very unwelcome information that a large number of Oubwas, from the neighboring villages, were coming, in their canoes, to call upon Under ordinary circumstances such a visitation, though disagreeable enough, would excite neither anxiety nor surprise; for the Indians, when in their villages, lead so monotonous an existence, that they are ready to snatch at the least occasion of excitement, and the prospect of a few trifling presents, and a few pipes of tobacco, is often a sufficient inducement for a journey of several days. But in the present instance, there was serious cause of apprehension, since Canadians and Frenchmen were alike hostile to the solitary trader. The story could not be better told than in his own graphic and truthful words.

"At two o'clock in the afternoon, the Chippewas (Oiibwas) came to the house, about sixty in number, and headed by Minavavana, their chief. They walked in single file, each with his tomahawk in one hand and scalpingknife in the other. Their bodies were naked from the waist upward, except in a few examples, where blankets were thrown loosely over the shoulders. Their faces were painted with charcoal, worked up with grease, their bodies with white clay, in patterns of various Some had feathers thrust through their noses, and their heads decorated with the same. It is unnecessary to dwell on the sensations with which I beheld the approach of this uncouth, if not frightful assemblage.

"The chief entered first, and the rest followed without noise. On receiving a sign from the former, the latter seated themselves on the floor.

"Minavavana appeared to be about fifty years of age. He was six feet in height, and had in his countenance an indescribable mixture of good and evil. Looking steadfastly at me, where I sat in ceremony, with an interpreter on either hand, and several Canadians behind me, he entered, at the same time, into conversation with Campion, inquiring how long it was since I left Montreal, and observing, that the English, as it would seem, were brave men, and not afraid of death, since they dared to come, as I had done, fearlessly among their enemies.

"The Indians now gravely smoked their pipes, while I inwardly endured the tortures of suspense. At length, the pipes being finished, as well as a long pause, by which they were succeeded. Minavavana, taking a few strings of wampum 2 in his hand, began the following speech:-

"'Englishman, it is to you that I speak, and I demand your attention.

"Englishman, you know that the French King is our father. He promised to be such; and we, in return, promised to be his children. This promise we have kept.

"Englishman, it is you that have made war with this our father. You are his enemy; and how, then, could you have the boldness to venture among us. his children? You know that his enemies are ours.

"'Englishman, we are informed that our father, the King of France, is old and infirm; and that, being fatigued with making war upon your nation, he is fallen asleep. During his sleep, you have taken advantage of him, and possessed yourselves of Canada. But his nap is almost at an end. I think I hear him already stirring, and inquiring for his children, the Indians; and when he does awake, what must become of you? He will destroy you utterly.

"'Englishman, although you have conquered the French, you have not yet conquered us. We are not your slaves. These lakes, these woods and mountains, were left to us by our ancestors. They are our inheritance; and we will part with them to none. Your nation supposes that we, like the white people, cannot live without bread, and pork, and beef! But you ought to know that He, the Great Spirit and Master of Life, has provided food for us in these spacious lakes, and on these woody mountains.

"'Englishman, our father, the King of France, employed our young men to make war upon your nation. In this warfare, many of them have been killed; and it is our custom to retaliate until such time as the spirits of the slain are satisfied. But the spirits of the slain are to be satisfied in either of two ways; the first is, by the spilling of the blood of the nation by which they fell; the other, by covering the bodies of the dead, and thus allaying the resentment of their relations. This is done by making presents.

"'Englishman, your King has never sent us any presents, nor entered into any treaty with us; wherefore he and we are still at war; and, until he does these things, we must consider that we have no other father nor friend, among the white men, than the King of France; but for you, we have taken into consideration that you have ventured your life among us, in the expectation that we should not molest you. You do not come armed, with an intention to make war; you come in peace, to trade with us, and supply us with necessaries, of which we are in much want. We shall regard you, therefore, as a brother; and you may sleep tranquilly, without fear of the Chippewas. As a token of our friendship, we present you this pipe to smoke.'

<sup>1</sup> probably an interpreter

&lt;sup>2</sup> shells or strings of shells used by the Indians as money and for ceremonial purposes

"As Minavavana uttered these words, an Indian presented me with a pipe, which, after I had drawn the smoke three times, was carried to the chief, and after him to every person in the room. This ceremony ended, the chief arose, and gave me his hand, in which he was followed by all the rest."

These tokens of friendship were suitably acknowledged by the trader, who made a formal reply to Minavavana's speech. To this succeeded a request for whisky on the part of the Indians, with which Henry unwillingly complied; and, having distributed several small additional presents, he beheld, with profound satisfaction, the departure of his guests. Scarcely had he ceased to congratulate himself on having thus got rid of the Ojibwas. or. as he calls them, the Chippewas, when a more formidable invasion once more menaced him with destruction. Two hundred L'Arbre Croche Ottawas came in a body to the fort, and summoned Henry, together with Goddard and Solomons, two other traders, who had just arrived, to meet them in council. Here they informed their startled auditors that they must distribute their goods among the Indians, adding a worthless promise to pay them in the spring, and threatening force in case of a refusal. Being allowed until the next morning to reflect on what they had heard, the traders resolved on resistance, and, accordingly, arming about thirty of their men, with muskets, they barricaded themselves in the house occupied by Henry, and kept strict watch all night. The Ottawas, however, did not venture an attack. On the following day, the Canadians, with pretended sympathy, strongly advised compliance with the demand; but the three traders resolutely held out, and kept possession of their stronghold till night, when, to their surprise and joy, the news arrived that the body of troops known to be on their way towards the fort were, at that moment, encamped within a few miles of it. Another night of watching and anxiety succeeded; but at sunrise, the Ottawas launched their canoes and departed, while, immediately after, the boats of the English detachment were seen to approach the landing-place. Michillimackinac received a strong garrison, and for a time, at least, the traders were safe.

Time passed on, and the hostile feelings of the Indians towards the English did not diminish. It necessarily follows, from the extremely loose character of Indian government,-if indeed the name government be applicable at all. —that the separate members of the same tribe have little political connection, and are often united merely by the social tie of totemship. 1 Thus the Ottawas at L'Arbre Croche were quite independent of those at Detroit. They had a chief of their own, who by no means acknowledged the authority of Pontiac, though the high reputation of this great warrior everywhere attached respect and influence to his The same relations subsisted between name. the Oiibwas of Michillimackinac and their more southern tribesmen; and the latter might declare war and make peace without at all involving the former.

The name of the Ottawa chief at L'Arbre Croche has not survived in history or tradition. The chief of the Oiibwas, however, is still remembered by the remnants of his people. and was the same whom Henry calls Minavavana, or, as the Canadians, entitled him, by way of distinction, Le Grand Sauteur, 2 or the Great Oiibwa. He lived in the little village of Thunder Bay, though his power was acknowledged by the Indians of the neighboring islands. That his mind was of no common order is sufficiently evinced by his speech to Henry; but he had not the commanding spirit of Pontiac. His influence seems not to have extended bevond his own tribe. He could not, or, at least, he did not, control the erratic forces of an Indian community, and turn them into one broad current of steady and united energy. Hence, in the events about to be described, the natural instability of the Indian character was abundantly displayed.

In the spring of the year 1763, Pontiac, in compassing his grand scheme of hostility, sent, among the rest, to the Indians of Michillimackinac, inviting them to aid him in the war. His messengers, bearing in their hands the warbelt of black and purple wampum, appeared before the assembled warriors, flung at their feet a hatchet painted red and delivered the speech with which they had been charged. The warlike auditory answered with deep ejacula-tions of applause, and, taking up the blood-red hatchet, pledged themselves to ioin in the con-Before the end of May, news reached the Oiibwas that Pontiac had already struck the English at Detroit. This wrought them up to a high pitch of excitement and emulation, and they resolved that peace should last no longer. Their numbers were at this time more than doubled, by several bands of their wandering people, who had gathered at Michillimackinac, from far and near, attracted probably by rumors of impending war. Being, perhaps, jealous of the Ottawas, or willing to gain all the glory and plunder to themselves, they determined to attack the fort, without communicating the design to their neighbors at L'Arbre Croche.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Tribal or clan relationship in a common ancestry was usually signified by an animal or object, a totem, to which the tribe believed themselves to be peculiarly or even sacredly related.
<sup>2</sup> "The Great Leaper"

At this time there were about thirty-five men, with their officers, in garrison at Michillimackinac. Warning of the tempest that impended had been clearly given; enough, had it been heeded, to have averted the fatal disaster. Several of the Canadians least hostile to the English had thrown out hints of approaching danger, and one of them had even told Captain Etherington, the commandant, that the Indians had formed a design to destroy, not only his garrison, but all the English on the lakes. With a folly, of which, at this period, there were several parallel instances among the British officers in America, Etherington not only turned a deaf ear to what he heard, but threatened to send prisoner to Detroit the next person who should disturb the fort with such tidings. Henry, the trader, who was at this time in the place, had also seen occasion to distrust the Indians: but on communicating his suspicions to the commandant, the latter treated them with total disregard. Henry accuses himself of sharing this officer's infatuation. That his person was in danger, had been plainly intimated to him, under the following curious circumstances:-

An Ojibwa chief, named Wawatam, had conceived for him one of those strong friendly attachments which often form so pleasing a feature in the Indian character. It was about a year since Henry had first met with this man. One morning, Wawatam had entered his house, and placing before him on the ground a large present of furs and dried meat, delivered a speech to the following effect: Early in life, after the ancient usage of his people, he had withdrawn to fast and pray in solitude, that he might propitiate the Great Spirit, and learn the future career marked out for him. In the course of his dreams and visions on this occasion it was revealed to him that, in after years. he should meet a white man, who should be to him a friend and brother. No sooner had he seen Henry, than the irrepressible conviction rose up within him, that he was the man whom the Great Spirit had indicated, and that the dream was now fulfilled. Henry replied to the speech with suitable acknowledgments of gratitude, made a present in his turn, smoked a pipe with Wawatam, and, as the latter soon after left the fort, speedily forgot his Indian friend and brother altogether. Many months had elapsed since the occurrence of this very characteristic incident when, on the second of June, Henry's door was pushed open without ceremony, and the dark figure of Wawatam glided silently in. He said that he was just returned from his wintering ground. Henry, at length recollecting him, inquired after the success of his hunt; but the Indian, without replying, sat down with a dejected air, and expressed his surprise and regret at finding his brother still in the fort. He said that he was going on the next day to the Sault Ste. Marie, and that he wished Henry to go with him. He then asked if the English had heard no bad news, and said that through the winter he himself had been much disturbed by the singing of evil birds. Seeing that Henry gave little attention to what he said, he at length went away with a sad and mournful face. One the next morning, he came again, together with his squaw, and, offering the trader a present of dried meat, again pressed him to go with him, in the afternoon, to the Sault Ste. Marie. When Henry demanded his reason for such urgency, he asked if his brother did not know that many bad Indians, who had never shown themselves at the fort, were encamped in the woods around it. Tomorrow, he said, they are coming to ask for whisky, and would all get drunk, so that it would be dangerous to remain. Wawatam let fall, in addition, various other hints, which, but for Henry's imperfect knowledge of the Algonquin language, could hardly have failed to draw his attention. As it was, however, his friend's words were spoken in vain; and at length, after long and persevering efforts, he and his squaw took their departure, but not, as Henry declares, before each had let fall some tears. Among the Indian women, the practice of weeping and wailing is universal upon all occasions of sorrowful emotion; and the kindhearted squaw, as she took down her husband's lodge, and loaded his canoe for departure, did not cease to sob and moan aloud.

On this same afternoon, Henry remembers that the fort was full of Indians, moving about among the soldiers with a great appearance of friendship. Many of them came to his house, to purchase knives and small hatchets, often asking to see silver bracelets, and other ornaments, with the intention, as afterwards appeared, of learning their places of deposit, in order the more easily to lay hand on them at the moment of pillage. As the afternoon drew to a close, the visitors quietly went away; and many of the unhappy garrison saw for the last time the sun go down behind the waters of Lake Michigan.

Chapter XVII

THE MASSACRE

The following morning was warm and sultry. It was the fourth of June, the birthday of King George. The discipline of the garrison was relaxed, and some license allowed to the soldiers. Encamped in the woods, not far off. were a large number of Ojibwas, lately arrived; while several bands of the Sac Indians from the River Wisconsin had also erected their lodges in the vicinity. Early in the morning, many Ojibwas came to the fort, inviting officers and soldiers to come out and see a grand game of ball, which was to be played between their nation and the Sacs. In consequence, the place was soon deserted by half its tenants. An outline of Michillimackinac, as far as tradition has preserved its general features, has already been given; and it is easy to conceive, with sufficient accuracy, the appearance it must have presented on this eventful morning. The houses and barracks were so ranged as to form a square, enclosing an extensive area, upon which their doors all opened, while behind rose the tall palisades, forming a large external square. The picturesque Canadian houses, with their rude porticoes, and projecting roofs of bark, sufficiently indicated the occupations of their inhabitants; for birch canoes were lying near many of them, and fishing nets were stretched to dry in the sun. Women and children were moving about the doors; knots of Canadian voyageurs reclined on the ground, smoking and conversing; soldiers were lounging listlessly at the doors and windows of the barracks, or strolling in a careless undress about the area.

Without the fort, the scene was of a very different character. The gates were wide open, and the soldiers were collected in groups under the shadow of the palisades, watching the Indian ball play. Most of them were without arms, and mingled among them were a great number of Canadians, while a multitude of Indian squaws, wrapped in blankets, were conspicuous in the crowd.

Captain Etherington and Lieutenant Leslie stood near the gate, the former indulging his inveterate English propensity; for, as Henry informs us, he had promised the Ojibwas that he would bet on their side against the Sacs. Indian chiefs and warriors were also among the spectators, intent, apparently, on watching the game, but with thoughts, in fact, far otherwise employed.

The plain in front was covered by the ball players. The game in which they were engaged, called baggattaway 1 by the Ojibwas, is still, as it always has been, a favorite with many Indian tribes. At either extremity of the ground, a tall post was planted, marking the stations of the rival parties. The object of each was to defend its own post, and drive the ball to that of its adversary. Hundreds of lithe and agile figures were leaping and bounding upon the plain. Each was nearly naked, his loose black hair flying in the wind, and each bore in his hand a bat of a form peculiar to this game. At one moment the whole were crowded together, a dense throng of combatants, all'struggling for the ball; at the next, they were scattered again, and running over the ground like hounds in full cry. Each, in his excitement, yelled and shouted at the height of his voice. Rushing and striking, tripping their adversaries, or hurling them to the ground, they pursued the animating contest amid the laughter and applause of the spectators. Suddenly, from the midst of the multitude, the ball soared into the air, and, descending in a wide curve, fell near the pickets of the fort. This was no chance stroke. It was part of a preconcerted stratagem to insure the surprise and destruction of the garrison. As if in pursuit of the ball, the players turned and came rushing, a maddened and tumultuous throng, towards the gate. In a moment they had reached it. The amazed English had no time to think or act. The shrill cries of the ball players were changed to the ferocious warwhoop. The warriors snatched from the squaws the hatchets, which the latter, with this design, had concealed beneath their blankets. Some of the Indians assailed the spectators without, while others rushed into the fort, and all was carnage and confusion. At the outset, several strong hands had fastened their gripe upon Etherington and Leslie, and led them away from the scene of massacre towards the woods.

<sup>1</sup> lacrosse

Within the area of the fort, the men were slaughtered without mercy. But here the task of description may well be resigned to the simple and manly pen of the trader Henry.

"I did not go myself to see the match which was now to be played without the fort, because, there being a canoe prepared to depart on the following day for Montreal, I employed myself in writing letters to my friends, and even when a fellow-trader, Mr. Tracy, happened to call upon me, saying that another canoe had just arrived from Detroit, and proposing that I should go with him to the beach, to inquire the news, it so happened that I still remained to finish my letters; promising to follow Mr. Tracy in the course of a few minutes. Mr. Tracy had not gone more than twenty paces from my door, when I heard an Indian war-cry, and a noise of general confusion.

"Going instantly to my window, I saw a crowd of Indians within the fort, furiously cutting down and scalping every Englishman they found: in particular, I witnessed the fate of Lieutenant Tamette.

"I had, in the room in which I was, a fowlingpiece, loaded with swan shot. This I immediately seized, and held it for a few minutes, waiting to hear the drum beat to arms. In this dreadful interval, I saw several of my countrymen fall, and more than one struggling between the knees of an Indian, who, holding him in this manner, scalped him while yet living.

"At length, disappointed in the hope of seeing resistance made to the enemy, and sensible, of course, that no effort of my own unassisted arm could avail against four hundred Indians, I thought only of seeking shelter amid the slaughter which was raging. I observed many of the Canadian inhabitants of the fort calmly looking on, neither opposing the Indians nor suffering injury; and from this circumstance, I conceived a hope of finding security in their houses.

"Between the yard door of my own house and that of M. Langlade, my next neighbor, there was only a low fence, over which I easily climbed. At my entrance, I found the whole family at the windows, gazing at the scene of blood before them. I addressed myself immediately to M. Langlade, begging that he would put me into some place of safety, until the heat of the affair should be over; an act of charity by which he might, perhaps, preserve me from the general massacre; but while I uttered my petition, M. Langlade, who had looked for a moment at me, turned again to the window, shrugging his shoulders, and intimating that he could do nothing for me—'Que voudries-vous que i'en ferais?' 1

"This was a moment for despair; but the next a Pani 2 woman, a slave of M. Langlade's, beckoned me to follow her. She brought me to a door, which she opened, desiring me to enter, and telling me that it led to the garret, where I must go and conceal myself. I joyfully obeyed her directions; and she, having followed me up to the garret door, locked it after me, and, with great presence of mind, took away the key.

"This shelter obtained, if shelter I could hope to find it, I was naturally anxious to know what might still be passing without. Through an aperture, which afforded me a view of the area of the fort. I beheld, in shapes the foulest and most terrible, the ferocious triumphs of barbarian conquerors. The dead were scalped and mangled: the dving were writhing and shricking under the unsatiated knife and tomahawk; and from the bodies of some, ripped open, their butchers were drinking the blood. scooped up in the hollow of joined hands, and quaffed amid shouts of rage and victory. was shaken not only with horror, but with fear. The sufferings which I witnessed I seemed on the point of experiencing. No long time elapsed before, every one being destroyed who could be found, there was a general cry of 'All is finished.' At the same instant, I heard some of the Indians enter the house where I was.

"The garret was separated from the room below only by a layer of single boards, at once the flooring of the one and the ceiling of the other. I could, therefore, hear everything that passed; and the Indians no sooner came in than they inquired whether or not any Englishmen were in the house. M. Langlade replied that 'he could not say, he did not know of any,' answers in which he did not exceed the truth: for the Pani woman had not only hidden me by stealth, but kept my secret and her own. M. Langlade was, therefore, as I presume, as far from a wish to destroy me as he was careless about saving me, when he added to these answers, that 'they might examine for themselves. and would soon be satisfied as to the object of their question.' Saying this, he brought them to the garret door.

"The state of my mind will be imagined. Arrived at the door, some delay was occasioned by the absence of the key; and a few moments were thus allowed me, in which to look around for a hiding-place. In one corner of the garret was a heap of those vessels of birch bark used in maple sugar making.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;What would you like to have me do about it?" 2 Pawnee, a tribe of western Indians

"The door was unlocked and opening, and the Indians ascending the stairs, before I had completely crept into a small opening which presented itself at one end of the heap. An instant after, four Indians entered the room, all armed with tomahawks, and all besmeared with blood, upon every part of their bodies.

"The die appeared to be cast. I could scarcely breathe; but I thought the throbbing of my heart occasioned a noise loud enough to betray me. The Indians walked in every direction about the garret; and one of them approached me so closely, that, at a particular moment, had he put forth his hand, he must have touched me. Still I remained undiscovered: a circumstance to which the dark color of my clothes, and the want of light, in a room which had no window in the corner in which I was, must have contributed. In a word, after taking several turns in the room, during which they told M. Langlade how many they had killed, and how many scalps they had taken, they returned downstairs, and I, with sensations not to be expressed, heard the door, which was the barrier between me and my fate, locked for the second time.

"There was a feather bed on the floor; and on this, exhausted as I was by the agitation of my mind, I threw myself down and fell asleep. In this state I remained till the dusk of the evening, when I was awakened by a second opening of the door. The person that now entered was M. Langlade's wife, who was much surprised at finding me, but advised me not to be uneasy, observing that the Indians had killed most of the English, but that she hoped that I might myself escape. A shower of rain having begun to fall, she had come to stop a hole in the roof. On her going away, I begged her to send me a little water to drink, which she did.

"As night was now advancing, I continued to lie on the bed, ruminating on my condition, but unable to discover a resource from which I could hope for life. A flight to Detroit had no probable chance of success. The distance from Michillimackinac was four hundred miles; I was without provisions and the whole length of the road lay through Indian countries, countries of an enemy in arms, where the first man whom I should meet would kill me. To stay where I was, threatened nearly the same issue. As before, fatigue of mind, and not tranquillity.

suspended my cares, and procured me farther sleen

The respite which sleep afforded me during the night was put an end to by the return of morning. I was again on the rack of apprehension. At sunrise, I heard the family stirring; and, presently after, Indian voices, informing M. Langlade that they had not found my hapless self among the dead, and they supposed be to be somewhere concealed. M. Langlade appeared, from what followed, to be, by this time, acquainted with the place of my retreat: of which, no doubt, he had been informed by his wife. The poor woman, as soon as the Indians mentioned me, declared to her husband, in the French tongue, that he should no longer keep me in his house, but deliver me up to my pursuers; giving as a reason for this measure, that should the Indians discover his instrumentality in my concealment, they might revenge it on her children, and that it was better that I should die than they. M. Langlade resisted, at first, this sentence of his wife, but soon suffered her to prevail, informing the Indians that he had been told I was in his house: that I had come there without his knowledge, and that he would put me into their hands. This was no sooner expressed than he began to ascend the stairs, the Indians following upon his heels.

"I now resigned myself to the fate with which I was menaced: and regarding every effort at concealment as vain. I arose from the bed, and presented myself full in view to the Indians, who were entering the room. They were all in a state of intoxication, and entirely naked, except about the middle. One of them, named Wenniway, whom I had previously known, and who was upwards of six feet in height, had his entire face and body covered with charcoal and grease, only that a white spot, of two inches in diameter, encircled either eye. This man, walking up to me, seized me, with one hand, by the collar of the coat, while in the other he held a large carving-knife, as if to plunge it into my breast; his eyes, meanwhile, were fixed steadfastly on mine. At length, after some seconds of the most anxious suspense, he dropped his arm, saying, 'I won't kill you!' To this he added, that he had been frequently engaged in wars against the English, and had brought away many scalps; that, on a certain occasion, he had lost a brother, whose name was Musinignon, and that I should be called after him.

"A reprieve, upon any terms, placed me among the living, and gave me back the sustaining voice of hope; but Wenniway ordered me downstairs, and there informing me that I was to be taken to his cabin, where, and indeed everywhere else, the Indians were all mad with liquor, death again was threatened, and not as possible only, but as certain. I mentioned my fears on this subject to M. Langlade, begging him to represent the danger to my master. M. Langlade, in this instance, did not withhold his compassion, and Wenniway immediately consented that I should remain where I was, until he found another opportunity to take me away."

Scarcely, however, had he been gone an hour. when an Indian came to the house, and directed Henry to follow him to the Ojibwa camp. Henry knew this man, who was largely in his debt, and some time before, on the trader's asking him for payment the Indian had declared in a significant tone, that he would pay him There seemed at present good ground to suspect his intention; but, having no choice, Henry was obliged to follow him. The Indian led the way out of the gate; but, instead of going towards the camp, he moved with a quick step in the direction of the bushes and sandhills behind the fort. At this, Henry's suspicions were confirmed. He refused to proceed farther, and plainly told his conductor that he believed he meant to kill him. 'The Indian coolly replied that he was quite right in thinking so, and at the same time, seizing the prisoner by the arm, raised his knife to strike him in the breast. Henry parried the blow, flung the Indian from him, and ran for his life. He gained the gate of the fort, his enemy close at his heels, and, seeing Wenniway standing in the center of the area, called upon him for protection. The chief ordered the Indian to desist; but the latter, who was foaming at the mouth with rage, still continued to pursue Henry, vainly striking at him with his knife. Seeing the door of Langlade's house wide open, the trader darted in, and at length found himself in safety. He retired once more to his garret, and lay down, feeling, as he declares, a sort of conviction that no Indian had power to harm him.

This confidence was somewhat shaken when, early in the night, he was startled from sleep by the opening of the door. A light gleamed in upon him, and he was summoned to descend. He did so, when, to his surprise and joy, he found, in the room below, Captain Etherington, Lieutenant Leslie, and Mr. Bostwick, a trader, together with Father Jonois, the Jesuit priest from L'Arbre Croche. The Indians were bent on enjoying that night a grand debauch upon the liquor they had seized; and the chiefs, well knowing the extreme danger to which the prisoners would be exposed during these revels, had conveyed them all into the fort, and placed them in charge of the Canadians.

Including officers, soldiers, and traders, they amounted to about twenty men, this handful being all that had escaped the massacre.

When Henry entered the room, he found his three companions in misfortune engaged in earnest debate. These men had supped full of horrors; yet they were almost on the point of risking a renewal of the bloodshed from which they had just escaped. The temptation was a strong one. The fort was this evening actually in the hands of the white men. The Indians, with their ordinary recklessness and improvidence, had neglected even to place a guard within the palisades. They were now, one and all, in their camp, mad with liquor. and the fort was occupied by twenty Englishmen, and about three hundred Canadians, principally voyageurs. To close the gates, and set the Indians at defiance, seemed no very difficult matter. It might have been attempted, but for the dissuasions of the Tesuit, who had acted throughout the part of a true friend of humanity, and who now strongly represented the probability that the Canadians would prove treacherous, and the certainty that a failure would involve destruction to every Englishman in the place. The idea was therefore abandoned. and Captain Etherington, with his companions. that night shared Henry's garret, where they passed the time in condoling with each other on their common misfortune.

A party of Indians came to the house in the morning, and ordered Henry to follow them The weather had changed, and a cold storm had set in. In the dreary and forlorn area of the fort were a few of the Indian conquerors, though the main body were still in their camp, not yet recovered from the effects of their last night's carouse. Henry's conductors led him to a house, where, in a room almost dark, he saw two traders and a soldier imprisoned. They were released, and directed to follow the party. The whole then proceeded together to the lake shore, where they were to embark for the Isles du Castor. A chilling wind blew strongly from the northeast, and the lake was covered with mists, and tossing angrily. Henry stood shivering on the beach, with no other upper garment than a shirt. drenched with the cold rain. He asked Langlade, who was near him, for a blanket, which <sup>1</sup> Beaver Islands in Lake Michigan the latter, with cold-blooded inhumanity, refused to furnish unless security was given for payment. Another Canadian proved more merciful, and Henry received a covering from the weather. With his three companions, guarded by seven Indians, he embarked in the canoe, the soldier being tied by his neck to one of the cross-bars of the vessel. The thick mists and the tempestuous weather compelled them to keep along the shore, close beneath the wet dripping forests. In this manner they had proceeded about eighteen miles, and were approaching L'Arbre Croche, when an Ottawa Indian came out of the woods, and called to them from the beach, inquiring the news, and asking who were their prisoners. Some conversation followed, in the course of which the canoe approached the shore, where the water was quite shallow. All at once, a loud yell was heard, and a hundred Ottawas, rising from among the trees and bushes, rushed into the water, and seized upon the canoe and prisoners. The astonished Oiibwas remonstrated in vain. The four Englishmen were taken from them, and led in safety to the shore. Good will to the prisoners, however, had by no means prompted the Ottawas to this very unexpected proceeding. They were jealous and angry that the Ojibwas should have taken the fort without giving them an opportunity to share in the plunder; and they now chose this summary mode of asserting their rights.

The chiefs, however, shook Henry and his companions by the hand, professing great good will, assuring them, at the same time, that the Ojibwas were carrying them to the Isles du Castor merely to kill and eat them. The four prisoners, the sport of so many changing fortunes, soon found themselves embarked in an Ottawa canoe, and on their way back to Michil-They were not alone. A flotilla limackinac. of canoes accompanied them, bearing a great number of Ottawa warriors; and before the day was over, the whole had arriced at the fort. At this time, the principal Ojibwa encampment was near the woods, in full sight of the landing-place. Its occupants, astonished at this singular movement on the part of their rivals, stood looking on in silent amazement, while the Ottawa warriors, well armed, filed into the fort, and took possession of it.

This conduct is not difficult to explain, when we take into consideration the peculiarities of the Indian character. Pride and jealousy are always strong and active elements in it. The Ottawas deemed themselves grossly insulted because the Ojibwas had undertaken an enterprise of such importance without consulting them, or asking their assistance. It may be added, that the Indians of L'Arbre Croche were somewhat less hostile to the English than the neighboring tribes; for the great influence of the priest Jonois seems always to have been exerted on the side of peace and friendship.

The English prisoners looked upon the new comers as champions and protectors, and conceived hopes from their interference not destined to be fully realized. On the morning after their arrival, the Ojibwa chiefs invited the principal men of the Ottawas to hold a council with them in a building within the fort. They placed upon the floor a valuable present of goods, which were part of the plunder they had taken; and their great war-chief Minavavana, who had conducted the attack, rose and addressed the Ottawas.

Their conduct, he said, had greatly surprised him. They had betrayed the common cause, and opposed the will of the Great Spirit, who had decreed that every Englishman must die. Excepting them, all the Indians had raised the hatchet. Pontiac had taken Detroit, and every other fort had also been destroyed. The English were meeting with destruction throughout the whole world, and the King of France was awakened from his sleep. He exhorted them, in conclusion, no longer to espouse the cause of the English, but, like their brethren, to lift the hatchet against them.

When Minavavana had concluded his speech, the council adjourned until the next day; a custom common among Indians, in order that the auditors may have time to ponder with due deliberation upon what they have heard. At the next meeting, the Ottawas expressed a readiness to concur with the views of the Oilb-Thus the difference between the two. tribes was at length amicably adjusted. The Ottawas returned to the Ojibwas some of the prisoners whom they had taken from them, still, however, retaining the officers and several of the soldiers. These they soon after carried to L'Arbre Croche, where they were treated with kindness, probably owing to the influence of Father Jonois. The priest went down to Detroit with a letter from Captain Etherington, acquainting Major Gladwyn with the loss of Michill mackinac and entreating that a force might be sent immediately to his aid. 1 The letter, as we have seen, was safely delivered; but Gladwyn was, of course, unable to render the required assistance.

Major Gladwyn in command of Fort Detroit, at this time—June, 1703—was resisting with about one hurdred men, a siege by over eight hundred Indians. Detroit was the only western fort that had not fallen a prey to Indian massacres.

Though the Ottawas and Oilbwas had come to terms, they still looked on each other with distrust, and it is said that the former never forgot the slight that had been put upon them. The Ojibwas took the prisoners who had been returned to them from the fort, and carried them to one of their small villages, which stood near the shore, at no great distance to the southeast. Among the other lodges was a large one, of the kind often seen in Indian villages, erected for use on public occasions, such as dances, feasts, or councils. It was now to serve as a prison. The soldiers were bound together, two and two, and farther secured by long ropes tied round their necks, and fastened to the pole which supported the lodge in the center. Henry and the other traders escaped this rigorous treatment. The spacious lodge was soon filled with Indians, who came to look at their captives, and gratify themselves by deriding and jeering at them. At the head of the lodge sat the great war-chief Minavavana. side by side with Henry's master, Wenniway. Things had remained for some time in this position, when Henry observed an Indian stooping to enter at the low aperture which served for a door, and, to his great joy, recognized his friend and brother, Wawatam, whom he had last seen on the day before the massacre. Wawatam said nothing; but, as he passed the trader, he shook him by the hand, in token of encouragement, and, proceeding to the head of the lodge, sat down with Wenniway and the war-chief. After he had smoked with them for a while in silence, he rose and went out again. Very soon he came back, followed by his squaw, who brought in her hands a valuable present, which she laid at the feet of the two chiefs. Wawatam then addressed them in the following speech: -

"Friends and relations, what is it that I shall say? You know what I feel. You all have friends, and brothers, and children, whom as yourselves you love; and you,—what would you experience, did you, like me, behold your dearest friend—your brother—in the condition of a slave; a slave, exposed every moment to insult, and to menaces of death? This case, as you all know, is mine. See there [pointing to Henry], my friend and brother among slaves,—himself a slave!

"You all well know that, long before the war began, I adopted him as my brother. From that moment, he became one of my family, so that no change of circumstances could break the cord which fastened us together.

"He is my brother; and because I am your relation, he is therefore your relation too; and how, being your relation, can he be your slave?

"On the day on which the war began, you were fearful lest, on this very account, I should reveal your secret. You requested, therefore, that I would leave the fort, and even cross the lake. I did so; but I did it with reluctance. I did it with reluctance, notwithstanding that you, Minavavana, who had the command in this enterprise, gave me your promise that you would protect my friend, delivering him from all danger, and giving him safely to me.

"The performance of this promise I now claim. I come not with empty hands to ask it. You, Minavavana, best know whether or not, as it respects yourself, you have kept your word; but I bring these goods to buy off every claim which any man among you all may have on my brother as his prisoner."

To this speech the war-chief returned a Wawatam's request was favorable answer. acceded to the present was accepted, and the prisoner released. Henry soon found himself in the lodge of his friend, where furs were spread for him to lie upon, food and drink brought for his refreshment, and everything done to promote his comfort that Indian hospitality could suggest. As he lay in the lodge. on the day after his release, he heard a loud noise from within the prison-house, which stood close at hand, and, looking through a crevice in the bark, he saw the dead bodies of seven soldiers dragged out. It appeared that a noted chief had just arrived from his wintering ground. Having come too late to take part in the grand achievement of his countrymen, he was anxious to manifest to all present his entire approval of what had been done, and with this design he had entered the lodge and despatched seven of the prisoners with his

The Indians are not habitual cannibals. After a victory, however, it often happens that the bodies of their enemies are consumed at a formal war-feast—a superstitious rite, adapted, as they think, to increase their courage and hardihood. Such a feast took place on the present occasion, and most of the chiefs partook of it, though some of them, at least, did so with repugnance.

About a week had now elapsed since the massacre, and a revulsion of feeling began to take place among the Indians. Up to this time all had been triumph and exultation; but they now began to fear the consequences of their conduct. Indefinite and absurd rumors of an approaching attack from the English were afloat at the camp, and, in their growing uneasiness, they thought it expedient to shift their position to some point more capable of defense. Three hundred and fifty warriors. with their families and household effects, embarked in canoes for the Island of Michillimackinac, seven or eight miles distant. Wawatam, with his friend Henry, was of the number. Strong gusts of wind came from the north, and when the fleet of canoes were half way to the island, it blew a gale, the waves pitching and tossing with such violence, that the frail and heavy-laden vessels were much endangered. Many voices were raised in prayer to the Great Spirit, and a dog was thrown into the lake, as a sacrifice to appease the angry manitou 1 of the waters. The canoes weathered the storm, and soon drew near the island. Two squaws, in the same canoe with Henry, raised their voices in mournful wailing and lamentation. Late events had made him sensible to every impression of horror, and these dismal cries seemed ominous of some new disaster, until he learned that they were called forth by the recollection of dead relatives, whose graves were visible upon a neighboring point of the shore.

The Island of Michillimackinac or Mackinaw, owing to its situation, its beauty, and the fish which the surrounding waters supplied, had long been a favorite resort of Indians. It is about three miles wide. So clear are the waters of Lake Huron, which wash its shores, that one may count the pebbles at an incredible depth. The island is fenced round by white limestone cliffs, beautifully contrasting with the green foliage that half covers them, and in the center The rock the land rises in woody heights. which forms its foundation assumes fantastic shapes—natural bridges, caverns, or sharp pinnacles, which, at this day, are pointed out as the curiosities of the region. In many of the caves have been found quantities of human bones, as if, at some period, the island had served as a grand depository for the dead; yet of these remains the present race of Indians can give no account. Legends and superstitions attached a mysterious celebrity to the place, and here it was said the fairies of Indian tradition might often be seen dancing upon the white rocks, or basking in the moonlight.

The Indians landed at the margin of a little bay. Unlading their canoes, and lifting them spirit (Indian)

high and dry upon the beach, they began to erect their lodges, and before night had completed their work. Messengers arrived on the next day from Pontiac, informing them that he was besieging Detroit, and urging them to come to his aid. But their warlike ardor had wellnigh died out. A senseless alarm prevailed among them, and they now thought more of securing their own safety than of injuring the enemy. A vigilant watch was kept up all day. and the unusual precaution taken of placing guards at night. Their fears, however, did not prevent them from seizing two English trading canoes, which had come from Montreal by way of the Ottawa. Among the booty found in them was a quantity of whisky, and a general debauch was the immediate result. As night closed in, the dolorous chanting of drunken songs was heard from within the lodges, the prelude of a scene of riot: and Wawatam, knowing that his friend Henry's life would be in danger, privately led him out of the camp to a cavern in the hills, towards the interior of the island. Here the trader spent the night. in a solitude made doubly dreary by a sense of his forlorn and perilous situation. On waking in the morning, he found that he had been lving on human bones, which covered the floor of the cave. The place had anciently served as a charnel-house. Here he spent another solitary night, before his friend came to apprise him that he might return with safety to the camp.

Famine soon began to be felt among the Indians, who were sometimes without food for days together. No complaints were heard; but with faces blackened, in sign of sorrow, they patiently endured the privation with that resignation, under inevitable suffering, which distinguishes the whole Indian race. They were at length compelled to cross over to the north shore of Lake Huron, where fish were more abundant, and here they remained until the end of summer, when they gradually dispersed, each family repairing to its winter huntinggrounds. Henry, painted and attired like an Indian, followed his friend Wawatan, and spent a lonely winter among the frozen forests, hunting the bear and moose for subsistence.

The posts of Green Bay and the Sault Ste. Marie did not share the fate of Michillimackinac. During the preceding winter, Ste. Marie had been partially destroyed by an accidental fire, and was therefore abandoned, the garrison withdrawing to Michillimackinac, where many of them perished in the massacre. The fort at Green Bay first received an English garrison in the year 1761, at the same time with the other posts of this region. The force consisted of seventeen men, commanded by Lieutenant Gorell. Though so few in number, their duties were of a very important character. In the neighborhood of Green Bay were numerous and powerful Indian tribes. The Menomonies lived at the mouth of Fox River, close to the fort. The Winnebagoes had several villages on the lake which bears their name, and the Sacs and Foxes were established on the River Wisconsin, in a large village composed of houses neatly built of logs and bark, and surrounded by fields of corn and vegetables. West of the Mississippi was the powerful nation of the Dahcotah, whose strength was loosely estimated at thirty thousand fighting men, and who, in the excess of their haughtiness, styled the surrounding tribes their dogs and slaves. The commandant of Green Bay was the representative of the British government, in communication with all these tribes. It devolved upon him to secure their friendship, and keep them at peace; and he was also intrusted, in a great measure, with the power of regulating the fur trade among them. In the course of each season, parties of Indians, from every quarter, would come to the fort, each expecting to be received with speeches and presents.

Gorell seems to have acquitted himself with great judgment and prudence. On first arriving at the fort, he had found its defenses decayed and ruinous, the Canadian inhabitants unfriendly, and many of the Indians disposed to hostility. His good conduct contributed to allay their irritation, and he was particularly successful in conciliating his immediate neighbors, the Menomonies. They had taken an active part in the late war between France and England, and their spirits were humbled by the losses they had sustained, as well as by recent ravages of the smallpox. Gorell summoned them to a council, and delivered a speech, in which he avoided wounding their pride, but at the same time assumed a tone of firmness and decision, such as can alone command an Indian's respect. He told them that the King of England had heard of their ill conduct, but that he was ready to forget all that had passed. If, however, they should again give him cause of complaint, he would send an army, numerous as the trees of the forest, and utterly destroy them. Flattering expressions of confidence and esteem succeeded, and the whole was enforced by the distribution of a few presents. The Menomonies replied by assurances of friendship, more sincerely made and faithfully kept than could have been expected. As Indians of the other tribes came from time to time to the fort, they met with a similar reception, and, in his whole intercourse with them, the constant aim of the commandant was to gain their good will. The result was most happy for himself and his garrison.

On the fifteenth of June, 1763, an Ottawa Indian brought to Gorell the following letter from Captain Etherington:-

"Michillimackinac, June 11, 1763.
"Dear Sir:

"This place was taken by surprise, on the fourth instant, by the Chippeways, [Ojibwas,] at which time Lieutenant Jamet and twenty [fifteen] more were killed, and all the rest taken prisoners; but our good friends, the Ottawas, have taken Lieutenant Lesley, me, and eleven men, out of their hands, and have promised to reinstate us again. You'll therefore, on the receipt of this, which I send by a canoe of Ottawas, set out with all your garrison, and what English traders you have with you, and come with the Indian who gives you this, who will conduct you safe to me. You must be sure to follow the instruction you receive from the bearer of this, as you are by no means to come to this post before you see me at the village, twenty miles from this. . . . I must once more beg you'll lose no time in coming to join me; at the same time, be very careful, and always be on your guard. I long much to see you, and am, dear sir,

"Your most humble serv't.
"Geo. Etherington.

"J. GORELL,
"Royal Americans."

On receiving this letter, Gorell summoned the Menomonies to a council, told them what the Ojibwas had done, and said that he and his soldiers were going to Michillimackinac to restore order, adding, that during his absence he commended the fort to their care. Great numbers of the Winnebagoes and of the Sacs and Foxes afterwards arrived, and Gorell addressed them in nearly the same words. Presents were given them, and it soon appeared that the greater part were well disposed towards the English, though a few were inclined to prevent their departure, and even to threaten hostility. At this juncture, a fortunate incident occurred. A Dahcotah chief arrived with a message from his people to the following import: They had heard, he said, of the bad conduct of the Ojibwas. They hoped that the tribes of Green Bay would not follow their example, but, on the contrary, would protect the English garrison. Unless they did so, the Dahcotah would fall upon them, and take ample revenge. This auspicious interference must, no doubt, be ascribed to the hatred with which the Dahcotah had long regarded the Ojibwas. That the latter should espouse one side of the quarrel, was abundant reason to the Dahcotah for adopting the other.

Some of the Green Bay Indians were also at enmity with the Oiibwas, and all opposition to the departure of the English was now at an end. Indeed, some of the more friendly offered to escort the garrison on its way; and on the twenty-first of June. Gorell's party embarked in several bateaux, 1 accompanied by ninety warriors in canoes. Approaching Isle du Castor, near the mouth of Green Bay, an alarm was given that the Ojibwas were lying there in ambush: on which the Menomonies raised the war-song, stripped themselves, and prepared to do battle in behalf of the English. The alarm, however, proved false; and, having crossed Lake Michigan in safety, the party arrived at the village of L'Arbre Croche on the thirtieth. The Ottawas came down to the beach to salute them with a discharge of guns. and, on landing, they were presented with the pipe of peace. Captain Etherington and Lieutenant Leslie, with eleven men, were in the village, detained as prisoners, though treated with kindness. It was thought that the Ottawas intended to disarm the party of Gorell also: but the latter gave out that he would resist such an attempt, and his soldiers were permitted to retain their weapons.

Several succeeding days were occupied by the Indians in holding councils. Those from Green Bay requested the Ottawas to set their prisoners at liberty, and the latter, at length. assented. A difficulty still remained, as the Ojibwas had declared that they would prevent the English from passing down to Montreal. Their chiefs were therefore summoned; and being at this time, as we have seen, in a state of much alarm, they at length reluctantly yielded the point. On the eighteenth of July. the English, escorted by a fleet of Indian canoes, left L'Arbre Croche, and reaching, without interruption, the portage of the River Ottawa, descended to Montreal, where they all arrived in safety, on the thirteenth day of August. Except the garrison of Detroit, not a British soldier now remained in the region of the lakes.

1848-1850 1851

1 boats (Fr.)

JOHN CALDWELL CALHOUN 1782-1850

Born in Abbeville District, South Carolina, Calhoun was brought up in all the customs and traditions of Southern society. He was graduated from Yale in 1804, studied and practiced law and soon entered politics. He was in Congress from South Carolina, 1811-1817, secretary of war, 1817-1825, vice-president of the United States, 1825-1832. He served in the Senate from 1832 to 1843, was secretary of state, 1844-1845, and from 1845 until his death was the chief spokesman for the South before the Civil War. His Works, consisting of state papers and orations, were first published in 1853.

Calhoun's theories of government and of our constitution rest upon his belief that sovereignty cannot be divided; that the nation is the servant of communities and not their coercer; and that minorities have rights that should not be overthrown by majorities. These theories he explained and defended with great skill both in writing and in his public speeches. These speeches appeal less to the emotions than Webster's, and less to popular interest; but to the student of government they present considerations that cannot be overlooked.

W. E. Dodd, "John C. Calhoun," in Statesmen of the Old South, 1911; W. M. Meigs, The Life of J. C. Calhoun, 2 vols. 1917; H. E. von Holst, (AS).

SPEECH ON THE FORCE BILL <sup>2</sup> FEBRUARY 15TH AND 16TH, 1833

Having made these remarks, the great question is now presented, Has Congress the right to pass this bill? which I will next proceed to consider. The decision of this question involves an inquiry into the provisions of the bill. What are they? It puts at the disposal of the President the army and navy, and the entire militia of the country; it enables him, at his pleasure, to subject every man in the

In this speech, Calhoun was defending the action of his state in resisting the tariff act of Congress of July 14th, 1832, imposing, for revenue and protection, duties upon various articles of imported merchandise. As agriculture was the chief resource of the South and manufacture that of the North, tariff for protection would especially benefit the North. Opposition in South Carolina to this act brought befoe Congress what was called the Force Bill, authorizing the President to use military force if necessary to enforce the tariff act. It was upon this bill that Calhoun was speaking. He had discussed at some length the tariff laws of 1816 and 1828, had said that South Carolina was loyal to the Union, that it did not deny the right of the Federal Government to lay duties on imports for revenue, but did deny its right to lav them for the protection of manufactures: that the public debt had been paid; and that this new impost duty would cause a large and dangerous surplus in the treasury. He then continued as above.

United States, not exempt from militia duty, to martial law: to call him from his ordinary occupation to the field, and under the penalty of fine and imprisonment, inflicted by a court martial, to imbrue his hand in his brother's There is no limitation on the power of the sword; -- and that over the purse is equally without restraint; for among the extraordinary features of the bill, it contains no appropriation, which, under existing circumstances, is tantamount to an unlimited appropriation. The President may, under its authority, incur any expenditure, and pledge the national faith to meet it. He may create a new national debt, at the very moment of the termination of the former-a debt of millions, to be paid out of the proceeds of the labor of that section of the country whose dearest constitutional rights this bill prostrates! exhibiting the extraordinary spectacle, that the very section of the country which is urging this measure, and carrying the sword of devastation against us, is, at the same time, incurring a new debt, to be paid by those whose rights are violated; while those who violate them are to receive the benefits, in the shape of bounties and expenditures.

And for what purpose is the unlimited control of the purse and of the sword thus placed at the disposition of the Executive? To make war against one of the free and sovereign members of this confederation, which the bill proposes to deal with, not as a State, but as a collection of banditti or outlaws. Thus exhibiting the impious spectacle of this Government, the creature of the States, making war against the power to which it owes its existence.

The bill violates the Constitution, plainly and palpably, <sup>1</sup> in many of its provisions, by authorizing the President at his pleasure, to place the different ports of this Union on an unequal footing, <sup>2</sup> contrary to that provision of the Constitution which declares that no preference shall be given to one port over another. It also violates the Constitution by authorizing him, at his discretion, to impose cash duties on one port, while credit is allowed in others; by enabling the President to regulate commerce, a power vested in Congress alone;

<sup>2</sup> The bill authorized the President, in case of unlawful obstruction, to move a customhouse to a secure

port.

and by drawing within the jurisdiction of the United States courts, powers never intended to be conferred on them. As great as these objections are, they become insignificant in the provisions of a bill which, by a single blowby treating the States as a mere lawless mass of individuals-prostrates all the barriers of the Constitution. I will pass over the minor considerations, and proceed directly to the great point. This bill proceeds on the ground that the entire sovereignty of this country belongs to the American people, as forming one great community, and regards the States as mere fractions or counties, and not as integral parts of the Union; having no more right to resist the encroachments of the Government than a county has to resist the authority of a State; and treating such resistance as the lawless acts of so many individuals, without possessing It has been sovereignty or political rights. said that the bill declares war against South Carolina. No. It decrees a massacre of her citizens! War has something ennobling about it, and, with all its horrors, brings into action the highest qualities, intellectual and moral. It was, perhaps, in the order of Providence that it should be permitted for that very purpose. But this bill declares no war, except, indeed, it be that which savages wage-a war, not against the community, but the citizens of whom that community is composed. But I regard it as worse than savage warfare-as an attempt to take away life under the color of law, without the trial by jury, or any other safeguard which the Constitution has thrown around the life of the citizen! It authorizes the President, or even his deputies, when they may suppose the law to be violated, without the intervention of a court or jury, to kill without mercy or discrimination!

It has been said by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Grundy] to be a measure of peace! Yes, such peace as the wolf gives to the lamb—the kite to the dove! Such peace as Russia gives to Poland, or death to its victim! A peace, by extinguishing the political existence of the State, by awing her into an abandonment of the exercise of every power which constitutes her a sovereign community. It is to South Carolina a question of self-preservation; and I proclaim it, that, should this bill pass, and an attempt be made to enforce it, it will be resisted, at every hazard—even that of death itself. Death is not the greatest calamity: there are others still more terrible to the free and brave, and among them may be placed the loss of liberty and honor. There are thousands of her brave sons who, if need be, are prepared cheerfully to lay down their lives in defense of the State, and the great principles of constitutional liberty for which she is contending. God forbid that this should become necessary! It never can be, unless this Government is resolved to bring the question to extremity, when her gallant sons will stand prepared to perform the last duty—to die nobly.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Those interested in the arguments on the other side may read Webster's speech in reply, which follows this. It should be remembered that the doctrines of nullification and secession were not uncommon. New England had thought of the possibility of seceding at the time of the war with Mexico. Cf. Lowell, Biglow Papers, First Series, I. last stanza.

&lt;sup>3</sup> in 1772, 1793, 1795, and again in 1814, Prussia, Austria, and Russia partitioned Poland among themselves. A Polish revolution in 1830-31 was put down by a large Russian army, and in 1832 Poland was declared a Russian province.

I go on the ground that this Constitution was made by the States: that it is a federal union of the States, in which the several States still retain their sovereignty. If these views be correct. I have not characterized the bill too strongly; and the question is, whether they be or be not. I will not enter into the discussion of this question now. I will rest it, for the present, on what I have said on the introduction of the resolutions now on the table. 1 under a hope that another opportunity will be afforded for more ample discussion. I will, for the present, confine my remarks to the objections which have been raised to the views which I presented when I introduced them. The authority of Luther Martin 2 has been adduced by the Senator from Delaware, to prove that the citizens of a state, acting under the authority of a state, are liable to be punished as traitors by this government. Eminent as Mr. Martin was as a lawver, and high as his authority may be considered on a legal point, I cannot accept it in determining the point at issue. The attitude which he occupied, if taken into view, would lessen, if not destroy, the weight of his authority. He had been violently opposed in convention to the Constitution, and the very letter from which the Senator has quoted was intended to dissuade Maryland from its adoption. With this view, it was to be expected that every consideration calculated to effect that object should be urged; that real objections should be exaggerated; and that those having no foundation, except mere plausible deductions, should be presented. It is to this spirit that I attribute the opinion of Mr. Martin in reference to the point under consideration. But if his authority be good on one point, it must be admitted to be equally so on another. If his opinion be sufficient to prove that a citizen of a State may be punished as a traitor when acting under allegiance to the State, it is also sufficient to show that no authority was intended to be given in the Constitution for the protection of manufactures by the general Government, and that the provisions in the Constitution permitting a State to lay an impost duty, 3 with the consent of Congress, was intended to reserve the right of protection to the States themselves, and that each State should protect its own industry. Assuming his opinion to be of equal authority on both points, how embarrassing would be the attitude in which it would place the Senator from Delaware, and those with whom he is acting-that of using the sword and bavonet to enforce the execution of an unconstitutional act of Congress. I must express my surprise that the slightest authority in favor of power should be received as the most conclusive evidence, while that which is, at least, equally strong in favor of right and liberty, is wholly overlooked or rejected.

tution

Notwithstanding all that has been said, I may say that neither the Senator from Delaware [Mr. Clayton], nor any other who has spoken on the same side, has directly and fairly met the great questions at issue: Is this a federal union? a union of States, as distinct from that of individuals? Is the sovereignty in the several States, or in the American people in the aggregate? The very language which we are compelled to use when speaking of our political institutions, affords proof conclusive as to its real character. The terms union, federal, united, all imply a combination of sovereignties, a confederation of States. They are never applied to an association of individuals. Who ever heard of the United State of New York, of Massachusetts, or of Virginia? Who ever heard the term federal or union applied to the aggregation of individuals into one community? Nor is the other point less clearthat the sovereignty is in the several States, and that our system is a union of twenty-four sovereign powers, under a constitutional compact, and not of a divided sovereignty between the States severally and the United States. In spite of all that has been said, I maintain that sovereignty is in its nature indivisible. It is

Calhoun had submitted, on Jan. 22, 1833, a series of resolutions against the Force Bill, and he had, in the first part of his speech here quoted, and in other speeches, discussed the relation of the Federal Government to the states a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1787 from Marvland, who had strongly opposed the centralization of power in the Federal Government and had even refused to sign the Constitution

<sup>3 &</sup>quot;No State shall, without consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws." Art. 1, Section 10 of the Constitution.

the supreme power in a State, and we might just as well speak of half a square, or half a triangle, as of half a sovereignty. It is a gross error to confound the exercise of sovereign powers with sovereignty itself, or the delegation of such powers with the surrender of them. A sovereign may delegate his powers to be exercised by as many agents as he may think proper, under such conditions and with such limitations as he may impose; but to surrender any portion of his sovereignty to another is to annihilate the whole. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. Clayton] calls this metaphysical reasoning, which he says he cannot comprehend. If by metaphysics he means that scholastic refinement which makes distinctions without difference, no one can hold it in more utter contempt that I do; but if, on the contrary, he means the power of analysis and combination-that power which reduces the most complex idea into its elements, which traces causes to their first principle, and, by the power of generalization and combination, unites the whole in one harmonious system—then, so far from deserving contempt, it is the highest attribute of the human mind. It is the power which raises man above the brute—which distinguishes his faculties from mere sagacity, which he holds in common with inferior animals. It is this power which has raised the astronomer from being a mere gazer at the stars to the high intellectual eminence of a Newton or a Laplace, 1 and astronomy itself from a mere observation of insulated facts into that noble science which displays to our admiration the system of the universe. And shall this high power of the mind, which has effected such wonders when directed to the laws which control the material world, be for ever prohibited, under a senseless cry of metaphysics, from being applied to the high purpose of political science and legislation? I hold them to be subject to laws as fixed as matter itself, and to be as fit a subject for the application of the highest intellectual power. Denunciation may, indeed, fall upon the philosophical inquirer into these first principles, as it did upon Galileo and Bacon 2 when they first unfolded the great discoveries which have immortalized their names; but the time will come when truth will prevail in spite of prejudice and denunciation, and when politics and legislation will be considered as much a science as astronomy and chemistry.

<sup>1</sup> Sir Isaac Newton, 1642-1727, discovered the law of gravitation. Laplace, 1749-1827, was a noted French astronomer.

In connection with this part of the subject, I understood the Senator from Virginia Mr. Rives 1 to say that sovereignty was divided, and that a portion remained with the States severally, and that the residue was vested in the Union. By Union, I suppose the Senator meant the United States. If such be his meaning-if he intended to affirm that the sovereignty was in the twenty-four States, in whatever light he may view them, our opinions will not disagree; but according to my conception, the whole sovereignty is in the several States, while the exercise of sovereign powers is divided-a part being exercised under compact, through this general Government, and the residue through the separate State Governments. But if the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Rives] means to assert that the twentyfour States form but one community, with a single sovereign power as to the objects of the Union, it will be but the revival of the old question, of whether the Union is a union between States, or distinct communities, or a mere aggregate of the American people, as a mass of individuals; and in this light his opinions would lead directly to consolidation.

But to return to the bill. It is said that the bill ought to pass, because the law must be enforced. The law must be enforced! imperial edict must be executed! It is under such sophistry, couched in general terms, without looking to the limitations which must ever exist in the practical exercise of power, that the most cruel and despotic acts ever have been covered. It was such sophistry as this that cast Daniel into the lion's den, and the three Innocents into the fiery furnace. 3 Under the same sophistry the bloody edicts of Nero and Caligula 4 were executed. The law must be enforced. Yes, the act imposing the "tea-tax must be executed." This was the very argument which impelled Lord North and his administration to that mad career which forever separated us from the British crown. Under a similar sophistry, "that religion must be protected," how many massacres have been perpetrated? and how many martyrs have been tied to the stake? What! acting on this vague abstraction, are you prepared to enforce a law without considering whether it be just or unjust, constitutional or unconstitutional? Will you collect money when it is acknowledged that it is not wanted? He who earns the money, who digs it from the earth with the sweat of his rrench astronomer.

Galileo, 1564-1642, the great Italian astronomer, was threatened with torture by the Inquisition. Sir Francis Bacon, 1561-1626, who was one of the first exponents of the inductive or experimental method of reasoning as opposed to the deductive, was ridiculed by many learned men.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Daniel iii, 20; vi, 16 <sup>4</sup> two of the most cruel of the Roman emperors

brow, has a just title to it against the universe. No one has a right to touch it without his consent except his government, and this only to the extent of its legitimate wants; to take more is robbery, and you propose by this bill to enforce robbery by murder. Yes: to this result you must come, by this miserable sophistry, this vague abstraction of enforcing the law, without a regard to the fact whether the law be just or unjust, constitutional or unconstitutional.

In the same spirit, we are told that the Union must be preserved, without regard to the means. And how is it proposed to preserve the Union? By force! Does any man in his senses believe that this beautiful structure—this harmonious aggregate of States, produced by the joint consent of all—can be preserved by force? very introduction will be certain destruction to this Federal Union. No. no. You cannot keep the States united in their constitutional and federal bonds by force. Force may, indeed, hold the parts together, but such union would be the bond between master and slave—a union of exaction on one side and of unqualified obedience on the other. That obedience which, we are told by the Senator from Pennsylvania Mr. Wilkins], is the Union! Yes, exaction on the side of the master; for this very bill is intended to collect what can be no longer called taxesthe voluntary contribution of a free people but tribute—tribute to be collected under the mouths of the cannon! Your custom-house is already transferred to a garrison, and that garrison with its batteries turned, not against the enemy of your country, but on subjects (I will not say citizens), on whom you propose to levy contributions. Has reason fled from our borders? Have we ceased to reflect? It is madness to suppose that the Union can be preserved by force. I tell you plainly, that the bill, should it pass, cannot be enforced. It will prove only a blot upon your statute-book, a reproach to the year, and a disgrace to the American Senate. I repeat, it will not be executed; it will rouse the dormant spirit of the people, and open their eyes to the approach of despotism. The country has sunk into avarice and political corruption, from which nothing can arouse it but some measure, on the part of the Government, of folly and madness, such as that now under consideration. 1

[SECOND DAY]

Having supplied the omissions of vesterday. I now resume the subject at the point where my remarks then terminated. The Senate will remember that I stated, at their close, that the great question at issue is, whether ours is a federal or a consolidated system of government: a system in which the parts, to use the emphatic language of Mr. Palgrave. 2 are the integers, and the whole the multiple, or in which the whole is an unit and the parts the fractions. I stated, that on the decision of this question. I believed, depend not only the liberty and prosperity of this country, but the place which we are destined to hold in the intellectual and moral scale of nations. I stated. also, in my remarks on this point, that there is a striking analogy between this and the great struggle between Persia and Greece, which was decided by the battles of Marathon, Plataea, and Salamis, and which immortalized the names of Miltiades and Themistocles. I illustrated this analogy by showing that centralism or consolidation, with the exception of a few nations along the eastern borders of the Mediterranean, has been the pervading principle in the Asiatic governments, while the federal system, or what is the same in principle, that system which organizes a community in reference to its parts, has prevailed in Europe. 3 . . .

But to return to the point immediately under consideration. I know that it is not only the opinion of a large majority of our country, but it may be said to be the opinion of the age, that the very beau ideal of a perfect government is the government of a majority, acting through a representative body, without check or limitation on its power; yet, if we may test this theory by experience and reason, we shall find that, so far from being perfect, the necessary tendency of all governments, based upon the will of an absolute majority, without constitutional check or limitation of power, is to faction, corruption, anarchy, and despotism; and this, whether the will of the majority be expressed directly through an assembly of the people themselves, or by their representatives. I know that, in venturing this assertion, I utter what is unpopular both within and without these walls; but where truth and liberty are con-

Calhoun, in closing his speech of the first day, criticized the stand taken by several senators, repeated the statement that the question was whether there was to be power or liberty, a federal government or a "consolidated one." On the second day, after reiterating that the action of South Carolina was not directed against revenue, but against protection, but that the two were so blended that it was impossible to discriminate between them, Calhoun proceeded as above.

2 Sir Francis Palgrave, 1788-1861, an English historian

Sir Francis Palgrave, 1788-1881, an English historian in the omitted paragraph the government of the twelve tribes of Israel is used as an illustration of the evils of a too centralized government.

cerned, such considerations should not be regarded. I will place the decision of this point on the fact that no government of the kind, among the many attempts which have been made, has ever endured for a single generation. but, on the contrary has invariably experienced the fate which I have assigned to it. Let a single instance be pointed out, and I will surrender my opinion. But, if we had not the aid of experience to direct our judgment, reason itself would be a certain guide. The view which considers the community as an unit, and all its parts as having a similar interest, is radically erroneous. However small the community may be, and however homogeneous its interests, the moment that government is put into operation—as soon as it begins to collect taxes and to make appropriations, the different portions of the community must, of necessity, bear different and opposing relations in reference to the action of the government. There must inevitably spring up two interests—a direction and a stockholder interest—an interest profiting by the action of the government, and interested in increasing its powers and action; and another, at whose expense the political machine is kept in motion. I know how difficult it is to communicate distinct ideas on such a subject, through the medium of general propositions, without particular illustration; and in order that I may be distinctly understood, though at the hazard of being tedious, I will illustrate the important principle which I have ventured to advance, by examples.

Let us, then, suppose a small community of five persons, separated from the rest of the world; and, to make the example strong, let us suppose them all to be engaged in the same pursuit, and to be of equal wealth. Let us further suppose that they determine to govern the commuity by the will of a majority; and, to make the case as strong as possible, let us suppose that the majority, in order to meet the expenses of the government, lay an equal tax, say of one hundred dollars on each individual of this little community. Their treasury would contain five hundred dollars. Three are a majority; and they, by supposition, have contributed three hundred as their portion, and the other two (the minority), two hundred. The three have the right to make the appropriations as they may think proper. The question is, How would the principle of the absolute and unchecked majority operate, under these circumstances, in this little community? If the three be governed by a sense of justice—if they should appropriate the money to the objects for which it was raised, the common and equal benefit of the five, then the object of the association would be fairly and honestly effected, and each would have a common interest in the government. But, should the majority pursue an opposite course-should they appropriate the money in a manner to benefit their own particular interest, without regard to the interest of the two (and that they will so act, unless there be some efficient check, he who best knows human nature will least doubt). who does not see that the three and the two would have directly opposite interests in reference to the action of the government? The three who contribute to the common treasury but three hundred dollars, could, in fact, by appropriating the five hundred to their own use, convert the action of the government into the means of making money, and, of consequence, would have a direct interest in increasing the taxes. They put in three hundred and take out five: that is, they take back to themselves all that they put in, and, in addition, that which was put in by their associates; or, in other words, taking taxation and appropriation together, they have gained, and their associates have lost, two hundred dollars by the fiscal action of the government. Opposite interests, in reference to the action of the government, are thus created between them: the one having an interest in favor, and the other against the taxes; the one to increase, and the other to decrease the taxes; the one to retain the taxes when the money is no longer wanted, and the other to repeal them when the objects for which they were levied have been secured.

Let us now suppose this community of five to be raised to twenty-four individuals, to be governed, in like manner, by the will of a majority: it is obvious that the same principle would divide them into two interests-into a majority and a minority, thirteen against eleven, or in some other proportion; and that all the consequences which I have shown to be applicable to the small community of five would be applicable to the greater, the cause not depending upon the number, but resulting necessarily from the action of the government Let us now suppose that, instead of governing themselves directly in an assembly of the whole, without the intervention of agents, they should adopt the representative principle; and that, instead of being governed by a majority of themselves, they should be governed by a majority of their representatives. It is obvious that the operation of the system would not be affected by the change: the representatives being responsible to those who chose them, would conform to the will of their constituents, and would act as they would do were they present and acting for themselves; and the same conflict of interest, which we have shown would exist in one case would equally exist in the other. In either case, the inevitable result would be a system of hostile legislation on the part of the majority, or the stronger interest, against the minority, or the weaker interest: the object of which, on the part of the former, would be to exact as much as possible from the latter, which would necessarily be resisted by all the means in their power. Warfare, by legislation, would thus be commenced between the parties, with the same object, and not less hostile than that which is carried on between distinct and rival nations -the only distinction would be in the instruments and the mode. Enactments, in the one case, would supply what could only be effected by arms in the other; and the inevitable operation would be to engender the most hostile feelings between the parties, which would merge every feeling of patriotism—that feeling which embraces the whole—and substitute in its place the most violent party attachment; and instead of having one common center of attachment, around which the affections of the community might rally, there would in fact be two-the interests of the majority, to which those who constitute that majority would be more attached than they would be to the whole,-and that of the minority, to which they, in like manner, would also be more attached than to the interests of the whole. Faction would thus take the place of patriotism; and, with the loss of patriotism, corruption must necessarily follow, and in its train, anarchy, and, finally, despotism, or the establishment of absolute power in a single individual, as a means of arresting the conflict of hostile interests; on the principle that it is better to submit to the will of a single individual, who by being made lord and master of the whole community, would have an equal interest in the protection of all the parts.

Let us next suppose that, in order to avert the calamitous train of consequences, this little community should adopt a written constitution, with limitations restricting the will of the majority, in order to protect the minority against the oppression which I have shown would necessarily result without such restrictions. It is obvious that the case would not be in the slightest degree varied, if the majority be left in possession of the right of judging exclusively of the extent of its powers, without any right on the part of the minority to enforce the restrictions imposed by the constitution on the will of the majority. The point is almost too clear for illustration. Nothing can be more certain than that, when a constitution grants power, and imposes limitations on the exercise of that power, whatever interests may obtain possession of the government, will be in favor of extending the power at the expense of the limitation; and that, unless those in whose behalf the limitations were imposed have, in some form or mode, the right of enforcing them, the power will ultimately supersede the limitation, and the government must operate precisely in the same manner as if the will of the majority governed without constitution or limitation of power.

I have thus presented all possible modes in which a government founded upon the will of an absolute majority will be modified; and have demonstrated that, in all its forms, whether in a majority of the people, as in a mere democracy, or in a majority of their representatives, without a constitution or with a constitution, to be interpreted as the will of the majority, the result will be the same: two hostile interests will inevitably be created by the action of the government, to be followed by hostile legislation, and that by faction, corruption, anarchy, and despotism.

The great and solemn question here presents itself. Is there any remedy for these evils? on the decision of which depends the question. whether the people can govern themselves, which has been so often asked with so much skepticism and doubt. There is a remedy, and but one,—the effect of which, whatever may be the form, is to organize society in reference to this conflict of interests, which springs out of the action of government; and which can only be done by giving to each part the right of self-protection; which, in a word, instead of considering the community of twenty-four a single community, having a common interest, and to be governed by the single will of an entire majority, shall upon all questions tending to bring the parts into conflict, the thirteen against the eleven, take the will, not of the twenty-four as a unit, but that of the thirteen and that of the eleven separately,—the majority of each governing the parts, and where they concur, governing the whole,—and where they disagree, arresting the action of the government. This I will call the concurring, as distinct from the absolute majority. It would not be, as was generally supposed, a minority governing a majority. In either way the number would be the same, whether taken as the absolute or as the concurring majority. Thus, the majority of the thirteen is seven, and of the eleven six; and the two together make thirteen, which is the majority of twenty-four. But, though the number is the same, the mode of counting is essentially different; the one representing the strongest interest, and the other, the entire interests of the community. The first mistake is, in supposing that the government of the absolute majority is the government of this people—that beau ideal of a perfect government which has been so enthusiastically entertained in every age by the generous and patriotic, where civilization and liberty have made the smallest progress. There can be no greater error: the government of the people is the government of the whole community—of the twenty-four—the self-government of all the parts—too perfect to be reduced to practice in the present, or any past stage of human society. The government of the absolute majority, instead of being the government of the people, is but the government of the strongest interests, and, when not efficiently checked, is the most tyrannical and oppressive that can be devised. Between this ideal perfection on one side, and despotism on the other. no other system can be devised but that which considers society in reference to its parts, as differently affected by the action of the government, and which takes the sense of each part separately, and thereby the sense of the whole, in the manner already illustrated.

These principles, as I have already stated. are not affected by the number of which the community may be composed, and are just as applicable to one of thirteen millions—the number which composes ours-as of the small community of twenty-four, which I have supposed for the purpose of illustration; and are not less applicable to the twenty-four States united in one community, than to the case of the twenty-four individuals. There is, indeed, a distinction between a large and a small community, not affecting the principle, but the violence of the action. In the former, the similarity of the interests of all the parts will limit the oppression from the hostile action of the parts, in a great degree, to the fiscal action of the government merely; but in the large community, spreading over a country of great extent, and having a great diversity of interests, with different kinds of labor, capital, and production, the conflict and oppression will extend not only to a monopoly of the appropriations on the part of the stronger interests. but will end in unequal taxes, and a general conflict between the entire interests of conflicting sections, which, if not arrested by the most powerful checks, will terminate in the most oppressive tyranny that can be conceived, or in the destruction of the community itself.

If we turn our attention from these supposed cases, and direct it to our Government and its actual operation, we shall find a practical confirmation of the truth of what has been stated, not only of the oppressive operation of the system of an absolute majority, but also a striking and beautiful illustration. in the formation of our system, of the principle of the concurring majority, as distinct from the absolute, which I have asserted to be the only means of efficiently checking the abuse of power, and, of course, the only solid foundation of constitutional liberty. That our Government. for many years, has been gradually verging to consolidation; that the Constitution has gradually become a dead letter; and that all restrictions upon the power of government have been virtually removed, so as practically to convert the general Government into a government of an absolute majority, without check or limitation, cannot be denied by any one who has impartially observed its operation.

It is not necessary to trace the commencement and gradual progress of the causes which have produced this change in our system: it is sufficient to state that the change has taken place within the last few years. What has been the result? Precisely that which might have been anticipated: the growth of faction, corruption, anarchy, and, if not despotism itself, its near approach, as witnessed in the provisions of this bill. And from what have these consequences sprung? We have been involved in no war. We have been at peace with all the world. We have been visited with no national calamity. Our people have been advancing in general intelligence, and, I will add, as great and alarming as has been the advance of political corruption among the mercenary corps who look to government for support, the morals and virtue of the community at large have been advancing in improvement. What, I again repeat, is the cause? No other can be assigned but a departure from the fundamental principles of the Constitution, which has converted the Government into the will of an absolute and irresponsible majority, and which, by the laws that must inevitably govern in all such majorities, has placed in conflict the great interests of the country, by a system of hostile legislation. by an oppressive and unequal imposition of taxes, by unequal and profuse appropriations.

and by rendering the entire labor and capital of the weaker interest subordinate to the stronger. 1

To maintain the ascendency of the Constitution over the law-making majority is the great and essential point, on which the success of the system must depend. Unless that ascendency can be preserved, the necessary consequence must be, that the laws will supersede the Constitution; and, finally, the will of the Executive, by the influence of his patronage, will supersede the laws-indications of which are already perceptible. This ascendency can only be preserved through the action of the States as organized bodies, having their own separate governments, and possessed of the right, under the structure of our system, of judging of the extent of their separate powers, and of interposing their authority to arrest the unauthorized enactments of the general Government within their respective limits. I will not enter, at this time, into the discussion of this important point, as it has been ably and fully presented by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Bibb]. and others who preceded him in this debate on the same side, whose arguments not only remain unanswered, but are unanswerable. It is only by this power of interposition that the reserved rights of the States can be peacefully and efficiently protected against the encroachments of the general Government-that the limitations imposed upon its authority can be enforced, and its movements confined to the orbit allotted to it by the Constitution. 2

But, to return to the general Government. We have now sufficient experience to ascertain that the tendency to conflict in its action is between the southern and other sections. The latter having a decided majority, must habitually be possessed of the powers of the Government, both in this and in the other House; and. being governed by that instinctive love of power so natural to the human breast, they must become the advocates of the power of Government, and in the same degree opposed to the limitations; while the other and weaker section is as necessarily thrown on the side of the limitations. One section is the natural guardian of the delegated powers, and the other of the reserved; and the struggle on the side of the former will be to enlarge the powers, while that on the opposite side will be to restrain them within their constitutional limits. The contest will, in fact, be a contest between power and liberty, and such I consider the present—a contest in which the weaker section, with its peculiar labor, productions, and institutions, has at stake all that can be dear to freemen. Should we be able to maintain in their full vigor our reserved rights, liberty and prosperity will be our portion; but if we yield. and permit the stronger interest to concentrate within itself all the powers of the Government. then will our fate be more wretched than that of the aborigines whom we have expelled. In this great struggle between the delegated and reserved powers, so far from repining that my lot, and that of those whom I represent, is cast on the side of the latter, I rejoice that such is the fact; for, though we participate in but few of the advantages of the Government, we are compensated, and more than compensated, in not being so much exposed to its corruption. Nor do I repine that the duty, so difficult to be discharged, of defending the reserved powers against apparently such fearful odds. has been assigned to us. To discharge successfully requires the highest qualities, moral and intellectual; and should we perform it with a zeal and ability in proportion to its magnitude, instead of being mere planters, our section will become distinguished for its patriots and statesmen. But, on the other hand, if we prove unworthy of the trust-if we yield to the steady encroachment of power, the severest calamity and most debasing corruption will overspread the land. Every Southern man, true to the interests of his section. and faithful to the duties which Providence has allotted him, will be forever excluded from the honors and emoluments of this Government, which will be reserved for those only who have qualified themselves, by political prostitution, for admission into the Magdalen Asylum.

1833 1833

DANIEL WEBSTER 1782-1852

To millions of American youth Webster has stood with Lincoln as an example of how men may rise from untoward circumstances to positions of national importance. He was born in poverty at Franklin, New Hampshire, the son of a farmer. but graduated from Dartmouth, 1801. He studied and practiced law, entered politics in Massachusetts, was congressman and senator, 1823-1841, and 1845-1850. He was twice secretary of state, and would undoubtedly have been made President had not his "compromise stand" displeased both North and South. His massive and commanding figure and his sonorous voice added greatly to the convincingness of his speeches. Webster's chief orations were on the Dartmouth College case in the Supreme Court of the United States, 1818; the Bunker Hill Monument oration, 1825; the speech in reply to Senator Hayne, 1830; the speech maintaining that the Constitution is not a compact, 1833; and the speech for the Constitution and the Union, March, 1850.

&lt;sup>1</sup> There follows a more definite summary of the political corruption of the time, and a reiteration of the statement that the rule of the absolute majority is the cause of this corruption.
<sup>2</sup> Calhoun here draws a parallel from Roman history.

It is hard to estimate the literary value of Webster's work. Its substance is weighty, but its sonorous, orotund phrases are in a style of speech now gone out of fashion. He was doubtless a close, if not a widely-trained student of written style, but it is as an orator that he is remembered. He was also the foremost interpreter of a constitutional theory that became, through the final test of arms, the will of the nation.

Biography and criticism: H. E. Scudder, (AML); Norman Hapgood, Daniel Webster, (BB) 1899; H. C. Lodge, (AS) 1899; J. B. McMaster, 1902; same, Cent. 61:103-119,763-76; 62:228-46, 719-41; S. W. McCall, "Daniel Webster," Atlan. 88:600-614.

THE CONSTITUTION NOT A COMPACT BETWEEN SOVEREIGN STATES 1

And now sir, against all these theories and opinions, I maintain,-

1. That the Constitution of the United States is not a league, confederacy, or compact between the people of the several States in their sovereign capacities; but a government proper, founded on the adoption of the people, and creating direct relations between itself and individuals.

2. That no State authority has power to dissolve these relations; that nothing can dissolve them but revolution; and that, consequently, there can be no such thing as secession without revolution.

That there is a supreme law, consisting of the Constitution of the United States, and acts of Congress passed in pursuance of it, and treaties; and that, in cases not capable of assuming the character of a suit in law or equity, Congress must judge of, and finally interpret, this supreme law so often as it has occasion to pass acts of legislation; and in cases

This speech was delivered on Feb. 16, 1833, in answer to Calhoun's speech of the same day. (See p. 445.) Since it is very long, the elaboration of the argument has been omitted whenever possible, the main points, however, being kept. After reviewing and briefly answering the resolutions and arguments brought forward by Calhoun, Webster proceeded as above.

capable of assuming, and actually assuming. the character of a suit, the Supreme Court of the United States is the final interpreter.

That an attempt by a State to abrogate. annul, or nullify an act of Congress, or to arrest its operation within her limits, on the ground that, in her opinion, such law is unconstitutional, is a direct usurpation on the just powers of the general Government, and on the equal rights of other States; a plain violation of the Constitution, and a proceeding essentially revolutionary in its character and tendency.

Whether the Constitution be a compact between States in their sovereign capacities, is a question which must be mainly argued from what is contained in the instrument itself. We all agree that it is an instrument which has been in some way clothed with power. We all admit that it speaks with authority. The first question then is. What does it say of itself? What does it purport to be? Does it style itself a league, confederacy, or compact between sovereign States? It is to be remembered, sir, that the Constitution began to speak only after its adoption. Until it was ratified by nine States, it was but a proposal, the mere draught of an instrument. It was like a deed drawn, but not executed. The Convention had framed it; sent it to Congress, then sitting under the Confederation; Congress had transmitted it to the State legislatures; and by these last it was laid before conventions of the people in the several States. All this while it was inoperative paper. It had received no stamp of authority, no sanction; it spoke no language. But when ratified by the people in their respective conventions, then it had a voice, and spoke authentically. Every word in it had then received the sanction of the popular will, and was to be received as the expression of that will. What the Constitution says of itself, therefore, is as conclusive as what it says on any other point. Does it call itself a "compact"? Certainly not. It uses the word compact but once, and that is when it declares that the States shall enter into no compact. Does it call itself a "league," a "confederacy," a "subsisting treaty between the States"? Certainly not. There is not a particle of such language in all its pages. But it declares itself a Constitu-TION. What is a constitution? Certainly not a league, compact, or confederacy, but a funda-That fundamental regulation mental law. which determines the manner in which the public authority is to be executed, is what forms the constitution of a state. Those primary rules which concern the body itself, and the very being of the political society, the form of government, and the manner in which power is to be exercised.—all, in a word, which form together the constitution of a state,—these are the fundamental laws. This, sir, is the language of the public writers. But do we need to be informed, in this country, what a constitution is? Is it not an idea perfectly familiar, definite. and well settled? We are at no loss to understand what is meant by the constitution of one of the States; and the Constitution of the United States speaks of itself as being an instrument of the same nature. It says, this Constitution shall be the law of the land, anything in any State constitution to the contrary notwithstanding. And it speaks of itself, too, in plain contradistinction from a confederation: for it says that all debts contracted, and all engagements entered into, by the United States. shall be as valid under this Constitution as under the Confederation. It does not say, as valid under this combact, or this league, or this confederation, as under the former confederation, but as valid under this Constitution.

This, then, sir, is declared to be a constitution. A constitution is the fundamental law of the state; and this is expressly declared to be the supreme law. It is as if the people had said "We prescribe this fundamental law," or "this supreme law," for they do say that they establish this Constitution, and that it shall be the supreme law. They say that they ordain and establish it. Now, sir, what is the common application of these words? We do not speak of ordaining leagues and compacts. If this was intended to be a compact or league, and the States to be parties to it, why was it not so said? Why is there found no one expression in the whole instrument indicating such intent? The old Confederation was expressly called a league, and into this league it was declared that the States, as States, severally entered. Why was not similar language used in the Constitution, if a similar intention had existed? Why was it not said, "the States enter into this new league," "the States form this new confederation," or "the States agree to this new compact"? Or why was it not said, in the language of the gentleman's resolution, that the people of the several States acceded to this compact in their sovereign capacities? What reason is there for supposing that the framers of the Constitution rejected expressions appropriate to their own meaning, and adopted others wholly at war with that meaning?

Again, sir, the Constitution speaks of that political system which is established as "the government of the United States." Is it not doing strange violence to language to call a league or a compact between sovereign powers a government? The government of a state is that organization in which the political power resides. It is the political being created by the constitution or fundamental law. broad and clear difference between a government and a league or compact is, that a government is a body politic; it has a will of its own; and it possesses powers and faculties to execute its own purposes. Every compact looks to some power to enforce its stipulations. Even in a compact between sovereign communities. there always exists this ultimate reference to a power to insure its execution; although, in such case, this power is but the force of one party against the force of another: that is to say, the power of war. But a government executes its decisions by its own supreme authority. Its use of force in compelling obedience to its own enactments is not war. It contemplates no opposing party having a right of resistance. It rests on its own power to enforce its own will; and when it ceases to possess this power, it is no longer a government.

Mr. President, I concur so generally in the very able speech of the gentleman from Virginia near me, 1 that it is not without diffidence and regret that I venture to differ with him on any point. His opinions, sir, are redolent of the doctrines of a very distinguished school, for which I have the highest regard, of whose doctrines I can say, what I can also say of the gentleman's speech, that, while I concur in the results, I must be permitted to hesitate about some of the premises. I do not agree that the Constitution is a compact between States in their sovereign capacities. I do not agree that in strictness of language, it is a compact at all. But I do agree that it is founded on consent or agreement, or on compact, if the gentleman prefers that word, and means no more by it than voluntary consent or agreement. Constitution, sir, is not a contract, but the result of a contract; meaning by contract no more than assent. Founded on consent, it is a government proper. Adopted by the agreement of the people of the United States, when adopted, it has become a Constitution. The people have agreed to make a Constitution; but when made, that Constitution becomes what its name imports. It is no longer a mere agreement. Our laws, sir, have their foundation in the agreement or consent of the two houses of Congress. We say, habitually, that one house proposes a bill, and the other agrees to it; but the result of this agreement is not a compact but a law. The law, the statute, is not the agreement, but something created by the agreement; and something which, when created, has a new character, and acts by its own authority. So the Constitution of the United States, founded in or on the consent of the people, may be said to rest on compact or consent; but it is not itself the compact, but its result. When the people agree to erect a government, and actually erect it, the thing is done, and the agreement is at an end. The compact is executed, and the end designed by it attained. Henceforth, the fruit of the agreement exists, but the agreement itself is merged in its own accomplishment; since there can be no longer a subsisting agreement or compact to form a constitution or government, after that constitution or government has been actually formed and established.

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Rives [Webster's note]

It appears to me, Mr. President, that the plainest account of the establishment of this Government presents the most just and philosophical view of its foundation. The people of the several States had their separate State governments; and between the States there also existed a Confederation. With this condition of things the people were not satisfied, as the Confederation had been found not to fulfill its intended objects. It was proposed, therefore, to erect a new, common government, which should possess certain definite powers, such as regarded the prosperity of the people of all the States, and to be formed upon the general model of American constitutions. This proposal was assented to, and an instrument was presented to the people of the several States for their consideration. They approved it, and agreed to adopt it, as a Constitution. They executed that agreement; they adopted the Constitution as a Constitution, and henceforth it must stand as a Constitution until it shall be altogether destroyed. Now, sir, is not this the truth of the whole matter? And is not all that we have heard of compact between sovereign States the mere effect of a theoretical and artificial mode of reasoning upon the subject? a mode of reasoning which disregards plain facts for the sake of hypothesis? 1

Looking still further to the provisions of the Constitution itself, in order to learn its true character, we find its great apparent purpose to be, to unite the people of all the States under one general government, for certain definite objects, and, to the extent of this union, to restrain the separate authority of the States. Congress only can declare war; therefore, when one State is at war with a foreign nation, all must be at war. The President and the Senate only can make peace; when peace is made for one State, therefore, it must be made for all.

Can anything be conceived more preposterous, than that any State should have power to nullify the proceedings of the general government respecting peace and war? When war is declared by a law of Congress, can a single State nullify that law, and remain at peace? And yet she may nullify that law as well as any other. If the President and Senate make peace, may one State, nevertheless, continue the war? And yet, if she can nullify a law, she may quite as well nullify a treaty.

The truth is, Mr. President, and no ingenuity of argument, no subtilty of distinction can evade it, that, as to certain purposes, the people of the United States are one people. They are one in making war, and one in making peace; they are one in regulating commerce, and one in laying duties of imposts. The very end and purpose of the Constitution was, to make them one people in these particulars; and it has effectually accomplished its object. All this is apparent on the face of the Constitution itself. I have already said, sir, that to obtain a power of direct legislation over the people, especially in regard to imposts, was always prominent as a reason for getting rid of the Confederation, and forming a new Constitution. Among innumerable proofs of this, before the assembling of the Convention, allow me to refer only to the report of the committee of the old Congress, July, 1785.

But, sir, let us go to the actual formation of the Constitution; let us open the journal of the Convention itself, and we shall see that the very first resolution which the Convention adopted was, "THAT A NATIONAL GOVERNMENT OUGHT TO BE ESTABLISHED, CONSISTING OF A SUPREME LEGISLATURE, JUDICIARY, AND EXEC-UTIVE."

This itself completely negatives all idea of league, and compact, and confederation. Terms could not be chosen more fit to express an intention to establish a national government, and to banish forever all notion of a compact between sovereign States.

This resolution was adopted on the 30th of May, 1787. Afterwards, the style was altered.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The six short paragraphs omitted emphasize the idea that the sovereignty of the United States government is a sovereignty of the people.

and, instead of being called a national government, it was called the government of the United States: but the substance of this resolution was retained, and was at the head of that list of resolutions which was afterwards sent to the committee who were to frame the instrument. 1

Indeed, sir, if we look to all contemporary history, to the numbers of The Federalist, to the depates in the conventions, to the publications of friends and foes, they all agree, that a change had been made from a confederacy of States, to a different system; they all agree, that the Convention had formed a constitution for a national government. With this result some were satisfied, and some were dissatisfied; but all admitted that the thing had been done. In none of these various productions and publications did anyone intimate that the new Constitution was but another compact between States in their sovereign capacities. I do not find such an opinion advanced in a single instance. Everywhere, the people were told that the old Confederation was to be abandoned, and a new system to be tried; that a proper government was proposed, to be founded in the name of the people, and to have a regular organization of its own. Everywhere, the people were told that it was to be a government with direct powers to make laws over individuals. and to lay taxes and imposts without the consent of the States. Everywhere, it was understood to be a popular constitution. It came to the people for their adoption, and was to rest on the same deep foundation as the State constitutions themselves. Its most distinguished advocates, who had been themselves members of the Convention, declared that the very object of submitting the Constitution to the people was, to preclude the possibility of its being regarded as a mere compact. "However gross a heresy," say the writers 2 of The Federalist, "it may be to maintain that a party to a compact has a right to revoke that compact, the doctrine itself has had respectable advocates. The possibility of a question of this nature proves the necessity of laying the foundations of our national government deeper than in the mere sanction of delegated authority. The fabric of American empire ought to rest on the solid basis of THE CONSENT OF THE PEOPLE "3

Finally, sir, how can any man get over the words of the Constitution itself?-"WE. THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES, DO ORDAIN AND ESTABLISH THIS CONSTITUTION." These words must cease to be a part of the Constitution. they must be obliterated from the parchment on which they are written, before any human ingenuity or human argument can remove the popular basis on which that Constitution rests, and turn the instrument into a mere compact between sovereign States.

The second proposition, sir, which I propose to maintain, is, that no State authority can dissolve the relations subsisting between the Government of the United States and individuals: that nothing can dissolve these relations but revolution; and that, therefore, there can be no such thing as secession without revolution. All this follows, as it seems to me, as a just consequence, if it be first proved that the Constitution of the United States is a government proper, owing protection to individuals, and entitled to their obedience.

The people, sir, in every State, live under two governments. They owe obedience to both. These governments, though distinct, are not adverse. Each has its separate sphere, and its peculiar powers and duties. It is not a contest between two sovereigns for the same power. like the wars of the rival houses in England; nor is it a dispute, between a government de facto 4 and a government de jure. It is the case of a division of powers between two governments, made by the people, to whom both are responsible. Neither can dispense with the duty which individuals owe to the other: neither can call itself master of the other: the people are masters of both. This division of power, it is true, is in a great measure unknown in Europe. It is the peculiar system of America; and though new and singular, it is not incomprehensible. The State constitutions are established by the people of the States. This Constitution is established by the people of all the States. How, then, can a State secede? How can a State undo what the whole people have done? How can she absolve her citizens from their obedience to the laws of the United States? How can she annul their obligations and oaths? How can the members of her legislature renounce their own oaths? Sir, secession,

There follows the explanation that though the Constitutional Convention debated whether to continue the Confederacy, they final y decided to reject the idea of a compact and instead to form a strong national government. Webster quotes from the speeches made in the convention.

2 See The Federalist, No. XXII (by Alexander Hamilton).

<sup>3</sup> There follows proof that the states in ratifying the Constitution recognized that it was a gove. nment of the people.

* "in reality," as opposed to de jurc, "by law"

as a revolutionary right, is intelligible; as a right to be proclaimed in the midst of civil commotions, and asserted at the head of armies. I can understand it. But as a practical right, existing under the Constitution, and in conformity with its provisions, it seems to me to be nothing but a plain absurdity; for it supposes resistance to government, under the authority of government itself; it supposes dismemberment, without violating the principles of union; it supposes opposition to law, without crime; it supposes the violation of oaths, without responsibility; it supposes the total overthrow of government, without revolution.

The Constitution, sir, regards itself as perpetual and immortal. It seeks to establish a union among the people of the States, which shall last through all time. Or, if the common fate of things human must be expected at some period to happen to it, yet that catastrophe is not anticipated.

The instrument contains ample provisions for its amendment, at all times; none for its abandonment, at any time. It declares that new States may come into the Union, but it does not declare that old States may go out. The Union is not a temporary partnership of States. It is the association of the people, under a constitution of government, uniting their power, joining together their highest interests, cementing their present enjoyments, and blending, in one indivisible mass, all their hopes for the future. Whatsoever is steadfast in just political principles; whatsoever is permanent in the structure of human society; whatsoever there is which can derive an enduring character from being founded on deep-laid principles of constitutional liberty and on the broad foundations of the public will,—all these unite to entitle this instrument to be regarded as a permanent constitution of government.

In the next place, Mr. President, I contend that there is a supreme law of the land, consisting of the Constitution, acts of Congress passed in pursuance of it, and the public treaties. This will not be denied, because such are the very words of the Constitution. But I contend, further, that it rightfully belongs to Congress, and to the courts of the United States, to settle the construction of this supreme law, in doubtful cases. This is denied; and here arises the great practical question, Who is to construe finally the Constitution of the United States? We all agree that the Constitution is the supreme law; but who shall interpret that law? In our system of the division of powers between different governments, controversies will necessarily sometimes arise. respecting the extent of the powers of each. Who shall decide these controversies? Does it rest with the general government, in all or any of its departments, to exercise the office of final interpreter? Or may each of the States. as well as the general government, claim this right of ultimate decision? The practical result of this whole debate turns on this point. The gentleman contends that each State may judge for itself of any alleged violation of the Constitution, and may finally decide for itself, and may execute its own decisions by its own power. All the recent proceedings in South Carolina are founded on this claim of right. Her convention has pronounced the revenue laws of the United States unconstitutional; and this decision she does not allow any authority of the United States to overrule or reverse. Of course she rejects the authority of Congress. because the very object of the ordinance is to reverse the decision of Congress; and she rejects, too, the authority of the courts of the United States, because she expressly prohibits all appeal to those courts. It is in order to sustain this asserted right of being her own judge, that she pronounces the Constitution of the United States to be but a compact, to which she is a party, and a sovereign party. If this be established, then the inference is supposed to follow, that, being sovereign, there is no power to control her decision; and her own judgment on her own compact is, and must be, conclusive. 1

. . . . . . . .

But, Mr. President, the Constitution has not left this cardinal point without full and explicit provisions. First, as to the authority. of Congress. Having enumerated the specific powers conferred on Congress, the Constitution adds, as a distinct and substantive clause, the following, viz.: "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." If this means anything, it means that Congress may judge of the true extent and just interpretation of the specific powers granted to it, and may judge also of what is necessary and proper for executing those powers. If Congress is to judge of what is necessary for the execution of its powers, it must, of necessity, judge of the extent and interpretation of those powers.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The truism is then emphasized that the whole cannot govern the parts if one part can govern the whole.

And in regard, sir, to the judiciary, the Constitution is still more express and emphatic. It declares that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law or equity arising under the Constitution, laws of the United States, and treaties: that there shall be one Supreme Court. and that this Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction of all these cases, subject to such exceptions as Congress may make. It is impossible to escape from the generality of these words. If a case arises under the Constitution, that is, if a case arises depending on the construction of the Constitution, the judicial power of the United States extends to it. It reaches the case, the question; it attaches the power of the national judicature to the case itself, in whatever court it may arise or exist; and in this case the Supreme Court has appellate jurisdiction over all courts whatever. No language could provide with more effect and precision than is here done, for subjecting constitutional questions to the ultimate decision of the Supreme Court. And, sir, this is exactly what the Convention found it necessary to provide for, and intended to provide for. It is, too, exactly what the people were universally told was done when they adopted the Constitution. One of the first resolutions adopted by the Convention was in these words. viz.: "That the jurisdiction of the national judiciary shall extend to cases which respect the collection of the national revenue, and questions which involve the national peace and harmony." Now, sir, this either had no sensible meaning at all, or else it meant that the jurisdiction of the national judiciary should extend to these questions, with a paramount authority. It is not to be supposed that the Convention intended that the power of the national judiciary should extend to these questions, and that the power of the judicatures of the States should also extend to them, with equal power of final decision. This would be to defeat the whole object of the provision. There were thirteen judicatures already in existence. The evil complained of, or the danger to be guarded against, was contradiction and repugnance in the decisions of these judicatures. If the framers of the Constitution meant to create a fourteenth, and yet not to give it power to revise and control the decisions of the existing thirteen, then they only intended to augment the existing evil and the apprehended danger by increasing still further the chances of discordant judgments. Why, sir, has it become a settled axiom in politics that every <sup>1</sup> Shall hear appeals.

government must have a judicial power coextensive with its legislative power? tainly, there is only this reason, namely, that the laws may receive a uniform interpretation and a uniform execution. This object cannot be otherwise attained. A statute is what it is judicially interpreted to be; and if it be construed one way in New Hampshire. and another way in Georgia, there is no uniform law. One supreme court, with appellate and final jurisdiction, is the natural and only adequate means, in any government, to secure this uniformity. The Convention saw all this clearly: and the resolution which I have quoted. never afterwards rescinded, passed through various modifications, till it finally received the form which the article now bears in the Constitution 2

Gentlemen appear to me, sir, to look at but one side of the question. They regard only the supposed danger of trusting a government with the interpretation of its own powers. But will they view the question in its other aspect? Will they show us how it is possible for a government to get along with four-and-twenty interpreters of its laws and powers? Gentlemen argue, too, as if, in these cases, the State would be always right, and the general government always wrong. But suppose the reverse: suppose the State wrong (and, since they differ. some of them must be wrong); are the most important and essential operations of the government to be embarrassed and arrested, because one State holds the contrary opinion? Mr. President, every argument which refers the constitutionality of acts of Congress to State decision appeals from the majority to the minority; it appeals from the common interest to a particular interest; from the counsels of all to the counsel of one; and endeavors to supersede the judgment of the whole by the judgment of a part. 3

Sir, those who espouse the doctrines of nullification reject, as it seems to me, the first great principle of all republican liberty; that is, that the majority must govern. In matters of common concern, the judgment of a majority must stand as the judgment of the whole. This is

Webster then shows that different methods of strengthening the central government we e suggested in the Federal Convention, some of which were not approved, but all of which aimed at the same end. Of what use would be a supreme court if the judiciary of each state were supreme?

if the judiciary of each state were supreme?

Webster goes on to say that as the supreme court is constituted the highest judicial body, so Congress is constituted the supreme legislative body.

a law imposed on us by the absolute necessity of the case; and if we do not act upon it, there is no possibility of maintaining any government but despotism. We hear loud and repeated denunciations against what is called majority government. It is declared, with much warmth, that a majority government cannot be maintained in the United States. What, then, do gentlemen wish? Do they wish to establish a minority government? Do they wish to subject the will of the many to the will of the few? The honorable gentleman from South Carolina has spoken of absolute majorities and majorities concurrent; language wholly unknown to our Constitution, and to which it is not easy to affix definite ideas. As far as I understand it, it would teach us that the absolute majority may be found in Congress, but the majority concurrent must be looked for in the States; that is to say, sir, stripping the matter of this novelty of phrase, that the dissent of one or more States, as States, renders void the decision of a majority of Congress, so far as that State is concerned. And so this doctrine, running but a short career. like other dogmas of the day, terminates in nullification. 1

Does not the gentleman perceive, sir, how his argument against majorities might here be retorted upon him? Does he not see how cogently he might be asked, whether it be the character of nullification to practice what it preaches? Look to South Carolina, at the present moment. How far are the rights of minorities there respected? I confess, sir, I have not known, in peaceable times, the power of the majority carried with a higher hand, or upheld with more relentless disregard of the rights, feelings, and principles of the minority; —a minority embracing, as the gentleman himself will admit, a large portion of the worth and respectability of the State; 2 a minority comprehending in its numbers men who have been associated with him, and with us, in these halls of legislation; men who have served their country at home and honored it abroad; men who would cheerfully lay down their lives for their native State, in any cause which they could regard as the cause of honor and duty; men above fear, and above reproach; whose deepest grief and distress spring from the conviction, that the present proceedings of the State must ultimately reflect discredit upon her. How is this minority, how are these men, regarded? They are enthralled and disfranchised by ordinances and acts of legislation: subjected to tests and oaths, incompatible, as they conscientiously think, with oaths already taken, and obligations already assumed, they are proscribed and denounced, as recreants to duty and patriotism, and slaves to a foreign power. Both the spirit which pursues them, and the positive measures which emanate from that spirit, are harsh and proscriptive beyond all precedent within my knowledge, except in periods of professed revolution.

<sup>2</sup> The leader of this strong minority, which opposed nullification, was the statesman Joel Roberts Poinsett.

It is not, sir, one would think, for those who would approve these proceedings to complain of the power of majorities.

Mr. President, all popular governments rest on two principles, or two assumptions:—

First, That there is so far a common interest among those over whom the government extends, as that it may provide for the defense, protection, and good government of the whole, without injustice or oppression to parts; and

Secondly, That the representatives of the people, and especially the people themselves, are secure against general corruption, and may be trusted, therefore, with the exercise of power.

Whoever argues against these principles argues against the practicability of all free governments. And whoever admits these, must admit, or cannot deny, that power is as safe in the hands of Congress as in those of other representative bodies. Congress is not irresponsible. Its members are agents of the people, elected by them, answerable to them, and liable to be displaced or superseded, at their pleasure; and they possess as fair a claim to the confidence of the people, while they continue to deserve it, as any other public political agents.

If, then, sir, the manifest intention of the Convention, and the contemporary admission of both friends and foes, prove anything; if the plain text of the instrument itself, as well as the necessary implication from other provisions, prove anything; if the early legislation of Congress, the course of judicial decisions, acquiesced in by all the States for forty years, prove anything,—then it is proved that there is a supreme law and a final interpreter.

My fourth and last proposition, Mr. President, was, that any attempt by a State to abrogate or nullify acts of Congress is a usurpation on the powers of the general government and on the equal rights of other States. a violation of the Constitution, and a proceeding essentially revolutionary. This is undoubtedly true, if the preceding propositions be regarded as proved. If the Government of the United States be trusted with the duty, in any department, of declaring the extent of its own powers, then a State ordinance, or act of legislation, authorizing resistance to an act of Congress, on the alleged ground of its unconstitutionality, is manifestly a usurpation upon its powers. If the States have equal rights in matters concerning the whole, then for one State to set up her judgment against the judgment of the rest, and to insist on executing that judgment by force, is also a manifest usurpation on the rights of other States. If the Constitution of the United States be a government proper, with authority to pass laws, and to give them a uniform interpretation and execution, then the interposition of a State, to enforce her own construction, and to resist, as to herself, that law which binds the other States, is a violation of the Constitution.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Here Webster emphasizes the fact that the Constitution of the United States, by means of the President's veto rower and the Senate, where states have equal representation without regard to size, furnishes checks upon mere majorities.

If that be revolutionary which arrests the legislative, executive, and judicial power of government, dispenses with existing oaths and obligations of obedience, and elevates another power to supreme dominion, then nullification is revolutionary. Or if that be revolutionary the natural tendency and practical effect of which are to break the Union into fragments, to sever all connection among the people of the respective States, and to prostrate this general government in the dust, then nullification is revolutionary.

Nullification, sir, is as distinctly revolutionary as secession; but I cannot say that the revolution which it seeks is one of so respectable a character. Secession would, it is true, abandon the Constitution altogether; but then it would profess to abandon it. Whatever other inconsistencies it might run into, one, at least, it would avoid. It would not belong to a government, while it rejected its authority. It would not repel the burden, and continue to enjoy the benefits. It would not aid in passing laws which others are to obey, and yet reject their authority as to itself. It would not undertake to reconcile obedience to public authority with an asserted right of command over that same authority. It would not be in the Government, and above the Government, at the same time. But though secession may be a more respectable mode of attaining the object than nullification, it is not more truly revolutionary. Each, and both, resist the constitutional authorities; each, and both, would sever the Union, and subvert the government. <sup>1</sup>

Mr. President, if the friends of nullification should be able to propagate their opinions, and to give them practical effect, they would, in my judgment, prove themselves the most skilful "architects of ruin," the most effectual extinguishers of high-raised expectation, the greatest blasters of human hopes, that any age has produced. They would stand up to proclaim, in tones which would pierce the ears of half the human race, that the last great experiment of representative government had failed. They would send forth sounds, at the hearing of which the doctrine of the divine right of kings would feel, even in its grave, a returning sense of vitality and resuscitation. Millions of eyes, of those who now feed their inherent love of liberty on the success of the American example. would turn away from beholding our dismemberment, and find no place on earth whereon to rest their gratified sight. Amidst the incantations and orgies of nullification, secession. disunion, and revolution, would be celebrated the funeral rites of constitutional and republican liberty.

But, sir, if the government do its duty, if it act with firmness and with moderation, these opinions cannot prevail. Be assured, sir, be assured that, among the political sentiments of this people, the love of union is still uppermost. They will stand fast by the Constitution. and by those who defend it. I rely on no temporary expedients, on no political combination; but I rely on the true American feeling, the genuine patriotism of the people, and the imperative decision of the public voice. Disorder and confusion, indeed, may arise; scenes of commotion and contest are threatened, and perhaps may come. With my whole heart I pray for the continuance of the domestic peace and quiet of the country. I desire, most ardently, the restoration of affection and harmony to all its parts. I desire that every citizen of the whole country may look to this Government with no other sentiments than those of grateful respect and attachment. But I cannot yield even to kind feelings the cause. of the Constitution, the true glory of the country, and the great trust which we hold in our hands for succeeding ages. If the Constitution cannot be maintained without meeting these scenes of commotion and contest, however unwelcome, they must come. We cannot, we must not, we dare not, omit to do that which, in our judgment, the safety of the Union requires. Not regardless of consequences, we must vet meet consequences; seeing the hazards which surround the discharge of public duty, it must yet be discharged. For myself, sir. I shun no responsibility justly devolving on me, here or elsewhere, in attempting to maintain the cause. I am bound to it by indissoluble ties of affection and duty, and I shall cheerfully partake in its fortunes and its fate. I am ready to perform my own appropriate part, whenever and wherever the occasion may call on me, and to take my chance among those upon whom blows may fall first and fall thickest. I shall exert every faculty I possess in aiding to prevent the Constitution from being nullified, destroyed, or impaired; and even should I see it fall, I will still, with a voice feeble perhaps, but earnest as ever issued from human lips. and with fidelity and zeal which nothing shall extinguish, call on the People to come to its rescue.

There follows a minute exposition of the ordinance and resolutions (see note 2, p. 445) of South Carolina and of their necessary result, and the proof that in the first Congress representatives from South Carolina were among the foremost to suggest the laying of impost duties.

1833 1833

CHARLES SUMNER 1811-1874

Sumner was born in Boston, graduated from Harvard in 1830 and for ten years studied and practiced law, wrote upon legal subjects, and traveled abroad. His career as a high-minded politician and official filled nearly all his public life. Though independent of strict party lines, he was active in the anti-slavery cause. From 1851 until his death in Washington he was United States senator from Massachusetts. His speeches in the Senate and elsewhere constitute his best-known literary work.

The selection here given from an early oration of Sumner's shows the bent of his idealism. The speech represents the type of oratory in vogue in Sumner's day, but its attitude toward war and military glory is more common now than in Sumner's time.

Moorfield Storey, Charles Sumner, (AS) 1900.

From THE TRUE GRANDEUR OF NATIONS 1

In accordance with uninterrupted usage, on this Sabbath of the nation, we have put aside our daily cares, and seized a respite from the

<sup>1</sup> This. Sumner's first great oration, was delivered July 4, 1845, in the Old South Church, Boston, before the authorities of the city. Sumner had in mind the aggressive policy of the United States toward Mexico just before the Mexican War. never-ending toils of life, to meet in gladness and congratulation, mindful of the blessings transmitted from the past, mindful also, I trust, of our duties to the present and the future.

All hearts turn first to the Fathers of the Republic. Their venerable forms rise before us, in the procession of successive generations. They come from the frozen rock of Plymouth. from the wasted bands of Raleigh, from the heavenly companionship of Penn, from the anxious councils of the Revolution .- from all those fields of sacrifice, where, in obedience to the spirit of their age, they sealed their devotion to duty with their blood. They say to us, their children, "Cease to vaunt what you do, and what has been done for you. Learn to walk meekly and to think humbly. Cultivate habits of self-sacrifice. Never aim at what is not RIGHT, persuaded that without this every possession and all knowledge will become an evil and a shame. And may these words of ours be ever in your minds! Strive to increase the inheritance we have bequeathed to you.-bearing in mind always, that, if we excel you in virtue, such a victory will be to us a mortification, while defeat will bring happiness. In this way you may conquer us. Nothing is more shameful for a man than a claim to esteem, not on his own merits, but on the fame of his ancestors. The glory of the fathers is doubtless to their children a most precious treasure; but to enjoy it without transmission to the next generation, and without addition. is the extreme of ignominy. Following these counsels, when your days on earth are finished. you will come to join us, and we shall receive you as friend receives friend; but if you neglect our words, expect no happy greeting from us."

Honor to the memory of our fathers! May the turf lie lightly on their sacred graves! Not in words only, but in deeds also, let us testify our reverence for their name, imitating what in them was lofty, pure, and good, learning from them to bear hardship and privation. May we, who now reap in strength what they sowed in weakness, augment the inheritance we have received! To this end, we must not fold our hands in slumber, nor abide content with the past. To each generation is appointed its peculiar task; nor does the heart which responds to the call of duty find rest except in the grave.

Be ours the task now in the order of Providence cast upon us. And what is this duty? What can we do to make our coming welcome to our fathers in the skies, and draw to our memory hereafter the homage of a grateful posterity? How add to the inheritance received? The answer must interest all, particularly on this festival, when we celebrate the nativity of the Republic. It well becomes the patriot citizen, on this anniversary, to consider the national character, and how it may be advanced,—as the good man dedicates his birthday to meditation on his life, and to resolutions of improvement.

Avoiding, then, all exultation in the abounding prosperity of the land, and in that freedom whose influence is widening to the uttermost circles of the earth, I would turn attention to the character of our country, and humbly endeavor to learn what must be done that the Republic may best secure the welfare of the people committed to its care,—that it may perform its part in the world's history,—that it may fulfil the aspirations of generous hearts,—and, practicing that righteousness which exalteth a nation, attain to the elevation of true grandeur.

With this aim, and believing that I can in no other way so fitly fulfil the trust reposed in me today, I purpose to consider what, in our age, are the true objects of national ambition,—what is truly national honor, national glory,—what is the true grandeur of nations. I would not depart from the modesty that becomes me, yet I am not without hope that I may do something to rescue these terms, now so powerful over the minds of men, from mistaken objects, especially from deeds of war, and the extension of empire, that they may be applied to works of justice and beneficence, which are better than war or empire.

The subject may be novel, on an occasion like the present; but it is comprehensive, and of transcendent importance. It raises us to the contemplation of things not temporary or local, but belonging to all ages and countries, —things lofty as truth, universal as humanity. Nay, more; it practically concerns the general welfare, not only of our own cherished Republic, but of the whole federation of nations. It has an urgent interest from transactions in which we are now unhappily involved. By an act of unjust legislation, extending our power over Texas, peace with Mexico is endangered .-while, by petulant assertion of a disputed claim to a remote territory beyond the Rocky Mountains, 1 ancient fires of hostile strife are kindled anew on the hearth of our mother country. Mexico and England both avow the determination to vindicate what is called the national honor; and our Government calmly contemplates the dread arbitrament of war, provided it cannot obtain what is called an honorable peace.

. . . . . . .

Can there be in our age any peace that is not honorable, any war that is not dishonorable? The true honor of a nation is conspicuous only in deeds of justice and beneficence, securing and advancing human happiness. In the clear eve of that Christian judgment which must yet prevail, vain are the victories of war, infamous its spoils. He is the benefactor, and worthy of honor, who carries comfort to wretchedness, dries the tear of sorrow, relieves the unfortunate, feeds the hungry, clothes the naked, does justice, enlightens the ignorant, unfastens the fetters of the slave, and finally, by virtuous genius, in art, literature, science, enlivens and exalts the hours of life, or, by generous example, inspires a love for God and man. This is the Christian hero; this is the man of honor in a Christian land. He is no benefactor, nor worthy of honor, whatever his worldly renown, whose life is absorbed in feats of brute force, who renounces the great law of Christian brotherhood, whose vocation is blood. Well may the modern poet exclaim, "The world knows nothing of its greatest men!" 2-for thus far it has chiefly honored the violent brood of battle, armed men springing up from the dragon's teeth sown by hate, and cared little for the truly good men, children of love, guiltless of their country's blood, whose steps on earth are noiseless as an angel's wing.

It will not be disguised that this standard differs from that of the world even in our day. The voice of man is yet given to martial praise, and the honors of victory are chanted even by the lips of woman. The mother, rocking the infant on her knee, stamps the images of war upon his tender mind, at that age more impressible than wax; she nurses his slumber with new states or territories only on condition that slavery should be excluded. Mexico strongly opposed the admission of Texas to the United States because it had been Mexican territory previous to its independence. The "Oregon Country," which both England and the United States claimed, included all Pacific coast territory between 42° and 54°20′—that is most of our Pacific Northwest and much of British Columbia. Concession on both sides resulted in the adoption in 1846 of 40° as the boundary line. Henry Taylor, 1800-1886, in his drama Philip Van Arteveld, I, 1-5 its music, pleases his waking hours with its stories, and selects for his playthings the plume and the sword. From the child is formed the man; and who can weigh the influence of a mother's spirit on the opinions of his life? The mind which trains the child is like the hand at the end of a long lever; a gentle effort suffices to heave the enormous weight of succeeding years. As the boy advances to youth, he is fed like Achilles, not only on honey and milk only, but on bears' marrow and lions' hearts. 1 He draws the nutriment of his soul from a literature whose beautiful fields are moistened by human blood. Fain would I offer my tribute to the Father of Poetry, standing with harp of immortal melody on the misty mountain-top of distant antiquity,-to those stories of courage and sacrifice which emblazon the annals of Greece and Rome,-to the fulminations of Demosthenes and the splendors of Tully.—to the sweet verse of Virgil and the poetic prose of Livy; fain would I offer my tribute to the new literature, which shot up in modern times as a vigorous forest from the burnt side of ancient woods.—to the passionate song of the Troubadour in France and the Minnesinger in Germany, 2-to the thrilling ballad of Spain and the delicate music of the Italian lyre: but from all these has breathed the breath of war, that has swept the heart-strings of men in all the thronging generations.

&lt;sup>1</sup>The annexation of Texas to the United States in 1845, increasing, as it did, the slave territory, was strongly opposed by the Free-Soilers, of whom Sumner was one, who favored admitting

And when the youth becomes a man, his country invites his service in war, and holds before his bewildered imagination the prizes of worldly honor. For him the pen of the historian and the verse of the poet. His soul is taught to swell at the thought that he, too, is a soldier.—that his name shall be entered on the list of those who have borne arms for their country; and perhaps he dreams that he, too, may sleep, like the Great Captain of Spain, 3 with a hundred trophies over his grave. The law of the land throws its sanction over this frenzy. The contagion spreads beyond those subject to positive obligation. Peaceful citizens volunteer to appear as soldiers, and affect, in dress, arms, and deportment, what is called the "pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war." The ear-piercing fife has today filled our streets, and we have come to this church, on this National Sabbath, by the thump of drum and with the parade of bristling bayonets.  $^4$

From prejudices engendered by the Church I pass to prejudices engendered by the army itself, having their immediate origin in military life, but unfortunately diffusing themselves throughout the community, in widening, though less apparent circles. I allude directly to what is called the Point of Honor, early child of Chivalry, living representative of its barbarism. It is difficult to define what is so evanescent. so impalpable, so chimerical, so unreal, and yet which exercises such fiendish power over many men, and controls the intercourse of nations. As a little water, fallen into the crevice of a rock, under the congelation of winter, swells till it bursts the thick and stony fibers, so a word or slender act, dropping into the heart of man, under the hardening influence of this pernicious sentiment, dilates till it rends in pieces the sacred depository of human affection, and the demons of hate and strife are left to rage. The musing Hamlet saw this sentiment in its strange and unnatural potency, when his soul pictured to his contemplations an army of such mass and charge, Led by a delicate and tender prince, . . . Exposing what is mortal and unsure To all that fortune, death, and danger dare, Even for an egg-shell; and when, again, giving to the sentiment its strongest and most popular expression, he exclaims.—

Rightly to be great Is not to stir without great argument, But greatly to find quarrel in a straw. When honor's at the stake. 5

And when is honor at stake? This inquiry opens again the argument with which I commenced, and with which I hope to close. Honor can be at stake only where justice and beneficence are at stake; it can never depend on egg-shell or straw; it can never depend on any hasty word of anger or folly, not even if followed by vulgar violence. True honor appears in the dignity of the human soul, in that highest moral and intellectual excellence which is the nearest approach to qualities we reverence as attributes of God. Our community frowns with indignation upon the profaneness of the duel, having its rise in this irrational point of honor. Are you aware that you indulge the same sentiment on a gigantic scale, when you recognize

&lt;sup>1</sup> Tradition later than Homer, the "Father of Poetry," relates that Achilles was fed by Thetis, his mother, upon milk and honey, but by Chiron, his centaurtutor, upon lions' hearts and bears' meat.
<sup>2</sup> The Troubadours and the Minnesingers were medieval

The Troubadours and the Minnesingers were medieval lyric poets of France and Germany, respectively.
 Probably the Cid, the great national hero of Spanish romance; see note 1, p. 416.

&lt;sup>4</sup> The vigorous explanation of what war is and of the obstacles to peace, which follows, is too long to include.

<sup>5</sup> Hamlet, IV, iv, 47-55

this very point of honor as a proper apology for war? We have already seen that justice is in no respect promoted by war. Is true honor promoted where justice is not?

The very word honor, as used by the world. fails to express any elevated sentiment. How immeasurably below the sentiment of duty! It is a word of easy virtue, that has been prostituted to the most opposite characters and transactions. From the field of Pavia, 1 where France suffered one of the worst reverses in her annals, the defeated king writes to his mother, "All is lost, except honor." At a later day, the renowned French cook, Vatel, 2 in a paroxysm of grief and mortification at the failure of two dishes for the table, exclaims, "I have lost my honor!" and stabs himself to the heart. Montesquieu, 3 whose writings are constellations of epigrams, calls honor a prejudice only, which he places in direct contrast with virtue,—the former being the animating principle of monarchy, and the latter the animating principle of a republic; but he reveals the inferiority of honor, as a principle, when he adds, that, in a well-governed monarchy, almost everybody is a good citizen, while it is rare to meet a really good man. The man of honor is not the man of virtue. By an instinct pointing to the truth, we do not apply this term to the high columnar qualities which sustain and decorate life,-parental affection, justice, benevolence, the attributes of God. He would seem to borrow a feebler phrase, showing a slight appreciation of the distinctive character to whom reverence is accorded, who should speak of father, mother, judge, angel, or finally of God, as persons of honor. In such sacred connections, we feel, beyond the force of any argument, the mundane character of the sentiment which plays such a part in history and even in common life.

The rule of honor is founded in the imagined necessity of resenting by force a supposed injury, whether of word or act. Admit the injury received, seeming to sully the character; is it wiped away by any force, and descent to the brutal level of its author? "Could I wipe your blood from my conscience as easily as this insult from my face," said a Marshal of France, greater on this occasion than on any field of battle, "I would lay you dead at my feet." Plato, reporting the angelic wisdom of Socrates.

declares, in one of those beautiful dialogues shining with stellar light across the ages, that to do a wrong is more shameful than to receive a wrong. And this benign sentiment commends itself alike to the Christian, who is bid to render good for evil, and to the enlightened soul of man. But who confessing its truth will resort to force on any point of honor?

And now, if it be asked, why, in considering the TRUE GRANDEUR OF NATIONS, I dwell thus singly and exclusively on war, it is because war is utterly and irreconcilably inconsistent with true greatness. Thus far, man has worshiped in military glory a phantom idol, compared with which the colossal images of ancient Babylon or modern Hindostan are but toys: and we, in this favored land of freedom, in this blessed day of light, are among the idolators. The Heaven-descended injunction. Know thyself, still speaks to an unheeding world from the far-off letters of gold at Delphi: * Know thyseli: know that the moral is the noblest part of man, transcending far that which is the seat of passion, strife, and war,—nobler than the intellect itself. And the human heart, in its untutored. spontaneous homage to the virtues of peace. declares the same truth, -admonishing the military idolator that it is not the bloody combats, even of bravest chiefs, even of gods themselves. as they echo from the resounding lines of the great poet of war, which receive the warmest admiration, but those two scenes where are painted the gentle, unwarlike affections of our nature, the parting of Hector from Andromache, and the supplication of Priam. In the definitive election of these peaceful pictures, the soul of man, inspired by a better wisdom than that of books, and drawn unconsciously by the heavenly attraction of what is truly great, acknowledges, in touching instances, the vanity of military glory. The beatitudes of Christ, which shrink from saying, "Blessed are the war-makers," inculcate the same les-Reason affirms and repeats what the heart has prompted and Christianity proclaimed. Suppose war decided by force, where is the glory? Suppose it decided by chance, where is the glory? Surely, in other ways true greatness lies. Nor is it difficult to tell where.

True greatness consists in imitating, as nearly as possible for finite man, the perfections of an infinite Creator,—above all, in cultivating those highest perfections, justice and love:

&lt;sup>1</sup> The French under Francis I were defeated at Pavia, in 1525, by the armies of Emperor Charles V. <sup>2</sup> steward of the Prince of Condé, a seventeenth century French nobleman justice, which, like that of St. Louis, does not swerve to the right hand or to the left; love. which, like that of William Penn, regards all mankind as of kin. "God is angry," says Plato, "when any one censures a man like Himself, or praises a man of an opposite character: and the godlike man is the good man." Again, in another of those lovely dialogues precious with immortal truth: "Nothing resembles God more than that man among us who has attained to the highest degree of justice." The true greatness of nations is in those qualities which constitute the true greatness of the individual. It is not in extent of territory, or vastness of population, or accumulation of wealth,-not in fortifications, or armies, or navies,-not in the sulphurous blaze of battle,not in Golgothas, 1 though covered by monuments that kiss the clouds; for all these are creatures and representatives of those qualities in our nature which are unlike anything in God's nature. Nor is it in triumphs of the intellect alone,-in literature, learning, science, or art. The polished Greeks, our masters in the delights of art, and the commanding Romans, overawing the earth with their power, were little more than splendid savages. And the age of Louis the Fourteenth 2 of France, spanning so long a period of ordinary worldly magnificence, thronged by marshals bending under military laurels, enlivened by the unsurpassed comedy of Moliere, dignified by the tragic genius of Corneille, illumined by the splendors of Bossuet, 3 is degraded by immoralities that cannot be mentioned without a blush, by a heartlessness in comparison with which the ice of Nova Zembla is warm, and by a succession of deeds of injustice not to be washed out by the tears of all the recording angels of Heaven.

The French philosophical historian; see L'Esprit des Lois, iii, 3-8.

&lt;sup>4</sup> In the vestibule of the temple at Delphi were written in golden letters sayings of the mythical Seven Wise Men of Greece.

The true greatness of a nation cannot be in triumphs of the intellect alone. Literature and art may enlarge the sphere of its influence; they may adorn it; but in their nature they are but accessories. The true grandeur of humanity is in moral elevation, sustained, enlightened, and decorated by the intellect of man. The surest tokens of this grandeur in a nation are that Christian beneficence which diffuses the greatest happiness among all, and that passionless, godlike justice which controls the relations of the nation to other nations, and to all the people committed to its charge.

But war crushes with bloody heel all beneficence, all happiness, all justice, all that is god-

Golgotha was the place of the crucifixion.

<sup>2</sup> The material wealth, extravagance, and luxury of his reign, 1643-1715, was equaled only by its selfishness, absolutism, and tyranny.

<sup>3</sup> a prelate and orator

like in man,-suspending every commandment of the decalogue, setting at naught every principle of the Gospel, and silencing all law, human as well as divine, except only that impious code of its own, the Laws of War. If in its dismal annals there is any cheerful passage, be assured it is not inspired by a martial fury. Let it not be forgotten, let it be ever borne in mind, as you ponder this theme, that the virtues which shed their charm over its horrors are all borrowed of peace,-that they are emanations from the spirit of love, which is so strong in the heart of man that it survives the rudest assault. The flowers of gentleness, kindliness, fidelity, humanity, which flourish unregarded in the rich meadows of peace, receive unwonted admiration when we discern them in war,-like violets shedding their perfume on the perilous edge of the precipice, beyond the smiling borders of civilization. 4 God be praised for all the examples of magnanimous virtue which he has vouchsafed to mankind! God be praised, that the Roman Emperor, 5 about to start on a distant expedition of war, encompassed by squadrons of cavalry, and by golden eagles swaying in the wind, stooped from his saddle to hear the prayer of a humble widow, demanding justice for the death of her son! God be praised, that Sidney, 6 on the field of battle, gave with dying hand the cup of cold water to the dying soldier! That single act of self-forgetful sacrifice has consecrated the deadly field of Zutphen, far, oh, far beyond its battle; it has consecrated thy name, gallant Sidney, beyond any feat of thy sword, beyond any triumph of thy pen! But there are lowly supplicants in other places than the camp; there are hands outstretched elsewhere than on fields of blood. Everywhere is opportunity for deeds of like charity. Know well that these are not the product of war. They do not spring from enmity, hatred, and strife, but from those benign sentiments whose natural and ripened fruit of joy and blessing are found only in If at any time they appear in the soldier, it is less because than notwithstanding he is the hireling of battle. Let me not be told, then, of the virtues of war. Let not the acts of generosity and sacrifice sometimes blossoming on its fields be invoked in its defense. From such a giant root of bitterness no true good can The poisonous tree, 7 in Oriental spring.

<sup>4</sup> Note the ornateness of the oratory of Sumner's time as compared with that of the present.
5 Trajan, whose kind deed Dante has made immortal in his Purgatorio, x, 76
6 Sir Philip Sidney, 1554-1586, was mortally wounded on the batt'efield of Zutphen in the Netherlands.
7 possibly the upas tree, concerning which many fabrules tales have been cold ulous tales have been cold imagery, though watered by nectar and covered with roses, produces only the fruit of death.

Casting our eyes over the history of nations with horror we discern the succession of murderous slaughters by which their progress is marked. Even as the hunter follows the wild beast to his lair by the drops of blood on the ground, so we follow man, faint, weary, staggering with wounds, through the Black Forest of the past, which he has reddened with his gore. Oh, let it not be in the future ages as in those we now contemplate! Let the grandeur of man be discerned, not in bloody victory or ravenous conquest, but in the blessings he has secured, in the good he has accomplished, in the triumphs of justice and beneficence, in the establishment of perpetual peace!

As ocean washes every shore, and with allembracing arms clasps every land, while on its heaving bosom it bears the products of various climes, so peace surrounds, protects, and upholds all other blessings. Without it, commerce is vain, the order of industry is restrained, justice is arrested, happiness is blasted, virtue sickens and dies.

Far be from us, fellow citizens, on this festival. the pride of national victory, and the illusion of national freedom, in which we are too prone to indulge! None of you make rude boast of individual prosperity or prowess. And here I end as I began. Our country cannot do what an individual cannot do. Therefore it must not vaunt or be puffed up. Rather bend to unperformed duties. Independence is not all. We have but half done, when we have made ourselves free. The scornful taunt wrung from bitter experience of the great Revolution in France must not be leveled at us: "They wish to be free, but know not how to be just."1 Nor is priceless freedom an end in itself, but rather the means of justice and beneficence. where alone is enduring concord, with that attendant happiness which is the final end and aim of nations, as of every human heart. It is not enough to be free. There must be peace which cannot fail, and other nations must share the great possession. For this good must we labor, bearing ever in mind two special objects, complements of each other: first, the arbitrament of war must end; and, secondly, disarmament must begin. With this ending and this beginning the great gates of the future will be opened, and the guardian virtues will assert a new empire. Alas! until this is done, national honor and national glory will yet longer flaunt in blood, and there can be no true grandeur of nations

To this great work let me summon you. That future, which filled the lofty visions of sages and bards in Greece and Rome, which was foretold by prophets and heralded by evangelists when man, in happy isles or in a new paradise, shall confess the loveliness of peace, may you secure, if not for yourselves, at least for your children! Believe that you can do it, and you can do it. The true golden age is before, not behind. If man has once been driven from paradise, while an angel with flaming sword forbade his return, there is another paradise, even on earth, which he may make for himself, by the cultivation of knowledge, religion, and the kindly virtues of life, where the confusion of tongues shall be dissolved in the union of hearts, and joyous nature, borrowing prolific charms from prevailing harmony, shall spread her lap with unimagined bounty, and there shall be perpetual jocund Spring, and sweet strains borne on "the odoriferous wing of gentle gales," through valleys of delight, more pleasant than the Vale of Tempe, 2 richer than the garden of the Hesperides, with no dragon to guard its golden fruit.

It is said that the age does not demand this work. The robber conqueror of the past, from fiery sepulcher demands it; the precious blood of millions unjustly shed in war, crying from the ground, demands it; the heart of the good man demands it, the conscience, even of the soldier, whispers, "Peace." There are considerations, springing from our situation and condition, which fervently invite us to take the lead. Here should join the patriotic ardor of the land, the ambition of the statesman, the effort of the scholar, the pervasive influence of the press, the mild persuasion of the sanctuary, the early teaching of the school. Here, in ampler ether and diviner air, are untried fields for exalted triumph, more truly worthy the American name than any snatched from rivers of blood. War is known as the last reason of kings. Let it be no reason of our Republic. Let us renounce and throw off forever the voke of tyranny most oppressive of all in the world's annals. As those standing on the mountaintop first discern the coming beams of morning, so may we from the vantage-ground of liberal institutions, first recognize the ascending sun of a new era! Lift high the gates, and let the King of Glory in,—the King of true Glory, of Peace! I catch the last words of music from the lips of innocence and beauty:-

&lt;sup>1</sup> a saying of Ahhé Sieyès, a French statesman, 1748-1836

<sup>2</sup> a valley in Greece famed for its beauty

"And let the whole earth be filled with His glory!"

It is a beautiful picture in Grecian story. that there was at least one spot, the small island of Delos, dedicated to the gods, and kept at all times sacred from war. No hostile foot ever pressed this kindly soil, and citizens of all countries met here, in common worship, beneath the aegis of inviolable peace. So let us dedicate our beloved country; and may the blessed consecration be felt, in all its parts, everywhere throughout its ample domain! The Temple of Honor shall be enclosed by the Temple of Concord, that it may never more be entered through any portal of war; the horn of abundance shall overflow at its gates; the angel of religion shall be the guide over its steps of flashing adamant; while within its happy courts, purged of violence and wrong, JUSTICE, returned to the earth from long exile in the skies. with equal scales for nations as for men. shall rear her serene and majestic front; and by her side, greatest of all, CHARITY, sublime in meekness, hoping all and enduring all, shall divinely temper every righteous decree, and with words of infinite cheer inspire to those deeds that cannot vanish away. And the future chief of the Republic, destined to uphold the glories of a new era, unspotted by human blood, shall be first in peace, first in the hearts of his country-

While seeking these fruitful glories for ourselves, let us strive for their extension to other lands. Let the bugles sound the Truce of God 1 to the whole world forever. Not to one people. but to every people, let the glad tidings go. The selfish boast of the Spartan women, that they never saw the smoke of an enemy's camp. must become the universal chorus of mankind. while the iron belt of war, now encompassing the globe, is exchanged for the golden cestus of peace, clothing all with celestial beauty. History dwells with fondness on the reverent homage bestowed by massacring soldiers, upon the spot occupied by the sepulcher of the Lord; vain man! Why confine regard to a few feet of sacred mold? The whole earth is the sepulcher of the Lord; nor can any righteous man profane any part thereof. Confessing this truth let us now, on this Sabbath of the Nation, lay a new and living stone in the grand Temple of Universal Peace, whose dome shall be lofty as the firmament of heaven, broad and comprehensive as earth itself.

1845 · 1845

ABRAHAM LINCOLN 1809-1865

Lincoln's immediate ancestors were frontiersmen in straightened circumstances, woodsmen, farmers. Removing with his father from Hardin County. Kentucky, where he was born, to Indiana and then to Illinois, he obtained in the aggregate perhaps a year's schooling, helped clear a pioneer farm, was flat-boat hand on the Mississippi, soldier in the Black Hawk War, postmaster, surveyor, member of the legislature, lawyer, and at length member of Congress in 1846. In 1858, as Republican candidate for the United States Senate from Illinois, he met his opponent, Douglas, in a series of debates that made him more than locally known. In 1860 and 1864 he was elected President of the United States. He was assassinated April 14, 1865, a few days after the downfall of the Confederacy.

In the present generation Lincoln has become almost a cult. His leadership in the greatest crisis of the nation's history and the circumstances of his tragic death make it still difficult to see the man in true perspective. Nevertheless, it is easy to feel in his best speeches and writings the evidence of a great spirit, great in emotion, and masterful in expression. Upon the English Bible and other masterpieces of English literature he formed a style of such directness, simplicity, terseness, and strength as is granted only to genius. It is not through the anecdotes and biographies of such a man that we can get the truest measure of his character and his greatness, but through his own words; these are the man himself.

Biography and criticism: (Articles and books upon Lincoln are so numerous that only a few, mostly recent, are noted.) J. T. Morse, Abraham Lincoln (AS), 2 vols. 1893; F. F. Browne, The Every-day Life of Abraham Lincoln, 1913; Lord Charnwood, Abraham Lincoln, 1916; J. G. Nicolay and John Hay, Abraham Lincoln, a History, 10 vols. 1890; Ida Tarbell, Life of Abraham Lincoln, 2 vols. 1900; Brand Whitlock, Abraham Lincoln, (BB) 1916; same, Carl Sandburg, 2 vols. 1926; A. J. Beveridge, Abraham Lincoln, 1809-1858, 2 vols. 1928. See also John Drinkwater, Abraham Lincoln (play), 1919; Mary R. S. Andrews, The Perfect Tribute, 1906; same, Scrib. M. 40:17-24.

FAREWELL ADDRESS AT SPRING-FIELD, ILLINOIS <sup>2</sup>

My Friends: No one, not in my situation, can appreciate my feeling of sadness at this parting. To this place, and the kindness of these people, I owe everything. Here I have lived a quarter of a century, and have passed from a young to an old man. Here my children have been born, and one is buried. I now leave, not knowing when or whether ever I may return, with a task before me greater than that which rested upon Washington. Without the assistance of that Divine Being who ever attended him, I cannot succeed. With that assistance, I cannot fail. Trusting in Him who can go with me, and remain with you, and be everywhere for good, let us confidently hope that all will yet be well. To His care commending you, as I hope in your prayers you will commend me. I bid vou an affectionate farewell.

&lt;sup>1</sup> a suspension of private feuds from Thursday evening to Monday morning for the celebration of church festivals, common in the 11th and 12th centuries

&lt;sup>2</sup> delivered Feb. 11, 1861, on Lincoln's departure from Springfield to assume the Presidency

1861 1861

ADDRESS IN INDEPENDENCE HALL PHILADELPHIA 1

Mr. Cuyler: I am filled with deep emotion at finding myself standing in this place, where were collected together the wisdom, the patriotism, the devotion to principle, from which sprang the institutions under which we live. You have kindly suggested to me that in my hands is the task of restoring peace to our distracted country. I can say in return, sir. that all the political sentiments I entertain have been drawn, so far as I have been able to draw them, from the sentiments which originated in and were given to the world from this hall. I have never had a feeling, politically, that did not spring from the sentiments embodied in the Declaration of Independence. I have often pondered over the dangers which were incurred by the men who assembled here and framed and adopted that Declaration. I have pondered over the toils that were endured by the officers and soldiers of the army who achieved that independence. I have often inquired of myself what great principle or idea it was that kept this Confederacy so long together. It was not the mere matter of separation of the colonies from the motherland, but that sentiment in the Declaration of Independence which gave liberty not alone to the people of this country, but hope to all the world, for all future time. It was that which gave promise that in due time the weights would be lifted from the shoulders of all men, and that all should have an equal chance. This is the sentiment embodied in the Declaration of Independence. Now, my friends, can this country be saved on that basis? If it can, I will consider myself one of the happiest men in the world if I can help to save it. If it cannot be saved upon that principle, it will be truly awful. But if this country cannot be saved without giving up that principle. I was about to say I would rather be assassinated on this spot than surrender it. Now, in my view of the present aspect of affairs, there is no need of bloodshed and war. There is no necessity for it. I am not in favor of such a course; and I may say in advance that there will be no bloodshed unless it is forced upon the government. The government will not use force, unless force is used against it.

Delivered Feb. 22, 1861; Theodore Cuyler, who presided at the meeting, was a prominent lawyer of Philadelphia and a War-Democrat; that is, a Democrat who believed that the Union should be maintained even at the cost of war. He therefore favored Lincoln's Republican administration.

My friends, this is wholly an unprepared speech. I did not expect to be called on to say a word when I came here. I supposed I was merely to do something toward raising a flag. I may, therefore, have said something indiscreet. But I have said nothing but what I am willing to live by, and, if it be the pleasure of Almighty God, to die by.

1861 1861

THE GETTYSBURG ADDRESS 2

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting-place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But in a larger sense we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us,that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

<sup>2</sup> Delivered November 19, 1863, at the dedication of the National Cemetery at Gettysburg; the battle of Gettysburg, July 1-3, 1863, one of the bloodiest in American history, is generally conceded to have been the turning point in the Civil War. This speech has passed into the permanent literature of the English tongue, while the long, formal address which preceded it, delivered by Edward Everett, the orator of the occasion, is forgotten.

1863 1863

LETTER TO MRS BIXBY

Executive Mansion, Washington, November 21, 1864.

Mrs. Bixby. Boston. Massachusetts.

Dear Madam: I have been shown in the files of the War Department a statement of the Adjutant-General of Massachusetts that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously on the field of battle. I feel how weak and fruitless must be any words of mine which should attempt to beguile you from the grief of a loss so overwhelming. But I cannot refrain from tendering to you the consolation that may be found in the thanks of the Republic they died to save. I pray that our heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement, and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and lost, and the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom.

Yours very sincerely and respectfully, ABRAHAM LINCOLN

THE SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS 1

Fellow-countrymen: At this second appearing to take the oath of the presidential office, there is less occasion for an extended address than there was at the first. Then a statement, somewhat in detail, of a course to be pursued, seemed fitting and proper. Now, at the expiration of four years, during which public declarations have been constantly called forth on every point and phase of the great contest which still absorbs the attention and engrosses the energies of the nation, little that is new could be presented. The progress of our arms, upon which all else chiefly depends, is as well known to the public as to myself; and it is, I trust, reasonably satisfactory and encouraging to all. With high hope for the future, no prediction in regard to it is ventured.

On the occasion corresponding to this four years ago, all thoughts were anxiously directed to an impending civil war. All dreaded itall sought to avert it. While the inaugural address was being delivered from this place, devoted altogether to saving the Union without war, insurgent agents were in the city seeking to destroy it without war—seeking to dissolve the Union, and divide effects, by negotiation. Both parties deprecated war; but one of them would make war rather than let the nation survive; and the other would accept war rather than let it perish. And the war came.

One eighth of the whole population were colored slaves, not distributed generally over the Union, but localized in the southern part of it. These slaves constituted a peculiar and powerful interest. All knew that this interest was, somehow, the cause of the war. strengthen, perpetuate, and extend this interest was the object for which the insurgents would rend the Union, even by war; while the government claimed no right to do more than to restrict the territorial enlargement of it.

Neither party expected for the war the magnitude or the duration which it has already attained. Neither anticipated that the cause of the conflict might cease with, or even before, the conflict itself should cease. Each looked for an easier triumph and a result less fundamental and astounding. Both read the same Bible, and pray to the same God; and each invokes his aid against the other. It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces: but let us judge not, that we be not judged. prayers of both could not be answered—that of neither has been answered fully.

The Almighty has his own purposes. "Woe unto the world because of offenses! for it must needs be that offenses come; but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh." 2 If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of those offenses which in the providence of God, must needs come, but which, having continued through his appointed time, he now wills to remove, and that he gives to both North and South this terrible war, as the woe due to those by whom the offense came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to him? Fondly do we hope—fervently do we pray—that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet. if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword. as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said, "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether." 3

<sup>1</sup> delivered March 4, 1865

<sup>2</sup> Matthew xviii, 7

<sup>3</sup> Psalms xix, 9

With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle. and for his widow and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves, and with all nations.

1865 1865

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER 1807-1892

Of the "six great American poets" of the nineteenth century Whittier sprang most closely from the soil. He was born at Haverhill, Massachusetts, of Quaker parents in the humblest circumstances. He lived the life of a typical farm boy; he attended the country schools and an academy; he worked at various trades and taught school. His life before the Civil War was that of an active anti-slavery reformer, and he suffered personal violence for his opinions. From 1830-1836 he engaged in journalism, beginning with the Haverhill Gazette, and ending with the Pennsylvania Freeman; and he continued until the Civil War closed, an earnest contributor to reform journals. Whittier's poems and collections of poetry date from 1831 to 1892; some of his best poetical work was done toward the close of his life, and no American poet save Bryant has had so long a career of productive literary activity. The collected and revised edition of his works in verse and prose occupies seven volumes.

Whittier's poems fall into two general divisions, those relating to the anti-slavery cause, and those relating to New England. Those of the first division, controversial and of temporary interest. do not now concern us. Those relating to the history and legends of his region, and especially those descriptive of the life and spirit of the New England of Whittier's day-now gone forever-are of great interest. The style may be in places diffuse, and there may be faults in versification and diction; but the picture of the simple, unified life of the New England home with its labor, self-sacrifice, and piety, its devotion to truth and honor, its intellectual and spiritual ambition, is final; for the life that produced it will never return. It is the humble but deep-rooted flower of Puritanismless brilliant and less imaginative than Hawthorne's -photographic in its realism.

Biography and criticism: G. R. Carpenter, (AML) 1903; T. W. Higginson, (EML) 1902; R. Burton, (BB) 1901; W. J. Linton, (GW) 1893; Macy; Chubb; More (Shel. 3); B. Perry, "Whittier for Today," Atlan. 100:851-9; E. C. Stedman, "Whittier," Cent. 30:38-50; G. E. Woodberry, "John Greenleaf Whittier," Atlan. 70:642-8; L. Abbott, "John Greenleaf Whittier, Mystic," Outlook, 127:96-8; N. Foerster, "Nature in Whittier," Nation 104:15-17.

MEMORIES 1

A beautiful and happy girl,
With step as light as summer air,
Eyes glad with smiles, and brow of pearl,
Shadowed by many a careless curl
Of unconfined and flowing hair;
A seeming child in everything,
Save thoughtful brow and ripening charms,
As Nature wears the smile of Spring
When sinking into Summer's arms.

A mind rejoicing in the light
Which melted through its graceful bower,
Leaf after leaf, dew-moist and bright,
And stainless in its holy white,
Unfolding like a morning flower:
A heart, which, like a fine-toned lute,
With every breath of feeling woke,
And, even when the tongue was mute,
From eye and lip in music spoke.

How thrills once more the lengthening chain
Of memory, at the thought of thee!
Old hopes which long in dust have lain,
Old dreams, come thronging back again,
And boyhood lives again in me;
I feel its glow upon my cheek,
Its fulness of the heart is mine,
As when I leaned to hear thee speak.
Or raised my doubtful eye to thine.

I hear again thy low replies,
I feel thy arm within my own,
And timidly again uprise
The fringed lids of hazel eyes,
With soft brown tresses overblown.
Ah! memories of sweet summer eves,
Of moonlit wave and willowy way,
Of stars and flowers, and dewy leaves,
And smiles and tones more dear than they!

Ere this, thy quiet eye hath smiled
My picture of thy youth to see,
When, half a woman, half a child,
Thy very artlessness beguiled,
And folly's self seemed wise in thee;
I too can smile, when o'er that hour
The lights of memory backward stream,
Yet feel the while that manhood's power
Is vainer than my boyhood's dream.

Years have passed on, and left their trace Of graver care and deeper thought;

<sup>1</sup> This poem, as well as "My Playmate" and others, was doubtless founded upon the memories and affections of Whittier's youth.

70

And unto me the calm, cold face Of manhood, and to thee the grace Of woman's pensive beauty brought. More wide, perchance, for blame than praise, The schoolboy's humble name has flown; Thine, in the green and quiet ways Of unobtrusive goodness known.

And wider yet in thought and deed Diverge our pathways, one in youth; Thine the Genevan's 1 sternest creed. While answers to my spirit's need The Derby dalesman's 2 simple truth. For thee, the priestly rite and prayer, And holy day, and solemn psalm; For me, the silent reverence where My brethren gather, slow and calm.

Yet hath thy spirit left on me An impress Time has worn not out, And something of myself in thee. A shadow from the past, I see, Lingering, even yet, thy way about; Not wholly can the heart unlearn That lesson of its better hours, Nor yet has Time's dull footstep worn To common dust that path of flowers.

Thus, while at times before our eyes The shadows melt, and fall apart, And, smiling through them, round us lies The warm light of our morning skies,-The Indian Summer of the heart!-In secret sympathies of mind. In founts of feeling which retain Their pure, fresh flow, we yet may find Our early dreams not wholly vain! 1850 1841

PROEM 3

I love the old melodious lays Which softly melt the ages through, The songs of Spenser's golden days, Arcadian Sidney's 4 silvery phrase. Sprinkling our noon of time with freshest morning dew.

Yet, vainly in my quiet hours To breathe their marvelous notes I try; I feel them, as the leaves and flowers land.

John Calvin, 1509-1564, a prominent theologian of the Protestant Reformation, lived in Geneva, Switzerland.

 The implication is wrong. George Fox, the founder of the Society of Friends, came from Leicestershire, though some of his hardest experiences as an evangelist took place in Derbyshire.
 written to introduce the first general collection of Whittier's poems

<sup>1</sup> The reference is to Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia (1590).

In silence feel the dewy showers. And drink with glad, still lips the blessing of the sky.

The rigor of a frozen clime, The harshness of an untaught ear. The jarring words of one whose rime Beat often Labor's hurried time. Or Duty's rugged march through storm and strife, are here.

Of mystic beauty, dreamy grace, No rounded art the lack supplies; Unskilled the subtle lines to trace.

Or softer shades of Nature's face. I view her common forms with unanointed eves.

Nor mine the seer-like power to show The secrets of the heart and mind; To drop the plummet-line below Our common world of joy and woe, A more intense despair or brighter hope to find.

Yet here at least an earnest sense Of human right and weal is shown; A hate of tyranny intense. And hearty in its vehemence, As if my brother's pain and sorrow were my own.

O Freedom! if to me belong Nor mighty Milton's gift divine, Nor Marvell's 5 wit and graceful song. Still with a love as deep and strong As theirs, I lay like them, my best gifts on thy shrine! 1847 1849

BARCLAY OF URY 6

Up the streets of Aberdeen, By the kirk and college green, Rode the Laird of Ury; Close behind him, close beside, Foul of mouth and evil-eyed. Pressed the mob in fury.

Flouted him the drunken churl. Jeered at him the serving-girl. Prompt to please her master; And the begging carlin, late Fed and clothed at Ury's gate, Cursed him as he passed her.

5 Andrew Marvell, 1621-1678, a satirical and lyric

10

Puritan roet

Barclay, a distinguished Scotch soldier, was one of the earliest converts to Quakerism in Scotland.

an

70

80

20

30

50

Yet, with calm and stately mien, Up the streets of Aberdeen Came he slowly riding; And, to all he saw and heard. Answering not with bitter word, Turning not for chiding.

Came a troop with broadswords swinging. Bits and bridles sharply ringing, Loose and free and froward: Ouoth the foremost, "Ride him down! Push him! prick him! through the town Drive the Ouaker coward!"

But from out the thickening crowd Cried a sudden voice and loud: "Barclay! Ho! a Barclay!" And the old man at his side Saw a comrade, battle tried, Scarred and sunburned darkly;

Who with ready weapon bare. Fronting to the troopers there, Cried aloud: "God save us. Call ye coward him who stood Ankle deep in Lützen's 1 blood, With the brave Gustavus?"

"Nay, I do not need thy sword, Comrade mine," said Ury's lord;
"Put it up, I pray thee: Passive to his holy will, Trust I in my Master's still, Even though he slay me.

"Pledges of thy love and faith. Proved on many a field of death. Not by me are needed." Marveled much that henchman bold, That his laird, so stout of old, Now so meekly pleaded.

"Woe's the day!" he sadly said, With a slowly shaking head, And a look of pity; "Ury's honest lord reviled. Mock of knave and sport of child, In his own good city!

"Speak the word, and, master mine, As we charged on Tilly's 2 line, And his Walloon lancers,

During the Thirty Years' War, Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, gained a victory in 1632 at Lützen, Prussia, over Wallenstein, the great general of Ferdinand II, emperor of Austria.
 Tilly, a Belgian, another of Ferdinand's great generals, had in his army many Walloons—Celtic people of southern Belgium.

Smiting through their midst we'll teach Civil look and decent speech To these boyish prancers!"

"Marvel not, mine ancient friend, Like beginning, like the end." Ouoth the Laird of Urv: "Is the sinful servant more Than his gracious Lord who bore Bonds and stripes in Jewry?

"Give me joy that in his name I can bear, with patient frame. All these vain ones offer: While for them he suffereth long, Shall I answer wrong with wrong, Scoffing with the scoffer?

"Happier I, with loss of all, Hunted, outlawed, held in thrall. With few friends to greet me, Than when reeve <sup>3</sup> and squire were seen, Riding out from Aberdeen, With bared heads to meet me.

"When each goodwife, o'er and o'er, Blessed me as I passed her door; And the snooded daughter, Through her casement glancing down, Smiled on him who bore renown From red fields of slaughter.

"Hard to feel the stranger's scoff, Hard the old friend's falling off, Hard to learn forgiving: But the Lord his own rewards, And his love with theirs accords, Warm and fresh and living.

"Through this dark and stormy night Faith beholds a feeble light Up the blackness streaking; Knowing God's own time is best, In a patient hope I rest For the full day-breaking!"

So the Laird of Ury said, Turning slow his horse's head Towards the Tolbooth 4 prison, Where, through iron grates, he heard Poor disciples of the Word Preach of Christ arisen!

Not in vain, Confessor old. Unto us the tale is told

3 an officer of justice a prison or jail, particularly the prison at Edinburgh

100

90

120

Of thy day of trial; Every age on him who strays From its broad and beaten ways Pours its sevenfold vial.

Happy he whose inward ear Angel comfortings can hear. O'er the rabble's laughter; And, while Hatred's fagots burn, Glimpses through the smoke discern Of the good hereafter.

Knowing this, that never yet Share of Truth was vainly set In the world's wide fallow; After hands shall sow the seed, After hands from hill and mead Reap the harvests yellow.

Thus, with somewhat of the Seer,
Must the moral pioneer
From the Future borrow;
Clothe the waste with dreams of grain,
And, on midnight's sky of rain,
Paint the golden morrow!
1847

THE ANGELS OF BUENA VISTA 1

Speak and tell us, our Ximena, 2 looking northward far away,

O'er the camp of the invaders, o'er the Mexican array,

Who is losing? who is winning? are they far or come they near?

Look abroad, and tell us, sister, whither rolls the storm we hear.

"Down the hills of Angostura still the storm of battle rolls; Blood is flowing, men are dying; God have mercy on their souls!"

Who is losing? who is winning?—"Over hill and over plain,

I see but smoke of cannon clouding through the mountain rain."

Holy Mother! keep our brothers! Look. Ximena, look once more.

"Still I see the fearful whirlwind rolling darkly as before.

Bearing on, in strange confusion, friend and foeman, foot and horse,

At the battle of Buena Vista, in 1847, during the Mexican War, Mexican women aided the wounded of both armies.
pronounced Hē-māy'-nä

" a range of mountains near Buena Vista

Like some wild and troubled torrent sweeping down its mountain course."

Look forth once more, Ximena! "Ah! the smoke has rolled away;

And I see the Northern rifles gleaming down the ranks of gray.

Hark! that sudden blast of bugles! there the troop of Miñon * wheels;

There the Northern horses thunder, with the cannon at their heels.

"Jesu, pity! how it thickens! now retreat and now advance!

Right against the blazing cannon shivers Puebla's charging lance!

Down they go, the brave young riders; horse and foot together fall;

Like a plowshare in the fallow through them plows the Northern ball."

Nearer came the storm and nearer, rolling fast and frightful on:

Speak, Ximena, speak and tell us, who has lost, and who has won?

"Alas! alas! I know not; friend and foe together fall,

O'er the dying rush the living: pray, my sisters, for them all!

"Lo! the wind the smoke is lifting: Blessed Mother, save my brain!

I can see the wounded crawling slowly out from heaps of slain.

Now they stagger, blind and bleeding; now they fall, and strive to rise;

Hasten, sisters, haste and save them, lest they die before our eyes!

"O my heart's love! O my dear one! lay thy poor head on my knee:

Dost thou know the lips that kiss thee? Canst thou hear me? canst thou see?

O my husband, brave and gentle! O my Bernal, look once more

On the blessed cross before thee! Mercy! mercy! all is o'er!"

Dry thy tears, my poor Ximena; lay thy dear one down to rest;

Let his hands be meekly folded, lay the cross upon his breast;

Let his dirge be sung hereafter, and his funeral masses said:

Today, thou poor bereaved one, the living ask thy aid.

4 Miñon was a Mexican general under Santa Anna.

20

30

Close beside her, faintly moaning, fair and young, a soldier lay,

Torn with shot and pierced with lances, bleeding slow his life away;

But, as tenderly before him, the lorn Ximena knelt.

She saw the Northern eagle shining on his pistol-belt. 40

With a stifled cry of horror straight she turned away her head:

With a sad and bitter feeling looked she back upon her dead;

But she heard the youth's low moaning, and his struggling breath of pain,

And she raised the cooling water to his parching lips again.

Whispered low the dying soldier, pressed her hand and faintly smiled:

Was that pitying face his mother's? did she watch beside her child?

All his stranger words with meaning her woman's heart supplied;

With her kiss upon his forehead, "Mother!" murmured he, and died!

"A bitter curse upon them, poor boy, who led thee forth,

From some gentle, sad-eyed mother, weeping, lonely, in the North!" 50

Spake the mournful Mexic woman, as she laid him with her dead.

And turned to soothe the living, and bind the wounds which bled.

Look forth once more, Ximena! "Like a cloud before the wind

Rolls the battle down the mountains, leaving blood and death behind;

Ah! they plead in vain for mercy; in the dust the wounded strive;

Hide your faces, holy angels! oh thou Christ of God, forgive!"

Sink, O Night, among thy mountains! let the cool, gray shadows fall;

Dying brothers, fighting demons, drop thy curtain over all!

Through the thickening winter twilight, wide apart the battle rolled,

In its sheath the saber rested, and the cannon's lips grew cold.

But the noble Mexic women still their holy task pursued,

Through that long, dark night of sorrow, worn and faint and lacking food;

Over weak and suffering brothers, with a tender care they hung,

And the dying foeman blessed them in a strange and Northern tongue.

Not wholly lost, O Father! is this evil world of ours;

Upward, through its blood and ashes, spring afresh the Eden flowers;

From its smoking hell of battle, Love and Pity send their prayer,

And still thy white-winged angels hover dimly in our air!

1847

THE POOR VOTER ON ELECTION DAY

The proudest now is but my peer.
The highest not more high;
Today, of all the weary year.
A king of men am I.
Today, alike are great and small,
The nameless and the known;
My palace is the people's hall,

The ballot-box my throne!

Who serves today upon the list
Beside the served shall stand;
Alike the brown and wrinkled fist,
The gloved and dainty hand!
The rich is level with the poor,
The weak is strong today;
And sleekest broadcloth counts no more

Today let pomp and vain pretence
My stubborn right abide;
I set a plain man's common sense
Against the pedant's pride.
Today shall simple manhood try
The strength of gold and land;

Than homespun frock of grav.

The strength of gold and land;
The wide world has not wealth to buy
The power in my right hand!

While there's a grief to seek redress, Or balance to adjust,

Where weighs our living manhood less Than Mammon's vilest dust,— While there's a right to need my vote,

A wrong to sweep away,

Up! clouted knee and ragged coat! A man's a man today! 1

1848

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Burns's "Is There for Honest Poverty," the sentiment of which is similar to that of this poem.

1850

ICHAROD! 1

So fallen! so lost! the light withdrawn Which once he wore! The glory from his gray hairs gone Forevermore!

Revile him not,—the Tempter hath A snare for all: And pitying tears, not scorn and wrath, Refit his fall!

Oh, dumb be passion's stormy rage, When he who might Have lighted up and led his age. Falls back in night.

Scorn! would the angels laugh, to mark A bright soul driven. Fiend-goaded, down the endless dark, From hope and heaven!

Let not the land once proud of him Insult him now. Nor brand with deeper shame his dim, Dishonored brow.

But let its humbled sons, instead, From sea to lake, A long lament, as for the dead, In sadness make.

Of all we loved and honored, naught Save power remains.— A fallen angel's pride of thought, Still strong in chains.

All else is gone; from those great eyes The soul has fled: When faith is lost, when honor dies. The man is dead!

Then, pay the reverence of old days To his dead fame: Walk backward, with averted gaze, And hide the shame! 1850

Hebrew, "the glory is departed"; see I Samuel iv, 21.
Whittier thus characterizes Webster, whose Seventh of March Speech in 1850 had made the Abolitionists of his time feel that he had compromised his conscience in an endeavor to win the presidency. Recent historians, however, believe Webster to have been influenced so'ely by a desire to save the Union. The degree of tenderness, dignity, and strength shown here does not appear elsewhere in Whittier's political poetry. Cf. Browning's "The Lost Leader," written five years before. years before.

BURNS<sup>2</sup>

ON RECEIVING A SPRIG OF HEATHER IN BLOSSOM No more these simple flowers belong To Scottish maid and lover: Sown in the common soil of song. They bloom the wide world over.

In smiles and tears, in sun and showers, The minstrel and the heather. The deathless singer and the flowers He sang of live together.

Wild heather-bells and Robert Burns! The moorland flower and peasant! How, at their mention, memory turns Her pages old and pleasant!

The gray sky wears again its gold And purple of adorning, And manhood's noonday shadows hold The dews of boyhood's morning.

The dews that washed the dust and soil From off the wings of pleasure, The sky, that flecked the ground of toil With golden threads of leisure.

I call to mind the summer day, The early harvest mowing, The sky with sun and clouds at play. And flowers with breezes blowing.

I hear the blackbird in the corn, The locust in the having; And, like the fabled hunter's horn, Old tunes my heart is playing.

How oft that day, with fond delay, I sought the maple's shadow. And sang with Burns the hours away, Forgetful of the meadow!

Bees hummed, birds twittered, overhead I heard the squirrels leaping. The good dog listened while I read, And wagged his tail in keeping.

I watched him while in sportive mood I read The Twa Dogs' story, And half believed he understood The poet's allegory.

Sweet day, sweet songs! The golden hours Grew brighter for that singing,

2 The poem is in one of Burns's favorite ballad forms.

20

10

40

qη

110

50

60

80

From brook and bird and meadow flowers A dearer welcome bringing.

New light on home-seen Nature beamed, New glory over Woman; And daily life and duty seemed No longer poor and common.

I woke to find the simple truth
Of fact and feeling better
Than all the dreams that held my youth
A still repining debtor:

That Nature gives her handmaid, Art,
The themes of sweet discoursing;
The tender idyls of the heart
In every tongue rehearsing.

Why dream of lands of gold and pearl, Of loving knight and lady, When farmer boy and barefoot girl Were wandering there already?

I saw through all familiar things
The romance underlying:
The joys and griefs that plume the wings
Of Fancy skyward flying.

I saw the same blithe day return.
The same sweet fall of even,
That rose on wooded Craigie-burn.
And sank on crystal Devon.

I matched with Scotland's heathery hills The sweet-brier and the clover; With Ayr and Doon, my native rills. Their wood-hymns chanting over.

O'er rank and pomp, as he had seen, I saw the Man uprising; No longer common or unclean, The child of God's baptizing!

With clearer eyes I saw the worth Of life among the lowly; The Bible at his Cotter's hearth <sup>2</sup> Had made my own more holy.

And if at times an evil strain, To lawless love appealing, Broke in upon the sweet refrain Of pure and healthful feeling,

It died upon the eye and ear, No inward answer gaining;

<sup>1</sup> The Craigie Burn (stream), the Devon, Ayr, and Doon are all rivers of Scotland.
 <sup>2</sup> See Burns's "The Cotter's Saturday Night."

No heart had I to see or hear The discord and the staining.

Let those who never erred forget
His worth, in vain bewailings;
Sweet Soul of Song! I own my deht
Uncanceled by his failings!

Lament who will the ribald line
Which tells his lapse from duty,
How kissed the maddening lips of wine
Or wanton ones of beauty;

But think, while falls that shade between
The erring one and Heaven,
That he who loved like Magdalen,
Like her may be forgiven.

Not his the song whose thunderous chime Eternal echoes render,— The mournful Tuscan's <sup>3</sup> haunted rime, And Milton's starry splendor!

But who his human heart has laid To Nature's bosom nearer? Who sweetened toil like him, or paid To love a tribute dearer?

Through all his tuneful art, how strong <sup>4</sup>
The human feeling gushes!
The very moonlight of his song
Is warm with smiles and blushes!

Give lettered pomp to teeth of Time, So "Bonnie Doon" but tarry; Blot out the Epic's stately rime. But spare his Highland Mary!

MAUD MULLER 5

Maud Muller on a summer's day Raked the meadow sweet with hay.

<sup>a</sup> Dante
<sup>4</sup> Cf. Wordsworth's "At the Grave of Burns" and "Thoughts Suggested The Day Following."

<sup>5</sup> Whittier wrote regarding this poem: "The poem had no real foundation in fact, though a hint of it may have been found in recaling an incident, trivial in itself, of a journey on the picturesque Maine seaboard with my sister some years before it was written. We had stopped to rest our tired horse under the shade of an apple-tree, and refresh him with water from a little brook which rippled through the stone wall across the road. A very beautiful young girl in scantest summer attire was at work in the hayfield, and as we talked with her we noticed that she strove to hide her bare feet by raking hay over them, blushing as she did so, through the tan of her cheek and neck."
See Whittier's Poems, Cambridge Edition, p. 47.
The Houghton Mifflin Company.

30

Beneath her torn hat glowed the wealth Of simple beauty and rustic health.

Singing, she wrought, and her merry glee The mock-bird echoed from his tree.

But when she glanced to the far-off town, White from its hill-slope looking down,

The sweet song died, and a vague unrest And a nameless longing filled her breast,—

A wish that she hardly dared to own, For something better than she had known.

The Judge rode slowly down the lane. Smoothing his horse's chestnut mane.

He drew his bridle in the shade Of the apple-trees, to greet the maid,

And ask a draught from the spring that flowed Through the meadow across the road.

She stooped where the cool spring bubbled up, And filled for him her small tin cup,

And blushed as she gave it, looking down On her feet so bare, and her tattered gown.

"Thanks!" said the Judge; "a sweeter draught From a fairer hand was never quaffed."

He spoke of the grass and flowers and trees, Of the singing birds and the humming bees;

Then talked of the haying, and wondered whether

The cloud in the west would bring foul weather.

And Maud forgot her brier-torn gown And her graceful ankles bare and brown;

And listened, while a pleased surprise Looked from her long-lashed hazel eyes.

At last, like one who for delay Seeks a vain excuse, he rode away.

Maud Muller looked and sighed: "Ah me! That I the Judge's bride might be!

"He would dress me up in silks so fine, And praise and toast me at his wine.

"My father should wear a broadcloth coat; My brother should sail a painted boat. "I'd dress my mother so grand and gay, And the baby should have a new toy each day.

"And I'd feed the hungry and clothe the poor. And all should bless me who left our door."

The Judge looked back as he climbed the hill, And saw Maud Muller standing still.

"A form more fair, a face more sweet, Ne'er hath it been my lot to meet.

"And her modest answer and graceful air Show her wise and good as she is fair.

"Would she were mine, and I today, Like her, a harvester of hay;

"No doubtful balance of rights and wrongs, Nor weary lawyers with endless tongues,

"But low of cattle and song of birds, And health and quiet and loving words."

But he thought of his sisters, proud and cold. And his mother, vain of her rank and gold.

So, closing his heart, the Judge rode on, And Maud was left in the field alone.

But the lawyers smiled that afternoon, When he hummed in court an old love-tune:

And the young girl mused beside the well Till the rain on the unraked clover fell

He wedded a wife of richest dower, Who lived for fashion, as he for power.

Yet oft in his marble hearth's bright glow, He watched a picture come and go;

70

And sweet Maud Muller's hazel eyes Looked out in their innocent surprise.

Oft, when the wine in his glass was red, He longed for the wayside well instead;

And closed his eyes on his garnished rooms. To dream of meadows and clover-blooms.

And the proud man sighed, with a secret pain, "Ah, that I were free again!

"Free as when I rode that day, Where the barefoot maiden raked her hay."

1854

10

20

30

40

50

She wedded a man unlearned and poor,
And many children played round her door.

But care and sorrow, and childbirth pain, Left their traces on heart and brain.

And oft, when the summer sun shone hot On the new-mown hay in the meadow lot,

And she heard the little spring brook fall Over the roadside, through the wall,

In the shade of the apple-tree again She saw a rider draw his rein

And, gazing down with timid grace, She felt his pleased eyes read her face.

Sometimes her narrow kitchen walls Stretched away into stately halls;

The weary wheel to a spinnet turned, The tallow candle an astral 1 burned.

And for him who sat by the chimney lug. Dozing and grumbling o'er pipe and mug,

A manly form at her side she saw, And joy was duty and love was law.

Then she took up her burden of life again, Saying only, "It might have been." <sup>2</sup>

Alas for maiden, alas for Judge, For rich repiner and household drudge!

God pity them both! and pity us all, Who vainly the dreams of youth recall.

For of all sad words of tongue or pen, The saddest are these: "It might have been!"

Ah, well! for us all some sweet hope lies Deeply buried from human eyes; 108

And, in the hereafter, angels may Roll the stone from its grave away!

THE BAREFOOT BOY

Blessings on thee, little man, Barefoot boy, with cheeks of tan! With thy turned-up pantaloons, And thy merry whistled tunes;

<sup>1</sup> an old-fashioned parlor lamp <sup>2</sup> Note the rustic pronunciation of been to rime with again and below with pen. Whittier defended these rimes when they were objected to. With thy red lip, redder still Kissed by strawberries on the hill; With the sunshine on thy face, Through thy torn brim's jounty grace; From my heart I give thee joy.— I was once a barefoot boy! Prince thou art,—the grown-up man Only is republican.

Let the million-dollared ride! Barefoot, trudging at his side, Thou hast more than he can buy In the reach of ear and eye,— Outward sunshine, inward joy: Blessings on thee, barefoot boy!

Oh for boyhood's painless play. Sleep that wakes in laughing day, Health that mocks the doctor's rules. Knowledge never learned of schools, Of the wild bee's morning chase, Of the wild-flower's time and place, Flight of fowl and habitude Of the tenants of the wood: How the tortoise bears his shell. How the woodchuck digs his cell, And the ground-mole sinks his well: How the robin feeds her young, How the oriole's nest is hung; Where the whitest lilies blow, Where the freshest berries grow, Where the groundnut trails its vine. Where the wood-grape's clusters shine; Of the black wasp's cunning way, Mason of his walls of clay. And the architect; ral plans Of gray hornet artisans! For, eschewing books and tasks. Nature answers all he asks; Hand in hand with her he walks. Face to face with her he talks, Part and parcel of her joy,-Blessings on the barefoot boy!

Oh for boyhood's time of June, Crowding years in one brief moon, When all things I heard or saw Me, their master, waited for. I was rich in flowers and trees. Humming-birds and honey-bees; For my sport the squirrel played, Plied the snouted mole his spade; For my taste the blackberry cone Purpled over hedge and stone; Laughed the brook for my delight Through the day and through the night, Whispering at the garden wall, Talked with me from fall to fall;

90

100

1856

Mine the sand-rimmed pickerel pond, Mine the walnut slopes beyond. Mine, on bending orchard trees, Apples of Hesperides! Still as my horizon grew, Larger grew my riches too: All the world I saw or knew Seemed a complex Chinese toy. Fashioned for a barefoot boy!

Oh for festal dainties spread. Like my bowl of milk and bread,-Pewter spoon and bowl of wood, On the door-stone, gray and rude! O'er me, like a regal tent, Cloudy-ribbed, the sunset bent, Purple-curtained, fringed with gold Looped in many a wind-swung fold; While for music came the play Of the pied frogs' orchestra; And, to light the noisy choir, Lit the fly his lamp of fire. I was monarch: pomp and joy Waited on the barefoot boy!

Cheerily, then, my little man, Live and laugh, as boyhood can! Though the flinty slopes be hard, Stubble-speared the new-mown sward, Every morn shall lead thee through Fresh baptisms of the dew; Every evening from thy feet Shall the cool wind kiss the heat: All too soon these feet must hide In the prison cells of pride. Lose the freedom of the sod, Like a colt's for work be shod, Made to tread the mills of toil, Up and down in ceaseless moil: Happy if their track be found Never on forbidden ground: Happy if they sink not in Quick and treacherous sands of sin. Ah! that thou couldst know thy joy, Ere it passes, barefoot boy! 1855

SKIPPER IRESON'S RIDE 1

Of all the rides since the birth of time, Told in story or sung in rime,-

Whittier based this poem on a bit of rime he had heard a schoolmate from Marblehead repeat. He supposed the incident to be a century old, but it was really of 1807. The fact was that Skipper Ireson was blameless, for his men compelled him to leave the sinking crew. He was, however, tarred and feathered. See History of Marblehead, by Samuel Roads Ir. by Samuel Roads, Jr., p. 232-234.

On Apuleius's Golden Ass. 2 Or one-eved Calendar's horse of brass. 3 Witch astride of a human hack, Islam's prophet on Al-Borák, 4-The strangest ride that ever was sped Was Ireson's out from Marblehead! Old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart, Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart By the women of Marblehead!

Body of Turkey, head of owl, Wings a-droop like a rained-on fowl. Feathered and ruffled in every part, Skipper Ireson stood in the cart. Scores of women, old and young, Strong of muscle, and glib of tongue, Pushed and pulled up the rocky lane, Shouting and singing the shrill refrain: "Here's Flud Oirson, fur his horrd horrt, Torr'd an' futherr'd an' corr'd in a corrt By the women o' Morble'ead!"

20

Wrinkled scolds with hands on hips, Girls in bloom of cheek and lips, Wild-eyed, free-limbed, such as chase Bacchus round some antique vase, Brief of skirt, with ankles bare, Loose of kerchief and loose of hair, With conch-shells blowing and fish-horns' twang,

Over and over the Maenads 5 sang: "Here's Flud Oirson, fur his horrd horrt. Torr'd an' futherr'd an' corr'd in a corrt By the women o' Morble'ead!"

Small pity for him!—He sailed away From a leaking ship in Chaleur Bay,— Sailed away from a sinking wreck, With his own town's-people on her deck! "Lay by! lay by!" they called to him. Back he answered, "Sink or swim! Brag of your catch of fish again!" And off he sailed through the fog and rain! Old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart, <sup>2</sup> Apuleius, a Roman philosopher of the second century, in his Metamorphoses, or, as it was popularly termed, The Golden Ass, tells the story of a young man who was turned into an ass and met many adventures before regaining human form. The book was heavily drawn upon by the makers of medieval narrative compilations like Boccaccio's Decameron.

Decameron.
A calendar, or dervish, was a begging saint. Whittier is confusing two of the Arabian Nights stories, that of the "Royal Mendicants," who were one-eyed, and that of "The Magic Horse," which was of brass but which soared into the sky at the rider's will.
Al Borák (Arabic, the lightning), a winged animal with the face of a man, that carried Mahomet to the seventh heaven.

to the seventh heaven

5 the frenzied priestesses of Bacchus en

70

Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart By the women of Marblehead!

Fathoms deep in dark Chaleur
That wreck shall lie forevermore.
Mother and sister, wife and maid,
Looked from the rocks of Marblehead
Over the moaning and rainy sea,—
Looked for the coming that might not be!
What did the winds and the sea-birds say
Of the cruel captain who sailed away?—
Old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart,
Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart
By the women of Marblehead.

Through the street, on either side,
Up flew windows, doors swung wide;
Sharp-tongued spinsters, old wives gray,
Treble lent the fish-horn's bray.
Sea-worn grandsires, cripple-bound,
Hulks of old sailors run aground,
Shook head, and fist, and hat, and cane,
And cracked with curses the hoarse refrain:
"Here's Flud Oirson, fur his horrd horrt.
Torr'd an' futherr'd an' corr'd in a corrt
By the women o' Morble'ead!"

Sweetly along the Salem road
Bloom of orchard and lilac showed.
Little the wicked skipper knew
Of the fields so green and the sky so blue.
Riding there in his sorry trim,
Like an Indian idol glum and grim.
Scarcely he seemed the sound to hear
Of voices shouting far and near:
"Here's Flud Oirson, fur his horrd horrt,
Torr'd an' futherr'd an' corr'd in a corrt
By the women o' Morble'ead!"

"Hear me, neighbors!" at last he cried.—
"What to me is this noisy ride?
What is the shame that clothes the skin
To the nameless horror that lives within?
Waking or sleeping, I see a wreck,
And hear a cry from a reeling deck!
Hate me and curse me,—I only dread
The hand of God and the face of the dead!"
Said old Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart,
Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart
By the women of Marblehead!

Then the wife of the skipper lost at sea
Said, "God has touched him! why should we?"
Said an old wife mourning her only son,
"Cut the rogue's tether and let him run!"
So with soft relentings and rude excuse,
Half scorn, half pity, they cut him loose,

And gave him a cloak to hide him in,
And left him alone with his shame and sin.
Poor Floyd Ireson, for his hard heart,
Tarred and feathered and carried in a cart
By the women of Marblehead!

1828, 1857

1857

TELLING THE BEES

Here is the place; right over the hill
Runs the path I took;
You can see the gap in the old wall still,
And the stepping-stones in the shallow brook.

There is the house, with the gate red-barred.

And the poplars tall;

And the barn's brown length, and the cattleyard,

And the white horns tossing above the wall.

There are the beehives ranged in the sun;
And down by the brink

Of the brook are her poor flowers, weed-o'errun,
Pansy and daffodil, rose and pink.

A year has gone, as the tortoise goes,
Heavy and slow;
And the same rose blows, and the same sun
glows,
And the same brook sings of a year ago.

There's the same sweet clover-smell in the breeze;
And the June sun warm
Tangles his wings of fire in the trees,
Setting, as then, over Fernside farm.

I mind me how with a lover's care
From my Sunday coat
I brushed off the burrs, and smoothed my hair.
And cooled at the brookside my brow and throat.

Since we parted, a month had passed,—
To love, a year;
Down through the beeches I looked at last
On the little red gate and the well-sweep near.

I can see it all now,—the slantwise rain
Of light through the leaves,
The sundown's blaze on her window-pane,
The bloom of her roses under the eaves.

Just the same as a month before,—
The house and the trees,
The barn's brown gable, the vine by the door.—
Nothing changed but the hives of bees.

Before them, under the garden wall, Forward and back,

Went drearily singing the chore-girl small, Draping each hive with a shred of black <sup>1</sup>

Trembling, I listened: the summer sun Had the chill of snow;

For I knew she was telling the bees of one Gone on the journey we all must go!

Then I said to myself, "My Mary weeps For the dead today:

Haply her blind old grandsire sleeps

The fret and the pain of his age away."

But her dog whined low; on the doorway sill With his cane to his chin,  $^{50}$

The old man sat; and the chore-girl still Sung to the bees stealing out and in.

And the song she was singing ever since In my ear sounds on:—

"Stay at home, pretty bees, fly not hence!
Mistress Mary is dead and gone!"

1858 1858

MY PLAYMATE 2

The pines were dark on Ramoth hill, <sup>3</sup>
Their song was soft and low;
The blossoms in the sweet May wind
Were falling like the snow.

The blossoms drifted at our feet, The orchard birds sang clear; The sweetest and the saddest day It seemed of all the year.

For, more to me than birds or flowers, My playmate left her home, And took with her the laughing spring, The music and the bloom.

She kissed the lips of kith and kin, She laid her hand in mine: What more could ask the bashful boy Who fed her father's kine?

1 "A remarkable custom, brought from the Old Country, formerly prevailed in the rural districts of New England. On the death of a member of the family, the bees were at once informed of the event, and their hives dressed in mourning. This ceremonial was supposed to be necessary to prevent the swarms from leaving their hives and seeking a new home." (Cambridge edition of Whittier, The Houghton Mifflin Company.) The scenery of the poem is that of Whittier's homestead.

See note 1, p. 471.
 A hill about two miles from Whittier's Amesbury home; the neighboring woods of Follymill were "famous for their mayflowers or ground laurel." Pickard, Life of Whittier, ii, 427.

She left us in the bloom of May:
The constant years told o'er
Their seasons with as sweet May morns.
But she came back no more.

I walk, with noiseless feet, the round Of uneventful years; Still o'er and o'er I sow the spring And reap the autumn ears.

She lives where all the golden year Her summer roses blow; The dusky children of the sun Before her come and go.

There haply with her jeweled hands She smooths her silken gown,— No more the homespun lap wherein I shook the walnuts down.

The wild grapes wait us by the brook.

The brown nuts on the hill,
And still the May-day flowers make sweet
The woods of Follymill.

The lilies blossom in the pond,
The bird builds in the tree,
The dark pines sing on Ramoth hill
The slow song of the sea.

I wonder if she thinks of them, And how the old time seems,— If ever the pines of Ramoth wood Are sounding in her dreams.

I see her face, I hear her voice.

Does she remember mine?

And what to her is now the boy

Who fed her father's kine?

What cares she that the orioles build For other eyes than ours,— That other hands with nuts are filled, And other laps with flowers?

O playmate in the golden time! Our mossy seat is green, Its fringing violets blossom yet, The old trees o'er it lean.

The winds so sweet with birch and fern A sweeter memory blow;
And there in spring the veeries sing
The song of long ago.

20

40

30

50

40

And still the pines of Ramoth wood Are moaning like the sea,— The moaning of the sea of change Between myself and thee!

1860

SNOW-BOUND 1

A WINTER IDYL

As the Spirits of Darkness be stronger in the dark, so Good Spirits which be Angels of Light are augmented not only by the Divine light of the Sun, but also by our common VVood Fire: and as the Celestial Fire drives away dark spirits, so also this our Fire of VVood doth the same.—Cor. Agrippa, Occult Philosophy, Book I, ch. v.

Announced by all the trumpets of the sky, Arrives the snow, and, driving o'er the fields, Seems nowhere to alight: the whited air Hides hills and woods, the river, and the heaven, And veils the farm-house at the garden's end. The sled and traveler stopped, the courier's feet Delayed, all friends shut out, the housemates sit Around the radiant fireplace, enclosed In a tumultuous privacy of storm.

EMERSON, The Snow Storm.

The sun that brief December day
Rose cheerless over hills of gray,
And, darkly circled, gave at noon
A sadder light than waning moon.
Slow tracing down the thickening sky
Its mute and ominous prophecy,
A portent seeming less than threat,
It sank from sight before it set.
A chill no coat, however stout,
Of homespun stuff could quite shut out,
A hard, dull bitterness of cold,
That checked, mid-vein, the circling race
Of life-blood in the sharpened face,
The coming of the snow-storm told.

Of life-blood in the sharpened face, The coming of the snow-storm told. The wind blew east: we heard the roar Of Ocean on his wintry shore, And felt the strong pulse throbbing there Beat with low rhythm our inland air.

Meanwhile we did our nightly chores,—
Brought in the wood from out of doors.

Littered the stalls, and from the mows
Raked down the herd's-grass for the cows:
Heard the horse whinnying for his corn;
And, sharply clashing horn on horn,
Impatient down the stanchion rows
The cattle shake their walnut bows;

While, peering from his early perch Upon the scaffold's pole of birch, The cock his crested helmet bent And down his querulous challenge sent.

Unwarmed by any sunset light
The gray day darkened into night,
A night made hoary with the swarm
And whirl-dance of the blinding storm,
As zigzag wavering to and fro,
Crossed and recrossed the winged snow:
And ere the early bedtime came
The white drift piled the window-frame,
And through the glass the clothes-line posts
Looked in like tall and sheeted ghosts.

So all night long the storm roared on: The morning broke without a sun: In tiny spherule traced with lines Of Nature's geometric signs, In starry flake and pellicle, All day the hoary meteor fell: And, when the second morning shone, We looked upon a world unknown, On nothing we could call our own. 50 Around the glistening wonder bent The blue walls of the firmament, No cloud above, no earth below,-A universe of sky and snow! The old familiar sights of ours Took marvelous shapes; strange domes and towers

Rose up where sty or corn-crib stood.
Or garden-wall, or belt of wood;
A smooth white mound the brush-pile showed,
A fenceless drift what once was road;
The bridle-post an old man sat
60
With loose-flung coat and high cocked hat;
The well-curb had a Chinese roof;
And even the long sweep, high aloof,
In its slant splendor, seemed to tell
Of Pisa's leaning miracle.

A prompt, decisive man, no breath Our father wasted: "Boys, a path!" Well pleased, (for when did farmer boy Count such a summons less than joy?) Our buskins on our feet we drew;

With mittened hands, and caps drawn low.
To guard our necks and ears from snow.
We cut the solid whiteness through.
And, where the drift was deepest, made
A tunnel walled and overlaid
With dazzling crystal: we had read
Of rare Aladdin's wondrous cave,
And to our own his name we gave,
With many a wish the luck were ours

In this poem, which pictures his own boyhood home, Whittier gives poetic warmth and significance to the homely details of the New England farm-life of the early nineteenth century. For contemporary treatment of the New England country, see Robert Frost's North of Boston, etc.

an

100

110

120

130

To test his lamp's supernal powers. We reached the barn with merry din, And roused the prisoned brutes within. The old horse thrust his long head out, And grave with wonder gazed about; The cock his lusty greeting said, And forth his speckled harem led; The oxen lashed their tails, and hooked, And mild reproach of hunger looked; The hornéd patriarch of the sheep. Like Egypt's Amun 1 roused from sleep. Shook his sage head with gesture mute. And emphasized with stamp of foot.

All day the gusty north-wind bore The loosening drift its breath before: Low circling round its southern zone. The sun through dazzling snow-mist shone. No church-bell lent its Christian tone To the savage air, no social smoke Curled over woods of snow-hung oak. A solitude made more intense By dreary-voicéd elements, The shricking of the mindless wind. The moaning tree-boughs swaying blind, And on the glass the unmeaning beat Of ghostly finger-tips of sleet. Beyond the circle of our hearth No welcome sound of toil or mirth Unbound the spell, and testified Of human life and thought outside. We minded that the sharpest ear The buried brooklet could not hear. The music of whose liquid lip Had been to us companionship. And, in our lonely life, had grown To have an almost human tone.

As night drew on, and, from the crest Of wooded knolls that ridged the west. The sun, a snow-blown traveler, sank From sight beneath the smothering bank. We piled with care our nightly stack Of wood against the chimney-back,— The oaken log, green, huge, and thick, And on its top the stout backstick; The knotty forestick laid apart, And filled between with curious art The ragged brush; then, hovering near, We watched the first red blaze appear. Heard the sharp crackle, caught the gleam On whitewashed wall and sagging beam. Until the old, rude-furnished room Burst, flower-like, into rosy bloom; While radiant with a mimic flame

Outside the sparkling drift became,
And through the bare-boughed lilac-tree
Our own warm hearth seemed blazing free.
The crane and pendent trammels showed,
The Turks' heads on the andirons glowed;
While childish fancy, prompt to tell
The meaning of the miracle,
Whispered the old rime: "Under the tree
When fire outdoors burns merrily,
There the witches are making tea."

The moon above the eastern wood Shone at its full; the hill-range stood Transfigured in the silver flood, Its blown snows flashing cold and keen, Dead white, save where some sharp ravine Took shadow, or the somber green Of hemlocks turned to pitchy black Against the whiteness at their back. For such a world and such a night Most fitting that unwarming light, Which only seemed where'er it fell To make the coldness visible.

150

180

Shut in from all the world without. We sat the clean-winged hearth about. Content to let the north-wind roar In baffled rage at pane and door. While the red logs before us beat 160 The frost-line back with tropic heat: And ever, when a louder blast Shook beam and rafter as it passed. The merrier up its roaring draught The great throat of the chimney laughed; The house-dog on his paws outspread Laid to the fire his drowsy head. The cat's dark silhouette on the wall A couchant tiger's seemed to fall; And, for the winter fireside meet. 170 Between the andirons' straddling feet. The mug of cider simmered slow, The apples sputtered in a row. And, close at hand, the basket stood With nuts from brown October's wood.

What matter how the night behaved? What matter how the north-wind raved? Blow high, blow low, not all its snow Could quench out hearth-fire's ruddy glow. O Time and Change!—with hair as gray As was my sire's that winter day, How strange it seems, with so much gone Of life and love, to still live on! Ah, brother! only I and thou Are left of all that circle now.— The dear home faces whereupon That fitful firelight paled and shone.

one of the chief deities of ancient Egypt, usually represented as a ram with great horns

210

230

250

260

270

280 rienceforward, listen as we will,

The voices of that hearth are still;
Look where we may, the wide earth o'er,
Those lighted faces smile no more.
We tread the paths their feet have worn,
We sit beneath their orchard-trees,
We hear, like them, the hum of bees
And rustle of the bladed corn;
We turn the pages that they read,

Their written words we linger o'er, But in the sun they cast no shade, No voice is heard, no sign is made,

No step is on the conscious floor!
Yet Love will dream, and Faith will trust,
(Since He who knows our need is just,)
That somehow, somewhere, meet we must.
Alas for him who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress-trees!
Who, hopeless, lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play!
Who hath not learned, in hours of faith.

The truth to flesh and sense unknown. That Life is ever lord of Death, And Love can never lose its own!

We sped the time with stories old, Wrought puzzles out, and riddles told. Or stammered from our school-book lore "The chief of Gambia's golden shore." <sup>2</sup> How often since, when all the land Was clay in Slavery's shaping hand, As if a trumpet called, I've heard, Dame Mercy Warren's rousing word: "Does not the voice of reason cry,

"Does not the voice of reason cry, 220 Claim the first right which Nature gave, From the red scourge of bondage fly, Nor deign to live a burdened slave!"

Our father rode again his ride
On Memphremagog's 3 wooded side;
Sat down again to moose and samp
In trapper's hut and Indian camp;
Lived o'er the old idyllic ease
Beneath St. François' hemlock trees;
Again for him the moonlight shone
On Norman cap and bodiced zone; 4
Again he heard the violin play
Which led the village dance away,
And mingled in its merry whirl

<sup>1</sup> The cypress tree is a symbol of mourning.

<sup>2</sup> "The African Chief," a poem in The American Preceptor, edited by Caleb Bingham; Mercy Otis Walten (mentioned below), 1728-1814, a daughter of James Otis the elder, was a dramatist and historian.

* A lake in Vermont and Quebec; samp, in the next line, is a kind of hominy.

Whittier's father had made trading trips into Canada, where he had seen French girls in Norman cap and bodice. The grandam and the laughing girl.
Or, nearer home, our steps he led
Where Salisbury's 5 level marshes spread
Mile-wide as flies the laden bee;
Where merry mowers, hale and strong,
Swept, scythe on scythe, their swaths along
The low green prairies of the sea.

24
We shared the fishing off Boar's Head, 6
And round the rocky Isles of Shoals 6

The hake-broil on the driftwood coals; The chowder on the sand-beach made, Dipped by the hungry, steaming hot, With spoons of clam-shell from the pot. We heard the tales of witchcraft old, And dream and sign and marvel told To sleepy listeners as they lay Stretched idly on the salted hay Adrift along the winding shores, When favoring breezes deigned to blow The square sail of the gundalow, And idle lay the useless oars.

Our mother, while she turned her wheel Or run the new-knit stocking-heel, Told how the Indian hordes came down At midnight on Cocheco town, <sup>7</sup> And how her own great-uncle bore His cruel scalp-mark to fourscore. Recalling, in her fitting phrase,

So rich and picturesque and free. (The common unrimed poetry Of simple life and country ways) The story of her early days,-She made us welcome to her home: Old hearths grew wide to give us room; We stole with her a frightened look At the gray wizard's conjuring-book, The fame whereof went far and wide Through all the simple country-side: We heard the hawks at twilight play, The boat-horn on Piscataqua, 8 The loon's weird laughter far away; We fished her little trout-brook, knew What flowers in wood and meadow grew, What sunny hillsides autumn-brown She climbed to shake the ripe nuts down, Saw where in sheltered cove and bay The ducks' black squadron anchored lay, And heard the wild-geese calling loud Beneath the gray November cloud.

Then, haply, with a look more grave, And soberer tone, some tale she gave From painful Sewel's <sup>9</sup> ancient tome,

&lt;sup>5</sup> a town in Massachusetts <sup>7</sup> Dover, New Hampshire <sup>6</sup> on the New Hampshire coast

<sup>8</sup> Note the rustic pronunctions of this rime.
9 William Sewel, 1654-1720, a Quaker see n. 1, p. 85.

320

330

Beloved in every Quaker home, Of faith fire-winged by martyrdom. Or Chalkley's 1 Journal, old and quaint,-Gentlest of skippers, rare sea-saint!-Who, when the dreary calms prevailed, And water-butt and bread-cask failed. And cruel, hungry eyes pursued His portly presence, mad for food, With dark hints muttered under breath Of casting lots for life or death, Offered, if Heaven withheld supplies, To be himself the sacrifice. Then, suddenly, as if to save The good man from his living grave. A ripple on the water grew, A school of perpoise flashed in view. "Take, eat," he said, "and be content; These fishes in my stead are sent By Him who gave the tangled ram To spare the child of Abraham."

Our uncle, innocent of books, Was rich in lore of fields and brooks. The ancient teachers never dumb Of Nature's unhoused lyceum. In moons and tides and weather wise, He read the clouds as prophecies, And foul or fair could well divine. By many an occult hint and sign, Holding the cunning-warded keys To all the woodcraft mysteries: Himself to Nature's heart so near That all her voices in his ear Of beast or bird had meanings clear, Like Apollonius 2 of old. Who knew the tales the sparrows told, Or Hermes, 3 who interpreted What the sage cranes of Nilus said: A simple, guileless, childlike man. Content to live where life began; Strong only on his native grounds. The little world of sights and sounds Whose girdle was the parish bounds, Whereof his fondly partial pride The common features magnified. As Surrey hills to mountains grew In White 4 of Selborne's loving view.— He told how teal and loon he shot, And how the eagle's eggs he got,

And flow the eagle's eggs fle got,

an English Quaker preacher, 1675-1741

a Greek philosopher and reputed magician, 4 B.C.-

97 A.D.

Hermes Trismegistus, thrice greatest, the Greek name of the Egyptian god Thoth, reputed writer of much scientific and magic ore much selecting and magic one and finance of the Hills, 1720-1793, whose careful description, in The Natural History of Selborne, of ratural objects about his home in the parish of Selborne, in Hampshire, England, has made his work a classic

The feats on pond and river done. The prodigies of rod and gun; Till, warming with the tales he told, 290 Forgotten was the outside cold, The bitter wind unheeded blew. From ripening corn the pigeons flew, The partridge drummed i' the wood, the mink Went fishing down the river-brink. In fields with bean or clover gay, The woodchuck, like a hermit gray, Peered from the doorway of his cell: The muskrat plied the mason's trade, And tier by tier his mud-walls laid; 300 And from the shagbark overhead The grizzled squirrel dropped his shell.

Next, the dear aunt, whose smile of cheer And voice in dreams I see and hear.— The sweetest woman ever Fate Perverse denied a household mate. Who, lonely, homeless, not the less Found peace in love's unselfishness. And welcome whereso'er she went, A calm and gracious element. Whose presence seemed the sweet income And womanly atmosphere of home,— 360 Called up her girlhood memories, The huskings and the apple-bees. The sleigh-rides and the summer sails, Weaving through all the poor details And homespun warp of circumstance A golden woof-thread of romance. For well she kept her genial mood And simple faith of maidenhood: Before her still a cloud-land lay, The mirage loomed across her way: 370 The morning dew, that dries so soon With others, glistened at her noon; Through years of toil and soil and care, From glossy tress to thin gray hair. All unprofaned she held apart The virgin fancies of the heart. Be shame to him of woman born Who hath for such but thought of scorn.

There, too, our elder sister plied
Her evening task the stand beside;
A full, rich nature, free to trust,
Truthful and almost sternly just,
Impulsive, earnest, prompt to act,
And make her generous thought a fact,
Keeping with many a light disguise
The secret of self-sacrifice.
O heart sore-tried! thou hast the best
That Heaven itself could give thee,—rest,
Rest from all bitter thoughts and things!
How many a poor one's blessing went

With thee beneath the low green tent Whose curtain never outward swings!

As one who held herself a part
Of all she saw, and let her heart
Against the household bosom lean,
Upon the motley-braided mat
Our youngest and our dearest 1 sat,
Lifting her large, sweet, asking eyes,
Now bathed within the fadeless green

And holy peace of Paradise.
Oh, looking from some heavenly hill,
Or from the shade of saintly palms,
Or silver reach of river calms,
Do those large eyes behold me still?

With me one little year ago:

The chill weight of the winter snow
For months upon her grave has lain;

And now, when summer south-winds blow And brier and harebell bloom again, I tread the pleasant paths we trod. 410 I see the violet-sprinkled sod Whereon she leaned, too frail and weak The hillside flowers she loved to seek, Yet following me where'er I went With dark eyes full of love's content. The birds are glad; the brier-rose fills The air with sweetness; all the hills Stretch green to June's unclouded sky: But still I wait with ear and eye For something gone which should be nigh, 420 A loss in all familiar things, In flower that blooms, and bird that sings. And yet, dear heart! remembering thee,

Am I not richer than of old? Safe in thy immortality,

What change can reach the wealth I hold? What chance can mar the pearl and gold Thy love hath left in trust with me?

And while in life's late afternoon,
Where cool and long the shadows grow,
I walk to meet the night that soon
Shall shape and shadow overflow,
I cannot feel that thou art far,
Since near at need the angels are;
And when the sunset gates unbar,

Shall I not see thee waiting stand, And, white against the evening star, The welcome of thy beckoning hand?

Brisk wielder of the birch and rule, The master of the district school Held at the fire his favored place, 440 Its warm glow lit a laughing face Fresh-hued and fair, where scarce appeared The uncertain prophecy of beard.

390 He teased the mitten-blinded cat. Played cross-pins on my uncle's hat. Sang songs, and told us what befalls In classic Dartmouth's college halls. Born the wild Northern hills among. From whence his veoman father wrung 450 By patient toil subsistence scant, Not competence and vet not want. He early gained the power to pay His cheerful, self-reliant way; Could doff at ease his scholar's gown 400 To peddle wares from town to town: Or through the long vacation's reach In lonely lowland districts teach. Where all the droll experience found At stranger hearths in boarding round, 460 The moonlit skater's keen delight. The sleigh-drive through the frosty night. The rustic party, with its rough Accompaniment of blind-man's-buff. And whirling plate, and forfeits paid, His winter task a pastime made. Happy the snow-locked homes wherein He tuned his merry violin, Or played the athlete in the barn, Or held the good dame's winding yarn, 470 Or mirth-provoking versions told Of classic legends rare and old. Wherein the scenes of Greece and Rome Had all the commonplace of home. And little seemed at best the odds Twixt Yankee pedlers and old gods; Where Pindus-born Araxes 2 took The guise of any grist-mill brook, And dread Olympus at his will Became a huckleberry hill.

A careless boy that night he seemed;
But at his desk he had the look
And air of one who wisely schemed,
And hostage from the future took

In trained thought and lore of book.

Large-brained, clear-eyed,—of such as he Shall Freedom's young apostles be,
Who, following in War's bloody trail,
Shall every lingering wrong assail;
All chains from limb and spirit strike,
Uplift the black and white alike;
Scatter before their swift advance
The darkness and the ignorance,
The pride, the lust, the squalid sloth,
Which nurtured Treason's monstrous growth,
Made murder pastime, and the hell
Of prison-torture possible;

&lt;sup>1</sup> Elizabeth, Whittier's much beloved vounger sister

&lt;sup>2</sup> A river which flows down from the Pindus mountains in Greece; Mt. Olympus was the home of the gods.

The cruel lie of caste refute,
Old forms remold, and substitute
For Slavery's lash the freeman's will,
For blind routine, wise-handed skill;
A school-house plant on every hill,
Stretching in radiate nerve-lines thence
The quick wires of intelligence;
Till North and South together brought Shall own the same electric thought,
In peace a common flag salute,
And, side by side in labor's free
And unresentful rivalry,
Harvest the fields wherein they fought.

510 Another guest 1 that winter night Flashed back from lustrous eyes the light. Unmarked by time, and yet not young, The honeved music of her tongue And words of meekness scarcely told A nature passionate and bold. Strong, self-concentered, spurning guide, Its milder features dwarfed beside Her unbent will's majestic pride. She sat among us, at the best. 520 A not unfeared, half-welcome guest, Rebuking with her cultured phrase Our homeliness of words and ways. A certain pard-like, treacherous grace Swayed the lithe limbs and drooped the lash. Lent the white teeth their dazzling flash; And under low brows, black with night,

And under low brows, black with night,
Rayed out at times a dangerous light;
The sharp heat-lightnings of her face
Presaging ill to him whom Fate
Condemned to share her love or hate.
A woman tropical, intense
In thought and act, in soul and sense,

¹ Whittier's own explanatory note is interesting: "The not unfeared, half-welcome guest was Harriet Liverm.o.e, daughter of Judge Livermore, of New Hampshire, a young woman of fine natural ability, enthusiastic, eccentric, with slight control over her violent temper, which sometimes made her religious profession doubtful. She was equally ready to exhort in schoolhouse, prayer-meeting and dance in a Washington bailroom while her father was a member of Congress. She early embraced the doctrine of the Second Advent and felt it her duty to proclaim the Lord's speedy coming. With this message she crossed the Atlantic and spent the greater part of a long life in traveling over Europe and Asia. She lived some time with Lady Hester Stanhope, a woman as fantastic and mentally strained as herself, on the slope of Mt. Lebanon, but finally quarre'ed with her. . . A friend of mine found her, when quite an old woman, wandering in Syria with a tribe of Arabs, who, with the Oriental notion that madness is inspiration, accepted her as their prophetess and leader. At the time referred to in Snow-Bound she was boarding at the Rocks Village, about two miles from us." Riverside Classics edition of Whitter's poems, p. ix.

She blended in a like degree
The vixen and the devotee,
Revealing with each freak or feint
The temper of Petruchio's Kate, <sup>2</sup>
The raptures of Siena's saint. <sup>3</sup>
Her tapering hand and rounded wrist
Had facile power to form a fist;
The warm, dark languish of her eyes
Was never safe from wrath's surprise.
Brows saintly calm and lips devout
Knew every change of scowl and pout;
And the sweet voice had notes more high
And shrill for social battle-cry.

Since then what old cathedral town
Has missed her pilgrim staff and gown,
What convent-gate has held its lock
Against the challenge of her knock!
Through Smyrna's plague-hushed thoroughfares, 550
Up sea-set Malta's rocky stairs,
Gray olive slopes of hills that hem
Thy tombs and shrines, Jerusalem,
Or startling on her desert throne
The crazy Queen of Lebanon
With claims fantastic as her own,
Her tireless feet have held their sway;
And still, unrestful, bowed, and gray,
She watches under Eastern skies, 559
With hope each day renewed and fresh.

With hope each day renewed and fresh, The Lord's quick coming in the flesh, Whereof she dreams and prophesies!

Where'er her troubled path may be,
The Lord's sweet pity with her go!
The outward wayward life we see,
The hidden springs we may not know.
Nor is it given us to discern

What threads the fatal sisters spun,
Through what ancestral years has run
The sorrow with the woman born,
What forged her cruel chain of moods,
What set her feet in solitudes,

570

And held the love within her mute, What mingled madness in the blood,

A life-long discord and annoy, Water of tears with oil of joy, And hid within the folded bud

Perversities of flower and fruit.
It is not ours to separate
The tangled skein of will and fate,
To show what metes and bounds should stand
Upon the soul's debatable land,
And between choice and Providence

Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew
 Saint Catherine of Siena, a famous saint, experienced many trances and visions.

630

Divide the circle of events;
But he who knows our frame is just,
Merciful and compassionate,
And full of sweet assurances
And hope for all the language is,
That He remembereth we are dust!

At last the great logs, crumbling low, 591 Sent out a dull and duller glow, The bull's-eve watch that hung in view, Ticking its weary circuit through, Pointed with mutely-warning sign Its black hand to the hour of nine. That sign the pleasant circle broke: My uncle ceased his pipe to smoke, Knocked from its bowl the refuse gray And laid it tenderly away, 600 Then roused himself to safely cover The dull red brands with ashes over. And while, with care, our mother laid The work aside, her steps she stayed One moment, seeking to express Her grateful sense of happiness For food and shelter, warmth and health, And love's contentment more than wealth. With simple wishes (not the weak, Vain prayers which no fulfilment seek. 610 But such as warm the generous heart, O'er-prompt to do with Heaven its part) That none might lack, that bitter night, For bread and clothing, warmth and light.

Within our beds awhile we heard
The wind that round the gables roared,
With now and then a ruder shock,
Which made our very bedsteads rock.
We heard the loosened clapboards tost,
The board-nails snapping in the frost;
And on us, through the unplastered wall,
Felt the light-sifted snow-flakes fall;
But sleep stole on, as sleep will do
When hearts are light and life is new;
Faint and more faint the murmurs grew.
Till in the summer-land of dreams
They softened to the sound of streams.
Low stir of leaves, and dip of-oars,
And lapsing waves on quiet shores.

Next morn we wakened with the shout Of merry voices high and clear; And saw the teamsters drawing near To break the drifted highways out. Down the long hillside treading slow We saw the half-buried oxen go, Shaking the snow from heads uptost, Their straining nostrils white with frost. Before our door the straggling train Drew up, an added team to gain. The elders threshed their hands a-cold, Passed, with the cider-mug, their jokes 641 From lip to lip; the younger folks Down the loose snow-banks, wrestling, rolled. Then toiled again the cavalcade O'er windy hill, through clogged ravine, And woodland paths that wound between Low drooping pine-boughs winter-weighed. From every barn a team afoot. At every house a new recruit, Where, drawn by Nature's subtlest law, 650 Haply the watchful young men saw Sweet doorway pictures of the curls And curious eyes of merry girls, Lifting their hands in mock defense Against the snow-ball's compliments. And reading in each missive tost The charm with Eden never lost.

We heard once more the sleigh-bells' sound; And, following where the teamsters led, The wise old Doctor went his round, 660 Just pausing at our door to say, In the brief autocratic way Of one who, prompt at Duty's call. Was free to urge her claim on all, That some poor neighbor sick abed At night our mother's aid would need. For, one in generous thought and deed, What mattered in the sufferer's sight The Quaker matron's inward light, The Doctor's mail of Calvin's creed? 670 All hearts confess the saints elect Who, twain in faith, in love agree, And melt not in an acid sect The Christian pearl of charity!

So days went on: a week had passed Since the great world was heard from last. The almanac we studied o'er, Read and reread our little store Of books and pamphlets, scarce a score; One harmless novel, mostly hid 680 From younger eyes, a book forbid, And poetry, (or good or bad, A single book was all we had,) Where Ellwood's 1 meek, drab-skirted Muse, A stranger to the heathen Nine, Sang, with a somewhat nasal whine, The wars of David and the Jews. At last the floundering carrier bore The village paper to our door.

<sup>1</sup> Thomas Ellwood, an English Quaker, 1639-1713, and a friend of Milton's, wrote a long poem in five books about the life of King David, which, as Whittier intimates, was not inspired by the Greek Muses.

710

720

730

Lo! broadening outward as we read, To warmer zones the horizon spread: In panoramic length unrolled We saw the marvels that it told. Before us passed the painted Creeks. 1

And daft McGregor on his raids In Costa Rica's everglades. And up Taygetos winding slow Rode Ypsilanti's Mainote Greeks, A Turk's head at each saddle bow! Welcome to us its week-old news. Its corner for the rustic Muse,

Its monthly gauge of snow and rain, Its record, mingling in a breath The wedding bell and dirge of death: Test, anecdote, and love-lorn tale, The latest culprit sent to jail; Its hue and cry of stolen and lost, Its vendue sales and goods at cost,

And traffic calling loud for gain. We felt the stir of hall and street, The pulse of life that round us beat: The chill embargo of the snow Was melted in the genial glow; Wide swung again our ice-locked door, And all the world was ours once more!

Clasp, Angel of the backward look And folded wings of ashen gray . And voice of echoes far away, The brazen covers of thy book: The weird palimpsest 2 old and vast. Wherein thou hid'st the spectral past: Where, closely mingling, pale and glow The characters of joy and woe: The monographs of outlived years, Or smile-illumed or dim with tears,

Green hills of life that slope to death, And haunts of home, whose vistaed trees Shade off to mournful cypresses

With the white amaranths 3 underneath. Even while I look, I can but heed

The restless sands' incessant fall. Importunate hours that hours succeed, Each clamorous with its own sharp need,

And duty keeping pace with all. Shut down and clasp the heavy lids; I hear again the voice that bids The dreamer leave his dream midway For larger hopes and graver fears:

They read of the war with the Seminole or Creek Indians in Georgia, 1817-18; of the Scotch Sir Gregor McGregor, who tried to establish a colony in Costa Rica; of Ypsilanti, a Greek who, in the war for Greek independence, pathered his cavalrymen from the province of Maina, near Mt. Taygetus, a locality inhabited by robbers and pirates. a parchment from which one writing has been erased to make room for another
3 an immortal flower

8 an immortal flower

Life greatens in these later years. 690 The century's aloe flowers today!

> 740 Yet, haply, in some lull of life, Some Truce of God 4 which breaks its strife The worldling's eyes shall gather dew.

Dreaming in throngful city ways Of winter joys his boyhood knew: And dear and early friends—the few Who yet remain—shall pause to view

These Flemish pictures 5 of old days: Sit with me by the homestead hearth. And stretch the hands of memory forth

To warm them at the wood-fire's blaze! And thanks untraced to lips unknown Shall greet me like the odors blown From unseen meadows newly mown, Or lilies floating in some pond, Wood-fringed, the wayside gaze beyond; The traveler owns the grateful sense Of sweetness near, he knows not whence, And, pausing, takes with forehead bare The benediction of the air. 1865 1866

THE ETERNAL GOODNESS

O friends! with whom my feet have trod The quiet aisles of prayer, Glad witness to your zeal for God And love of man I bear.

I trace your lines of argument; Your logic linked and strong I weigh as one who dreads dissent. And fears a doubt as wrong.

But still my human hands are weak To hold your iron creeds: Against the words ye bid me speak My heart within me pleads.

Who fathoms the Eternal Thought? Who talks of scheme and plan? The Lord is God! He needeth not The poor device of man.

I walk with bare, hushed feet the ground Ye tread with boldness shod; I dare not fix with mete and bound The love and power of God.

Ye praise his justice; even such His pitying love I deem:

<sup>4</sup>in medieval times a cessation of private hostilities from Thursday evening to Monday morning 5 The Flemish painters of the 15th century were among the first to depict homely, domestic life.

751

10

70

Ye seek a king: I fain would touch The robe that hath no seam

Ve see the curse which overbroads A world of pain and loss: I hear our Lord's beatitudes And prayer upon the cross.

More than your schoolmen teach, within Myself, alas! I know: Too dark ve cannot paint the sin. Too small the merit show.

I bow my forehead to the dust. I veil mine eves for shame. And urge, in trembling self-distrust. A prayer without a claim.

I see the wrong that round me lies. I feel the guilt within: I hear, with groan and travail-cries. The world confess its sin.

Yet, in the maddening maze of things, And tossed by storm and flood. To one fixed trust my spirit clings; I know that God is good!

Not mine to look where cherubim And seraphs may not see, But nothing can be good in him Which evil is in me.

The wrong that pains my soul below I dare not throne above. I know not of his hate,-I know His goodness and his love.

I dimly guess from blessings known Of greater out of sight, And, with the chastened Psalmist, own His judgments too are right. 1

I long for household voices gone. For vanished smiles I long. But God hath led my dear ones on, And he can do no wrong.

I know not what the future hath Of marvel or surprise. Assured alone that life and death His mercy underlies.

And if my heart and flesh are weak To bear an untried pain, The bruised reed he will not break, But strengthen and sustain.

1 Cf. David, Psalms xix, 9.

No offering of my own I have. Nor works my faith to prove: I can but give the gifts he gave. And plead his love for love.

And so beside the Silent Sea. I wait the muffled oar: No harm from him can come to me On ocean or on shore

I know not where his islands lift Their fronded palms in air: I only know I cannot drift Beyond his love and care.

O brothers! if my faith is vain. If hopes like these betray. Pray for me that my feet may gain The sure and safer way.

And Thou, O Lord! by whom are seen Thy creatures as they be. Forgive me if too close I lean My human heart on thee! 1865

IN SCHOOL-DAYS

Still sits the school-house by the road, A ragged beggar sleeping; Around it still the sumachs grow, And blackberry vines are creeping.

Within, the master's desk is seen. 50 Deep scarred by raps official; The warping floor, the battered seats. The jack-knife's carved initial;

> The charcoal frescoes on its wall: Its door's worn sill, betraying The feet that, creeping slow to school, Went storming out to playing!

Long years ago a winter sun Shone over it at setting: Lit up its western window-panes, And low eaves' icy fretting.

It touched the tangled golden curls, And brown eyes full of grieving, Of one who still her steps delayed When all the school were leaving.

For near her stood the little boy Her childish favor singled: His cap pulled low upon a face Where pride and shame were mingled. 80

1867

11)

40

1870

10

Pushing with restless feet the snow To right and left, he lingered;— As restlessly her tiny hands The blue-checked apron fingered.

He saw her lift her eyes; he felt The soft hand's light caressing, And heard the tremble of her voice, As if a fault confessing.

"I'm sorry that I spelt the word:
I hate to go above you,
Because,"—the brown eyes lower fell,—
"Because, you see, I love you!"

Still memory to a gray-haired man That sweet child-face is showing. Dear girl! the grasses on her grave Have forty years been growing!

He lives to learn, in life's hard school, How few who pass above him Lament their triumph and his loss, Like her,—because they love him.

MY TRIUMPH

The autumn-time has come: On woods that dream of bloom, And over purpling vines, The low sun fainter shines

The aster-flower is failing, The hazel's gold is paling; Yet overhead more near The eternal stars appear!

And present gratitude Insures the future's good, And for the things I see I trust the things to be;

That in the paths untrod, And the long days of God, My feet shall still be led, My heart be comforted.

O living friends who love me! O dear ones gone above me! Careless of other fame, I leave to you my name.

Hide it from idle praises, Save it from evil phrases: Why, when dear lips that spake it Are dumb, should strangers wake it? Let the thick curtain fall; I better know than all How little I have gained, How yast the unattained.

Not by the page word-painted Let life be banned or sainted: Deeper than written scroll The colors of the soul.

Sweeter than any sung My songs that found no tongue; Nobler than any fact My wish that failed of act. <sup>1</sup>

Others shall sing the song, Others shall right the wrong,— Finish what I begin, And all I fail of win.

What matter, I or they? Mine or another's day, So the right word be said And life the sweeter made?

Hail to the coming singers! Hail to the brave light-bringers! Forward I reach and share All that they sing and dare.

The airs of heaven blow o'er me; A glory shines before me Of what mankind shall be,— Pure, generous, brave and free.

A dream of man and woman Diviner but still human, Solving the riddle old, Shaping the Age of Gold! <sup>2</sup>

The love of God and neighbor; An equal-handed labor; The richer life, where beauty Walks hand in hand with duty.

Ring, bells in unreared steeples, The joy of unborn peoples! Sound, trumpets far off blown, Your triumph is my own!

20 ¹ Cf. Browning's "Rabbi Ben Ezra." "What I aspired to be, And was not comforts me";

"All I could never be,
All, men ignored in me,
This, I was worth to God, whose wheel the pitcher shaped."

the fabled primeval age of innocence and happiness

30

40

50

Parcel and part of all. I keep the festival. Fore-reach the good to be. And share the victory.

I feel the earth move sunward. I join the great march onward. And take, by faith, while living, My freehold of thanksgiving.

1870 1871

IOHN UNDERHILL 1

A score of years had come and gone Since the Pilgrims landed on Plymouth stone, When Captain Underhill, bearing scars From Indian ambush and Flemish wars. Left three-hilled Boston and wandered down, East by north, to Cocheco 2 town.

With Vane the younger, 3 in council sweet. He had sat at Anna Hutchinson's feet, And, when the bolt of banishment fell On the head of his saintly oracle, He had shared her ill as her good report, And braved the wrath of the General Court.

He shook from his feet as he rode away The dust of the Massachusetts Bay. The world might bless and the world might ban. What did it matter the perfect man, To whom the freedom of earth was given. Proof against sin, and sure of heaven?

He cheered his heart as he rode along With screed 4 of Scripture and holy song, Or thought how he rode with his lances free By the Lower Rhine and the Zuyder-Zee.

<sup>1</sup> Captain Underhill, c. 1600-1672, after having served in the Netherlands and in Spain, came to Massa-chusetts in 1630. Here he was a member of the Massachusetts Assembly and aided valiantly in putting down the Pequot rebellion. Being disfranchised by the Massachusetts court, and fearing franchised by the Massachusetts court, and fearing to face a charge of adultery, he fied to Cocheco (Dover, New Hampshire), where he was chosen governor. Later he returned to Massachusetts, publicly confessed his sins, and was reinstated. After this he lived in the New Haven colony and among the Dutch in New Netherlands, doing excellent service as an Indian fighter. His career, which shows a strange mixture of courage passion. which shows a strange mixture of courage, passion, humility, integrity, and hypocrisy, is pretty thoroughly set forth in Winthrop's History, even to heard of the stranger of the set of the heard of the set of those who administered law and formal religion in the New England colonies.

2 Dover, New Hampshire

3 Sir Harry Vane, governor of the Massachusetts Bay Colony 1636-37, whose independence and breadth of view were unusual in his time; he sympathized with Mrs. Hutchinson, a religious extremist who was banished from the Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1647 because of her views. which shows a strange mixture of courage, passion, in 1637 because of her views.

4 quotation

Till his wood-path grew to a trodden road, And Hilton Point 5 in the distance showed.

He saw the church with the blockhouse nigh. The two fair rivers, the flakes thereby, And, tacking to windward, low and crank, The little shallop from Strawberry Bank: 5 And he rose in his stirrups and looked abroad Over land and water, and praised the Lord.

31 Goodly and stately and grave to see, Into the clearing's space rode he. With the sun on the hilt of his sword in sheath. And his silver buckles and spurs beneath, And the settlers welcomed him, one and all, From swift Ouampeagan to Gonic Fall. 5

And he said to the elders: "Lo. I come As the way seemed open to seek a home. Somewhat the Lord hath wrought by my hands In the Narragansett and Netherlands, And if here we have work for a Christian man, I will tarry, and serve ye as best I can.

"I boast not of gifts, but fain would own The wonderful favor God hath shown, The special mercy vouchsafed one day On the shore of Narragansett Bay, As I sat, with my pipe, from the camp aside. And mused like Isaac at eventide.

"A sudden sweetness of peace I found. 50 A garment of gladness wrapped me round; I felt from the law of works released. The strife of the flesh and the spirit ceased. My faith to a full assurance grew. And all I had hoped for myself I knew.

"Now as God appointeth, I keep my way, I shall not stumble, I shall not stray; He hath taken away my fig-leaf dress, I wear the robe of His righteousness; And the shafts of Satan no more avail Than Pequot arrows on Christian mail."

"Tarry with us," the settler cried, Thou man of God, as our ruler and guide." And Captain Underhill bowed his head. "The will of the Lord be done!" he said. And the morrow beheld him sitting down In the ruler's seat in Cocheco town.

And he judged therein as a just man should; His words were wise and his rule was good; He coveted not his neighbor's land, From the holding of bribes he shook his hand;

<sup>5</sup> near Dover

And through the camps of the heathen ran A wholesome fear of the valiant man.

But the heart is deceitful, the good Book saith, And life hath ever a savor of death. Through hymns of triumph the tempter calls, And whoso thinketh he standeth falls. Alas! ere their round the seasons ran, There was grief in the soul of the saintly man.

The tempter's arrows that rarely fail
Had found the joints of his spiritual mail;
And men took note of his gloomy air,
The shame in his eye, the halt in his prayer,
The signs of a battle lost within,
The pain of a soul in the coils of sin.

Then a whisper of scandal linked his name With broken vows and a life of blame; And the people looked askance on him As he walked among them sullen and grim, Ill at ease, and bitter of word, And prompt of quarrel with hand or sword.

None knew how, with prayer and fasting still, He strove in the bonds of his evil will; But he shook himself like Samson at length, And girded anew his loins of strength, And bade the crier go up and down And call together the wondering town.

Jeer and murmur and shaking of head Ceased as he rose in his place and said: "Men, brethren, and fathers, well ye know How I came among you a year ago, 100 Strong in the faith that my soul was freed From sin of feeling, or thought, or deed.

"I have sinned, I own it with grief and shame, But not with a lie on my lips I came. In my blindness I verily thought my heart Swept and garnished in every part. He chargeth His angels with folly; He sees The heavens unclean. Was I more than these?

"I urge no plea. At your feet I lay
The trust you gave me, and go my way.
Hate me or pity me, as you will,
The Lord will have mercy on sinners still;
And I, who am chiefest, say to all,
Watch and pray, lest ye also fall."

No voice made answer; a sob so low
That only his quickened ear could know
Smote his heart with a bitter pain,
As into the forest he rode again,
And the veil of its oaken leaves shut down
On his latest glimpse of Cocheco town.

Crystal-clear on the man of sin
The streams flashed up, and the sky shone in;
On his cheek of fever the cool wind blew,
The leaves dropped on him their tears of dew.
And angels of God, in the pure, sweet guise
Of flowers, looked on him with sad surprise.

Was his ear at fault that brook and breeze Sang in their saddest of minor keys? What was it the mournful wood-thrush said? What whispered the pine-trees overhead? Did he hear the Voice on his lonely way That Adam heard in the cool of day?

Into the desert alone rode he, Alone with the Infinite Purity; And, bowing his soul to its tender rebuke, As Peter did to the Master's look, He measured his path with prayers of pain For peace with God and nature again.

And in after years to Cocheco came
The bruit of a once familiar name;
How among the Dutch of New Netherlands,
From wild Danskamer to Haarlem sands,
A penitent soldier preached the Word,
And smote the heathen with Gideon's sword! 1

And the heart of Boston was glad to hear How he harried the foe on the long frontier, And heaped on the land against him barred The coals of his generous watch and ward. Frailest and bravest! the Bay State still Counts with her worthies John Underhill. 1873

CONDUCTOR BRADLEY 2

Conductor Bradley, (always may his name Be said with reverence!) as the swift doom came.

Smitten to death, a crushed and mangled frame,

Sank, with the brake he grasped just where he stood

To do the utmost that a brave man could, And die, if needful, as a true man should.

Men stooped above him; women dropped their tears

On that poor wreck beyond all hopes or fears, Lost in the strength and glory of his years.

What heard they? Lo! the ghastly lips of pain,

 1 Judges vii, 18
 2 "A railway conductor who lost his life in an accident on a Connecticut railway, May 9, 1873." (Cambridge Edition of Whittier's poems, p. 117.)

40

50

60

Dead to all thought save duty's, moved again: "Put out the signals for the other train!"

No nobler utterance since the world began From lips of saint or martyr ever ran, Electric, through the sympathies of man.

Ah me! how poor and noteless seem to this The sick-bed dramas of self-consciousness, Our sensual fears of pain and hopes of bliss!

Oh, grand supreme endeavor! Not in vain <sup>19</sup> That last brave act of failing tongue and brain! Freighted with life the downward rushing train,

Following the wrecked one, as wave follows wave.

Obeyed the warning which the dead lips gave. Others he saved, himself he could not save.

Nay, the lost life was saved. He is not dead Who, in his record still the earth shall tread With God's clear aureole shining round his head.

We bow as in the dust, with all our pride Of virtue dwarfed the noble deed beside. <sup>2</sup> God give us grace to live as Bradley died! 1873

A SEA DREAM

We saw the slow tides go and come,
The curving surf-lines lightly drawn,
The gray rocks touched with tender bloom
Beneath the fresh-blown rose of dawn.

We saw in richer sunsets lost
The somber pomp of showery noons;
And signaled spectral sails that crossed
The weird, low light of rising moons.

On stormy eves from cliff and head
We saw the white spray tossed and spurned;
While over all, in gold and red,
Its face of fire the lighthouse turned.

The rail-car brought its daily crowds,
Half curious, half indifferent,
Like passing sails or floating clouds,
We saw them as they came and went.

But, one calm morning, as we lay
And watched the mirage-lifted wall
Of coast, across the dreamy bay,
And heard afar the curlew call,

And nearer voices, wild or tame, Of airy flocks and childish throng, Up from the water's edge there came Faint snatches of familiar song.

Careless we heard the singer's choice Of old and common airs; at last The tender pathos of his voice In one low chanson held us fast.

A song that mingled joy and pain, And memories old and sadly sweet; While, timing to its minor strain, The waves in lapsing cadence beat.

The waves are glad in breeze and sun;
The rocks are fringed with foam;
I walk once more a haunted shore,
A stranger, yet at home,
A land of dreams I roam.

Is this the wind, the soft sea-wind
That stirred thy locks of brown?
Are these the rocks whose mosses knew
The trail of thy light gown,
Where boy and girl sat down?

I see the gray fort's broken wall, The boats that rock below; And, out at sea, the passing sails We saw so long ago Rose-red in morning's glow.

The freshness of the early time
On every breeze is blown;
As glad the sea, as blue the sky,—
The change is ours alone;
The saddest is my own.

A stranger now, a world-worn man,
Is he who bears my name;
But thou, methinks, whose mortal life
Immortal youth became,
Art evermore the same.

Thou art not here, thou art not there,
Thy place I cannot see;
I only know that where thou art
The blessed angels be,
And heaven is glad for thee.

Forgive me if the evil years
Have left on me their sign;
Wash out, O soul so beautiful,
The many stains of mine
In tears of love divine!

I could not look on thee and live. If thou wert by my side: The vision of a shining one, The white and heavenly bride, Is well to me denied.

But turn to me thy dear girl-face Without the angel's crown. The wedded roses of thy lips. Thy loose hair rippling down In waves of golden brown.

Look forth once more through space and time, And let thy sweet shade fall In tenderest grace of soul and form On memory's frescoed wall, A shadow, and yet all!

Draw near, more near, forever dear! Where'er I rest or roam. Or in the city's crowded streets. Or by the blown sea foam, The thought of thee is home!

At breakfast hour the singer read The city news, with comment wise, Like one who felt the pulse of trade Beneath his finger fall and rise.

His look, his air, his curt speech, told The man of action, not of books. To whom the corners made in gold And stocks were more than seaside nooks.

Of life beneath the life confessed His song had hinted unawares; Of flowers in traffic's ledgers pressed, Of human hearts in bulls and bears.

But eyes in vain were turned to watch That face so hard and shrewd and strong: And ears in vain grew sharp to catch The meaning of that morning song.

In vain some sweet-voiced querist sought To sound him, leaving as she came; Her baited album only caught A common, unromantic name.

No word betrayed the mystery fine, That trembled on the singer's tongue; He came and went, and left no sign Behind him save the song he sung. 1874

SUNSET ON THE BEARCAMP 1

10

00

::0

A gold fringe on the purpling hem Of hills the river runs. As down its long, green valley falls The last of summer's suns. Along its tawny gravel-bed Broad-flowing, swift, and still, As if its meadow levels felt The hurry of the hill. Noiseless between its banks of green From curve to curve it slips; The drowsy maple-shadows rest Like fingers on its lips.

A waif from Carroll's 2 wildest hills. Unstoried and unknown; The ursine legend of its name Prowls on its banks alone. Yet flowers as fair its slopes adorn As ever Yarrow 3 knew, Or, under rainy Irish skies, By Spenser's Mulla 4 grew; And through the gaps of leaning trees Its mountain cradle shows: The gold against the amethyst, The green against the rose.

Touched by a light that hath no name, A glory never sung, Aloft on sky and mountain wall Are God's great pictures hung. How changed the summits vast and old! No longer granite-browed, They melt in rosy mist; the rock Is softer than the cloud; The valley holds its breath; no leaf Of all its elms is twirled; The silence of eternity Seems falling on the world.

The pause before the breaking seals Of mystery is this; Yon miracle-play of night and day 40 Makes dumb its witnesses. What unseen altar crowns the hills That reach up stair on stair? What eyes look through, what white wings fan These purple veils of air? What Presence from the heavenly heights To those of earth stoops down?

Whittier was very fond of the scenery near Ossipee.
 N.H., on the Bearcamp River.

 Carroll County, New Hampshire
 the Scotch stream and valley made famous by Wordsworth's "Yarrow Unvisited," and other poems Edmund Spenser lived for a time in Kilcolman Castle near the Mulla River in Ireland.

20

Not vainly Hellas dreamed of gods On Ida's snowy crown! 1

Slow fades the vision of the sky,
The golden water pales,
And over all the valley-land
A gray-winged vapor sails.
I go the common way of all;
The sunset fires will burn,
The flowers will blow, the river flow,
When I no more return.
No whisper from the mountain pine
Nor lapsing stream shall tell
The stranger, treading where I tread,
Of him who loved them well.

But beauty seen is never lost,
God's colors all are fast;
The glory of this sunset heaven
Into my soul has passed,
A sense of gladness unconfined
To mortal date or clime;
As the soul liveth, it shall live
Beyond the years of time.
Beside the mystic asphodels <sup>2</sup>
Shall bloom the home-born flowers,
And new horizons flush and glow
With sunset hues of ours.

Farewell! these smiling hills must wear
Too soon their wintry frown,
And snow-cold winds from off them shake
The maple's red leaves down.
But I shall see a summer sun
Still setting broad and low;
The mountain slopes shall blush and bloom,
The golden water flow.
A lover's claim is mine on all
I see to have and hold.—
The rose-light of perpetual hills,
And sunsets never cold!

THE TRAILING ARBUTUS

I wandered lonely where the pine-trees made Against the bitter East their barricade, And, guided by its sweet Perfume, I found, within a narrow dell. The trailing spring flower tinted like a shell Amid dry leaves and mosses at my feet.

<sup>1</sup> The Greeks naturally peopled the beautiful Mt. Ida with gods.

with gods.

A flower of the lily order; in Greek mythology the asphodel covered the meadows of the underworld and was associated with the dead.

From under dead boughs, for whose loss the

Moaned ceaseless overhead, the blossoming

Lifted their glad surprise,

While yet the bluebird smoothed in leafless trees

His feathers ruffled by the chill sea-breeze, And snow-drifts lingered under April skies.

As, pausing o'er the lonely flower I bent.

I thought of lives thus lowly, clogged and pent.

Which yet find room.

Through care and cumber, coldness and decay, To lend a sweetness to the ungenial day, And make the sad earth happier for their bloom.

1879

660

70

THE LOST OCCASION 8

Some die too late and some too soon, At early morning, heat of noon, Or the chill evening twilight. Thou, Whom the rich heavens did so endow With eyes of power and Jove's 4 own brow, With all the massive strength that fills Thy home-horizon's granite hills, With rarest gifts of heart and head From manliest stock inherited, New England's stateliest type of man. In port and speech Olympian; Whom no one met, at first, but took A second awed and wondering look (As turned, perchance the eyes of Greece On Phidias' unveiled masterpiece); 5 Whose words in simplest homespun clad. The Saxon strength of Caedmon's 6 had, With power reserved at need to reach The Roman forum's loftiest speech, Sweet with persuasion, eloquent In passion, cool in argument. Or, ponderous, falling on thy foes

This poem, written thirty years after "Ichabod," shows Whittier's softened feeling regarding Webster, but it is still truged by strong Abolition sentiment. See port 1, 276

See note 1, p. 476.

**Carlyle, who once saw Webster, described his eyes as: "duil black eyes under their precipice of brows like dull anthracite furnaces needing only to be blown"; Webster's large head and great forehead made him seem indeed Olympian. The remark of Richard Brinsley Sheridan concerning Lord Thurlow, that "no man was ever so wise as Lord Thurlow looked," might well have been made of Webster.

The colosed statue of Zeus at Clympia an old English poet who died about 680; his life is narrated in Bede's Ecclesiastical History of England. See note 7, p. 713.

As fell the Norse god's 1 hammer blows, Crushing as if with Talus' 2 flail Through Error's logic-woven mail. And failing only when they tried The adamant of the righteous side,-Thou, foiled in aim and hope, bereaved Of old friends, by the new deceived, Too soon for us, too soon for thee, Beside thy lonely Northern sea, Where long and low the marsh-lands spread, Laid wearily down thy august head.

Thou shouldst have lived to feel below Thy feet Disunion's fierce upthrow; The late-sprung mine that underlaid Thy sad concessions vainly made. Thou shouldst have seen from Sumter's wall The star-flag of the Union fall, And armed rebellion pressing on The broken lines of Washington! No stronger voice than thine had then Called out the utmost might of men, To make the Union's charter free And strengthen law by liberty. How had that stern arbitrament To thy gray age youth's vigor lent, Shaming ambition's paltry prize Before thy disillusioned eyes; 50 Breaking the spell about thee wound Like the green withes that Samson bound: 3 Redeeming in one effort grand, Thyself and thy imperiled land! Ah, cruel fate, that closed to thee, O sleeper by the Northern sea, The gates of opportunity! God fills the gaps of human need, Each crisis brings its word and deed. Wise men and strong we did not lack; 60 But still, with memory turning back, In the dark hours we thought of thee, And thy lone grave beside the sea.

Above that grave the east winds blow, And from the marsh-lands drifting slow The sea-fog comes, with evermore The wave-wash of a lonely shore, And sea-bird's melancholy cry, As Nature fain would typify The sadness of a closing scene, The loss of that which should have been. But, where thy native mountains bare 71

<sup>1</sup> Thor, the Scandinavian god of thunder, who carried a mighty hammer

Their foreheads to diviner air. Fit emblem of enduring fame, One lofty summit keeps thy name, 4 For thee the cosmic forces did The rearing of that pyramid. The prescient ages shaping with Fire, flood, and frost thy monolith. Sunrise and sunset lav thereon With hands of light their benison. The stars of midnight pause to set Their jewels in its coronet. And evermore that mountain mass Seems climbing from the shadowy pass To light, as if to manifest Thy nobler self, thy life at best! 1880

80

THE KING'S MISSIVE 5 1661

Under the great hill sloping bare To cove and meadow and Common lot. In his council chamber and oaken chair. Sat the worshipful Governor Endicott. A grave, strong man, who knew no peer In the pilgrim land, where he ruled in fear Of God, not man, and for good or ill Held his trust with an iron will.

He had shorn with his sword the cross 6 from

The flag, and cloven the May-pole down. Harried the heathen round about,

And whipped the Quakers from town to town. Earnest and honest, a man at need To burn like a torch for his own harsh creed. He kept with the flaming brand of his zeal The gate of the holy common weal.

His brow was clouded, his eye was stern, With a look of mingled sorrow and wrath;

Mount Webster, in the White Mountains
This poem was based on a historic incident. Endicott, governor of Massachusetts from 1649-1665, except during 1650 and 1654 when he was deputy governor, had been very harsh in his persecution of the Quakers. They had been imprisoned or driven out of the colony, but had persisted in returning until finally a law was passed punishing with death any Quaker that returned after having been sent away. In October, 1650, two men were hanged, and in the spring of 1660 Mrs. Mary Dyer suffered death for her faith. Meantime a petition in behalf of the Quakers had been sent to Charles II, who in May, 1660, had been restored to the throne of England. The poem tells, with considerable poetic license Whittier says, how the King's letter demanding toleration of the Quakers was received. was received

<sup>6</sup> Apparently thinking of it only as a mark of Catholicism, he had cut the royal red cross of St. George out of the flag of a Salem company of militia. See in Hawthorne's Twice-Told Tales, "Endicott and the Red Cross." For the maypole story see, in the same book, "The Maypole of Merry Mount."

&lt;sup>2</sup> An iron man who carried an iron flail with which he threshed out falsehood; see Spenser's Faeric Outreshed out falsehood; see Spenser's Faeric Queene V, i, 12.

3 I. e., that bound Samson; see Judges xvi, 6-9.

"Woe's me!" he murmured: "at every turn
The pestilent Quakers are in my path! 20
Some we have scourged, and banished some,
Some hanged, more doomed, and still they come.

Fast as the tide of yon bay sets in, Sowing their heresy's seed of sin.

"Did we count on this? Did we leave behind
The graves of our kin, the comfort and ease
Of our English hearths and homes, to find Troublers of Israel such as these?
Shall I spare? Shall I pity them? God forbid!
I will do as the prophet to Agag did: 1 20
They come to poison the wells of the Word,
I will hew them in pieces before the Lord!"

The door swung open, and Rawson the clerk
Entered, and whispered under breath,
"There waits below for the hangman's work
A fellow banished on pain of death—
Shattuck of Salem. unhealed of the whip,
Brought over in Master Goldsmith's ship
At anchor here in a Christian port,

39
With freight of the devil and all his sort!"

Twice and thrice on the chamber floor Striding fiercely from wall to wall, "The Lord do so to me and more,"

The Governor cried, "if I hang not all! Bring hither the Quaker." Calm, sedate. With the look of a man at ease with fate, Into that presence grim and dread Came Samuel Shattuck, with hat on head.

"Off with the knave's hat!" An angry hand Smote down the offence; but the wearer said. With a quiet smile, "By the King's command I bear his message and stand in his stead." In the governor's hand a missive he laid 53 With the royal arms on its seal displayed. And the proud man spake as he gazed thereat. Uncovering, "Give Mr. Shattuck his hat."

He turned to the Quaker, bowing low,—
"The King commandeth your friends' release;
Doubt not he shall be obeyed, although
To his subjects' sorrow and sin's increase.

60
What he here enjoineth, John Endicott,
His loyal servant, questioneth not.
You are free! God grant the spirit you own
May take you from us to parts unknown."

So the door of the jail was open cast, And, like Daniel, out of the lion's den <sup>2</sup> Tender youth and girlhood passed,

1 1 Samuel xv, 8 2 Daniel vi, 23

With age-bowed women and gray-locked men. And the voice of one appointed to die Was lifted in praise and thanks on high, And the little maid from New Netherlands Kissed, in her joy, the doomed man's hands.

And one, whose call was to minister

To the souls in prison, beside him went,
An ancient woman, bearing with her

The linen shroud for his burial meant.

For she, not counting her own life dear,
In the strength of a love that cast out fear,
Had watched and served where her brethren died

Like those who waited the cross beside.

One moment they paused on their way to look On the martyr graves by the Common side, And much scourged Wharton of Salem took

His burden of prophecy up and cried:
"Rest, souls of the valiant! Not in vain
Have ye borne the Master's cross of pain;
Ye have fought the fight, ye are victors crowned,
With a fourfold chain ve have Satan bound!"

The autumn haze lay soft and still
On wood and meadow and upland farms;
On the brow of Snow Hill the great windmill
Slowly and lazily swung its arms;
Broad in the sunshine stretched away,
With its capes and islands, the turquoise bay;
And over water and dusk of pines
Blue hills lifted their faint outlines.

The topaz leaves of the walnut glowed,
The sumach added its crimson fleck,
And double in air and water showed
The tinted maples along the Neck; <sup>3</sup>
Through frost flower clusters of pale star-mist,
And gentian fringes of amethyst,
And royal plumes of golden-rod,
The grazing cattle on Centry * trod.

But as they who see not, the Quakers saw The world about them; they only thought With deep thanksgiving and pious awe On the great deliverance God had wrough

On the great deliverance God had wrought. Through lane and alley the gazing town Noisily followed them up and down;
Some with scoffing and brutal jeer,
Some with pity and words of cheer.

Beacon Hill in early times, because it was a point of observation, was frequently called Sentry or Centry Hill.

the name in early times for the narrow strip of land that connected the peninsula of Boston with the mainland

One brave voice rose above the din.

Upsall, gray with his length of days,
Cried from the door of his Red Lion Inn:

"Men of Boston, give God the praise!
No more shall innocent blood call down
The bolts of wrath on your guilty town.
The freedom of worship, dear to you,
Is dear to all, and to all is due.

"I see the vision of days to come,
When your beautiful City of the Bay,
Shall be Christian liberty's chosen home,
And none shall his neighbor's rights gainsay
The varying notes of worship shall blend
And as one great prayer to God ascend,
And hands of mutual charity raise
Walls of salvation and gates of praise."

So passed the Quakers through Boston town.

Whose painful <sup>1</sup> ministers sighed to see <sup>130</sup>
The walls of their sheep-fold falling down.

And wolves of heresy prowling free. But the years went on, and brought no wrong; With milder counsels the State grew strong. At outward Letter and inward Light <sup>2</sup> Kept the balance of truth aright.

The Puritan spirit perishing not, To Concord's yeomen the signal sent, And spake in the voice of the cannon-shot

And spake in the voice of the cannon-shot
That severed the chains of a continent. 140
With its gentler mission of peace and good-will
The thought of the Quaker is living still.
And the freedom of soul he prophesied
Is gospel and law where the martyrs died
1880 1881

HENRY WADSWORTH LONG-FELLOW 1807-1882

Tennyson was above all others the representative poet of England during the nineteenth century; Longfellow, of this country. Outward circumstances could scarcely have been more favorable to one who was to occupy such a place. He was born in Portland, Maine, of a family high in social, professional, and political standing, and steeped in New England tradition. His life was that of a teacher and scholar shielded by circumstances from the hard blows of the world, and having an abundance of all that makes life comfortable and profitable. He was graduated from Bowdoin College in 1825, traveled and studied in Europe 1826-1829, was professor of modern languages at Bowdoin 1829-1835, and at Harvard College 1836-

 diligent, painstaking
 The Quaker faith is based largely on the revelations to each of the Inward Light. 1854. He published in prose Outre-Mer, A Pilgrimage beyond the Sea, 1833, and Hyperion, 1839. The publication of his poems runs from 1826 to 1883, chief landmarks being Evangeline, 1847, Hiawatha, 1855, Tales of a Wayside Inn, 1863. The most serious work of his life was the translation of the Divina Comedia, completed in 1867. Into this difficult task, which has been the despair of many translators, Longfellow put not only long years of toil and the fruits of ripe scholarship, but religious enthusiasm and devotion.

It is useless to expect in Longfellow the force of Byron or the mystic insight of Wordsworth. He was one of a generation whose grandfathers regarded imaginative literature as a possible snare of the devil, but who were appealed to by sentiment and didacticism. These we must expect to find in his poetry. But we must also notice that whatever he touched he handled in the spirit of the artist and with all the skill that his own careful workmanship could achieve; that his work brought home to America the best of the continental spirit of his day; that it nourished the affections and stimulated the intelligence of his readers here; and that to millions of Europeans as well his poems were an inspiration and a solace. Longfellow is perhaps the best story-teller in verse that America has produced. He was a skillful experimenter in versification, and the perfection of some of his sonnets is worthy of all praise.

Biography: G. R. Carpenter, (BB) 1901; T. W. Higginson, (AML) 1902; S. Longfellow, with extracts from journal and correspondence, 2 vols. 1886; E. S. Robertson, (GW); G. W. Curtis, (LJ); Macy. Criticism: P. E. More, (Shel. 5); J. L. Hervey, "The 'Distinction' of Longfellow." Dial 60:49-51; G. Bradford, "Portraits of American Authors." Bookm. 42:248-61; W. D. Howells, "The Art of Longfellow," No. Am. 184:472-85; B. Perry, "The Centenary of Longfellow," Atlan. 99:379-88.

A PSALM OF LIFE

WHAT THE HEART OF THE YOUNG MAN SAID TO THE PSALMIST 3

Tell me not, in mournful numbers, Life is but an empty dream!— For the soul is dead that slumbers, And things are not what they seem.

Life is real! Life is earnest!
And the grave is not its goal;
Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
Was not spoken of the soul.

Not enjoyment, and not sorrow.
Is our destined end or way;
But to act, that each tomorrow
Find us farther than today.

<sup>3</sup> King David, whose psalms are among the greatest poems of Hebrew literature

20

1839

***

Art is long, and Time is fleeting, 1 And our hearts, though stout and brave, Still, like muffled drums, are beating Funeral marches to the grave.

In the world's broad field of battle. In the bivouac of Life. Be not like dumb, driven cattle! Be a hero in the strife!

Trust no Future, howe'er pleasant! Let the dead Past bury its dead! Act,-act in the living Present! Heart within, and God o'erhead!

Lives of great men all remind us We can make our lives sublime. And, departing, leave behind us, Footprints on the sands of time:

Footprints, that perhaps another, Sailing o'er life's solemn main. A forlorn and shipwrecked brother, Seeing, shall take heart again.

Let us, then, be up and doing, With a heart for any fate; Still achieving, still pursuing, Learn to labor and to wait. 1838

THE REAPER AND THE FLOWERS

There is a Reaper whose name is Death. And, with his sickle keen, He reaps the bearded grain at a breath. And the flowers that grow between.

"Shall I have nought that is fair?" saith he; "Have nought but the bearded grain? Though the breath of these flowers is sweet to I will give them all back again."

He gazed at the flowers with tearful eyes, 10 He kissed their drooping leaves; It was for the Lord of Paradise He bound them in his sheaves.

"My Lord has need of these flowerets gay," The Reaper said, and smiled; "Dear tokens of the earth are they. Where he was once a child.

<sup>1</sup> "Vita brevis, ars longa," a thought probably expressed first by Hippocrates, the Greek Philosopher, 460-377 B.C., and later by Seneca, in De Brevitate Vitae I

"They shall all bloom in fields of light. Transplanted by my care. And saints, upon their garments white. These sacred blossoms wear."

And the mother gave, in tears and pain. The flowers she most did love: She knew she could find them all again In the fields of light above.

O, not in cruelty, not in wrath. The Reaper came that day: Twas an angel visited the green earth, And took the flowers away. 1838 1839

THE WRECK OF THE HESPERUS 2

It was the schooner Hesperus. That sailed the wintry sea; And the skipper had taken his little daughter, To bear him company.

Blue were her eyes as the fairy-flax. Her cheeks like the dawn of day, And her bosom white as the hawthorn buds, That ope in the month of May.

The skipper he stood beside the helm, His pipe was in his mouth, And he watched how the veering flaw did blow The smoke now West, now South.

Then up and spake an old Sailòr, Had sailed to the Spanish Main, 3 "I pray thee, put into yonder port, For I fear a hurricane.

"Last night the moon had a golden ring, And tonight no moon we see!" The skipper, he blew a whiff from his pipe, And a scornful laugh laughed he.

Colder and louder blew the wind, A gale from the Northeast. The snow fell hissing in the brine, And the billows frothed like yeast.

Down came the storm, and smote amain The vessel in its strength;

<sup>2</sup> This is an unusually good imitation of the ancient English popular hallad. Note the similarity of the fourth and fifth stanzas to the second, sixth, and seventh of "Sir Patrick Spens," and compare the concluding invocation with that of "The Hun-ing of the Cheviot."

8 a common name for the northern coast of South America or more especially the waters north of

She shuddered and paused, like a frighted steed, Then leaped her cable's length.

"Come hither! come hither! my little daughtèr,
And do not tremble so;

For I can weather the roughest gale
That ever wind did blow."

He wrapped her warm in his seaman's coat Against the stinging blast; He cut a rope from a broken spar, And bound her to the mast.

"O father! I hear the church-bells ring, 1 Oh say, what may it be?"
""Tie a fee bell on a rock bound coest!"

"'Tis a fog-bell on a rock-bound coast!"—
And he steered for the open sea.

"O father! I hear the sound of guns, Oh say, what may it be?" "Some ship in distress, that cannot live In such an angry sea!"

"O father! I see a gleaming light, Oh say, what may it be?" But the father answered never a word, A frozen corpse was he.

Lashed to the helm, all stiff and stark,
With his face turned to the skies,
The lantern gleamed through the gleaming snow,
On his fixed and glassy eyes.

Then the maiden clasped her hands and prayed That saved she might be; And she thought of Christ who stilled the wave, On the Lake of Galilee.

And fast through the midnight dark and drear, Through the whistling sleet and snow. Like a sheeted ghost, the vessel swept Tow'rds the reef of Norman's Woe. <sup>2</sup>

And ever the fitful gusts between
A sound came from the land;
It was the sound of the trampling surf
On the rocks and the hard sea-sand.

The breakers were right beneath her bows, She drifted a dreary wreck, And a whooping billow swept the crew Like icicles from her deck.

 The suggestion of impending woe is in the manner of the ancient ballads.
 a dangerous reef just outside Gloucester harbor, Massachusette She struck where the white and fleecy waves Looked soft as carded wool,
But the cruel rocks, they gored her side
Like the horns of an appry bull.

Her rattling shrouds, all sheathed in ice, With the masts went by the board; Like a vessel of glass, she stove and sank, Ho! ho! the breakers roared!

At daybreak, on the bleak sea-beach, A fisherman stood aghast, To see the form of a maiden fair, Lashed close to a drifting mast.

The salt sea was frozen on her breast,
The salt tears in her eyes;
And he saw her hair, like the brown sea-weed,
On the billows fall and rise.

80

10

20

Such was the wreck of the Hesperus,
In the midnight and the snow!
Christ save us all from a death like this,
On the reef of Norman's Woe!
1839

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH

Under a spreading chestnut-tree
The village smithy stands;
The smith, a mighty man is he,
With large and sinewy hands;
And the muscles of his brawny arms
Are strong as iron bands.

His hair is crisp, and black, and long,
His face is like the tan;
His brow is wet with honest sweat,
He earns whate'er he can,
And looks the whole world in the face,
For he owes not any man.

Week in, week out, from morn till night,
You can hear his bellows blow;
You can hear him swing his heavy sledge
With measured beat and slow,
Like a sexton ringing the village bell,
When the evening sun is low.

And children coming home from school
Look in at the open door;
They love to see the flaming forge,
And hear the bellows roar,
And catch the burning sparks that fly
Like chaff from a threshing-floor.

1839

10

20

He goes on Sunday to the church. And sits among his boys: He hears the parson pray and preach, He hears his daughter's voice. Singing in the village choir, And it makes his heart rejoice.

It sounds to him like her mother's voice, Singing in Paradise! He needs must think of her once more. How in the grave she lies: And with his hard, rough hand he wipes A tear out of his eves.

Toiling,—rejoicing,—sorrowing, Onward through life he goes; Each morning sees some task begin, Each evening sees its close; Something attempted, something done, Has earned a night's repose.

Thanks, thanks to thee, my worthy friend, For the lesson thou hast taught! Thus at the flaming forge of life Our fortunes must be wrought: Thus on its sounding anvil shaped Each burning deed and thought! 1839 1841

HYMN TO THE NIGHT

'Ασπασίη, τρίλλιστος<sup>1</sup>

I heard the trailing garments of the Night Sweep through her marble halls! I saw her sable skirts all fringed with light From the celestial walls!

I felt her presence, by its spell of might, Stoop o'er me from above; The calm, majestic presence of the Night, As of the one I love.

I heard the sounds of sorrow and delight, The manifold, soft chimes, That fill the haunted chambers of the Night, Like some old poet's rimes.

From the cool cisterns of the midnight air My spirit drank repose; The fountain of perpetual peace flows there,— From those deep cisterns flows.

O holy Night! from thee I learn to bear What man has borne before! Thou layest thy finger on the lips of Care, And they complain no more.

1 ". . . Welcome, thrice prayed for . . ." Iliad, viii, 488.

Peace! Peace! Orestes-like I breathe this praver! 2 Descend with broad-winged flight.

The welcome, the thrice-prayed for, the most

The best-beloved Night!

1830

THE SKELETON IN ARMOR 3

"Speak! speak! thou fearful guest! Who, with thy hollow breast, Still in rude armor drest, Comest to daunt me! Wrapt not in Eastern balms, 4 But with thy fleshless palms Stretched, as if asking alms, Why dost thou haunt me?"

Then from those cavernous eyes Pale flashes seemed to rise. As when the Northern skies Gleam in December: And, like the water's flow Under December's snow. Came a dull voice of woe From the heart's chamber.

"I was a Viking 5 old! My deeds, though manifold, No Skald 6 in song has told, No Saga 7 taught thee! Take heed that in thy verse Thou dost the tale rehearse, Else dread a dead man's curse: For this I sought thee.

"Far in the Northern Land, By the wild Baltic's strand, I, with my childish hand, Tamed the gerfalcon; 8 And, with my skates fast-bound, Orestes, in Aeschylus's drama The Eumenides, when seeking peace from the Furies, prays to the goddess Athena for righteous judgment.

 "A skeleton had been dug up at Fall River clad in broken and corroded armor; and the idea occurred to me of connecting it with the Round Tower at Newport."—Longfellow's note. The tower was once thought to be of Norse origin, but has been proved modern. Longfellow is here using the meter and stanza of Michael Drayton's famous ballad "Agincourt."
 as the Exyptian dead were wrapped in spices as the Egyptian dead were wrapped in spices Scandinavian sea-royer

6 bard (Scandinavian) ancient Norse heroic legend

8 an Arctic falcon of unusual fierceness

40

50

60

70

Skimmed the half-frozen Sound. That the poor whimpering hound Trembled to walk on

"Oft to his frozen lair
Tracked I the grisly bear,
While from my path the hare
Fled like a shadow;
Oft through the forest dark
Followed the were-wolf's 1 bark
Until the soaring lark
Sang from the meadow.

"But when I older grew,
Joining a corsair's crew,
O'er the dark sea I flew
With the marauders.
Wild was the life we led;
Many the souls that sped,
Many the hearts that bled,
By our stern orders.

"Many a wassail-bout 2 Wore the long winter out; Often our midnight shout Set the cocks crowing, As we the Berserk's 3 tale Measured in cups of ale, Draining the oaken pail Filled to o'erflowing.

"Once as I told in glee
Tales of the stormy sea,
Soft eyes did gaze on me,
Burning yet tender;
And as the white stars shine
On the dark Norway pine,
On that dark heart of mine
Fell their soft splendor.

"I wooed the blue-eyed maid, Vielding, yet half afraid. And in the forest's shade Our vows were plighted. Under its loosened vest Fluttered her little breast, Like birds within their nest By the hawk frighted.

"Bright in her father's hall Shields gleamed upon the wall, Loud sang the minstrels all,

<sup>1</sup> a man-wolf; one who can turn himself into a wolf, or has been turned into a wolf, still retaining human intelligence

<sup>2</sup> carouse <sup>5</sup> a wild Scandinavian warrior of barbaric times; probably one who fought "bear-sark," i.e., clad in a bear-skin shirt Chanting his glory;
When of old Hildebrand
I asked his daughter's hand,
Mute did the minstrels stand
To hear my story.

"While the brown ale he quaffed.
Loud then the champion laughed,
And as the wind-gusts waft
The sea-foam brightly,
So the loud laugh of scorn
Out of those lips unshorn,
From the deep drinking-horn
Blew the foam lightly.

80

90

120

"She was a Prince's child,
I but a Viking wild,
And though she blushed and smiled,
I was discarded!
Should not the dove so white
Follow the sea-mew's flight?
Why did they leave that night
Her nest unguarded?

"Scarce had I put to sea,
Bearing the maid with me,
Fairest of all was she
Among the Norsemen!
When on the white sea-strand,
Waving his armed hand,
Saw we old Hildebrand,
With twenty horsemen.

"Then launched they to the blast,
Bent like a reed each mast,
Yet we were gaining fast,
When the wind failed us;
And with a sudden flaw
Came round the gusty Skaw,
So that our foe we saw
Laugh as he hailed us.

"And as to catch the gale
Round veered the flapping sail,
'Death!' was the helmsman's hail,
'Death without quarter!'
Midships with iron keel
Struck we her ribs of steel;
Down her black hulk did reel
Through the black water!

"As with his wings aslant, Sails the fierce cormorant, Seeking some rocky haunt, With his prey laden,— So toward the open main,

<sup>4</sup> Cape Skagen in northeastern Denmark

140

Beating to sea again, Through the wild hurricane, Bore I the maiden

"Three weeks we westward bore,
And when the storm was o'er,
Cloud-like we saw the shore
Stretching to leeward;
There for my lady's bower
Built I the lofty tower,
Which, to this very hour,
Stands looking seaward.

"There lived we many years;
Time dried the maiden's tears;
She had forgot her fears,
She was a mother;
Death closed her mild blue eyes;
Under that tower she lies;
Ne'er shall the sun arise
On such another!

"Still grew my bosom then,
Still as a stagnant fen!
Hateful to me were men,
The sunlight hateful!
In the vast forest here,
Clad in my warlike gear,
Fell I upon my spear.
Oh, death was grateful!

"Thus, seamed with many scars,
Bursting these prison bars
Up to its native stars
My soul ascended!
There from the flowing bowl
Deep drinks the warrior's soul,
Skoal! to the Northland! skoal!"
Thus the tale ended.

1840 1841

ENDYMION 2

The rising moon has hid the stars; Her level rays, like golden bars, Lie on the landscape green, With shadows brown between.

And silver white the river gleams, As if Diana, in her dreams,

1 "In Scandinavia this was the customary salutation when drinking a health. I have slightly changed the orthography of the word, in order to preserve the correct pronunciation."—Longfellow's note.
2 The legendary Greek youth who, in some legends, was said to have asked Zeus for immortality, eternal youth, and lasting slumber; he was beloved by Selene, the moon (Roman Diana), as he lay sleeping on Mt. Latmos. See Keats's Endymion.

Had dropt her silver bow Upon the meadows low.

On such a tranquil night as this, She woke Endymion with a kiss, When, sleeping in the grove, He dreamed not of her love.

Like Dian's kiss, unasked, unsought, Love gives itself, but is not bought; Nor voice, nor sound betrays Its deep, impassioned gaze.

It comes,—the beautiful, the free, The crown of all humanity,— In silence and alone To seek the elected one.

It lifts the boughs, whose shadows deep Are Life's oblivion, the soul's sleep, And kisses the closed eyes Of him, who slumbering lies.

O weary hearts! O slumbering eyes! O drooping souls, whose destinies Are fraught with fear and pain, Ye shall be loved again!

No one is so accursed by fate,
No one so utterly desolate,
But some heart, though unknown,
Responds unto his own.

Responds,—as if with unseen wings, An angel touched its quivering strings; And whispers, in its song, "Where hast thou stayed so long?"

1841

MAIDENHOOD

Maiden! with the meek, brown eyes, In whose orbs a shadow lies Like the dusk in evening skies!

Thou whose locks outshine the sun, Golden tresses, wreathed in one, As the braided streamlets run!

Standing, with reluctant feet, Where the brook and river meet, Womanhood and childhood fleet!

Gazing, with a timid glance. On the brooklet's swift advance, On the river's broad expanse! 10

20

30

1841

1841

Deep and still, that gliding stream Beautiful to thee must seem. As the river of a dream

Then why pause with indecision When bright angels in thy vision Beckon thee to fields Elysian? 1

Seest thou shadows sailing by, As the dove, with startled eye, Sees the falcon's shadow fly?

Hearest thou voices on the shore. That our ears perceive no more, Deafened by the cataract's roar?

O, thou child of many prayers! Life hath quicksands,—Life hath snares! Care and age come unawares!

Like the swell of some sweet tune, Morning rises into noon, May glides onward into June.

Childhood is the bough, where slumbered Birds and blossoms many-numbered;-Age, that bough with snows encumbered.

Gather, then, each flower that grows, When the young heart overflows, To embalm that tent of snows.

Bear a lily in thy hand; Gates of brass cannot withstand One touch of that magic wand.

Bear through sorrow, wrong, and ruth. In thy heart the dew of youth, On thy lips the smile of truth.

O, that dew, like balm, shall steal Into wounds, that cannot heal, Even as sleep our eyes doth seal;

And that smile, like sunshine, dart Into many a sunless heart, For a smile of God thou art. 1841

EXCELSIOR 2

The shades of night were falling fast, As through an Alpine village passed

2 Longfellow described his purpose in writing the poem as "to display, in a series of pictures, the life of a man of genius, resisting all temptations, laying aside all fears, heedless of all warnings, and pressing right on to accomplish his purpose. His motto is Excelsior—'higher.'"

A youth, who bore, 'mid snow and ice, A banner with the strange device, Excelsior!

His brow was sad; his eye beneath, Flashed like a falchion from its sheath. And like a silver clarion rung The accents of that unknown tongue. Excelsion!

In happy homes he saw the light Of household fires gleam warm and bright; Above, the spectral glaciers shone, And from his lips escaped a groan, Excelsior!

"Try not the Pass!" the old man said; "Dark lowers the tempest overhead, The roaring torrent is deep and wide!" And loud that clarion voice replied. Excelsior!

"O stay," the maiden said, "and rest Thy weary head upon this breast!" A tear stood in his bright blue eve. But still he answered, with a sigh, Excelsion!

"Beware the pine tree's withered branch! Beware the awful avalanche!" This was the peasant's last Good-night; A voice replied far up the height, Excelsior!

At break of day, as heavenward The pious monks of Saint Bernard 3 Uttered the oft-repeated prayer, A voice cried through the startled air, Excelsior!

A traveler, by the faithful hound, Half-buried in the snow was found. Still grasping in his hand of ice That banner with the strange device, Excelsior!

There in the twilight cold and gray, Lifeless, but beautiful, he lay, And from the sky, serene and far, A voice fell, like a falling star, Excelsior!

1841 1841

<sup>3</sup> The great monastery, 8108 feet above the sea in the St. Bernard Pass leading from Switzerland to Italy, was founded in the tenth or eleventh cen-tury. Many lives have been saved by the monks and their faithful dogs.

20

10

30

MEZZO CAMMIN<sup>1</sup>

WRITTEN AT BOPPARD ON THE RHINE AUGUST 25. 1842. TUST BEFORE LEAVING FOR HOME

Half of my life is gone, and I have let The years slip from me and have not fulfilled The aspiration of my youth, to build Some tower of song with lofty parapet. Not indolence, nor pleasure, nor the fret Of restless passions that would not be stilled. But sorrow, and a care that almost killed, 2 Kept me from what I may accomplish yet; Though, half-way up the hill, I see the Past Lying beneath me with its sounds and sights,— A city in the twilight dim and vast. With smoking roofs, soft bells, and gleaming lights.—

And hear above me on the autumnal blast The cataract of Death far thundering from the

1842

1887

THE ARSENAL AT SPRINGFIELD 3

This is the Arsenal. From floor to ceiling, Like a huge organ, rise the burnished arms; But from their silent pipes no anthem pealing Startles the villages with strange alarms.

Ah! what a sound will rise, how wild and

When the death-angel touches those swift kevs!

What loud lament and dismal Miserere 4 Will mingle with their awful symphonies!

I hear even now the infinite fierce chorus, 10 The cries of agony, the endless groan, Which, through the ages that have gone before

In long reverberations reach our own.

On helm and harness rings the Saxon hammer, Through Cimbric forest roars the Norseman's song, 5

And loud, amid the universal clamor. O'er distant deserts sounds the Tartar gong.

<sup>1</sup> "The middle of the journey"; the title was suggested by the first line of The Inferno, begun in the thirty-fifth year of Dante's life. See Milton's sonnet "On His Having Arrived at the Age of Twenty-three."

<sup>2</sup> Longfellow's wife had died in November, 1835.

3 Massachusetts

the Latin Vulgate version of the 51st Psalm (50th in the Vulgate), beginning "Miserere mei Domine,"—"Have mercy upon me, O Lord!"
The reference is probably to Jutland, supposed by the ancients to have been the first home of the Cimbri, a Teutonic tribe who invaded Roman territory and were destroyed in Piedmont 101 B.C.

I hear the Florentine, who from his palace Wheels out his battle-bell 6 with dreadful din. And Aztec priests upon their teocallis 7

Beat the wild war-drum made of serpent's skin:

The tumult of each sacked and burning vil-

The shout that every prayer for mercy drowns:

The soldiers' revels in the midst of pillage: The wail of famine in beleaguered towns:

The bursting shell, the gateway wrenched asunder.

The rattling musketry, the clashing blade; And ever and anon, in tones of thunder, The diapason of the cannonade.

Is it, O man, with such discordant noises, With such accursed instruments as these, Thou drownest Nature's sweet and kindly voices.

And jarrest the celestial harmonies?

Were half the power, that fills the world with

Were half the wealth, bestowed on camps and courts,

Given to redeem the human mind from error, There were no need of arsenals nor forts:

The warrior's name would be a name ab-

And every nation, that should lift again

Its hand against a brother, on its forehead Would wear forevermore the curse of Cain!

Down the dark future, through long generations.

The echoing sounds grow fainter and then cease:

And like a bell, with solemn, sweet vibrations, I hear once more the voice of Christ say, "Peace!"

Peace! and no longer from its brazen portals The blast of War's great organ shakes the skies!

But beautiful as songs of the immortals, The holy melodies of love arise.

1844 1844

6 In time of war, the Florentines of the 13th century wheeled out the Martinella, the battle bell, upon the battlefield itself, close by the battle standard. I flat-topped pyramids for Aztec worship

THE BRIDGE

I stood on the bridge at midnight, As the clocks were striking the hour, And the moon rose o'er the city. Behind the dark church-tower.

I saw her bright reflection In the waters under me. Like a golden goblet falling And sinking into the sea.

And far in the hazy distance Of that lovely night in June, The blaze of the flaming furnace Gleamed redder than the moon.

Among the long, black rafters The wavering shadows lay, And the current that came from the ocean Seemed to lift and bear them away;

As, sweeping and eddying through them, Rose the belated tide, And, streaming into the moonlight, The seaweed floated wide.

And like those waters rushing Among the wooden piers, A flood of thoughts came o'er me That filled my eyes with tears.

How often, oh how often, In the days that had gone by. I had stood on that bridge at midnight And gazed on that wave and sky!

How often, oh how often, I had wished that the ebbing tide Would bear me away on its bosom O'er the ocean wild and wide!

For my heart was hot and restless, And my life was full of care, And the burden laid upon me Seemed greater than I could bear.

But now it has fallen from me, It is buried in the sea; And only the sorrow of others Throws its shadow over me.

Yet whenever I cross the river On its bridge with wooden piers, Like the odor of brine from the ocean Comes the thought of other years. And I think how many thousands Of care-encumbered men. Each bearing his burden of sorrow. Have crossed the bridge since then.

I see the long procession Still passing to and fro. The young heart hot and restless. And the old subdued and slow!

And forever and forever. As long as the river flows. As long as the heart has passions. As long as life has woes:

The moon and its broken reflection And its shadows shall appear. As the symbol of love in heaven, And its wavering image here. 1845

1845

30

50

THE OLD CLOCK ON THE STAIRS

L'éternité est une pendule, dont le balancier dit et redit sans cesse ces deux mots seulement, dans le silence des tombeaux, "Toujours, jamais! Jamais, toujours!"

-TACOUES BRIDAINE.1

Somewhat back from the village street Stands the old-fashioned country-seat. 2 Across its antique portico Tall poplar-trees their shadows throw. And from its station in the hall An ancient timepiece says to all,— "Forever-never! Never-forever!"

Half-way up the stairs it stands, 10 And points and beckons with its hands From its case of massive oak, Like a monk, who, under his cloak, Crosses himself, and sighs, alas! With sorrowful voice to all who pass,— "Forever-never! Never-forever!"

But in the silent dead of night, Distinct as a passing footstep's fall 20 It echoes along the vacant hall, Along the ceiling, along the floor, And seems to say, at each chamber-door,-

By day its voice is low and light;

"Eternity is a clock whose pendulum utters and repeats without ceasing these two words only, in the silence of the tomb—'Forever, never! Never, forever!" Bridaine was a famous Catholic preacher in France (1710-1767).
a house in Pittsfield, Mass., in which Mrs. Longfellow's grandfather lived

40

70

1845

"Forever-never! Never-forever!"

Through days of sorrow and of mirth. Through days of death and days of birth, Through every swift vicissitude Of changeful time, unchanged it has stood, And as if, like God, it all things saw, It calmly repeats those words of awe.— "Forever—never!"

In that mansion used to be Free-hearted Hospitality: His great fires up the chimney roared: The stranger feasted at his board: But, like the skeleton at the feast, That warning timepiece never ceased,-"Forever-never!

Never-forever!'

There groups of merry children played. There youths and maidens dreaming strayed. O precious hours! O golden prime, And affluence of love and time! Even as a miser counts his gold, Those hours the ancient timepiece told,-"Forever-never! Never-forever!"

From that chamber, clothed in white, The bride came forth on her wedding night; There, in that silent room below, The dead lay in his shroud of snow; And in the hush that followed the prayer. Was heard the old clock on the stair,-"Forever-never! Never-forever!"

All are scattered now and fled, Some are married, some are dead; And when I ask, with throbs of pain, "Ah! when shall they all meet again?" 60 As in the days long since gone by, The ancient timepiece makes reply,-"Forever—never! Never-forever!"

Never here, forever there, Where all parting, pain, and care, And death, and time, shall disappear,-Forever there, but never here! The horologe of Eternity Saveth this incessantly.— "Forever—never! Never-forever!" 1845 1845

THE ARROW AND THE SONG

I shot an arrow into the air. It fell to earth, I knew not where; For, so swiftly it flew, the sight Could not follow it in its flight.

I breathed a song into the air. It fell to earth. I knew not where: For who has sight so keen and strong That it can follow the flight of song?

Long, long afterward, in an oak 10 I found the arrow, still unbroke; And the song, from beginning to end, I found again in the heart of a friend.

THE BUILDERS

All are architects of Fate. Working in these walls of Time; Some with massive deeds and great. Some with ornaments of rime.

Nothing useless is, or low: Each thing in its place is best; And what seems but idle show Strengthens and supports the rest.

For the structure that we raise, 10 Time is with materials filled: Our todays and yesterdays Are the blocks with which we build.

Truly shape and fashion these; Leave no yawning gaps between; Think not, because no man sees, Such things will remain unseen.

In the elder days of Art, Builders wrought with greatest care Each minute and unseen part; 20 For the Gods see everywhere.

Let us do our work as well, Both the unseen and the seen; Make the house, where Gods may dwell, Beautiful, entire, and clean.

Else our lives are incomplete, Standing in these walls of Time, Broken stairways where the feet Stumble as they seek to climb.

Build today, then, strong and sure. With a firm and ample base;

20

And ascending and secure Shall tomorrow find its place.

Thus alone can we attain To those turrets, where the eve Sees the world as one vast plain, And one boundless reach of sky.

1246

TEGNER'S DRAPA 1

I heard a voice that cried. "Balder 2 the Beautiful Is dead, is dead!" And through the misty air Passed like the mournful cry Of sunward sailing cranes.

I saw the pallid corpse Of the dead sun Borne through the Northern sky. Blasts from Niffelheim 3 Lifted the sheeted mists Around him as he passed.

And the voice forever cried, "Balder the Beautiful Is dead, is dead!" And died away Through the dreary night, In accents of despair.

Balder the Beautiful. God of the summer sun. Fairest of all the Gods! Light from his forehead beamed, Runes were upon his tongue, As on the warrior's sword.

All things in earth and air Bound were by magic spell

Bound were by magic spell

Tegner's Death Song or Dirge; Esaias Tegnér (těgnár'), 1782-1846, was an eminent Swedish poet. Longfeilow translated several of his poems, "Frithiof's Saga," "The Children of the Lord's Supper," etc.

The sun-god Balder (baldr, foremost), the son of Odin and Freya, was the wisest, purest, most beautiful, and most beloved of the Scandinavian gods. Evil dreams having come to Baldur, Freya, his mother, persuaded all things on earth, vegetable, mineral, and animal, to take oath that they would not hurt him. As he was therefore believed invulnerable, the gods amused themselves by shooting at him. But Loki the evil god, discovering that the mistletoe had been too young to take the oath, made an arrow out of that plant. This, as if in sport, he helped the blind god Höder (night). Balder's brother, to aim. Höder shot and killed Balder. Great was the mourning in heaven. However, according to Scandinavian myth, Balder will return, as the sun returns in summer, to a newly created heaven and earth. Cf. Matthew Arrold's "Balder Dead" and Gray's "The Descent of Odin."

In Norse mythology, the northern land of fog and cold 3 in Norse mythology, the northern land of fog and cold

Never to do him harm: Even the plants and stones: All save the mistletoe. The sacred mistletoe!

Höder, the blind old God, Whose feet are shod with silence, Pierced through that gentle breast With his sharp spear, by fraud Made of the mistletoe. The accursed mistletoe!

They laid him in his ship, With horse and harness. As on a funeral pyre. Odin placed A ring upon his finger, And whispered in his ear.

They launched the burning ship! It floated far away Over the misty sea. Till like the sun it seemed. Sinking beneath the waves. Balder returned no more!

So perish the old Gods! But out of the sea of Time Rises a new land of song. Fairer than the old. Over its meadows green Walk the young bards and sing.

Build it again. O ve bards. Fairer than before! Ye fathers of the new race. Feed upon morning dew, Sing the new Song of Love!

The law of force is dead! The law of love prevails! Thor, 4 the thunderer, Shall rule the earth no more. No more, with threats. Challenge the meek Christ.

Sing no more, O ye bards of the North, Of Vikings and of Jarls! 5 Of the days of Eld Preserve the freedom only, Not the deeds of blood.

1850

the Norse God of thunder Scandinavian noblemen; cf. earl; Vikings were searovers.

30

50

From EVANGELINE 1

A TALE OF ACADIE

This is the forest primeval. The murmuring pines and the hemlocks,

Bearded with moss, and in garments green, indistinct in the twilight,

Stand like Druids 2 of eld, with voices sad and prophetic.

Stand like harpers hoar, with beards that rest on their bosoms.

Loud from its rocky caverns, the deep-voiced neighboring ocean

Speaks, and in accents disconsolate answers the wail of the forest.

This is the forest primeval; but where are the hearts that beneath it

Leaped like the roe, when he hears in the woodland the voice of the huntsman?

Where is the thatch-roofed village, the home of Acadian farmers,—

Men whose lives glid on like rivers that water the wood s. 10

water the wood state of the work of the wo

Waste are those pleas at farms, and the farmers

Scattered like dust and wees, when the mighty blasts of October

Seize them, and whirl them aloft, and sprinkle them far o'er the ocean.

Naught but tradition remains of the beautiful village of Grand-Pré.

Ye who believe in affection that hopes, and endures, and is patient,

Ye who believe in the beauty and strength of woman's devotion,

List to the mournful tradition, still sung by the pines of the forest;

List to a Tale of Love in Acadie, home of the happy.

<sup>1</sup> In Hawthorne's American Note-Books occurs this passage: "H. L. C. (Reverend H. L. Conolly) heard from a French Canadian a story of a young couple in Acadie. On their marriage day all the men of the Province were summoned to assemble in the church to hear a proclamation. When assembled, they were all seized and shipped off to be distributed throughout New England,—among them the new bridegroom. His bride set off in search of him—wandered about New England all her life-time, and at last, when she was old, found her bridegroom on his death-bed. The shock was so great that it killed her likewise." Since Hawthorne, however, did not wish to use the incident for a story, Longfellow asked permission to develop it.

<sup>2</sup> The Druids or priests of the early Celts in Britain

worshiped in forests.

PART THE FIRST

т

In the Acadian land, on the shores of the Basin of Minas,

Distant, secluded, still, the little village of Grand-Pré

Lay in the fruitful valley. Vast meadows stretched to the eastward.

Giving the village its name, and pasture to flocks without number.

Dikes, that the hands of the farmers had raised with labor incessant.

Shut out the turbulent tides; but at stated seasons the flood-gates

Opened, and welcomed the sea to wander at will o'er the meadows

West and south there were fields of flax, and orchards and cornfields

Spreading afar and unfenced o'er the plain; and away to the northward

Blomidon <sup>3</sup> rose, and the forests old, and aloft on the mountains

Sea-fogs pitched their tents, and mists from the mighty Atlantic 30

Looked on the happy valley, but ne'er from their station descended.

There, in the midst of its farms, reposed the Acadian village.

Strongly built were the houses, with frames of oak and of hemlock.

Such as the peasants of Normandy built in the reign of the Henries. 4

Thatched were the roofs, with dormer-windows; and gables projecting

Over the basement below protected and shaded the doorway.

There in the tranquil evenings of summer, when brightly the sunset

Lighted the village street, and gilded the vanes on the chimneys,

Matrons and maidens sat in snow-white caps and in kirtles

Scarlet and blue and green, with distaffs spinning the golden 40

Flax for the gossiping looms, whose noisy shuttles within doors

Mingled their sound with the whir of the wheels and the songs of the maidens.

Solemnly down the street came the parish priest, and the children

Paused in their play to kiss the hand he extended to bless them.

S Cape Blomidon, one of the northern extremities of the precipitous ridge lying along the Bay of Fundy Probably Henry III and Henry IV, kings of France 1574-1610; Acadia was colonized in 1604. Reverend walked he among them; and up rose matrons and maidens.

Hailing his slow approach with words of affectionate welcome.

Then came the laborers home from the field, and serenely the sun sank

Down to his rest, and twilight prevailed. Anon from the belfry

Softly the Angelus <sup>1</sup> sounded, and over the roofs of the village

Columns of pale blue smoke, like clouds of incense ascending, 50

Rose from a hundred hearts, the homes of peace and contentment.

Thus dwelt together in love these simple Acadian farmers,—

Dwelt in the love of God and of man. Alike were they free from Fear, that reigns with the tyrant, and envy, the vice of republics.

Neither locks had they to their doors, nor bars to their windows:

But their dwellings were open as day and the hearts of the owners:

There the richest was poor, and the poorest lived in abundance.

Somewhat apart from the village, and nearer the Basin of Minas.

Benedict Bellefontaine, the wealthiest farmer of Grand-Pré.

Dwelt on his goodly acres; and with him, directing his household,

Gentle Evangeline lived, his child, and the pride of the village.

Stalwart and stately in form was the man of seventy winters;

Hearty and hale was he, an oak that is covered with snow-flakes;

White as the snow were his locks, and his cheeks as brown as the oak-leaves.

Fair was she to behold, that maiden of seventeen summers;

Black were the eyes as the berry that grows on the thorn by the wayside,

Black, yet how softly they gleamed beneath the brown shade of her tresses!

Sweet was her breath as the breath of kine that feed in the meadows.

When in the harvest heat she bore to the reapers at noontide

Flagons of home-brewed ale, ah! fair in sooth was the maiden.

Fairer was she when on Sunday morn, while the bell from its turret

<sup>1</sup> a bell rung at morning, noon, and night as a call to devotion; named the Angelus in commemoration of the annunciation by the angel Gabriel, of the Incarnation Sprinkled with holy sounds the air, as the priest with his hyssop<sup>2</sup>

Sprinkles the congregation, and scatters blessings upon them,

Down the long street she passed, with her chaplet of beads and her missal,

Wearing her Norman cap and her kirtle of blue and the ear-rings

Brought in the olden time from France, and since, as an heirloom,

Handed down from mother to child, through long generations.

But a celestial brightness—a more ethereal beauty—

Shone on her face and encircled her form, when, after confession,

Homeward serenely she walked with God's benediction upon her.

When she had passed, it seemed like the ceasing of exquisite music.

Firmly builded with rafters of oak, the house of the farmer

Stood on the side of a hill commanding the sea; and a shady

Sycamore grew by the door, with a woodbine wreathing around it.

Rudely carved was the porch, with seats beneath; and a footpath

Led through an orchard wide, and disappeared in the meadow.

Under the sycamore-tree were hives overhung by a penthouse,

Such as the traveler sees in regions remote by the roadside,

Built o'er a box for the poor, or the blessed image of Mary.

Farther down, on the slope of the hill, was the well with its moss-grown 90

Bucket, fastened with iron, and near it a trough for the horses.

Shielding the house from storms, on the north, were the barns and the farmyard.

There stood the broad-wheeled wains and the antique plows and the harrows:

There were the folds for the sheep; and there, in his feathered seraglio,

Strutted the lordly turkey, and crowed the cock, with the selfsame with the selfsame Voice that in ages of old had startled the peni-

tent Peter. 3

Bursting with hay were the barns, themselves a village. In each one

Far o'er the gable projected a roof of thatch; and a staircase,

<sup>2</sup> an herb, the twigs of which were used by Jewish priests in ceremonial purifications by sprinkling; in Catholic churches the holy water sprinkler

3 Matthew xxvi, 74, 75

Under the sheltering eaves, led up to the odorous corn-loft.

There too the dove-cot stood, with its meek and innocent inmates

Murmuring ever of love; while above in the variant breezes

Numberless noisy weathercocks rattled and sang of mutation.

Thus, at peace with God and the world, the farmer of Grand-Pré

Lived on his sunny farm, and Evangeline governed his household.

Many a youth, as he knelt in the church and opened his missal.

Fixed his eyes upon her as the saint of his deepest devotion:

Happy was he who might touch her hand or the hem of her garment!

Many a suitor came to her door, by the darkness befriended.

And, as he knocked and waited to hear the sound of her footsteps.

Knew not which beat the louder, his heart or the knocker of iron:

Or, at the joyous feast of the Patron Saint of the village, Bolder grew, and pressed her hand in the dance as he whispered Hurried words of love, that seemed a part of the music. But among all who came young Gabriel only was welcome: Gabriel Lajeunesse, the son of Basil the black-

Who was a mighty man in the village, and honored of all men; For, since the birth of time, throughout all ages and nations,

Has the craft of the smith been held in repute

by the people. Basil was Benedict's friend. Their children from earliest childhood

Grew up together as brother and sister; and Father Felician,

Priest and pedagogue both in the village, had taught them their letters

Out of the selfsame book, with the hymns of the church and the plain-song. 1

But when the hymn was sung, and the daily lesson completed,

Swiftly they hurried away to the forge of Basil the blacksmith.

There at the door they stood, with wondering eves to behold him

Take in his leathern lap the hoof of the horse as a plaything,

1 the simple liturgical music required in Catholic services

Nailing the shoe in its place; while near him the tire of the cart-wheel

Lay like a fiery snake, coiled round in a circle of cinders.

Oft on autumnal eves, when without in the gathering darkness

Bursting with light seemed the smithy, through every cranny and crevice,

Warm by the forge within they watched the laboring bellows.

And as its panting ceased, and the sparks expired in the ashes.

Merrily laughed, and said they were nuns going into the chapel.

Oft on sledges in winter, as swift as the swoop of the eagle.

Down the hillside bounding, they glided away o'er the meadow.

Oft in the barns they climbed to the populous nests on the rafters.

Seeking with eager eves that wondrous stone. which the swallow

Brings from the shore of the sea to restore the sight of its fledglings; 2

Lucky was he who found that stone in the nest of the swallow!

Thus passed a few swift years, and they no longer were children.

He was a valiant youth, and his face, like the face of the morning.

Gladdened the earth with its light, and ripened thought into action.

She was a woman now, with the heart and hopes of a woman.

"Sunshine of St. Eulalie," 3 was she called; for that was the sunshine

Which, as the farmers believed, would load their orchards with apples;

She too would bring to her husband's house delight and abundance,

Filling it with love and the ruddy faces of children.

Now had the season returned, when the nights grow colder and longer,

And the retreating sun the sign of the Scorpion 4 enters.

<sup>2</sup> "If the eyes of one of the young of a swallow be put out, the mother bird will bring from the seashore a little stone, which will immediately restore its sight." Pluquet, Contes Populaires; quoted by Wright, Literature and Superstitions of England in the Middle Ages.

3 Pluquetiese the size.

"Pluquet gives the rime:

"Si le soleil rit le jour Sainte Eulalie Il y aura pommes et cidre à folie."

i. e., "If the sun laughs on Saint Eulalie's da;
There will be apples and cider a-plenty."

the eighth of the signs of the zodiac, that which the sun enters Oct. 20

Birds of passage sailed through the leaden air. from the ice-bound.

Desolate northern bays to the shores of tropical islands.

Harvests were gathered in; and wild with the winds of September

Wrestled the trees of the forest, as Jacob of old with the angel. 1

All the signs foretold a winter long and inclement.

Bees, with prophetic instinct of want, had hoarded their honey

Till the hives overflowed; and the Indian hunters asserted

Cold would the winter be, for thick was the fur of the foxes.

Such was the advent of autumn. Then followed that beautiful season.

Called by the pious Acadian peasants the Summer of All-Saints! 2

Filled was the air with a dreamy and magical light; and the landscape

Lav as if new-created in all the freshness of childhood.

Peace seemed to reign upon earth, and the restless heart of the ocean

Was for a moment consoled. All sounds were in harmony blended.

Voices of children at play, the crowing of cocks in the farm-yards,

Whir of wings in the drowsy air, and the cooing of pigeons.

All were subdued and low as the murmurs of love, and the great sun

Looked with the eye of love through the golden vapors around him;

While arrayed in its robes of russet and scarlet and vellow.

Bright with the sheen of the dew, each glittering tree of the forest

Flashed like the plane-tree the Persian adorned with mantles and jewels. 3

Now recommenced the reign of rest and affection and stillness.

Day with its burden and heat had departed, and twilight descending

Brought back the evening star to the sky, and the herds to the homestead.

Pawing the ground they came, and resting their necks on each other,

And with their nostrils distended inhaling the freshness of evening.

<sup>1</sup> Genesis xxxii, 24-30
<sup>2</sup> about the first of November, that day being All Saints'
Day, corresponding to our Indian summer
<sup>3</sup> Xerxes found a plane tree so beautiful that he "presented it with golden ornaments" and put it in the care of a soldier of his chosen legion. See Herodotus vii, 31.

Foremost, bearing the bell, Evangeline's beautiful heifer,

Proud of her snow-white hide, and the ribbon that waved from her collar.

Quietly paced and slow, as if conscious of human affection.

Then came the shepherd back with his bleating flocks from the seaside.

Where was their favorite pasture. Behind them followed the watch-dog.

Patient, full of importance, and grand in the pride of his instinct.

Walking from side to side with a lordly air. and superbly

Waving his bushy tail, and urging forward the stragglers;

Regent of flocks was he when the shepherd slept; their protector,

When from the forest at night, through the starry silence, the wolves howled.

Late, with the rising moon, returned the wains from the marshes.

Laden with bring hav, that filled the air with its odor.

Cheerily neighed the steeds, with dew on their manes and their fetlocks,

While aloft on their shoulders the wooden and ponderous saddles,

Painted with brilliant dyes, and adorned with tassels of crimson,

Nodded in bright array, like hollyhocks heavy with blossoms.

Patiently stood the cows meanwhile, and yielded their udders

Unto the milkmaid's hand; whilst loud and in regular cadence

Into the sounding pails the foaming streamlets descended.

Lowing of cattle and peals of laughter were heard in the farm-yard,

Echoed back by the barns. Anon they sank into stillness;

Heavily closed, with a jarring sound, the valves of the barn-doors,

Rattled the wooden bars, and all for a season was silent.

In-doors, warm by the wide-mouthed fireplace, idly the farmer

Sat in his elbow-chair, and watched how the flames and the smoke-wreaths Struggled together like foes in a burning city. Behind him,

Nodding and mocking along the wall, with gestures fantastic,

Darted his own huge shadow, and vanished away into darkness.

Faces, clumsily carved in oak, on the back of his arm-chair

Laughed in the flickering light, and the pewter plates on the dresser

Caught and reflected the flame, as shields of armies the sunshine.

Fragments of song the old man sang, and carols of Christmas.

Such as at home, in the olden time, his fathers before him

Sang in their Norman orchards and bright Burgundian vineyards.

Close at her father's side was the gentle Evangeline seated, 210

Spinning flax for the loom that stood in the corner behind her.

Silent awhile were its treadles, at rest was its diligent shuttle,

While the monotonous drone of the wheel, like the drone of a bagpipe.

Followed the old man's song, and united the fragments together.

As in a church, when the chant of the choir at intervals ceases,

Footfalls are heard in the aisles, or words of the priest at the altar.

So, in each pause of the song, with measured motion the clock clicked.

Thus as they sat, there were footsteps heard, and, suddenly lifted,

Sounded the wooden latch, and the door swung back on its hinges.

Benedict knew by the hob-nailed shoes it was

Basil the blacksmith.

220

And by her beating heart Evangeline knew who was with him.

"Welcome!" the farmer exclaimed, as their footsteps paused on the threshold,

"Welcome, Basil, my friend! Come, take thy place on the settle

Close by the chimney-side, which is always empty without thee;

Take from the shelf overhead thy pipe and the box of tobacco;

Never so much thyself art thou as when, through the curling

Smoke of the pipe or the forge, thy friendly and jovial face gleams

Round and red as the harvest moon through the mist of the marshes."

Then, with a smile of content, thus answered Basil the blacksmith,

Taking with easy air the accustomed seat by the fireside:—

"Benedict Bellefontaine, thou hast ever thy jest and thy ballad!

Ever in cheerfullest mood art thou, when others are filled with Gloomy forebodings of ill, and see only ruin before them.

Happy art thou, as if every day thou hadst picked up a horseshoe."

Pausing a moment, to take the pipe that Evangeline brought him,

And with a coal from the embers had lighted, he slowly continued:—

"Four days now are passed since the English ships at their anchors

Ride in the Gaspereau's mouth, with their cannon pointed against us.

What their design may be is unknown; but all are commanded

On the morrow to meet in the church, where his Majesty's mandate 240

Will be proclaimed as law in the land. Alas! in the mean time

Many surmises of evil alarm the hearts of the people."

Then made answer the farmer:—"Perhaps some friendlier purpose

Brings these ships to our shores. Perhaps the harvests in England

By untimely rains or untimelier heat have been blighted,

And from our bursting barns they would feed their cattle and children."

"Not so thinketh the folk in the village," said warmly the blacksmith,

Shaking his head as in doubt; then, heaving a sigh, he continued: —

"Louisburg is not forgotten, nor Beau Séjour, nor Port Royal. 1

Many already have fled to the forest, and lurk on its outskirts, 250

Waiting with anxious hearts the dubious fate of tomorrow.

Arms have been taken from us, and warlike weapons of all kinds;

Nothing is left but the blacksmith's sledge and the scythe of the mower."

Then with a pleasant smile made answer the jovial farmer:—

"Safer are we unarmed, in the midst of our flocks and our cornfields,

Safer within these peaceful dikes besieged by the ocean,

Than our fathers in forts, besieged by the enemy's cannon.

Fear no evil, my friend, and tonight may no shadow of sorrow

Louisburg, capital of Cape Breton Island, had been captured by the English in 1745 and 1758; Beau Séjour, on the neck connecting Acadia with the mainland, in 1755; and Port Royal, in Acadia in 1690 and 1710. Fall on this house and hearth; for this is the night of the contract.

Built are the house and the barn. The merry lads of the village

Strongly have built them and well; and breaking the glebe round about them, 1

Filled the barn with hav, and the house with food for a twelvemonth.

René Leblanc will be here anon, with his papers and inkhorn.

Shall we not then be glad, and rejoice in the joy of our children?"

As apart by the window she stood, with her hand in her lover's.

Blushing Evangeline heard the words that her father had spoken,

And, as they died on his lips, the worthy notary entered.

TTT

Bent like a laboring oar, that toils in the surf of the ocean,

Bent, but not broken, by age was the form of the notary public;

Shocks of yellow hair, like the silken floss of the maize, hung

Over his shoulders; his forehead was high; and glasses with horn bows

Sat astride on his nose, with a look of wisdom supernal.

Father of twenty children was he, and more than a hundred

Children's children rode on his knee, and heard his great watch tick.

Four long years in the times of the war 2 had he languished a captive,

Suffering much in an old French fort as the friend of the English.

Now, though warier grown, without all guile or suspicion.

Ripe in wisdom was he, but patient, and simple, and childlike.

He was beloved by all, and most of all by the children:

For he told them tales of the Loup-garou " in the forest,

1 "As soon as a young man arrived to the proper age, the community built him a house, broke up the lands about it, and supplied him with all the necessaries of life for a twelve-month. There he received the partner whom he had chosen, and who brought him her portion in flocks." See Haliburton's History of Nova Scotia, I, 172.
2 Probably King George's War, 1744-1748, between England and her colonies on the one side and France and the Indians on the other; in Europe it was known as the War of the Austrian Succession, 1741-1748.

cession, 1741-1748.

The man-wolf; cf. "Skeleton in Armor," note 1, p. 504.
Belief in the Létiche was perhaps based on glimpses of the white ermine. It was said that on

And of the goblin that came in the night to water the horses.

And of the white Létiche, the ghost of a child who unchristened

Died, and was doomed to haunt unseen the chambers of children:

And how on Christmas eve the oxen talked in the stable.

And how the fever was cured by a spider shut up in a nutshell.

And of the marvelous powers of four-leafed clover and horseshoes.

With whatsoever else was writ in the lore of the village.

Then up rose from his seat by the fireside Basil the blacksmith.

Knocked from his pipe the ashes, and slowly extending his right hand,

"Father Leblanc," he exclaimed, "thou hast heard the talk in the village,

And, perchance, canst tell us some news of these ships and their errand."

Then with modest demeanor made answer the notary public,-

"Gossip enough have I heard, in sooth, yet am never the wiser:

And what their errand may be I know not better than others.

Yet am I not of those who imagine some evil intention Brings them here, for we are at peace; and why then molest us?"

"God's name!" shouted the hasty and somewhat irascible blacksmith;

"Must we in all things look for the how, and the why, and the wherefore?

Daily injustice is done, and might is the right of the strongest!"

But, without heeding his warmth, continued the notary public,—

"Man is unjust, but God is just; and finally justice

Triumphs; and well I remember a story 4 that often consoled me.

When as a captive I lay in the old French fort at Port Royal."

This was the old man's favorite tale, and he loved to repeat it

When his neighbors complained that any injustice was done them.

"Once in an ancient city, whose name I no longer remember,

Christmas eve the cattle knelt to worship Christ: a spider sealed up in a goose-quill and hung about a person's neck would cure the ague, etc. For these and similar beliefs see Pluquet.

A version of the same story is found in Rossini's opera The Thieving Magpie, 1817.

Raised aloft on a column, a brazen statue of Iustice

Stood in the public square, upholding the scales in its left hand,

And in its right a sword, as an emblem that justice presided

Over the laws of the land, and the hearts and homes of the people.

Even the birds had built their nests in the scales of the balance

Having no fear of the sword that flashed in the sunshine above them.

But in the course of time the laws of the land were corrupted;

Might took the place of right, and the weak were oppressed, and the mighty

Ruled with an iron rod. Then it chanced in a nobleman's palace

That a necklace of pearls was lost, and ere long a suspicion

Fell on an orphan girl who lived as maid in the household.

She, after form of trial condemned to die on the scaffold,

Patiently met her doom at the foot of the statue of Justice.

As to her Father in heaven her innocent spirit ascended.

Lo! o'er the city a tempest rose; and the bolts of the thunder

Smote the statue of bronze, and hurled in wrath from its left hand

Down on the pavement below the clattering scales of the balance.

And in the hollow thereof was found the nest of a magpie,

Into whose clay-built walls the necklace of pearls was inwoven."

Silenced, but not convinced, when the story was ended, the blacksmith

Stood like a man who fain would speak, but findeth no language:

All his thoughts were congealed into lines on his face, as the vapors

Freeze in fantastic shapes on the window panes in the winter.

Then Evangeline lighted the brazen lamp on the table, 330

Filled, till it overflowed, the pewter tankard with home-brewed

Nut-brown ale, that was famed for its strength in the village of Grand-Pré;

While from his pocket the notary drew his papers and inkhorn,

Wrote with a steady hand the date and the age of the parties,

Naming the dower of the bride in flocks of sheep and in cattle.

Orderly all things proceeded, and duly and well were completed.

And the great seal of the law was set like a sun on the margin.

Then from his leathern pouch the farmer threw on the table

Three times the old man's fee in solid pieces of silver:

And the notary rising, and blessing the bride and the bridegroom.

Lifted aloft the tankard of ale and drank to their welfare.

Wiping the foam from his lip, he solemnly bowed and departed,

While in silence the others sat and mused by the fireside.

Till Evangeline brought the draught-board out of its corner.

Soon was the game begun. In friendly contention the old men

Laughed at each lucky hit, or unsuccessful maneuver.

Laughed when a man was crowned, or a breach was made in the king-row.

Meanwhile apart, in the twilight gloom of a window's embrasure,

Sat the lovers and whispered together, beholding the moon rise

Over the pallid sea and the silvery mist of the meadows.

Silently one by one, in the infinite meadows of heaven,

Blossomed the lovely stars, the forget-me-note of the angels.

Thus was the evening passed. Anon the bell from the belfry

Rang out the hour of nine, the village curfew, and straightway

Rose the guests and departed; and silence reigned in the household.

Many a farewell word and sweet good-night on the door-step

Lingered long in Evangeline's heart, and filled it with gladness.

Carefully then were covered the embers that glowed on the hearth-stone,

And on the oaken stairs resounded the tread of the farmer.

Soon with a soundless step the foot of Evangeline followed.

Up the staircase moved a luminous space in the darkness,

Lighted less by the lamp than the shining face of the maiden.

Silent she passed the hall, and entered the door of her chamber.

Simple that chamber was, with its curtains of white, and its clothes-press

Ample and high, on whose spacious shelves were carefully folded

Linen and woollen stuffs, by the hand of Evangeline woven.

This was the precious dower she would bring to her husband in marriage,

Better than flocks and herds, being proofs of her skill as a housewife.

Soon she extinguished her lamp, for the mellow and radiant moonlight

Streamed through the windows, and lighted the room, till the heart of the maiden

Swelled and obeyed its power, like the tremulous tides of the ocean.

Ah! she was fair, exceeding fair to behold, as she stood with

Naked snow-white feet on the gleaming floor of her chamber!

Little she dreamed that below, among the trees of the orchard,

Waited her lover and watched for the gleam of her lamp, and her shadow.

Yet were her thoughts of him, and at times a feeling of sadness

Passed o'er her soul, as the sailing shade of clouds in the moonlight

Flitted across the floor and darkened the room for a moment.

And, as she gazed from the window, she saw serenely the moon pass Forth from the folds of a cloud, and one star follow her footsteps,

380

As out of Abraham's tent young Ishmael wandered with Hagar! 1

IV

Pleasantly rose next morn the sun on the village of Grand-Pré.

Pleasantly gleamed in the soft, sweet air the Basin of Minas,

Where the ships, with their wavering shadows, were riding at anchor.

Life had long been astir in the village, and clamorous labor

Knocked with its hundred hands at the golden gates of the morning.

Now from the country around, from the farms and neighboring hamlets,

Came in their holiday dresses the blithe Acadian peasants.

Many a glad good-morrow and jocund laugh from the young folk Where no path could be seen but the track of wheels in the greensward,

Group after group appeared, and joined, or passed on the highway.

Long ere noon, in the village all sounds of labor were silenced.

Thronged were the streets with people; and noisy groups at the house-doors

Sat in the cheerful sun, and rejoiced and gossiped together.

Every house was an inn, where all were welcomed and feasted;

For with this simple people, who lived like brothers together,

All things were held in common, and what one had was another's.

Yet under Benedict's roof hospitality seemed more abundant:

For Evangeline stood among the guests of her father:

Bright was her face with smiles, and words of welcome and gladness

Fell from her beautiful lips, and blessed the cup as she gave it.

Under the open sky, in the odorous air of the orchard.

Stript of its golden fruit, was spread the feast of betrothal.

There in the shade of the porch were the priest and the notary seated:

There good Benedict sat, and sturdy Basil the blacksmith.

Not far withdrawn from these, by the ciderpress and the beehives,

Michael the fiddler was placed, with the gayest of hearts and of waistcoats.

Shadow and light from the leaves alternately played on his snow-white

Hair, as it waved in the wind; and the jolly face of the fiddler

Glowed like a living coal when the ashes are blown from the embers.

Gayly the old man sang to the vibrant sound of his fiddle,

Tous les Bourgeois de Chartres, and Le Carillon de Dunkerque. 2

And anon with his wooden shoes beat time to the music.

Merrily, merrily whirled the wheels of the dizzying dances

Under the orchard-trees and down the path to the meadows;

1 Genesis xxi, 14-21

Made the bright air brighter, as up from the numerous meadows,

&lt;sup>2</sup> "All the Citizens of Chartres," and "The Chime of Dunkirk"—popular French songs

Old folk and young together, and children mingled among them.

Fairest of all the maids was Evangeline, Benedict's daughter!

Noblest of all the youths was Gabriel, son of the blacksmith!

So passed the morning away. And lo! with a summons sonorous 420

Sounded the bell from its tower, and over the meadows a drum beat.

Thronged ere long was the church with men.
Without, in the churchyard,

Waited the women. They stood by the graves, and hung on the headstones

Garlands of autumn-leaves and evergreens fresh from the forest.

Then came the guard from the ships, and marching proudly among them

Entered the sacred portal. With loud and dissonant clangor

Echoed the sound of their brazen drums from ceiling and casement,—

Echoed a moment only, and slowly the ponderous portal

Closed, and in silence the crowd awaited the will of the soldiers.

Then uprose their commander, and spake from the steps of the altar,

430

Holding aloft in his hands, with its seals, the royal commission.

"You are convened this day," he said, "by His Majesty's orders.

Clement and kind has he been; but how you have answered his kindness

Let your own hearts reply! To my natural make and my temper

Painful the task is I do, which to you I know must be grievous.

Yet must I bow and obey, and deliver the will of our monarch:

Namely, that all your lands, and dwellings, and cattle of all kinds

Forfeited be to the crown; and that you yourselves from this province

Be transported to other lands. God grant you may dwell there

Ever as faithful subjects, a happy and peaceable people!

Prisoners now I declare you, for such is His Majesty's pleasure!"

As, when the air is serene in the sultry solstice of summer,

Suddenly gathers a storm, and the deadly sling of the hailstones

Beats down the farmer's corn in the field, and shatters his windows,

Hiding the sun, and strewing the ground with thatch from the house-roofs,

Bellowing fly the herds, and seek to break their enclosures;

So on the hearts of the people descended the words of the speaker.

Silent a moment they stood in speechless wonder, and then rose

Louder and ever louder a wail of sorrow and

And, by one impulse moved, they madly rushed to the doorway.

Vain was the hope of escape; and cries and fierce imprecations

Rang through the house of prayer; and high o'er the head of the others

Rose, with his arms uplifted, the figure of Basil the blacksmith,

As, on a stormy sea, a spar is tossed by the billows.

Flushed was his face and distorted with passion; and wildly he shouted,—

"Down with the tyrants of England! we never have sworn them allegiance!

Death to these foreign soldiers, who seize on our homes and our harvests!"

More he fain would have said, but the merciless hand of a soldier

Smote him upon the mouth, and dragged him down to the pavement.

In the midst of the strife and tumult of angry contention, 460

Lo! the door of the chancel opened, and Father Felician

Entered, with serious mien, and ascended the steps of the altar.

Raising his reverend hand, with a gesture he awed into silence

All that clamorous throng; and thus he spake to his people;

Deep were his tones and solemn; in accents measured and mournful

Spake he, as, after the tocsin's alarum, distinctly the clock strikes.

"What is this that ye do, my children? what madness has seized you?

Forty years of my life have I labored among you, and taught you,

Not in word alone, but in deed, to love one another!

Is this the fruit of my toils, of my vigils and prayers and privations?

470

Have you so soon forgotten all lessons of love and forgiveness?

This is the house of the Prince of Peace, and would you profane it

Thus with violent deeds and hearts overflowing with hatred?

Lo! where the crucified Christ from his cross is gazing upon you!

See! in those sorrowful eyes what meekness and holy compassion!

Hark! how those lips still repeat the prayer, 'O Father, forgive them!'

Let us repeat that prayer in the hour when the wicked assail us.

Let us repeat it now, and say, 'O Father, forgive them!""i

Few were his words of rebuke, but deep in the hearts of his people

Sank they, and sobs of contrition succeeded the passionate outbreak.

While they repeated his prayer, and said, "O Father, forgive them!"

Then came the evening service. The tapers gleamed from the altar;

Fervent and deep was the voice of the priest, and the people responded,

Not with their lips alone, but their hearts: and the Ave Maria

Sang they, and fell on their knees, and their souls, with devotion translated,

Rose on the ardor of prayer, like Elijah ascending to heaven. 2

Meanwhile had spread in the village the tidings of ill, and on all sides

Wandered, wailing, from house to house the women and children.

Long at her father's door Evangeline stood, with her right hand

Shielding her eves from the level rays of the sun, that, descending,

Lighted the village street with mysterious splendor, and roofed each

Peasant's cottage with golden thatch, and emblazoned its windows.

Long within had been spread the snow-white cloth on the table;

There stood the wheaten loaf, and the honey fragrant with wild flowers:

There stood the tankard of ale, and the cheese fresh brought from the dairy:

And, at the head of the board, the great armchair of the farmer.

Thus did Evangeline wait at her father's door, as the sunset

Threw the long shadows of trees o'er the broad ambrosial meadows.

Ah! on her spirit within a deeper shadow had fallen.

And from the fields of her soul a fragrance celestial ascended .--

Charity, meekness, love, and hope, and forgiveness, and patience!

Then, all forgetful of self, she wandered into the village,

Cheering with looks and words the mournful hearts of the women,

As o'er the darkening fields with lingering steps they departed,

Urged by their household cares, and the weary feet of their children.

Down sank the great red sun, and in golden. glimmering vapors

Veiled the light of his face, like the Prophet descending from Sinai. 3

Sweetly over the village the bell of the Angelus sounded.

Meanwhile amid the gloom, by the church Evangeline lingered.

All was silent within; and in vain at the door and the windows

Stood she, and listened and looked, until, overcome by emotion.

"Gabriel!" cried she aloud with tremulous voice: but no answer

Came from the graves of the dead, nor the gloomier grave of the living.

Slowly at length she returned to the tenantless house of her father.

Smoldered the fire on the hearth, on the board was the supper untasted.

Empty and drear was each room, and haunted with phantoms of terror.

Sadly echoed her step on the stair and the floor of her chamber.

In the dead of the night she heard the disconsolate rain fall

Loud on the withered leaves of the sycamoretree by the window.

Keenly the lightning flashed; and the voice of the echoing thunder

Told her that God was in heaven, and governed the world he created!

Then she remembered the tale she had heard of the justice of Heaven;

Soothed was her troubled soul, and she peacefully slumbered till morning.

Four times the sun had risen and set; and now on the fifth day

Cheerily called the cock to the sleeping maids of the farm-house.

3 Exodus xxxiv, 29-35

Soon o'er the yellow fields, in silent and mournful procession.

Came from the neighboring hamlets and farms the Acadian women,

Driving in ponderous wains their household goods to the seashore,

Pausing and looking back to gaze once more on their dwellings.

Ere they were shut from sight by the winding road and the woodland.

Close at their sides their children ran, and urged on the oxen,

While in their little hands they clasped some fragments of playthings.

Thus to the Gaspereau's mouth they hurried; and there on the sea-beach

Piled in confusion lay the household goods of the peasants.

All day long between the shore and the ships did the boats ply;

All day long the wains came laboring down from the village.

Late in the afternoon, when the sun was near to his setting,

Echoed far o'er the fields came the roll of drums from the churchyard.

Thither the women and children thronged. On a sudden the church-doors

Opened, and forth came the guard, and marching in gloomy procession 540

ing in gloomy procession

Followed the long-imprisoned, but patient,

Acadian farmers.

Even as pilgrims, who journey afar from their homes and their country.

Sing as they go, and in singing forget they are weary and wayworn.

So with songs on their lips the Acadian peasants descended

Down from the church to the shore, amid their wives and their daughters.

Foremost the young men came; and, raising together their voices,

Sang with tremulous lips a chant of the Catholic Missions:—

"Sacred heart of the Saviour! O inexhaustible fountain!

Fill our hearts this day with strength and submission and patience!"

Then the old men, as they marched, and the women that stood by the wayside

Joined in the sacred psalm, and the birds in the sunshine above them

551

Mingled their notes therewith, like voices of spirits departed.

Half-way down to the shore Evangeline waited in silence,

Not overcome with grief, but strong in the hour of affliction,—

Calmly and sadly she waited, until the procession approached her.

And she beheld the face of Gabriel pale with Tears then filled her eyes, and, eagerly running to meet him.

Clasped she his hands, and laid her head on his shoulder, and whispered,—

"Gabriel, be of good cheer! for if we love one another.

Nothing, in truth, can harm us, whatever mischances may happen!" 560

Smiling she spake these words; then suddenly paused, for her father

Saw she, slowly advancing. Alas! how changed was his aspect!

Gone was the glow from his cheek, and the fire from his eye, and his footstep

Heavier seemed with the weight of the heavy heart in his bosom.

But with a smile and a sigh, she clasped his neck and embraced him.

Speaking words of endearment where words of comfort availed not.

Thus to the Gaspereau's mouth moved on that mournful procession.

There disorder prevailed, and the tumult and stir of embarking.

Busily plied the freighted boats; and in the confusion

Wives were torn from their husbands, and mothers, too late, saw their children

Left on the land, extending their arms, with wildest entreaties. <sup>571</sup>

So unto separate ships were Basil and Gabriel carried,

While in despair on the shore Evangeline stood with her father.

Half the task was not done when the sun went down, and the twilight

Deepened and darkened around; and in haste the refluent ocean

Fled away from the shore, and left the line of the sand-beach

Covered with waifs of the tide, with kelp and the slippery seaweed.

Farther back in the midst of the household goods and the wagons.

Like to a gypsy camp, or a leaguer 1 after a battle,

All escape cut off by the sea, and the sentinels near them, 580

Lay encamped for the night the houseless Acadian farmers.

<sup>1</sup> camp

Back to its nethermost caves retreated the bellowing ocean.

Dragging adown the beach the rattling pebbles, and leaving

Inland and far up the shore the stranded boats of the sailors.

Then, as the night descended, the herds returned from their pastures:

Sweet was the moist still air with the odor of milk from their udders;

Lowing they waited, and long, at the well-known bars of the farm-yard,—

Waited and looked in vain for the voice and the hand of the milkmaid.

Silence reigned in the streets; from the church no Angelus sounded,

Rose no smoke from the roofs, and gleamed no lights from the windows.

590

But on the shores meanwhile the evening fires had been kindled.

Built of the drift-wood thrown on the sands from wrecks in the tempest.

Round them shapes of gloom and sorrowful faces were gathered.

Voices of women were heard, and of men, and the crying of children.

Onward from fire to fire, as from hearth to hearth in his parish.

Wandered the faithful priest, consoling and blessing and cheering.

Like unto shipwrecked Paul on Melita's desolate seashore. <sup>1</sup>

Thus he approached the place where Evangeline sat with her father,

And in the flickering light beheld the face of the old man.

Haggard and hollow and wan, and without either thought or emotion, 600

E'en as the face of a clock from which the hands have been taken.

Vainly Evangeline strove with words and caresses to cheer him,

Vainly offered him food; yet he moved not, he looked not, he spake not,

But, with a vacant stare, ever gazed at the flickering fire-light.

"Benedicite!" 2 murmured the priest, in tones of compassion.

More he fain would have said, but his heart was full, and his accents

Faltered and paused on his lips, as the feet of a child on a threshold,

Hushed by the scene he beholds, and the awful presence of sorrow.

1 Acts xxviii, 1-10 2 "Blessing upon you"

Silently, therefore, he laid his hand on the head of the maiden.

Raising his tearful eyes to the silent stars that above them 610

Moved on their way, unperturbed by the wrongs and sorrows of mortals.

Then sat he down at her side, and they wept together in silence.

Suddenly rose from the south a light, as in autumn the blood-red

Moon climbs the crystal walls of heaven, and o'er the horizon

Titan-like stretches its hundred hands 3 upon mountain and meadow,

Seizing the rocks and the rivers, and piling huge shadows together.

Broader and ever broader it gleamed on the roofs of the village,

Gleamed on the sky and the sea, and the ships that lay in the roadstead.

Columns of shining smoke uprose, and flashes of flame were 619

Thrust through their folds and withdrawn, like the quivering hands of a martyr.

Then as the wind seized the gleeds and the burning thatch, and, uplifting,

Whirled them aloft through the air, at once from a hundred house-tops

Started the sheeted smoke with flashes of flame intermingled.

These things beheld in dismay the crowd on the shore and on shipboard.

Speechless at first they stood, then cried aloud in their anguish,

"We shall behold no more our homes in the village of Grand-Pré!"

Loud on a sudden the cocks began to crow in the farm-yards,

Thinking the day had dawned; and anon the lowing of cattle

Came on the evening breeze, by the barking of dogs interrupted.

Then rose a sound of dread, such as startles the sleeping encampments 630

Far in the western prairies or forests that skirt the Nebraska,

When the wild horses affrighted sweep by with the speed of the whirlwind,

Or the loud bellowing herds of buffaloes rush to the river.

<sup>3</sup> The Titans, here apparently confused with their hundred-handed brothers, the Uranids, of whom Briareus was one of the chief, represent convulsive forces of nature.
<sup>4</sup> burning coals

Such was the sound that arose on the night, as the herds and the horses

Broke through their folds and fences, and madly rushed o'er the meadows.

Overwhelmed with the sight, yet speechless, the priest and the maiden

Gazed on the scene of terror that reddened and widened before them:

And as they turned at length to speak to their silent companion.

Lo! from his seat he had fallen, and stretched abroad on the seashore

Motionless lay his form, from which the soul had departed.

Slowly the priest uplifted the lifeless head, and the maiden

Knelt at her father's side, and wailed aloud in her terror.

Then in a swoon she sank, and lay with her head on his bosom.

Through the long night she lay in deep, oblivious slumber:

And when she woke from the trance, she beheld a multitude near her

Faces of friends she beheld, that were mournfully gazing upon her,

Pallid, with tearful eyes, and looks of saddest compassion.

Still the blaze of the burning village illumined the landscape,

Reddened the sky overhead, and gleamed on the faces around her.

And like the day of doom it seemed to her wavering senses.

Then a familiar voice she heard, as it said to the people,-

"Let us bury him here by the sea. When a happier season

Brings us again to our homes from the unknown land of our exile,

Then shall his sacred dust be piously laid in the churchyard."

Such were the words of the priest. And there in haste by the seaside.

Having the glare of the burning village for funeral torches.

But without bell or book, 1 they buried the farmer of Grand-Pré.

And as the voice of the priest repeated the service of sorrow,

Lo! with a mournful sound like the voice of a vast congregation,

Solemnly answered the sea, and mingled its roar with the dirges.

'Twas the returning tide, that afar from the waste of the ocean.

With the first dawn of the day, came heaving and hurrying landward.

Then recommenced once more the stir and noise of embarking:

And with the ebb of the tide the ships sailed out of the harbor.

Leaving behind them the dead on the shore. and the village in ruins.

1845-1847

1847

[End of Part the First]

THE SECRET OF THE SEA 2

Ah! what pleasant visions haunt me As I gaze upon the sea! All the old romantic legends, All my dreams, come back to me.

Sails of silk and ropes of sendal. 3 Such as gleam in ancient lore; And the singing of the sailors. And the answer from the shore!

Most of all, the Spanish ballad Haunts me oft, and tarries long, Of the noble Count Arnaldos And the sailor's mystic song.

Like the long waves on a sea-beach. Where the sand as silver shines. With a soft, monotonous cadence, Flow its unrimed lyric lines:-

Telling how the Count Arnaldos. With his hawk upon his hand, Saw a fair and stately galley, Steering onward to the land;-

20

10

How he heard the ancient helmsman Chant a song so wild and clear, That the sailing sea-bird slowly Poised upon the mast to hear,

Till his soul was full of longing, And he cried, with impulse strong,-"Helmsman! for the love of heaven, Teach me, too, that wondrous song!"

<sup>2</sup> This poem is based upon and in places is almost a literal translation of a Spanish ballad, the "Ro-mance del Conde Arnaldo." It may be found in Primarera y Flor de Romance collected by Wolf and Hofman, 1856.
3 a kind of thin silk material

<sup>1</sup> without religious ceremony

"Wouldst thou,"—so the helmsman answered,
"Learn the secret of the sea?
Only those who brave its dangers Comprehend its mystery!"

In each sail that skims the horizon,
In each landward-blowing breeze,
I behold that stately galley,
Hear those mountful melodies:

Till my soul is full of longing
For the secret of the sea,
And the heart of the great ocean
Sends a thrilling pulse through me.
1848

SIR HUMPHREY GILBERT 1

Southward with fleet of ice Sailed the corsair Death; Wild and fast blew the blast, And the east-wind was his breath.

His lordly ships of ice
Glistened in the sun;
On each side, like pennons wide,
Flashing crystal streamlets run.

His sails of white sea-mist
Dripped with silver rain;
But where he passed there were cast
Leaden shadows o'er the main.

Eastward from Campobello <sup>2</sup>
Sir Humphrey Gilbert sailed;
Three days or more seaward he bore,
Then, alas! the land-wind failed.

Alas! the land-wind failed,
And ice-cold grew the night;
And never more, on sea or shore,
Should Sir Humphrey see the light.

An English adventurer, a half brother of Sir Walter Raleigh; he established the first English colony in North America at St. Johns, Newfoundland, where he landed Aug. 5, 1583. On his return to England, after disastrous experiences, he was one tempestuous day seen by those of an accompanying vessel, the Golden Hind, sitting at the stern of his little pinnace of ten tons, the Squirrel, reading a book, and as often as the two ships drew near was heard to exclaim, "We are as near heaven by sea as by land." That night, Sept. 9, 1583, the lights of the Squirrel suddenly disappeared and no trace of the vessel was ever found. See Hakluvt, The Primipal Navigations, Voyages, and Discoveries of the English Nation, vol. viii, p. 174, Edinburgh, 1904. Hakluyt makes no suggestion of the ice as incidental to the disaster.

<sup>2</sup> Campobello Island, probably mentioned because of its musical name, is in the Bay of Fundy. He sat upon the deck,
The Book was in his hand;
"Do not fear! Heaven is as near,"
He said, "by water as by land!"

In the first watch of the night,
Without a signal's sound.
Out of the sea, mysteriously,
The fleet of Death rose all around.

The moon and the evening star Were hanging in the shrouds; Every mast, as it passed, Seemed to rake the passing clouds.

They grappled with their prize.
At midnight black and cold!
As of a rock was the shock;
Heavily the ground-swell rolled.

Southward through day and dark,
They drift in close embrace,
With mist and rain, to the Spanish Main; 3
Yet there seems no change of place.
40

Southward, forever southward, They drift through dark and day; And like a dream, in the Gulf-Stream Sinking, vanish all away.

1848

10

1848

30

RESIGNATION 4

There is no flock, however watched and tended. But one dead lamb is there! There is no fireside, howsoe'er defended, But has one vacant chair!

The air is full of farewells to the dying, And mournings for the dead; The heart of Rachel, for her children crying. Will not be comforted! <sup>5</sup>

Let us be patient! These severe afflictions
Not from the ground arise,
But oftentimes celestial benedictions
Assume this dark disguise.

We see but dimly through the mists and vapors; Amid these earthly damps What seem to us but sad funereal tapers May be heaven's distant lamps.

the seas north of South America written after the death of his little daughter Fanny Jeremiah xxxi, 15

There is no Death! What seems so is transition;

This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian.
Whose portal we call Death.

She is not dead,—the child of our affection,— But gone unto that school

Where she no longer needs our poor protection, And Christ himself doth rule.

In that great cloister's stillness and seclusion, By guardian angels led.

Safe from temptation, safe from sin's pollution. She lives, whom we call dead.

Day after day we think what she is doing
In those bright realms of air;
Year after year, her tender steps pursuing,
Behold her grown more fair.

Thus do we walk with her, and keep unbroken The bond which nature gives.

Thinking that our remembrance, though unspoken.

May reach her where she lives.

Not as a child shall we again behold her; For when with raptures wild In our embraces we again enfold her, She will not be a child;

But a fair maiden, in her Father's mansion. <sup>1</sup> Clothed with celestial grace; And beautiful with all the soul's expansion Shall we behold her face.

And though at times impetuous with emotion And anguish long suppressed.

The swelling heart heaves moaning like the ocean,

That cannot be at rest.-

We will be patient, and assuage the feeling We may not wholly stay;
By silence sanctifying, not concealing, The grief that must have way.

1848

KING WITLAF'S DRINKING HORN

Witlaf, 2 a king of the Saxons, Ere yet his last he breathed,

<sup>1</sup> John xiv, 2
<sup>2</sup> Witlaf, King of Mercia, once took refuge for four months at the Abbey of Croyland, which he rewarded with gifts and privileges. In his will

To the merry monks of Croyland His drinking-horn bequeathed.—

That, whenever they sat at their revels
And drank from the golden bowl,
They might remember the donor,
And breathe a prayer for his soul.

So sat they once at Christmas, And bade the goblet pass; In their beards the red wine glistened Like dew-drops in the grass.

They drank to the soul of Witlaf, They drank to Christ the Lord, And to each of the Twelve Apostles, Who had preached his holy word.

They drank to the Saints and Martyrs Of the dismal days of yore, And as soon as the horn was empty They remembered one Saint more.

And the reader droned from the pulpit, Like the murmur of many bees, The legend of good Saint Guthlac, s And Saint Basil's homilies:

Till the great bells of the convent, From their prison in the tower, Guthlac and Bartholomaeus. <sup>5</sup> Proclaimed the midnight hour.

And the Yule-log cracked in the chimney, And the Abbot bowed his head,
And the flamelets flapped and flickered, But the Abbot was stark and dead.

Yet still in his pallid fingers

He clutched the golden bowl,
In which, like a pearl dissolving,
Had sunk and dissolved his soul

But not for this their revels
The jovial monks forbore,
For they cried, "Fill high the goblet!
We must drink to one Saint more!"
1848 was found this bequest: "I also offer to the refectory... the horn of my table, that the elders of the monastery may drink out of it on the festivals of the saints; and may sometimes amid their benedictions remember the soul of the donor. Witlaf."

5 Bartholomew, one of the twe've apostles

10

20

38 a Saint Guthlac the English hermit, 673?-714, died at Crovland, where he had lived for fifteen years.

THE BUILDING OF THE SHIP 1

"Build me straight, O worthy Master! Stanch and strong, a goodly vessel, That shall laugh at all disaster, And with wave and whirlwind wrestle!"

The merchant's word Delighted the Master heard; For his heart was in his work, and the heart Giveth grace unto every Art. A quiet smile played round his lips, As the eddies and dimples of the tide Play round the bows of ships, That steadily at anchor ride. And with a voice that was full of glee, He answered, "Ere long we will launch A vessel as goodly, and strong, and stanch, As ever weathered a wintry sea!"

And first with nicest skill and art, Perfect and finished in every part, A little model the Master wrought, 20 Which should be to the larger plan What the child is to the man, Its counterpart in miniature; That with a hand more swift and sure The greater labor might be brought To answer to his inward thought. And as he labored, his mind ran o'er The various ships that were built of yore, And above them all, and strangest of all, Towered the Great Harry, 2 crank and tall, Whose picture was hanging on the wall, With bows and stern raised high in air, And balconies hanging here and there, And signal lanterns and flags affoat, And eight round towers, like those that frown From some old castle, looking down Upon the drawbridge and the moat. And he said, with a smile, "Our ship, I wis, Shall be of another form than this!"

It was of another form, indeed; Built for freight, and yet for speed, A beautiful and gallant craft; Broad in the beam, that the stress of the blast, Pressing down upon sail and mast, Might not the sharp bows overwhelm; Broad in the beam, but sloping aft With graceful curve and slow degrees, That she might be docile to the helm,

And that the currents of parted seas. Closing behind, with mighty force, Might aid and not impede her course.

In the ship-yard stood the Master, With the model of the vessel That should laugh at all disaster, And with wave and whirlwind wrestle! 50

70

80

Covering many a rood of ground. Lay the timber piled around; Timber of chestnut, and elm, and oak, And scattered here and there, with these, The knarred and crooked cedar knees; 60 Brought from regions far away, From Pascagoula's sunny bay, 3 And the banks of the roaring Roanoke! 4 Ah! what a wondrous thing it is To note how many wheels of toil One thought, one word, can set in motion! There's not a ship that sails the ocean, But every climate, every soil, Must bring its tribute, great or small, And help to build the wooden wall! 5

The sun was rising o'er the sea. And long the level shadows lay, As if they, too, the beams would be Of some great, airy argosy, 6 Framed and launched in a single day. That silent architect, the sun, Had hewn and laid them every one, Ere the work of man was yet begun. Beside the Master, when he spoke, A youth, against an anchor leaning, Listened, to catch his slightest meaning. Only the long waves, as they broke In ripples on the pebbly beach, Interrupted the old man's speech.

Beautiful they were, in sooth, The old man and the fiery youth! The old man, in whose busy brain Many a ship that sailed the main Was modeled o'er and o'er again;— The fiery youth, who was to be The heir of his dexterity, The heir of his house, and his daughter's hand, When he had built and launched from land What the elder head had planned.

This poem is comparable with Schiller's "Song of the Bell," in which the changes of meter are adapted to the changes in thought. Note the occasional use of the meter which Longfellow later used in "Hiawatha."

<sup>2</sup>a three-masted English war-ship, huge for its day, built in 1488

s on the southern coast of Mississippi

in North Carolina
The answer of the Delphic orac'e to the Greeks who as el how they were to meet Xerxes was:
"Zeus the sire of a'l Hath safety promised in a wooden wall."
Accordingly, by using we'l their ships the Greeks overthrew the Persians in the naval battle of Salamis. a richly laden merchant vessel

"Thus," said he, "will we build this ship! Lay square the blocks upon the slip. 1 And follow well this plan of mine. Choose the timbers with greatest care: Of all that is unsound beware: For only what is sound and strong 100 To this vessel shall belong. Cedar of Maine and Georgia pine Here together shall combine. A goodly frame, and a goodly fame, And the UNION 2 be her name! For the day that gives her to the sea Shall give my daughter unto thee!"

The Master's word Enraptured the young man heard; And as he turned his face aside. 110 With a look of joy and a thrill of pride. Standing before Her father's door, He saw the form of his promised bride. The sun shone on her golden hair, And her cheek was glowing fresh and fair, With the breath of morn and the soft sea air. Like a beauteous barge was she, Still at rest on the sandy beach, Just beyond the billow's reach; 120 But he Was the restless, seething, stormy sea!

Ah, how skilful grows the hand That obeyeth Love's command! It is the heart, and not the brain, That to the highest doth attain, And he who followeth Love's behest Far excelleth all the rest!

Thus with the rising of the sun Was the noble task begun, And soon throughout the ship-yard's bounds 131 Were heard the intermingled sounds Of axes and of mallets, plied With vigorous arms on every side; Plied so deftly and so well, That, ere the shadows of evening fell, The keel of oak for a noble ship, Scarfed <sup>3</sup> and bolted, straight and strong, Was lying ready, and stretched along The blocks, well placed upon the slip. 140 Happy, thrice happy, every one Who sees his labor well begun. And not perplexed and multiplied, By idly waiting for time and tide!

And when the hot, long day was o'er, The young man at the Master's door Sat with the maiden calm and still. And, within the porch, a little more Removed beyond the evening chill, 149 The father sat, and told them tales Of wrecks in the great September gales, 4 Of pirates upon the Spanish Main, 5 And ships that never came back again. The chance and change of a sailor's life. Want and plenty, rest and strife. His roving fancy, like the wind. That nothing can stay and nothing can bind, And the magic charm of foreign lands, With shadows of palms, and shining sands, Where the tumbling surf. 160 O'er the coral reefs of Madagascar. Washes the feet of the swarthy Lascar. 6 As he lies alone and asleep on the turf. And the trembling maiden held her breath At the tales of that awful, pitiless sea, With all its terror and mystery, The dim, dark sea, so like unto Death, That divides and yet unites mankind! And whenever the old man paused, a gleam From the bowl of his pipe would awhile illume The silent group in the twilight gloom, And thoughtful faces, as in a dream: And for a moment one might mark What had been hidden by the dark. That the head of the maiden lay at rest, Tenderly, on the young man's breast!

Day by day the vessel grew, With timbers fashioned strong and true, Stemson and keelson and sternson-knee, 7 Till, framed with perfect symmetry, 180 A skeleton ship rose up to view! And around the bows and along the side The heavy hammers and mallets plied, Till after many a week, at length, Wonderful for form and strength, Sublime in its enormous bulk, Loomed aloft the shadowy hulk! And around it columns of smoke, upwreathing, Rose from the boiling, bubbling, seething Caldron, that glowed, And overflowed With the black tar, heated for the sheathing. And amid the clamors Of clattering hammers, He who listened heard now and then The song of the Master and his men:—

<sup>1</sup> an inclined plane on which a vessel is built or re-

The poem was written during the great secession agitation.

* spliced lengthwise

&lt;sup>4</sup> A great gale in 1815 was long known as the great September gale. <sup>5</sup> the waters north of South America <sup>6</sup> an East Indian sailor

<sup>7</sup> bracings at the stern of a wooden ship's hull

"Build me straight, O worthy Master, Stanch and strong, a goodly vessel. That shall laugh at all disaster, And with wave and whirlwind wrestle!"

200 With oaken brace and copper band, Lav the rudder on the sand, That, like a thought, should have control Over the movement of the whole: And near it the anchor, whose giant hand Would reach down and grapple with the land. And immovable and fast Hold the great ship against the bellowing blast! And at the bows an image stood. By a cunning artist carved in wood, 210 With robes of white, that far behind Seemed to be fluttering in the wind. It was not shaped in a classic mold. Not like a nymph or Goddess of old, Or naiad 1 rising from the water, But modeled from the Master's daughter! On many a dreary and misty night, Twill be seen by the rays of the signal light, Speeding along through the rain and the dark. Like a ghost in its snow-white sark, 2 220 The pilot of some phantom bark, Guiding the vessel, in its flight, By a path none other knows aright!

Behold, at last, Each tall and tapering mast Is swung into its place; Shrouds and stays Holding it firm and fast!

Long ago. In the deer-haunted forests of Maine, 230 When upon mountain and plain Lay the snow, They fell,-those lordly pines! Those grand, majestic pines! 'Mid shouts and cheers The jaded steers. Panting beneath the goad, Dragged down the weary, winding road Those captive kings so straight and tall, · To be shorn of their streaming hair. 240 And, naked and bare, To feel the stress and the strain Of the wind and the reeling main, Whose roar Would remind them forevermore Of their native forests they should not see again.

And everywhere
The slender, graceful spars

1 sea nymph 2 shirt

Poise aloft in the air,
And at the masthead,
White, blue, and red,
A flag unrolls the stripes and stars.
Ah! when the wanderer, lonely, friendless,
In foreign harbors shall behold
That flag unrolled,
'Twill be as a friendly hand
Stretched out from his native land,
Filling his heart with memories sweet and endless.

All is finished! and at length
Has come the bridal day
Of beauty and of strength.
Today the vessel shall be launched!
With fleecy clouds the sky is blanched,
And o'er the bay,
Slowly, in all his splendors dight,
The great sun rises to behold the sight.

The ocean old,
Centuries old,
Strong as youth, and as uncontrolled,
Paces restless to and fro,
Up and down the sands of gold.
His beating heart is not at rest;
And far and wide,
With ceaseless flow,
His beard of snow
Heaves with the heaving of his breast.

270

290

He waits impatient for his bride.
There she stands,
With her foot upon the sands,
Decked with flags and streamers gay,
In honor of her marriage day,
Her snow-white signals fluttering, blending,
Round her like a veil descending,
Ready to be
The bride of the gray, old sea.

On the deck another bride
Is standing by her lover's side.
Shadows from the flags and shrouds,
Like the shadows cast by clouds,
Broken by many a sunny fleck,
Fall around them on the deck.

The prayer is said,
The service read,
The joyous bridegroom bows his head;
And in tears the good old Master
Shakes the brown hand of his son,
Kisses his daughter's glowing cheek
In silence, for he cannot speak,
And ever faster
Down his own the tears begin to run.

300 The worthy pastor-The shepherd of that wandering flock. That has the ocean for its wold. That has the vessel for its fold. Leaping ever from rock to rock-Spake, with accents mild and clear. Words of warning, words of cheer, But tedious to the bridegroom's ear. He knew the chart Of the sailor's heart. 210 All its pleasures and its griefs. All its shallows and rocky reefs. All those secret currents, that flow With such resistless undertow. And lift and drift, with terrible force. The will from its moorings and its course. Therefore he spake, and thus said he:-"Like unto ships far off at sea, Outward or homeward bound are we. Before, behind, and all around, 320 Floats and swings the horizon's bound. Seems at its distant rim to rise And climb the crystal wall of the skies. And then again to turn and sink, As if we could slide from its outer brink. Ah! it is not the sea. It is not the sea that sinks and shelves. But ourselves That rock and rise With endless and uneasy motion. 330 Now touching the very skies, Now sinking into the depths of ocean. Ah! if our souls but poise and swing Like the compass in its brazen ring, Ever level and ever true To the toil and the task we have to do. We shall sail securely, and safely reach The Fortunate Isles. 1 on whose shining beach The sights we see, and the sounds we hear. Will be those of joy and not of fear!"

340 Then the Master. With a gesture of command, Waved his hand: And at the word, Loud and sudden there was heard. All around them and below, The sound of hammers, blow on blow, Knocking away the shores and spurs. And see! she stirs! She starts,—she moves,—she seems to feel 350 The thrill of life along her keel, And, spurning with her foot the ground, With one exulting, joyous bound, She leaps into the ocean's arms!

And lo! from the assembled crowd
There rose a shout, prolonged and loud.
That to the ocean seemed to say.
"Take her, Oh bridegroom, old and gray,
Take her to thy protecting arms,
With all her youth and all her charms!"

How beautiful she is! How fair
She lies within those arms, that press
Her form with many a soft caress
Of tenderness and watchful care!
Sail forth into the sea, O ship!
Through wind and wave, right onward steer!
The moistened eye, the trembling lip,
Are not the signs of doubt or fear.

Sail forth into the sea of life,
O gentle, loving, trusting wife,
And safe from all adversity
Upon the bosom of that sea
Thy comings and thy goings be!
For gentleness and love and trust
Prevail o'er angry wave and gust;
And in the wreck of noble lives
Something immortal still survives!

Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State! Sail on, O Union, strong and great! Humanity with all its fears, 380 With all the hopes of future years, Is hanging breathless on thy fate! We know what Master laid thy keel, What Workmen wrought thy ribs of steel, Who made each mast, and sail, and rope, What anvils rang, what hammers beat, In what a forge, and what a heat Were shaped the anchors of thy hope! Fear not each sudden sound and shock. 'Tis of the wave and not the rock; 390 'Tis but the flapping of the sail, And not a rent made by the gale! In spite of rock and tempest's roar. In spite of false lights on the shore. Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea! Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee, Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears, Our faith triumphant o'er our fears, Are all with thee,—are all with thee! 1849 1840

CHILDREN

Come to me, O ye children!
For I hear you at your play,
And the questions that perplexed me
Have vanished quite away.

or Isles of the Blest-the last home of the favorites of the gods

Ye open the eastern windows, That look towards the sun, Where thoughts are singing swallows, And the brooks of morning run.

In your hearts are the birds and the sunshine,
In your thoughts the brooklet's flow,

But in mine is the wind of Autumn
And the first fall of the snow.

Ah! what would the world be to us
If the children were no more?
We should dread the desert behind us
Worse than the dark before.

What the leaves are to the forest,
With light and air for food,
Ere their sweet and tender juices
Have been hardened into wood,—

That to the world are children; Through them it feels the glow Of a brighter and sunnier climate Than reaches the trunks below.

Come to me, O ye children!
And whisper in my ear
What the birds and the winds are singing
In your sunny atmosphere.

For what are all our contrivings, And the wisdom of our books, When compared with your caresses, And the gladness of your looks?

Ye are better than all the ballads
That ever were sung or said;
For ye are living poems.
And all the rest are dead.
1840

THE LADDER OF SAINT AUGUSTINE 1

Saint Augustine! well hast thou said,
That of our vices we can frame
A ladder, if we will but tread
Beneath our feet each deed of shame!

All common things, each day's events.

That with the hour begin and end,
Our pleasures and our discontents,
Are rounds by which we may ascend.

Saint Augustine (354-430) said, "De vitiis nostris scalam nobis facimus, si vitia ipsa calcamus"— We make a ladder for ourselves from our faults if we tread upon the faults themselves. Sermon III, De Ascensione. The low desire, the base design,
That makes another's virtues less;
The revel of the ruddy wine,
And all occasions of excess:

The longing for ignoble things;
The strife for triumph more than truth;
The hardening of the heart, that brings
Irreverence for the dreams of youth;

10

20

30

All thoughts of ill; all evil deeds.

That have their root in thoughts of ill;
Whatever hinders or impedes
The action of the nobler will;—

All these must first be trampled down
Beneath our feet, if we would gain
In the bright fields of fair renown
The right of eminent domain.

We have not wings, we cannot soar; But we have feet to scale and climb By slow degrees, by more and more, The cloudy summits of our time.

The mighty pyramids of stone
That wedge-like cleave the desert airs,
When nearer seen, and better known,
Are but gigantic flights of stairs.

The distant mountains that uprear Their solid bastions 2 to the skies. Are crossed by pathways, that appear As we to higher levels rise.

The heights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.

40

Standing on what too long we bore
With shoulders bent and downcast eyes,
We may discern—unseen before—
A path to higher destinies.

Nor deem the irrevocable Past, As wholly wasted, wholly vain, If, rising on its wrecks, at last To something nobler we attain. 1850

2 earthworks

THE WARDEN OF THE CINOUE PORTS 1

A mist was driving down the British Channel. The day was just begun.

And through the window-panes, on floor and nanel.

Streamed the red autumn sun.

It glanced on flowing flag and rippling pennon. And the white sails of ships;

And from the frowning rampart, the black

Hailed it with feverish lips.

Sandwich and Romney, Hastings, Hithe, and Dover

Were all alert that day, To see the French war-steamers speeding over, 2 When the fog cleared away.

Sullen and silent, and like couchant lions, Their cannon, through the night, Holding their breath, had watched, in grim de-

The sea-coast opposite.

And now they roared at drum-beat from their stations

On every citadel;

Each answering each, with morning salutations. That all was well.

And down the coast, all taking up the burden, Replied the distant forts,

As if to summon from his sleep the Warden And Lord of the Cinque Ports.

Him shall no sunshine from the fields of azure. No drum-beat from the wall,

No morning gun from the black fort's embrasure.

Awaken with its call!

No more, surveying with an eye impartial The long line of the coast, Shall the gaunt figure of the old Field Marshal Be seen upon his post!

<sup>1</sup> This poem was written in October, 1852, in honor of Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, England's great general, who had died Sept. 14th, and who in 1829 had been given the very honorable title of Warden of the Cinque (Fr. five) Ports—the ports mentioned in the third stanza. These had once, because of their strength in ships, been considered the defense of England from continental invasion.
<sup>2</sup> out of respect to the memory of Wellington

For in the night, unseen, a single warrior, In somber harness mailed. Dreaded of man, and surnamed the Destroyer,

The rampart wall had scaled.

He passed into the chamber of the sleeper. The dark and silent room.

And as he entered, darker grew, and deeper, The silence and the gloom.

He did not pause to parley or dissemble. But smote the Warden hoar;

Ah! what a blow! that made all England tremble

And groan from shore to shore.

Meanwhile, without, the surly cannon waited, The sun rose bright o'erhead; Nothing in Nature's aspect intimated That a great man was dead. 1852 1853

From THE SONG OF HIAWATHA 3 INTRODUCTION

Should you ask me, whence these stories? Whence these legends and traditions. With the odors of the forest, With the dew and damp of meadows. With the curling smoke of wigwams, With the rushing of great rivers, With their frequent repetitions, And their wild reverberations, As of thunder in the mountains?

I should answer, I should tell you, "From the forests and the prairies, From the great lakes of the Northland, From the land of the Ojibways, 4 From the land of the Dacotahs, 5 From the mountains, moors, and fenlands,

3 Longfellow in a note that accompanied the poem wrote: "This Indian Edda—if I may so call it—is founded on a tradition prevalent among the North American Indians, of a person of miraculous birth, who was sent among them to clear their river forests and fishing grounds and to teach rivers, forests, and fishing grounds, and to teach them the arts of peace. He was known among the different tribes by the several names of Michabou, Chiabo, Manabozo, Tarenyawagon, and Hiawatha. . . . Into this old tradition I have woven other curious Indian legends, drawn chiefly from the various and valuable writings of Mr. School-craft, to whom the literary world is greatly in-debted for his indefatigable zeal in rescuing from debted for his indefatigable zeal in rescuing from oblivion so much of the legendary lore of the Indians." The meter was copied from that of the Finnish epic Kalevala.

4 or Chippewas, a tribe of Algonquins who lived on the south shore of Lakes Superior and Huron and in northern Minnesota and Dakota

5 A branch of the Sioux: they lived where now are North and South Dakota.

Where the heron, the Shuh-shuh-gah, Feeds among the reeds and rushes. I repeat them as I heard them From the lips of Nawadaha The musician, the sweet singer."

Should you ask where Nawadaha
Found these songs so wild and wayward,
Found these legends and traditions,
I should answer, I should tell you,
"In the birds'-nests of the forest,
In the lodges of the beaver,
In the hoof-prints of the bison,
In the eyry of the eagle!

"All the wild-fowl sang them to him. In the moorlands and the fenlands. In the melancholy marshes; Chetowaik, the plover sang them, Mahng, the loon, the wild-goose. Wawa, The blue heron, the Shuh-shuh-gah, And the grouse, the Mushkodasa!"

If still further you should ask me, Saying, "Who was Nawadaha? Tell us of this Nawadaha," I should answer your inquiries Straightway in such words as follow.

"In the vale of Tawasentha, <sup>1</sup> In the green and silent valley. By the pleasant water-courses, Dwelt the singer Nawadaha. Round about the Indian village Spread the meadows and the corn-fields, And beyond them stood the forest. Stood the groves of singing pine-trees, Green in summer, white in winter. Ever sighing, ever singing.

"And the pleasant water-courses,
You could trace them through the valley,
By the rushing in the spring-time,
By the alders in the summer,
By the white fog in the autumn,
By the black line in the winter;
And beside them dwelt the singer,
In the vale of Tawasentha,
In the green and silent valley.

"There he sang of Hiawatha, Sang the Song of Hiawatha, Sang his wondrous birth and being. How he prayed and how he fasted, How he lived, and toiled, and suffered, That the tribes of men might prosper, That he might advance his people!"

Ye who love the haunts of nature, Love the sunshine of the meadow, Love the shadow of the forest, Love the wind among the branches.

<sup>1</sup> a valley in Albany County, New York, now known as Norman's Kill

And the rain-shower and the snow-storm, And the rushing of great rivers
Through their palisades of pine-trees, And the thunder in the mountains,
Whose innumerable echoes
Flap like eagles in their eyries;—

Flap like eagles in their eyries;— Listen to these wild traditions, To this Song of Hiawatha! Ye who love a nation's legends,

Ye who love a nation's legends,
Love the ballads of a people,
That like voices from afar off
Call to us to pause and listen,
Speak in tones so plain and childlike,
Scarcely can the ear distinguish
Whether they are sung or spoken:—

80

90

100

110

Whether they are sung or spoken;— Listen to this Indian Legend, To this Song of Hiawatha!

Ye whose hearts are fresh and simple. Who have faith in God and Nature, Who believe, that in all ages Every human heart is human, That in even savage bosoms There are longings, yearnings, strivings For the good they comprehend not, That the feeble hands and helpless. Groping blindly in the darkness. Touch God's right hand in that darkness And are lifted up and strengthened;—Listen to this simple story.

To this Song of Hiawatha!

Ye, who sometimes in your rambles
Through the green lanes of the country,
Where the tangled barberry-bushes
Hang their tufts of crimson berries
Over stone walls gray with mosses,
Pause by some neglected graveyard,
For a while to muse, and ponder
On a half-effaced inscription,
Written with little skill of song-craft,
Homely phrases, but each letter
Full of hope and yet of heart-break,
Full of all the tender pathos
Of the Here, and the Hereafter;
Stay and read this rude inscription,

Read this Song of Hiawatha!

T37

HIAWATHA AND MUDIEKEEWIS 2

Out of childhood into manhood Now had grown my Hiawatha, Skilled in all the craft of hunters, <sup>2</sup> Hiawatha is the son of Mudjekeewis the West Wind and Wenonah, daughter of Nokomis, the child of the Moon. Wenonah, deserted by Mudjekeewis, has died of sorrow, and Hiawatha is cared for by his grandmother, near the shores of Gitche Gumee—Lake Superior.

40

50

60

70

80 an 100

110

Learned in all the lore of old men, In all youthful sports and pastimes, In all manly arts and labors.

Swift of foot was Hiawatha;
He could shoot an arrow from him,
And run forward with such fleetness,
That the arrow fell behind him!

Strong of arm was Hiawatha;
He could shoot ten arrows upward,
Shoot them with such strength and swiftness,
That the tenth had left the bow-string
Fre the first to earth had fallen!

He had mittens, Minjekahwun.

Magic mittens made of deer-skin;

When upon his hands he wore them,

He could smite the rocks asunder,

He could grind them into powder,

He had moccasins enchanted,

Magic moccasins of deer-skin;

When he bound them round his ankles,

When upon his feet he tied them,

At each stride a mile he measured!

Much he questioned old Nokomis
Of his father Mudjekeewis;
Learned from her the fatal secret
Of the beauty of his mother,
Of the falsehood of his father;
And his heart was hot within him,
Like a living coal his heart was.

Then he said to old Nokomis, "I will go to Mudjekeewis, See how fares it with my father, At the doorways of the West-Wind, At the portals of the Sunset!"

From his lodge went Hiawatha,
Dressed for travel, armed for hunting;
Dressed in deer-skin shirt and leggings,
Richly wrought with quills and wampum; <sup>1</sup>
On his head his eagle feathers,
Round his waist his belt of wampum,
In his hand his bow of ash-wood,
Strung with sinews of the reindeer;
In his quiver oaken arrows,
Tipped with jasper, winged with feathers;
With his mittens, Minjekahwun,
With his moccasins enchanted.

Warning said the old Nokomis, "Go not forth, O Hiawatha! To the kingdom of the West-Wind, To the realms of Mudjekeewis, Lest he harm you with his magic, Lest he kill you with his cunning!"

But the fearless Hiawatha Heeded not her woman's warning; Forth he strode into the forest, At each stride a mile he measured; Lurid seemed the sky above him, Lurid seemed the earth beneath him, Hot and close the air around him, Filled with smoke and fiery vapors, As of burning woods and prairies. For his heart was hot within him, Like a living coal his heart was.

So he journeyed westward, westward, Left the fleetest deer behind him, Left the antelope and bison; Crossed the rushing Esconaba, Crossed the mighty Mississippi, Passed the Mountains of the Prairie, Passed the land of Crows and Foxes. Passed the dwellings of the Blackfeet, Came unto the Rocky Mountains, To the kingdom of the West-Wind, Where upon the gusty summits Sat the ancient Mudjekeewis. Ruler of the winds of heaven.

Filled with awe was Hiawatha At the aspect of his father. On the air about him wildly Tossed and streamed his cloudy tresses, Gleamed like drifting snow his tresses, Glared like Ishkoodah, the comet. Like the star with fiery tresses.

Filled with joy was Mudjekeewis When he looked on Hiawatha, Saw his youth rise up before him In the face of Hiawatha, Saw the beauty of Wenonah From the grave rise up before him.

"Welcome!" said he, "Hiawatha,
To the kingdom of the West-Wind!
Long have I been waiting for you!
Youth is lovely, age is lonely,
Youth is fiery, age is frosty;
You bring back the days departed,
You bring back my youth of passion,
And the beautiful Wenonah!"

Many days they talked together. Questioned, listened, waited, answered; Much the mighty Mudjekeewis Boasted of his ancient prowess, Of his perilous adventures. His indomitable courage, His invulnerable body.

Patiently sat Hiawatha, Listening to his father's boasting; With a smile he sat and listened, Uttered neither threat nor menace, Neither word nor look betrayed him. But his heart was hot within him, Like a living coal his heart was.

&lt;sup>1</sup> small shells strung together like beads and used for decoration and sometimes as money

130

140

150

160

170

Then he said, "O Mudjekeewis, Is there nothing that can harm you? Nothing that you are afraid of?" And the mighty Mudjekeewis, Grand and gracious in his boasting, Answered, saying, "There is nothing, Nothing but the black rock yonder, Nothing but the fatal Wawbeek!"

And he looked at Hiawatha
With a wise look and benignant,
With a countenance paternal,
Looked with pride upon the beauty
Of his tall and graceful figure,
Saying, "O my Hiawatha!
Is there anything can harm you?
Anything you are afraid of?"

But the wary Hiawatha
Paused awhile, as if uncertain,
Held his peace, as if resolving,
And then answered, "There is nothing,
Nothing but the bulrush yonder,
Nothing but the great Apukwa!"

And as Mudjekeewis, rising, Stretched his hand to pluck the bulrush, Hiawatha cried in terror, Cried in well-dissembled terror.

"Kago! ¹ kago! do not touch it!"
"Ah, kaween!" said Mudjekeewis,
"No indeed, I will not touch it!"

Then they talked of other matters; First of Hiawatha's brothers, First of Wabun, of the East-Wind, Of the South-Wind, Shawondasee, Of the North, Kabibonokka; Then of Hiawatha's mother, Of the beautiful Wenonah, Of her birth upon the meadow, Of her death, as old Nokomis Had remembered and related.

And he cried, "O Mudjekeewis, It was you who killed Wenonah, Took her young life and her beauty, Broke the Lily of the Prairie, Trampled it beneath your footsteps; You confess it!" And the mighty Mudjekeewis Tossed upon the wind his tresses, Bowed his hoary head in anguish, With a silent nod assented.

Then up started Hiawatha, And with threatening look and gesture Laid his hand upon the black rock, On the fatal Wawbeek laid it, With his mittens, Minjekahwun, Rent the jutting crag asunder, Smote and crushed it into fragments, Hurled them madly at his father, The remorseful Mudjekeewis, For his heart was hot within him, Like a living coal his heart was.

But the ruler of the West-Wind,
Blew the fragments backward from him,
With the breathing of his nostrils,
With the tempest of his anger,
Blew them back at his assailant;
Seized the bulrush, the Apukwa,
Dragged it with its roots and fibers
From the margin of the meadow,
From its ooze, the giant bulrush;
Long and loud laughed Hiawatha!

180

190

200

210

220

Then began the deadly conflict, Hand to hand among the mountains; From his eyry screamed the eagle, The Keneu, the great war-eagle, Sat upon the crags around them, Wheeling flapped his wings above them.

Like a tall tree in the tempest Bent and lashed the giant bulrush; And in masses huge and heavy Crashing fell the fatal Wawbeek; Till the earth shook with the tumult And confusion of the battle, And the air was full of shoutings, And the thunder of the mountains, Starting, answered, "Baim-wawa!" 2

Back retreated Mudjekeewis,
Rushing westward o'er the mountains,
Stumbling westward down the mountains,
Three whole days retreated fighting,
Still pursued by Hiawatha
To the doorways of the West-Wind,
To the portals of the Sunset,
To the earth's remotest border,
Where into the empty spaces
Sinks the sun, as a flamingo
Drops into her nest at nightfall
In the melancholy marshes.

"Hold!" at length cried Mudjekeewis, "Hold, my son, my Hiawatha!

'Tis impossible to kill me, For you cannot kill the immortal.

I have put you to this trial,
But to know and prove your courage;

Now receive the prize of valor!

"Go back to your home and people,
Live among them, toil among them,
Cleanse the earth from all that harms it,
Clear the fishing-grounds and rivers,
Slay all monsters and magicians,
All the Wendigoes, the giants,
All the serpents, the Kenabeeks,
As I slew the Mishe-Mokwa,
Slew the Great Bear of the mountains.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Kago meant, "do not touch it"; Kaw, "no"; and Kaween, "no indeed."

<sup>2</sup> the sound of the thunder

240

260

280

"And at last when Death draws near you. When the awful eyes of Pauguk Glare upon you in the darkness. I will share my kingdom with you. Ruler shall you be thenceforward Of the Northwest-Wind, Keewaydin, Of the home-wind, the Keewaydin,"

Thus was fought that famous battle In the dreadful days of Shah-shah, 1 In the days long since departed. In the kingdom of the West-Wind. Still the hunter sees its traces Scattered far o'er hill and valley: Sees the giant bulrush growing By the ponds and water-courses. Sees the masses of the Wawbeek Lying still in every valley.

Homeward now went Hiawatha: Pleasant was the landscape round him, Pleasant was the air above him. For the bitterness of anger 249 Had departed wholly from him. From his brain the thought of vengeance. From his heart the burning fever.

Only once his pace he slackened. Only once he paused or halted, Paused to purchase heads of arrows Of the ancient Arrow-maker, In the land of the Dacotahs. Where the Falls of Minnehaha 2 Flash and gleam among the oak-trees. Laugh and leap into the valley.

There the ancient Arrow-maker Made his arrow-heads of sandstone. Arrow-heads of chalcedony. Arrow-heads of flint and jasper, Smoothed and sharpened at the edges, Hard and polished, keen and costly.

With him dwelt his dark-eyed daughter, Wayward as the Minnehaha. With her moods of shade and sunshine. Eyes that smiled and frowned alternate, 270 Feet as rapid as the river, Tresses flowing like the water, And as musical a laughter; And he named her from the river, From the water-fall he named her, Minnehaha, Laughing Water.

Was it then for heads of arrows, Arrow-heads of chalcedony, Arrow-heads of flint and jasper, That my Hiawatha halted

In the land of the Dacotahs? Was it not to see the maiden, See the face of Laughing Water

<sup>1</sup> long ago <sup>2</sup> The beautiful Falls of Minnehaha (laughing water) are in Minnesota, near St. Paul and Minneapolis, in a small tributary to the Mississippi.

Peeping from behind the curtain. Hear the rustling of her garments From behind the waving curtain. As one sees the Minnehaha Gleaming, glancing through the branches. As one hears the Laughing Water From behind its screen of branches?

Who shall say what thoughts and visions Fill the fiery brains of young men? Who shall say what dreams of beauty Filled the heart of Hiawatha? All he told to old Nokomis. When he reached the lodge at sunset, Was the meeting with his father. Was his fight with Mudiekeewis: Not a word he said of arrows. Not a word of Laughing Water.

1854-55

1855

10

20

VICTOR GALBRAITH 3

Under the walls of Monterey At daybreak the bugles began to play. Victor Galbraith! In the mist of the morning damp and gray. These were the words they seemed to say: "Come forth to thy death. Victor Galbraith!"

Forth he came, with a martial tread; Firm was his step, erect his head; Victor Galbraith. He who so well the bugle played, Could not mistake the words it said: "Come forth to thy death, Victor Galbraith!'

He looked at the earth, he looked at the sky, He looked at the files of musketry, Victor Galbraith!

And he said, with a steady voice and eye, "Take good aim; I am ready to die!" Thus challenges death

Victor Galbraith.

Twelve fiery tongues flashed straight and red, Six leaden balls on their errand sped: Victor Galbraith Falls to the ground, but he is not dead;

His name was not stamped on those balls of lead, 4

And they only scath Victor Galbraith.

3 He was a bugler in a regiment of cavalry in Mexico, and was sentenced to death for some breach of discipline.

4 According to superstition a bullet will not kill a soldier unless his name is written on it.

10

Three balls are in his breast and brain,
But he rises out of the dust again,
Victor Galbraith!
The water he drinks has a bloody stain;
"O kill me, and put me out of my pain!"
In his agony prayeth
Victor Galbraith.

Forth dart once more those tongues of flame,
And the bugler has died a death of shame,
Victor Galbraith!

His soul has gone back to whence it came,
And no one answers to the name,
When the Sergeant saith,
"Victor Galbraith!"

Under the walls of Monterey
By night a bugle is heard to play,
Victor Galbraith!
Through the mist of the valley damp and gray
The sentinels hear the sound, and say,

"That is the wraith
Of Victor Galbraith!"

1855

MY LOST YOUTH

Often I think of the beautiful town <sup>1</sup>
That is seated by the sea;
Often in thought go up and down
The pleasant streets of that dear old town,
And my youth comes back to me.
And a verse of a Lapland song
Is haunting my memory still:
"A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts." <sup>2</sup>

And catch, in sudden gleams,
The sheen of the far-surrounding seas.
And islands that were the Hesperides <sup>3</sup>
Of all my boyish dreams.
And the burden of that old song,
It murmurs and whispers still:
"A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts."

I remember the black wharves and the slips,

I can see the shadowy lines of its trees,

I remember the black wharves and the slips, And the sea-tides tossing free; And Spanish sailors with bearded lips,

Portland, Maine, Longfellow's birthplace
 The lines are in a nuptial song in a Latin treatise on Lapland, published in 1674, by Johannes Scheffer, Professor at Upsala.
 mythological maidens, guardians of the golden apples of the sunset: hence, loosely, the western islands where they lived

And the beauty and mystery of the ships,
And the magic of the sea.
And the voice of that wayward song
Is singing and saying still:
"A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts."

I remember the bulwarks by the shore,
And the fort upon the hill;
The sunrise gun, with its hollow roar,
The drum-beat repeated o'er and o'er,
And the bugle wild and shrill.
And the music of that old song
Throbs in my memory still:
"A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts."

thoughts.'

I remember the sea-fight far away, <sup>4</sup>
How it thundered o'er the tide!
And the dead captains, as they lay
In their graves, o'erlooking the tranquil bay
Where they in battle died.
And the sound of that mournful song
Goes through me with a thrill:
"A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long

I can see the breezy dome of groves,
The shadows of Deering's Woods;
And the friendships old and the early loves
Come back with a Sabbath sound, as of doves
In quiet neighborhoods.

And the verse of that sweet old song,
It flutters and murmurs still:

"A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long
thoughts."

I remember the gleams and glooms that dart
Across the school-boy's brain;
The song and the silence in the heart,
That in part are prophecies, and in part
Are longings wild and vain.
And the voice of that fitful song
Sings on, and is never still:

"A boy's will is the wind's will,
And the thoughts of youth are long, long
thoughts."

<sup>4</sup> The reference is to an engagement, between the American brig Enterprise and the English brig Boxer, which occurred off Portland in 1813. The Enterprise conquered, but the captains of both ships were killed and were buried side by side on shore.

10

20

30

10

50

There are things of which I may not speak: There are dreams that cannot die: There are thoughts that make the strong heart weak. And bring a pallor into the cheek.

And a mist before the eve. And the words of that fatal song

Come over me like a chill: "A boy's will is the wind's will.

And the thoughts of vouth are long, long thoughts."

Strange to me now are the forms I meet When I visit the dear old town: But the native air is pure and sweet. And the trees that o'ershadow each well-known

As they balance up and down. Are singing the beautiful song. Are sighing and whispering still: "A bov's will is the wind's will, And the thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts."

And Deering's Woods are fresh and fair. And with joy that is almost pain My heart goes back to wander there. And among the dreams of the days that were. I find my lost youth again. And the strange and beautiful song. The groves are repeating it still: "A boy's will is the wind's will, And the thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts." 1855 1855

THE DISCOVERER OF THE NORTH CAPE

A LEAF FROM KING ALFRED'S Orosius 1

Othere, the old sea-captain, Who dwelt in Helgoland, 2 To King Alfred, the Lover of Truth, Brought a snow-white walrus-tooth, Which he held in his brown right hand.

His figure was tall and stately, Like a boy's his eye appeared;

1 Alfred, king of the West Saxons 871-901 and a lover Alfred, king of the West Saxons $71-901 and a lover of learning, not only translated the history of the world written by Orosius, a Spanish monk of the fifth century, but also added to it. He relates among other things what was told him by Ohthere (or Ottar), a Norwegian sailor who about 870 rounded the North Cape and discovered the White Sea.
-evidently not Helvoland, the island off the coast of Schleswig-Holstein (cf. Il. 26, 27), but possibly Hel o Island on the Norway coast southwest of North Cape

His hair was vellow as hav. But threads of a silvery gray Gleamed in his tawny beard.

Hearty and hale was Othere. His cheek had the color of oak; With a kind of laugh in his speech. Like the sea-tide on a beach. As unto the King he spoke.

And Alfred, King of the Saxons, Had a book upon his knees, And wrote down the wondrous tale Of him who was first to sail Into the Arctic seas.

"So far I live to the northward. No man lives north of me: To the east are wild mountain-chains. And beyond them meres and plains: To the westward all is sea.

"So far I live to the northward. From the harbor of Skeringes-hale, 3 If you only sailed by day, With a fair wind all the way, More than a month would you sail.

"I own six hundred reindeer. With sheep and swine beside: I have tribute from the Finns, Whalebone and reindeer-skins. And ropes of walrus-hide.

"I plowed the land with horses, But my heart was ill at ease, For the old seafaring men Came to me now and then, With their sagas of the seas;—

"Of Iceland and of Greenland, And the stormy Hebrides. And the undiscovered deep;-Oh. I could not eat nor sleep For thinking of those seas.

"To the northward stretched the desert. How far I fain would know: So at last I sallied forth, And three days sailed due north, As far as the whale-ships go.

"To the west of me was the ocean, To the right the desolate shore, But I did not slacken sail For the walrus or the whale, Till after three days more.

3 in the Gulf of Christiania

100

"The days grew longer and longer, Till they became as one. And northward through the haze I saw the sullen blaze Of the red midnight sun.

"And then uprose before me, Upon the water's edge. The huge and haggard shape Of that unknown North Cape. Whose form is like a wedge.

"The sea was rough and stormy, The tempest howled and wailed. And the sea-fog, like a ghost, Haunted that dreary coast. But onward still I sailed.

"Four days I steered to eastward. Four days without a night: Round in a fiery ring Went the great sun, O King, With red and lurid light."

Here Alfred, King of the Saxons, Ceased writing for a while: And raised his eyes from his book, With a strange and puzzled look, And an incredulous smile.

But Othere, the old sea-captain, He neither paused nor stirred, Till the King listened, and then Once more took up his pen, And wrote down every word.

"And now the land," said Othere, "Bent southward suddenly, And I followed the curving shore And ever southward bore Into a nameless sea.

"And there we hunted the walrus. The narwhale, 1 and the seal; Ha! 'twas a noble game! And like the lightning's flame Flew our harpoons of steel.

"There were six of us all together, Norsemen of Helgoland; In two days and no more We killed of them threescore, And dragged them to the strand!"

<sup>1</sup> an animal resembling a small whale and having a tusk projecting horizontally forward from its upper jaw

Here Alfred the Truth-Teller Suddenly closed his book. And lifted his blue eves With doubt and strange surmise Depicted in their look.

And Othere the old sea-captain Stared at him wild and weird. Then smiled, till his shining teeth Gleamed white from underneath His tawny, quivering beard.

And to the King of the Saxons, In witness of the truth, Raising his noble head. He stretched his brown hand, and said, "Behold this walrus-tooth!" 1857

SANDALPHON 2

Have you read in the Talmud 3 of old, In the Legends the Rabbins have told Of the limitless realms of the air, Have you read it.—the marvelous story Of Sandalphon, the Angel of Glory, Sandalphon, the Angel of Prayer?

How, erect, at the outermost gates Of the City Celestial he waits, With his feet on the ladder of light. That, crowded with angels unnumbered, By Jacob was seen as he slumbered 4 Alone in the desert at night?

The Angels of Wind and of Fire Chant only one hymn, and expire With the song's irresistible stress: Expire in their rapture and wonder, As harp-strings are broken asunder By music they throb to express.

But serene in the rapturous throng, Unmoved by the rush of the song, With eyes unimpassioned and slow, Among the dead angels, the deathless Sandalphon stands listening breathless To sounds that ascend from below:-

From the spirits on earth that adore, From the souls that entreat and implore

<sup>2</sup> In Jewish tradition, Sandalphon, who stands on earth but whose head reaches heaven, is an angel who weaves into garlands the prayers of the Israelites. He is not one of the multitudes of angels created each day who sing one song and then perish, but has existed since the first creation. Cf. Poe's "Israfel," p. 284.
<sup>3</sup> the book of Jewish commentary upon the Old Testament

ment

Genesis xxviii, 12

110

10

20

50

20

30

In the fervor and passion of prayer; From the hearts that are broken with losses. And weary with dragging the crosses Too heavy for mortals to bear. ٥n

And he gathers the prayers as he stands. And they change into flowers in his hands. Into garlands of purple and red: And beneath the great arch of the portal, Through the streets of the City Immortal Is wafted the fragrance they shed.

It is but a legend, I know,-A fable, a phantom, a show, Of the ancient Rabbinical lore: Yet the old medieval tradition. The beautiful, strange superstition, But haunts me and holds me the more.

When I look from my window at night. And the welkin above is all white, All throbbing and panting with stars. Among them majestic is standing Sandalphon the angel, expanding His pinions in nebulous bars.

And the legend, I feel, is a part Of the hunger and thirst of the heart, The frenzy and fire of the brain, That grasps at the fruitage forbidden, The golden pomegranates of Eden, To quiet its fever and pain. 1857

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR

Between the dark and the daylight, When the night is beginning to lower, Comes a pause in the day's occupations, That is known as the Children's Hour.

I hear in the chamber above me The patter of little feet, The sound of a door that is opened, And voices soft and sweet.

From my study I see in the lamplight, Descending the broad hall stair, Grave Alice, and laughing Allegra, And Edith with golden hair.

A whisper, and then a silence: Yet I know by their merry eyes They are plotting and planning together To take me by surprise.

A sudden rush from the stairway. A sudden raid from the hall! By three doors left unguarded They enter my castle wall!

They climb up into my turret O'er the arms and back of my chair: If I try to escape, they surround me: They seem to be everywhere.

They almost devour me with kisses. Their arms about me entwine, Till I think of the Bishop of Bingen In his Mouse-Tower on the Rhine! 1

Do you think, O blue-eyed banditti, Because you have scaled the wall. Such an old mustache as I am Is not a match for you all!

I have you fast in my fortress, And will not let you depart, But put you down into the dungeon In the round-tower of my heart.

And there will I keep you forever, Yes, forever and a day, Till the walls shall crumble to ruin. And molder in dust away. 1859

1860

39

10

A DAY OF SUNSHINE

O gift of God! O perfect day: Whereon shall no man work, but play; Whereon it is enough for me, Not to be doing, but to be!

Through every fiber of my brain, Through every nerve, through every vein, I feel the electric thrill, the touch Of life, that seems almost too much.

I hear the wind among the trees Playing celestial symphonies; I see the branches downward bent, Like keys of some great instrument.

And over me unrolls on high The splendid scenery of the sky, Where through a sapphire sea the sun Sails like a golden galleon, 2

Legend says that Archbishop Hatto of the roth century, because in time of famine he had burned poor people caught stealing grain, was eaten by mice, although he had tried to escape them by building a high tower. Cf. Southey's poem "God's Judgment on a Wicked Bishop."
an ancient Spanish ship often carrying treasure

Towards yonder cloud-land in the West. Towards yonder Islands of the Blest, Whose steep sierra far uplifts Its craggy summits white with drifts.

Blow, winds! and waft through all the rooms The snow-flakes of the cherry-blooms! Blow, winds! and bend within my reach The fiery blossoms of the peach!

O Life and Love! O happy throng Of thoughts, whose only speech is song! O heart of man! canst thou not be Blithe as the air is, and as free? 1860

From TALES OF A WAYSIDE INN 1

PART FIRST

PRELUDE

THE WAYSIDE INN

One autumn night, in Sudbury town, Across the meadows bare and brown. The windows of the wayside inn Gleamed red with fire-light through the leaves Of woodbine, hanging from the eaves Their crimson curtains rent and thin.

As ancient is this hostelry
As any in the land may be.
Built in the old Colonial day,
When men lived in a grander way,
With ampler hospitality;
A kind of old Hobgoblin Hall,
Now somewhat fallen to decay,
With weather-stains upon the wall,
And stairways worn, and crazy doors,
And creaking and uneven floors,
And chimneys huge, and tiled and tall.

A region of repose it seems,
A place of slumber and of dreams,
Remote among the wooded hills!
For there no noisy railway speeds,
Its torch-race scattering smoke and gleeds; <sup>2</sup>
But noon and night, the panting teams
Stop under the great oaks, that throw
Tangles of light and shade below,
On roofs and doors and window-sills.

2 burning coals

Across the road the barns display
Their lines of stalls, their mows of hay,
Through the wide doors the breezes blow,
The wattled cocks strut to and fro,
And, half effaced by rain and shine.
The Red Horse prances on the sign.
Round this old-fashioned, quaint abode
Deep silence reigned, save when a gust
Went rushing down the county road,
And skeletons of leaves, and dust,
A moment quickened by its breath,
Shuddered and danced their dance of death,
And through the ancient oaks o'erhead
Mysterious voices moaned and fled.

But from the parlor of the inn A pleasant murmur smote the ear, Like water rushing through a weir: Oft interrupted by the din Of laughter and of loud applause, And, in each intervening pause, The music of a violin. The fire-light, shedding over all The splendor of its ruddy glow, 50 Filled the whole parlor large and low: It gleamed on wainscot and on wall, It touched with more than wonted grace Fair Princess Mary's pictured face; It bronzed the rafters overhead. On the old spinet's ivory keys It played inaudible melodies. It crowned the somber clock with flame, The hands, the hours, the maker's name, And painted with a livelier red 60 The Landlord's coat-of-arms again: And, flashing on the window-pane, Emblazoned with its light and shade The jovial rimes, that still remain, Writ near a century ago By the great Major Molineaux, Whom Hawthorne has immortal made. 3

Before the blazing fire of wood
Erect the rapt musician <sup>4</sup> stood;
And ever and anon he bent
His head upon his instrument,
And seemed to listen, till he caught
Confessions of its secret thought.—

<sup>3</sup> In his tale "My Kinsman, Major Molineux," in The Snow Image and Other Twice-Told Tales; the lines on the window with the name Wm. Molineux, Jr., Esq., June 24, 1774, are:

70

What do you think?
Here is a good drink
Perhaps you may not know it;
If not in haste
Do stop and taste!
You very merry folk will show it.

4 Ole Bull, 1810-1880, the Norwegian violinist

Longfellow, grouping the tellers of his tales after the manner of Boccaccio and Chaucer, brings them together in the Red-Horse Inn of Sudbury, Mass., about twenty miles west of Boston. The same family, the Howes, had kept the inn for one hundred and seventy-five years. In stage-coaching times it had been the regular stopping place for all travelers going westward.

RΛ

90

The joy, the triumph, the lament, The exultation and the pain; Then, by the magic of his art, He soothed the throbbings of its heart, And lulled it into peace again.

Around the fireside at their ease There sat a group of friends, entranced With the delicious melodies: Who from the far-off noisy town Had to the wayside inn come down To rest beneath its old oak trees. The fire-light on their faces glanced. Their shadows on the wainscot danced. And, though of different lands and speech, Each had his tale to tell, and each Was anxious to be pleased and please. And while the sweet musician plays, Let me in outline sketch them all. Perchance uncouthly as the blaze With its uncertain touch portrays Their shadowy semblance on the wall.

But first the Landlord will I trace; Grave in his aspect and attire: A man of ancient pedigree, A Tustice of the Peace was he. Known in all Sudbury as "The Squire." Proud was he of his name and race. 100 Of old Sir William and Sir Hugh, And in the parlor, full in view, His coat-of-arms, well framed and glazed, Upon the wall in colors blazed; He beareth gules 1 upon his shield, A chevron argent 2 in the field. With three wolf's heads, and for the crest 3 A Wyvern part-per-pale addressed Upon a helmet barred; below The scroll reads, "By the name of Howe." 110 And over this, no longer bright. Though glimmering with a latent light. Was hung the sword his grandsire bore In the rebellious days of yore, Down there at Concord in the fight. 4

A youth was there, of quiet ways, A Student <sup>5</sup> of old books and days, To whom all tongues and lands were known, And yet a lover of his own;

1 red
2 silver chevron
3 "A device supported by a wreath or coronet displayed above the shield; the description of the crest here is that of a helmet surmounted by a winged dragon (Wyvern), the whole appearing in a vertical bar through the middle of the shield (part-per-pale)." Quoted from The Lake Classics edition of the Talcs, edited by J. R. Powell.

* April 19, 1775 * Henry Ware Wales, a scholar and traveler

With many a social virtue graced. 120 And yet a friend of solitude: A man of such a genial mood The heart of all things he embraced. And yet of such fastidious taste. He never found the best too good. Books were his passion and delight. And in his upper room at home Stood many a rare and sumptuous tome. In vellum bound, with gold bedight, Great volumes garmented in white. 130 Recalling Florence, Pisa, Rome. He loved the twilight that surrounds The border-land of old romance; Where glitter hauberk, helm, and lance, And banner waves, and trumpet sounds, And ladies ride with hawk on wrist. And mighty warriors sweep along, Magnified by the purple mist, The dusk of centuries and of song. The chronicles of Charlemagne. 140 Of Merlin and the Mort d'Arthure, Mingled together in his brain With tales of Flores and Blanchefleur, Sir Ferumbras, Sir Eglamour, Sir Launcelot, Sir Morgadour, Sir Guv. Sir Bevis. Sir Gawain. 6

A young Sicilian, 7 too was there; In sight of Etna born and bred. Some breath of its volcanic air Was glowing in his heart and brain, 150 And, being rebellious to his liege, After Palermo's fatal siege. Across the western seas he fled. In good King Bomba's s happy reign. His face was like a summer night, All flooded with a dusky light; His hands were small; his teeth shone white As sea-shells, when he smiled or spoke; His sinews supple and strong as oak; Clean shaven was he as a priest, 160 Who at the mass on Sunday sings, Save that upon his upper lip His beard, a good palm's length at least, Level and pointed at the tip, Shot sideways, like a swallow's wings. The poets read he o'er and o'er, And most of all the Immortal Four 9

6 All these are heroes or heroines of medieval romance.
7 Luigi Monti, an intimate friend of Longfellow's;
Palermo fell into the hands of the French in 1840.

1849.
 a nickname given Ferdinand II, king of the Two Sicilies, because of his bombardment of Messina Dante, 1265-1321; Petrarch, 1304-1374; Tasso, 1544-1595; Ariosto, 1474-1533; Boccaccio, 1313-1375, laid the scene of his group of stories, the Decameron, in Florence and its environs. Fiesole is a town three miles from Florence.

180

190

200

210

Of Italy; and next to those, The story-telling bard of prose. Who wrote the joyous Tuscan tales Of the Decameron, that make Fiesole's green hills and vales Remembered for Boccaccio's sake. Much too of music was his thought: The melodies and measures fraught With sunshine and the open air. Of vineyards and the singing sea Of his beloved Sicily: And much it pleased him to peruse The songs of the Sicilian muse.-Bucolic songs by Meli sung 1 In the familiar peasant tongue, That made men say, "Behold! once more The pitying gods to earth restore Theocritus of Syracuse!"2

A Spanish Tew 3 from Alicant With aspect grand and grave was there; Vender of silks and fabrics rare. And attar of rose from the Levant. Like an old Patriarch be appeared, Abraham or Isaac, or at least Some later Prophet or High-Priest; With lustrous eyes, and olive skin, And, wildly tossed from cheeks and chin. The tumbling cataract of his beard. His garments breathed a spicy scent Of cinnamon and sandal blent, Like the soft aromatic gales That meet the mariner, who sails Through the Moluccas and the seas That wash the shores of Celebes. 4 All stories that recorded are By Pierre Alphonse 5 he knew by heart, And it was rumored he could say The parables of Sandabar, 6 And all the Fables of Pilpay, 7 Or if not all, the greater part! Well versed was he in Hebrew books Talmud and Targum, and the lore Of Kabala; 8 and evermore There was a mystery in his looks; His eyes seemed gazing far away,

The Sicilian, Meli, 1740-1815, wrote poetry that was genuinely pastoral (bucolic) in its reflection of simple shepherd life.
 a pastoral poet of Sicily in the third century B.C.
 A Boston merchant, Israel Edrehi; Alicante is a

As if in vision or in trance He heard the solemn sackbut 9 plav. And saw the Tewish maidens dance.

A Theologian, 10 from the school Of Cambridge, on the Charles was there; Skilful alike with tongue and pen. He preached to all men everywhere The Gospel of the Golden Rule, The New Commandment given to men. Thinking the deed, and not the creed, Would help us in our utmost need. With reverent feet the earth he trod. Nor banished nature from his plan. But studied still with deep research To build the Universal Church.

Lofty as in the love of God.

And ample as the wants of man.

A Poet, 11 too, was there, whose verse 230 Was tender, musical, and terse; The inspiration, the delight, The gleam, the glory, the swift flight, Of thoughts so sudden, that they seem The revelations of a dream. All these were his; but with them came No envy of another's fame; He did not find his sleep less sweet For music in some neighboring street, Nor rustling hear in every breeze 240 The laurels of Miltiades. 12 Honor and blessings on his head While living, good report when dead, Who, not too eager for renown, Accepts, but does not clutch, the crown!

Last the Musician, as he stood Illumined by that fire of wood; Fair-haired, blue-eyed, his aspect blithe, His figure tall and straight and lithe, And every feature of his face Revealing his Norwegian race; A radiance, streaming from within, Around his eyes and forehead beamed, The Angel with the violin, Painted by Raphael, 13 he seemed. He lived in that ideal world Whose language is not speech, but song: Around him evermore the throng Of elves and sprites their dances whirled:

220

250 province in Spain.

* islands of the Dutch East Indies

* a learned Spanish Jew of the 12th century

a learned Spanish Jew of the 12th century
 a Hebrew tales of the middle ages or more correctly Kalilah and Dimnah, a Sanskrit work of the 4th century B C.
 The Talmud contains the Jewish traditional law; the Targum is the Chaldaic version of the Old Testament; the Kabba'a, of the tenth century, is a mystic explanation of the Hebrew religion.

a musical instrument
 Daniel Treadwell, a professor at Harvard
 Thomas William Parsons, 1819-1892, an American poet and translator of pa ts of Dante
 The Greek general Themistocles was jealous of Miltiades who won the battle of Marathon. Plutarch says "the trophies of Miltiades robbed Themistocles of s'eep."
 the great Italian painter, 1882-1892.

<sup>13</sup> the great Italian painter, 1483-1520

280

290

300

The Strömkarl 1 sang, the cataract hurled Its headlong waters from the height: And mingled in the wild delight The scream of sea-birds in their flight. The rumor of the forest trees. The plunge of the implacable seas. The tumult of the wind at night, Voices of eld, like trumpets blowing. Old ballads, and wild melodies Through mist and darkness pouring forth. Like Elivagar's 2 river flowing Out of the glaciers of the North.

The instrument on which he played Was in Cremona's 3 workshop's made, By a great master of the past. Ere yet was lost the art divine; Fashioned of maple and of pine, That in Tyrolian forests vast Had rocked and wrestled with the blast: Exquisite was it in design, Perfect in each minutest part. A marvel of the lutist's art; And in its hollow chamber, thus, The maker from whose hands it came Had written his unrivaled name.-"Antonius Stradivarius."

And when he played, the atmosphere Was filled with magic, and the ear Caught echoes of that Harp of Gold, 4 Whose music had so weird a sound, The hunted stag forgot to bound, The leaping rivulet backward rolled, The birds came down from bush and tree. The dead came from beneath the sea, The maiden to the harper's knee!

The music ceased; the applause was loud, The pleased musician smiled and bowed; The wood-fire clapped its hands of flame, The shadows on the wainscot stirred, And from the harpsichord there came A ghostly murmur of acclaim, A sound like that sent down at night By birds of passage in their flight, From the remotest distance heard.

Then silence followed; then began A clamor for the Landlord's tale,—

<sup>1</sup> In Norse mythology, the spirit of a river; he plays on a five-stringed viol and sometimes teaches his art to mortals.

<sup>2</sup> Ten rivers, the Elivagar, flowed from the spring Hvergelmir in the midst of Nifiheim, the world of fog and cold in Norse mythology.

<sup>3</sup> a city of Lombardy, Italy, noted for its violin makers, among them Stradivarius, 1644?-1737

<sup>4</sup> Orpheus, the Greek, by the music of his golden lyre enticed even trees and stones to follow him.

enticed even trees and stones to follow him.

The story promised them of old, 260 They said, but always left untold: And he, although a bashful man, And all his courage seemed to fail, Finding excuse of no avail. Yielded; and thus the story ran. 1862

309 1863

THE LANDLORD'S TALE PAUL REVERE'S RIDE 5

Listen, my children, and you shall hear Of the midnight ride of Paul Revere, On the eighteenth of April, in Seventy-five; Hardly a man is now alive Who remembers that famous day and year.

He said to his friend, "If the British march By land or sea from the town tonight, Hang a lantern aloft in the belfry arch Of the North Church tower as a signal light,-One, if by land, and two, if by sea; And I on the opposite shore will be, Ready to ride and spread the alarm Through every Middlesex village and farm, For the country folk to be up and to arm."

Then he said, "Good night!" and with muffled

Silently rowed to the Charlestown shore, Just as the moon rose over the bay, Where swinging wide at her moorings lay The Somerset, British man-of-war; 20 A phantom ship, with each mast and spar Across the moon like a prison bar, And a huge black hulk that was magnified By its own reflection in the tide.

Meanwhile, his friend, through alley and street, Wanders and watches with eager ears, Till in the silence around him he hears The muster of men at the barrack door, The sound of arms, and the tramp of feet, And the measured tread of the grenadiers, Marching down to their boats on the shore.

Then he climbed the tower of the Old North Church.

By the wooden stairs, with stealthy tread,

<sup>5</sup> Paul Revere, 1735-1818, rode from Boston to Lexington, in Middlesex county, on the night of Apiil 18, 1775, to summon the militia. Longfellow believed that the lanterns—signals indicating that the British had left Boston for Concord—were hung in Christ Church, popularly called North Church, which still stands. Possibly they were hung, rather, in the North Meeting House in North Square, destroyed in the siege of Boston, 1775-1726. 1776.

To the belfry chamber overhead, And startled the pigeons from their perch On the somber rafters, that round him made Masses and moving shapes of shade.-By the trembling ladder, steep and tall, To the highest window in the wall, Where he paused to listen and look down 40 A moment on the roofs of the town. And the moonlight flowing over all. Beneath, in the churchyard, lay the dead, In their night-encampment on the hill. Wrapped in silence so deep and still That he could hear, like a sentinel's tread. The watchful night-wind, as it went Creeping along from tent to tent, And seeming to whisper, "All is well!" A moment only he feels the spell Of the place and the hour, and the secret dread

Of the lonely belfry and the dead; For suddenly all his thoughts are bent On a shadowy something far away, Where the river widens to meet the bay,— A line of black that bends and floats On the rising tide, like a bridge of boats.

Meanwhile, impatient to mount and ride, Booted and spurred, with a heavy stride On the opposite shore walked Paul Revere. Now he patted his horse's side, Now gazed at the landscape far and near, Then, impetuous, stamped the earth, And turned and tightened his saddle-girth; But mostly he watched with eager search The belfry-tower of the Old North Church, As it rose above the graves on the hill, Lonely and spectral and somber and still. And lo! as he looks, on the belfry's height A glimmer, and then a gleam of light! He springs to the saddle, the bridle he turns. But lingers and gazes, till full on his sight A second lamp in the belfry burns!

A hurry of hoofs in a village street, A shape in the moonlight, a bulk in the dark, And beneath, from the pebbles, in passing, a spark

Struck out by a steed flying fearless and fleet: That was all! And yet, through the gloom and the light,

The fate of a nation was riding that night; And the spark struck out by that steed, in his flight,

Kindled the land into flame with its heat. 8

He has left the village and mounted the steep, And beneath him, tranquil and broad and deep, Is the Mystic, 1 meeting the ocean tides; And under the alders, that skirt its edge, Now soft on the sand, now loud on the ledge. Is heard the tramp of his steed as he rides.

It was twelve by the village clock
When he crossed the bridge into Medford

90

He heard the crowing of the cock, And the barking of the farmer's dog, And felt the damp of the river fog, That rises after the sun goes down.

It was one by the village clock
When he galloped into Lexington.
He saw the gilded weathercock
Swim in the moonlight as he passed,
And the meeting-house windows, blank and bare,

Gaze at him with a spectral glare, As if they already stood aghast

At the bloody work they would look upon.

It was two by the village clock
When he came to the bridge in Concord town.
He heard the bleating of the flock,
And the twitter of birds among the trees,
And felt the breath of the morning breeze
Blowing over the meadows brown.
And one <sup>2</sup> was safe and asleep in his bed
Who at the bridge would be first to fall,
Who that day would be lying dead,
Pierced by a British musket-ball.

You know the rest. In the books you have read.

How the British Regulars fired and fled,— How the farmers gave them ball for ball, From behind each fence and farm-yard wall, Chasing the red-coats down the lane, Then crossing the fields to emerge again Under the trees at the turn of the road, And only pausing to fire and load.

So through the night rode Paul Revere; And so through the night went his cry of alarm

To every Middlesex village and farm,—A cry of defiance and not of fear, A voice in the darkness, a knock at the door, And a word that shall echo forevermore! For, borne on the night-wind of the Past, Through all our history, to the last, In the hour of darkness and peril and need,

The Mystic River separates Charlestown from Chelsea.
 Captain Isaac Davis of Acton, a town near Concord, was said to be the first killed in the Concord fight.

The people will waken and listen to hear 129 The hurrying hoof-beats of that steed. And the midnight message of Paul Revere. 1860

THE SICILIAN'S TALE KING ROBERT OF SICILY 1

Robert of Sicily, brother of Pope Urbane 2 And Valmond, Emperor of Allemaine. Appareled in magnificent attire. With retinue of many a knight and squire. On St. John's eve, 4 at vespers, proudly sat And heard the priests chant the Magnificat. 3 And as he listened, o'er and o'er again Repeated, like a burden or refrain, He caught the words, "Deposuit potentes De sede, et exaltavit humiles:" 5 10 And slowly lifting up his kingly head He to a learned clerk beside him said. "What mean these words?" The clerk made answer meet.

"He has put down the mighty from their seat, And has exalted them of low degree." Thereat King Robert muttered scornfully. "'Tis well that such seditious words are sung Only by priests and in the Latin tongue: For unto priests and people be it known, There is no power can push me from my throne!"

And leaning back, he yawned and fell asleep, Lulled by the chant monotonous and deep.

When he awoke, it was already night: The church was empty, and there was no light, Save where the lamps, that glimmered few and faint.

Lighted a little space before some saint. He started from his seat and gazed around, But saw no living thing and heard no sound. He groped towards the door, but it was locked; He cried aloud, and listened, and then knocked. And uttered awful threatenings and complaints, And imprecations upon men and saints. The sounds reëchoed from the roof and walls As if dead priests were laughing in their stalls!

<sup>1</sup> This old legend is said to date back as far as the time of Solomon, and is found in Hindu myths, in the Gesta Romanorum, a collection of medieval tales, and also in modern poetry. See Morris's The Earthly Paradise and Leigh Hunt's A Jar of Honey from Mount Hybla—the last probably being the source of Longfellow's poem.

There were seven popes named Urban during the rith-rith centuries, but no emperor Valmond.

Germany the very of the eve of June 23d the song of the Virgin Mary (Luke i, 46-55).

"My soul doth magnify the Lord. . . He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low decree."

them of low degree.

<sup>6</sup> scholar

At length the sexton, hearing from without The tumult of the knocking and the shout. And thinking thieves were in the house of praver.

Came with his lantern, asking, "Who is there?" Half choked with rage, King Robert fiercely

"Open: 'tis I, the King! Art thou afraid?" The frightened sexton, muttering, with a curse. "This is some drunken vagabond, or worse!" Turned the great key and flung the portal wide; A man rushed by him at a single stride, Haggard, half naked, without hat or cloak, Who neither turned, nor looked at him, nor spoke.

But leaped into the blackness of the night. And vanished like a specter from his sight.

Robert of Sicily, brother of Pope Urbane And Valmond, Emperor of Allemaine, Despoiled of his magnificent attire, Bareheaded, breathless, and besprent with mire. With sense of wrong and outrage desperate, Strode on and thundered at the palace gate; Rushed through the courtyard, thrusting in his

To right and left each seneschal 7 and page, And hurried up the broad and sounding stair, His white face ghastly in the torches' glare. From hall to hall he passed with breathless speed;

Voices and cries he heard, but did not heed, Until at last he reached the banquet-room, Blazing with light, and breathing with perfume.

There on the dais sat another king, Wearing his robes, his crown, his signet-ring. King Robert's self in features, form, and height. But all transfigured with angelic light! It was an Angel; and his presence there With a divine effulgence filled the air, An exaltation, piercing the disguise, 70 Though none the hidden Angel recognize.

A moment speechless, motionless, amazed, The throneless monarch on the Angel gazed, Who met his looks of anger and surprise With the divine compassion of his eyes; Then said, "Who art thou? and why com'st thou here?"

To which King Robert answered with a sneer. "I am the King, and come to claim my own From an impostor, who usurps my throne!" And suddenly, at these audacious words, Up sprang the angry guests, and drew their swords;

<sup>7</sup> high steward

The Angel answered, with unruffled brow, "Nay, not the King, but the King's Jester, thou Henceforth shalt wear the bells and scalloped

And for thy counselor shalt lead an ape; Thou shalt obey my servants when they call, And wait upon my henchmen in the hall!"

Deaf to King Robert's threats and cries and prayers,

They thrust him from the hall and down the stairs:

A group of tittering pages ran before,
And as they opened wide the folding-door,
His heart failed, for he heard, with strange alarms,

The boisterous laughter of the men-at-arms, And all the vaulted chamber roar and ring With the mock plaudits of "Long live the King!"

Next morning, waking with the day's first beam, He said within himself, "It was a dream!"
But the straw rustled as he turned his head, There were the cap and bells beside his bed, Around him rose the bare, discolored walls, Close by, the steeds were champing in their stalls,

And in the corner, a revolting shape, Shivering and chattering sat the wretched ape. It was no dream; the world he loved so much Had turned to dust and ashes at his touch!

Days came and went; and now returned again To Sicily the old Saturnian reign; Under the Angel's governance benign The happy island danced with corn and wine, And deep within the mountain's burning breast Enceladus, the giant, was at rest.

Meanwhile King Robert yielded to his fate, Sullen and silent and disconsolate. Dressed in the motley garb that Jesters wear, With look bewildered and a vacant stare, Close shaven above the ears, as monks are shorn,

By courtiers mocked, by pages laughed to scorn, His only friend the ape, his only food 117 What others left,—he still was unsubdued. And when the Angel met him on his way,

According to Roman mythology, Saturn was one of the most ancient of the gods; deposed by Jupiter, he went to Italy, where he reigned as king. His age was termed golden because as god of harvest he taught the people agriculture and raised them from barbarism to civilization. His wife was Ops, plenty.

One of the hundred armed giants who made war upon the gods: according to some he was buried by Zeus under Mt. Aetna, in Sicily. His movements caused earthquakes. And half in earnest, half in jest, would say, Sternly, though tenderly, that he might feel The velvet scabbard held a sword of steel, "Art thou the King?" the passion of his woe Burst from him in resistless overflow, And, lifting high his forehead, he would fling The haughty answer back, "I am, I am the King!"

Almost three years were ended; when there came

Ambassadors of great repute and name
From Valmond, Emperor of Allemaine, 129
Unto King Robert, saying that Pope Urbane
By letter summoned them forthwith to come
On Holy Thursday to his city of Rome.
The Angel with great joy received his guests,
And gave them presents of embroidered vests,
And velvet mantles with rich ermine lined,
And rings and jewels of the rarest kind.
Then he departed with them o'er the sea
Into the lovely land of Italy,
Whose loveliness was more resplendent made
By the mere passing of that cavalcade, 140
With plumes, and cloaks, and housings, and the stir

Of jeweled bridle and of golden spur.

And lo! among the menials, in mock state,
Upon a piebald steed, with shambling gait,
His cloak of fox-tails flapping in the wind,
The solemn ape demurely perched behind,
King Robert rode, making huge merriment
In all the country towns through which they went.

The Pope received them with great pomp, and

Of bannered trumpets, on Saint Peter's square, Giving his benediction and embrace Fervent, and full of apostolic grace.
While with congratulations and with prayers
He entertained the Angel unawares,
Robert, the Jester, bursting through the crowd,
Into their presence rushed, and cried aloud,
"I am the King! Look, and behold in me
Robert, your brother, King of Sicily!
This man, who wears my semblance to your

Is an impostor in a King's disguise.

Do you not know me? does no voice within Answer my cry, and say we are akin?"

The Pope in silence, but with troubled mien, Gazed at the Angel's countenance serene;

The Emperor, laughing, said, "It is strange sport

To keep a madman for thy Fool at court!" And the poor, baffled Jester in disgrace Was hustled back among the populace. In solemn state the Holy Week went by,
And Easter Sunday gleamed upon the sky;
The presence of the Angel, with its light,
Before the sun rose, made the city bright,
And with new fervor filled the hearts of men,
Who felt that Christ indeed had risen again.
Even the Jester, on his bed of straw,
With haggard eyes the unwonted splendor saw.
He felt within a power unfelt before,
And, kneeling humbly on his chamber floor,
He heard the rushing garments of the Lord
Sweep through the silent air, ascending heavenward.

And now the visit ending, and once more Valmond returning to the Danube's shore. Homeward the Angel journeyed, and again The land was made resplendent with his train. Flashing along the towns of Italy Unto Salerno, and from there by sea. And when once more within Palermo's wall, And, seated on the throne in his great hall, He heard the Angelus from convent towers, As if the better world conversed with ours. He beckoned to King Robert to draw nigher, And with a gesture bade the rest retire; And when they were alone, the Angel said, "Art thou the King?" Then bowing down his head,

King Robert crossed both hands upon his breast.

And meekly answered him: "Thou knowest best!

My sins as scarlet are; let me go hence, And in some cloister's school of penitence, Across those stones, that pave the way to heaven,

Walk barefoot, till my guilty soul is shriven!"

The Angel smiled, and from his radiant face A holy light illumined all the place, And through the open window, loud and clear, They heard the monks chant in the chapel near, Above the stir and tumult of the street: "He has put down the mighty from their seat, And has exalted them of low degree!" And through the chant a second melody Rose like the throbbing of a single string: "I am an Angel, and thou art the King!"

King Robert, who was standing near the throne, Lifted his eyes, and lo! he was alone! But all appareled as in days of old, With ermined mantle and with cloth of gold; And when his courtiers came, they found him there Kneeling upon the floor, absorbed in silent prayer.

1862

HAWTHORNE May 23, 1864 <sup>1</sup>

How beautiful it was, that one bright day
In the long week of rain!
Though all its splendor could not chase away
The omnipresent pain.

The lovely town was white with apple-blooms, And the great elms o'erhead Dark shadows wove on their aërial looms, Shot through with golden thread.

Across the meadows, by the gray old manse,
The historic river flowed:
I was as one who wanders in a trance,
Unconscious of his road.

The faces of familiar friends seemed strange;
Their voices I could hear,
And yet the words they uttered seemed to change

Their meaning to my ear.

For the one face I looked for was not there,
The one low voice was mute;
Only an unseen presence filled the air,
And baffled my pursuit.

Now I look back, and meadow, manse, and stream
Dimly my thought defines;

I only see—a dream within a dream— The hill-top hearsed with pines. <sup>2</sup>

I only hear above his place of rest
Their tender undertone,
The infinite longings of a troubled breast,
The voice so like his own.

There in seclusion and remote from men
The wizard hand lies cold,
Which at its topmost speed let fall the pen,
And left the tale half told.

Ah! who shall lift that wand of magic power, And the lost clew regain? The unfinished window in Aladdin's 3 tower Unfinished must remain!

1864

<sup>1</sup> This was the date of the burial of Hawthorne. <sup>2</sup> the S'eepy Hollow Cemetery in Concord, where Hawthorne is buried

<sup>3</sup> Aladdin, by means of his magic lamp, had a palace built for his bride in one night, but one window was left unfinished. Hawthorne left two romances unfinished, Septimius Felton and Dr. Grimshaw's Secret.

FLOWER-DE-LUCE 1

Beautiful lilv, dwelling by still rivers, Or solitary mere, Or where the sluggish meadow-brook delivers Its waters to the weir! 2

Thou laughest at the mill, the whirr and worry Of spindle and of loom.

And the great wheel that toils amid the hurry And rushing of the flume.

Born in the purple, born to joy and pleasance. Thou dost not toil nor spin, But makest glad and radiant with thy presence The meadow and the lin. 3

The wind blows, and uplifts the drooping

And round thee throng and run The rushes, the green yeomen of thy manor. The outlaws of the sun.

The burnished dragon-fly is thine attendant, And tilts against the field, And down the listed sunbeam rides resplendent With steel-blue mail and shield.

Thou art the Iris, fair among the fairest, Who, armed with golden rod And winged with the celestial azure, bearest The message of some God.

Thou art the Muse, who far from crowded cities Hauntest the sylvan streams. Playing on pipes of reed the artless ditties That come to us as dreams.

O flower-de-luce, bloom on, and let the river Linger to kiss thy feet! O flower of song, bloom on, and make forever The world more fair and sweet.

1866 1867

KILLED AT THE FORD

He is dead, the beautiful youth, The heart of honor, the tongue of truth, He, the life and light of us all, Whose voice was blithe as a bugle-call, Whom all eyes followed with one consent, The cheer of whose laugh, and whose pleasant

Hushed all murmurs of discontent.

<sup>1</sup> The fleur-de-lis or lily of France—the iris; this selection is the title poem of a small collection published in 1867.

2 dam or other obstruction to check the flow of a stream

" waterfall, or the pool below it

Only last night, as we rode along Down the dark of the mountain gap. To visit the picket-guard at the ford. Little dreaming of any mishap. He was humming the words of some old song: "Two red roses he had on his cap And another he bore at the point of his sword."

Sudden and swift a whistling ball Came out of a wood, and the voice was still; Something I heard in the darkness fall. And for a moment my blood grew chill; I spake in a whisper, as one who speaks 20 In a room where some one is lying dead: But he made no answer to what I said.

We lifted him up to his saddle again. And through the mire and the mist and the rain Carried him back to the silent camp, And laid him as if asleep on his bed: And I saw by the light of the surgeon's lamp Two white roses upon his cheeks. And one, just over his heart, blood-red!

And I saw in a vision how far and fleet 30 That fatal bullet went speeding forth. Till it reached a town in the distant North. Till it reached a house in a sunny street. Till it reached a heart that ceased to beat Without a murmur, without a cry; And a bell was tolled, in that far-off town. For one who had passed from cross to crown, And the neighbors wondered that she should die. 1866 1867

GIOTTO'S TOWER 4

How many lives, made beautiful and sweet By self-devotion and by self-restraint, Whose pleasure is to run without complaint On unknown errands of the Paraclete, 5 Wanting the reverence of unshodden feet. Fail of the nimbus which the artists paint Around the shining forehead of the saint. And are in their completeness incomplete! In the old Tuscan town stands Giotto's tower, The lily of Florence blossoming in stone,-A vision, a delight, and a desire,— The builder's perfect and centennial flower, That in the night of ages bloomed alone, 6 But wanting still the glory of the spire.

Giotto, 1276-1337, the painter, architect, and sculptor, who designed and began the campanile or bell-tower at Florence, intended that it should have a spire one hundred feet high, but Gaddi who completed the structure after Giotto's death, gave up that plan.

intercessor—used especially of the Holy Spirit in allusion to the flowering after a supposed hundred years' growth, of the century plant

DANTE 1

Tuscan, that wanderest through the realms of gloom.

With thoughtful pace, and sad, majestic eyes, Stern thoughts and awful from thy soul arise. Like Farinata from his fiery tomb.

Thy sacred song is like the trump of doom: Yet in thy heart what human sympathies. What soft compassion glows: as in the skies The tender stars their clouded lamps relume! Methinks I see thee stand with pallid cheeks By Fra Hilario in his diocese.

As up the convent-walls, in golden streaks. The ascending sunbeams mark the day's de-

And, as he asks what there the stranger seeks. Thy voice along the cloister whispers. "Peace!"

1843 1845

DIVINA COMMEDIA 2

Oft have I seen at some cathedral door A laborer, pausing in the dust and heat, Lay down his burden, and with reverent feet Enter, and cross himself, and on the floor

Kneel to repeat his paternoster 3 o'er; Far off the noises of the world retreat: The loud vociferations of the street Become an undistinguishable roar.

So, as I enter here from day to day. And leave my burden at this minster gate, Kneeling in prayer, and not ashamed to pray.

From 1842, the year in which, according to one biographer, "he had been steeping his soul in Dante" to the close of his life, Longiel.ow was a student of the Italian poet. He translated the Divinu Commedia, 1867-1870. In this sonnet he sees Dante in two aspects, first as the passionate exile resentful of his political wrongs even in the realms of the lost where he meets Farinata, leader realms of the lost where he meets Farinata, leader of his ancestral enemies, enduring fiery punishment, and returns to him scorn for scorn (Inferno, x); secondly, as the world-worn pilgrim seeking peace. A letter whose authenticity has been questioned, written by "Frate Ilario, a humble monk of Corvo," relates that when Dante, unknown, visited the monastery, "I questioned him of what he wanted . . . thereat he looked round at me and the brethren who were with me and answered, 'Peace.'" Longfellow's six sonnets relating to Dante have been placed together here without regard to chronlow. here without regard to chronology.

<sup>2</sup> Longfellow wrote these sonnets while translating the Divina Commedia into English verse, and prefixed them to different divisions of the translation. The student will note the extended figure beginning in the first sonnet and running through the whole sequence: Dante's work, in spirit and in intellect, is a reflection, like the cathedral, of the intense religious life of the Middle Ages. It is significant that Longfellow, whose creed was fundamentally so different from Dante's, should have been influenced, like all deep students of the great Tuscan, to a feeling of profound veneration for Dante's beliefs.

Lord's Prayer—"Our Father" The student will note the extended figure begin-

"The Lord's Prayer-"Our Father"

The tumult of the time disconsolate To inarticulate murmurs dies away. While the eternal ages watch and wait.

1864

How strange the sculptures that adorn these

This crowd of statues, in whose folded sleeves Birds build their nests: while canopied with Parvis 4 and portal bloom like trellised howers.

And the vast minster seems a cross of flowers! But fiends and dragons on the gargovled 5

Watch the dead Christ between the living

And, underneath, the traitor Judas lowers! Ah! from what agonies of heart and brain,

What exultations trampling on despair. What tenderness, what tears, what hate of What passionate outcry of a soul in pain, Uprose this poem of the earth and air. This medieval miracle of song!

1864

I enter, and I see thee in the gloom Of the long aisles, O poet saturnine! And strive to make my steps keep pace with thine 6

The air is filled with some unknown perfume: The congregation of the dead make room

For thee to pass; the votive tapers shine; Like rooks that haunt Ravenna's groves of pine

The hovering echoes fly from tomb to tomb.

From the confessionals I hear arise 10 Rehearsals of forgotten tragedies, And lamentations from the crypts below:

And then a voice celestial that begins

With the pathetic words, "Although your sins As scarlet be," and ends with "as the snow." 1865

I lift mine eyes, and all the windows blaze With forms of Saints and holy men who died.

4 church-porch Furnished with gargoyles, that is, water-spouts gro-tesquely carved; see Ruskin, Stones of Venice (Vol. II, Chap. iv, St. Mark's) on the imagery and symbolism of Gothic article Hell and part of

<sup>6</sup> As Vergil conducted Dante through Hell and part of Purgatory, so Dante seems to be conducting Long-fellow. The sonnet is full of echoes from Dante.

Here martyred and hereafter glorified: And the great Rose 1 upon its leaves displays Christ's triumph, and the angelic roundelays. With splendor upon splendor multiplied: And Beatrice again at Dante's side No more rebukes, but smiles her words of praise.

And then the organ sounds, and unseen choirs Sing the old Latin hymns of peace and love. And benedictions of the Holy Ghost: And the melodious bells among the spires O'er all the house-tops and through heaven above

Proclaim the elevation of the Host! 2 1866

O star of morning and of liberty! 3 O bringer of the light, whose splendor shines Above the darkness of the Apennines, Forerunner of the day that is to be! The voices of the city and the sea. The voices of the mountains and the pines. Repeat thy song, till the familiar lines Are footpaths for the thought of Italy! Thy fame is blown abroad from all the heights, Through all the nations, and a sound is heard. As of a mighty wind, and men devout, Strangers of Rome, and the new proselytes, In their own language hear thy wondrous And many are amazed, and many doubt.

1866

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES 1809-1894

In Holmes we have a Boston New Englander conscious of a distinguished American ancestry. loyal to his city, to Harvard, to his profession, and to the literary and social circle of which he was one of the most brilliant members. He was born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, son of a clergyman, a descendant of Anne Bradstreet and of several persons prominent in colonial and Revolutionary New England. He was educated at xxx, xxxi.

A circular window of tracery and stained glass in conventionalized rose design generally placed in the western gable of a Gothic church; see also the Heavenly Rose, as described by Dante, Paradiso, xxx, xxxi.

At the elevation, or lifting from the altar by the priest, of the host, or elements of the Lord's Supper, bel's are rung and the wo shipers adore the elements as the body and blood of Christ.

Although Dante was a strict adherent of the medieval Church, he so constantly inveighed against its abuses and proc'aimed the cause of liberty, that his name has been a rallying cry through the centuries in the struggle for the unification of Italy. This union was taking place when Longfellow wrote.

Phillips Academy, Andover, and at Harvard, graduating in 1829. He studied medicine in Boston and Paris, was made professor of anatomy and physiology at Dartmouth in 1839, and at Harvard in 1847, retaining his connection with Harvard until 1882. His poems, written at various dates from 1836, are included in the volumes Songs in Many Keys, 1861, Humorous Poems, 1865, Songs of Many Seasons, 1874, and Before the Curfew, 1888. His chief prose works were: The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, 1858; The Professor at the Breakfast Table, 1860; Elsie Venner (novel), 1861; The Guardian Angel (novel). 1867. To these should be added notable reviews. memorials, essays, and important scientific publications.

Holmes had the most facile brain of any major American writer of his day. This is seen in his essays and in his humorous and satirical poems. The discursive essay form seems especially made for the type of mind like his, a mind that expresses itself most congenially in conversation in which it has liberty to handle ideas as it will, lightly or gravely, with what brilliancy or spontaneity is native to it. The salient feature of Holmes's essays is their vivacity; they show a mind intensely interested in whatever occupies it, especially its own workings, a mind not so profound as scintillating, one that can touch the varied scenes of life with a flash of wit that places the picture forever in memory. His poetry, by reason of its incisiveness, is unique in American literature. No other American has equaled him in the perfection of his vers de société.

Biography and criticism: J. T. Morse, Life and Biography and criticism: J. T. Morse, Life and Letters of O. W. Holmes, 2 vols. 1896; L. Stephen, "Life and Literary Work of Holmes," Studies of a Biographer, 2:149-82; Burton; Macy; Chubb; S. M. Crothers, "The Autocrat and his Fellow Boarders," Atlan. 104:237-44; "Oliver Wendell Holmes," Liv. Age 263:99-103; W. G. Ballantine, "Oliver Wendell Holmes as a Poet and as a Man," No. Am. 190:178-93.

OLD IRONSIDES 4

Ay, tear her tattered ensign down! Long has it waved on high, And many an eye has danced to see That banner in the sky; Beneath it rung the battle shout, And burst the cannon's roar;-The meteor of the ocean air Shall sweep the clouds no more.

<sup>4</sup> In this poem, written September 15, 1830, and printed next day in the Boston Daily Advertiser, Holmes voiced the indignation of the American people over the proposal made by the secretary of the navy and printed in the Advertiser on September 14, 1830, that the naval ship Constitution, familiarly linown as Old Ironsides, which had survived several thrilling engagements in the War of 1812, be discontiled and old. As a result of the propular be dismantled and sold. As a result of the popular feeling a oused, the o'd frigate was used instead as a school-ship, and later as a receiving ship.

20

10

40

1831

10

20

Her deck, once red with heroes' blood,
Where knelt the vanquished foe,
When winds were hurrying o'er the flood,
And waves were white below,
No more shall feel the victor's tread,
Or know the conquered knee;—
The harpies of the shore shall pluck
The eagle of the sea!

Oh, better that her shattered hulk
Should sink beneath the wave;
Her thunders shook the mighty deep,
And there should be her grave;
Nail to the mast her holy flag,
Set every threadbare sail,
And give her to the god of storms,
The lightning and the gale!
1830

TO AN INSECT

I love to hear thine earnest voice, Wherever thou art hid, Thou testy little dogmatist, Thou pretty Katydid! <sup>1</sup> Thou mindest me of gentlefolks,— Old gentlefolks are they,— Thou say'st an undisputed thing In such a solemn way.

Thou art a female, Katydid!

I know it by the trill

That quivers through thy piercing notes,
So petulant and shrill;
I think there is a knot of you
Beneath the hollow tree.—
A knot of spinster Katydids,—
Do Katydids drink tea?

Oh, tell me where did Katy live,
And what did Katy do?
And was she very fair and young,
And yet so wicked, too?
Did Katy love a naughty man,
Or kiss more cheeks than one?
I warrant Katy did no more
Than many a Kate has done.

Dear me! I'll tell you all about
My fuss with little Jane,
And Ann, with whom I used to walk
So often down the lane,
And all that tore their locks of black,
Or wet their eyes of blue,—
Pray tell me, sweetest Katydid,
What did poor Katy do?

<sup>1</sup>Cf. Freneau's poem, p. 169.

Ah, no! the living oak shall crash,
That stood for ages still,
The rock shall rend its mossy base
And thunder down the hill,
Before the little Katydid
Shall add one word, to tell
The mystic story of the maid
Whose name she knows so well.

Peace to the ever-murmuring race!
And when the latest one
Shall fold in death her feeble wings
Beneath the autumn sun,
Then shall she raise her fainting voice
And lift her drooping lid,
And then the child of future years
Shall hear what Katy did.

1830 1831

MY AUNT

My aunt! my dear unmarried aunt!
Long years have o'er her flown;
Yet still she strains the aching clasp
That binds her virgin zone;
I know it hurts her,—though she looks
As cheerful as she can;
Her waist is ampler than her life,
For life is but a span.

My aunt! my poor deluded aunt!
Her hair is almost gray;
Why will she train that winter curl
In such a spring-like way?
How can she lay her glasses down,
And say she reads as well,
When, through a double convex lens,
She just makes out to spell?

Her father—grandpapa! forgive
This erring lip its smiles—
Vowed she should make the finest girl
Within a hundred miles;
He sent her to a stylish school;
"Twas in her thirteenth June;
And with her, as the rules required,
"Two towels and a spoon."

They braced my aunt against a board,
To make her straight and tall;
They laced her up, they starved her down,
To make her light and small;
They pinched her feet, they singed her hair,
They screwed it up with pins;—
Oh, never mortal suffered more
In penance for her sins.

1831

10

So, when my precious aunt was done, My grandsire brought her back; (By daylight, lest some rabid youth Might follow on the track;) "Ah!" said my grandsire, as he shook Some powder in his pan, 1 "What could this lovely creature do Against a desperate man!"

Alas! nor chariot, nor barouche,
Nor bandit cavalcade,
Tore from the trembling father's arms
His all-accomplished maid.
For her how happy had it been!
And heaven had spared to me
To see one sad, ungathered rose
On my ancestral tree.
1831

THE LAST LEAF 2

I saw him once before,
As he passed by the door,
And again
The pavement stones resound
As he totters o'er the ground
With his cane.

They say that in his prime,
Ere the pruning-knife of Time
Cut him down,
Not a better man was found
By the Crier on his round
Through the town.

But now he walks the streets, And he looks at all he meets Sad and wan, And he shakes his feeble head, That it seems as if he said, "They are gone."

Just before shooting the old flint-lock fire-arms, the pan, a small spoon-shaped receptacle outside the lock, had to be replenished with fresh powder, which, when ignited by flint and steel, would fire the charge inside.

which, when ignited by him and steet, would me
the charge inside.

"Major Thomas Melville, an ancestor of Herman Melvile, and "the last of the cocked hats," was a familiar sight in Boston in 1831-32. "His aspect among the crowds of a later generation reminded me of a withered leaf which has held to its stem through the storms of autumn and winter, and finds itself still clinging to its bough while the new growths of spring are bursting their buds and spreading their foliage a'l around it. I make this explanation for the benefit of those who have been puzzled by the lines,

"The last leaf upon the tree In the spring."
[Holmes's note in the Cambridge Edition of his poems, published by The Houghton Mifflin Company.]

The mossy marbles rest
On the lips that he has prest
In their bloom,
And the names he loved to hear
Have been carved for many a year
On the tomb.

20

20

My grandmamma has said—
Poor old lady, she is dead
Long ago—
That he had a Roman nose,
And his cheek was like a rose
In the snow

But now his nose is thin,
And it rests upon his chin
Like a staff,
And a crook is in his back,
And a melancholy crack
In his laugh.

I know it is a sin

For me to sit and grin
At him here;

But the old three-cornered hat,
And the breeches, and all that,
Are so queer!

And if I should live to be
The last leaf upon the tree
In the spring,
Let them smile, as I do now,
At the old forsaken bough
Where I cling.

1831 1831

A SONG

FOR THE CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF HARVARD COLLEGE, 1836

When the Puritans came over
Our hills and swamps to clear,
The woods were full of catamounts,
And Indians red as deer,
With tomahawks and scalping-knives,
That make folks' heads look queer;
Oh the ship from England used to bring
A hundred wigs a year!

The crows came cawing through the air
To pluck the Pilgrims' corn,
The bears came snuffing round the door
Whene'er a babe was born,
The rattlesnakes were bigger round
Than the butt of the old ram's horn
The deacon blew at meeting time
On every "Sabbath" morn.

20

• • • • •

40

But soon they knocked the wigwams down. And pine-tree trunk and limb Began to sprout among the leaves In shape of steeples slim: And out the little wharves were stretched Along the ocean's rim. And up the little school-house shot To keep the boys in trim.

And when at length the College rose. The sachem cocked his eve At every tutor's meager ribs Whose coat-tails whistled by: But when the Greek and Hebrew words Came tumbling from their jaws, The copper-colored children all Ran screaming to the squaws.

And who was on the Catalogue When college was begun? Two nephews of the President. And the Professor's son: (They turned a little Indian boy, As brown as any bun:) Lord! how the seniors knocked about The freshman class of one!

They had not then the dainty things That commons now afford. But succotash and hominy Were smoking on the board: They did not rattle round in gigs. Or dash in long-tail blues, But always on Commencement days The tutors blacked their shoes.

God bless the ancient Puritans! 50 Their lot was hard enough: But honest hearts make iron arms. And tender maids are tough: So love and faith have formed and fed Our true-born Yankee stuff, And keep the kernel in the shell The British found so rough! 1836 1849

ON LENDING A PUNCH-BOWL

This ancient silver bowl of mine, it tells of good old times,

Of joyous days, and jolly nights, and merry Christmas chimes;

They were a free and jovial race, but honest. brave, and true,

That dipped their ladle in the punch when this old bowl was new.

A Spanish galleon brought the bar: 1 so runs the ancient tale:

T was hammered by an Antwerp smith, whose arm was like a flail:

And now and then beneath the strokes, for fear his strength should fail.

He wiped his brow, and quaffed a cup of good old Flemish ale.

'T was purchased by an English squire to please his loving dame.

Who saw the cherubs, and conceived a longing for the same:

And oft as on the ancient stock another twig was found.

'T was filled with caudle 2 spiced and hot, and handed smoking round.

But, changing hands, it reached at length a Puritan divine.

Who used to follow Timothy, and take a little wine. 3

But hated punch and prelacy; and so it was, perhaps.

He went to Leyden, 4 where he found conventicles and schnapps. 6

And then, of course, you know what's next,-it left the Dutchman's shore

With those that in the Mayflower came,—a hundred souls and more,-

Along with all the furniture, to fill their new

To judge by what is still on hand, at least a hundred loads.

'T was on a dreary winter's eve, the night was closing dim,

When brave Miles Standish took the bowl, and filled it to the brim:

The little Captain stood and stirred the posset with his sword.

And all his sturdy men-at-arms were ranged about the board.

He poured the fiery Hollands in,-the man that never feared,-

He took a long and solemn draught, and wiped his yellow beard;

And one by one the musketeers-the men that fought and prayed—

All drank as 't were their mother's milk, and not a man afraid.

3 1 Timothy v, 23 1 bar silver

a hot drink made of wines, eggs, etc.
The Pilgrims went to Leyden, Holland, from England before coming to America.

Dissenters' religious meetings 6 Holland gin

That night, affrighted from his nest, the screaming eagle flew.

He heard the Pequot's ringing whoop, the soldier's wild halloo:

And there the sachem i learned the rule he taught to kith and kin.

"Run from the white man when you find he smells of Hollands gin!"

A hundred years, and fifty more, had spread their leaves and snows.

A thousand rubs had flattened down each little cherub's nose:

When once again the bowl was filled, but not in mirth or joy.

'T was mingled by a mother's hand to cheer her parting boy.

"Drink, John," she said, "'t will do you good, -poor child, you'll never bear

This working in the dismal trench, out in the midnight air:

And if—God bless me!—you were hurt, 't would keep away the chill";

So John did drink,—and well he wrought that night at Bunker's Hill!

I tell you, there was generous warmth in good old English cheer;

I tell you, 't was a pleasant thought to bring its symbol here.

'T is but the fool that loves excess; hast thou a drunken soul?

Thy bane is in thy shallow skull, not in my silver bowl!

I love the memory of the past,—its pressed yet fragrant flowers.-

The moss that clothes its broken walls,—the ivy on its towers;---

Nay, this poor bauble it bequeathed,—my eyes grow moist and dim.

To think of all the vanished joys that danced around its brim.

Then fill a fair and honest cup, and bear it straight to me;

The goblet hallows all it holds, whate'er the liquid be;

And may the cherubs on its face protect me from the sin,

That dooms one to those dreadful words,— "My dear, where have you been?"

NON-RESISTANCE 2

Perhaps too far in these considerate days Has patience carried her submissive ways: Wisdom has taught us to be calm and meek. To take one blow, and turn the other cheek: It is not written what a man shall do If the rude caitiff smite the other too!

Land of our fathers, in thine hour of need God help thee, guarded by the passive creed! As the lone pilgrim trusts to beads and cowl. When through the forest ring's the gray wolf's howl:

As the deep galleon trusts her gilded prow When the black corsair slants athwart her bow; As the poor pheasant, with his peaceful mien. Trusts to his feathers, shining golden-green, When the dark plumage with the crimson beak Has rustled shadowy from its splintered peak,-So trust thy friends, whose babbling tongues would charm

The lifted saber from thy foeman's arm. Thy torches ready for the answering peal From bellowing fort and thunder-freighted keel!

1850 1862

THE OLD MAN DREAMS

Oh for one hour of youthful joy! 3 Give back my twentieth spring! I'd rather laugh a bright-haired boy Than reign a gray-beard king!

Off with the spoils of wrinkled age! Away with Learning's crown! Tear out life's Wisdom-written page. And dash its trophies down!

One moment let my life-blood stream From boyhood's fount of flame! Give me one giddy, reeling dream Of life all love and fame!

10

My listening angel heard the prayer, And calmly smiling, said,

"If I but touch thy silvered hair, Thy hasty wish hath sped.

<sup>2</sup> This poem may have been called forth by some lines of Whittier's revealing Quaker sentiment at the beginning of the agitation that led to the Civil

8 Cf. Bvron, "Oh, talk not to me of a name great in story," etc., in "Stanzas Written on the Road between Florence and Pisa."

1849

1 tribal chief

20

30

40

30

10

"But is there nothing in thy track
To bid thee fondly stay,
While the swift seasons hurry back
To find the wished-for day?"

"Ah, truest soul of womankind!
Without thee, what were life?
One bliss I cannot leave behind:
I'll take—my—precious—wife!"

The angel took a sapphire pen And wrote in rainbow dew, The man would be a boy again, And be a husband too!

"And is there nothing yet unsaid.

Before the change appears?
Remember, all their gifts have fled
With those dissolving years!"

"Why, yes"; for memory would recall My fond paternal joys; "I could not bear to leave them all—I'll take—my—girl—and—boys."

The smiling angel dropped his pen,—
"Why, this will never do;
The man would be a boy again,
And be a father, too!"

And so I laughed,—my laughter woke
The household with its noise.—
And wrote my dream, when morning broke.
To please the gray-haired boys.

1854
1858

THE TWO ARMIES

As Life's unending column pours,
Two marshaled hosts are seen,—
Two armies on the trampled shores
That Death flows black between.

One marches to the drum-beat's roll, The wide-mouthed clarion's bray, And bears upon a crimson scroll, "Our glory is to slay."

One moves in silence by the stream, With sad, yet watchful eyes, Calm as the patient planet's gleam That walks the clouded skies.

Along its front no sabers shine, No blood-red pennons wave; Its banner bears the single line, "Our duty is to save."

For those no death-bed's lingering shade;
At Honor's trumpet-call,
With knitted brow and lifted blade
In Glory's arms they fall.

For these no clashing falchions bright, No stirring battle-cry; The bloodless stabber calls by night,— Each answers, "Here am I!"

For those the sculptor's laureled bust, The builder's marble piles. The anthems pealing o'er their dust Through long cathedral aisles.

For these the blossom-sprinkled turf
That floods the lonely graves
When Spring rolls in her sea-green surf
In flowery-foaming waves.

Two paths lead upward from below.

And angels wait above,
Who count each burning life-drop's flow,
Each falling tear of Love.

Though from the Hero's bleeding breast Her pulses Freedom drew, Though the white lilies in her crest Sprang from that scarlet dew.—

While Valor's haughty champions wait
Till all their scars are shown,
Love walks unchallenged through the gate.
To sit beside the Throne!
1858

THE DEACON'S MASTERPIECE: 1

OR, THE WONDERFUL "ONE-HOSS-SHAY."
A LOGICAL STORY

Have you heard of the wonderful one-hoss-shay. That was built in such a logical way It ran a hundred years to a day, And then, of a sudden, it—ah, but stay, I'll tell you what happened without delay, Scaring the parson into fits. Frightening people out of their wits,—Have you ever heard of that, I say?

Seventeen hundred and fifty-five. Georgius Secundus was then alive,—

Professor Barrett Wendell sees in this poem a satire in which the "shay" is the extreme Puritan doctrine of the eighteenth century. Snuffy old drone from the German hive! <sup>1</sup> That was the year when Lisbon-town Saw the earth open and gulp her down, And Braddock's army was done so brown, Left without a scalp to its crown. It was on the terrible Earthquake-day That the Deacon finished the one-hoss-shay.

Now in building of chaises, I tell you what. There is always somewhere a weakest spot,—In hub, tire, felloe, in spring or thill, In panel, or crossbar, or floor, or sill, In screw, bolt, thoroughbrace,—lurking still, Find it somewhere you must and will,—Above or below, or within or without,—And that's the reason, beyond a doubt. That a chaise breaks down, but doesn't wear out.

But the Deacon swore (as Deacons do. With an "I dew vum," or an "I tell yeou,")
He would build one shay to beat the taown
'N' the keounty 'n' all the kentry raoun':

It should be so built that it couldn' break
daown:

— "Fur," said the Deacon, "'t's mighty plain Thut the weakes' place mus' stan' the strain; 'N' the way t' fix it, uz I maintain,

Is only jest

T' make that place uz strong uz the rest."

So the Deacon inquired of the village folk Where he could find the strongest oak. That couldn't be split nor bent nor broke,—
That was for spokes and floor and sills;
He sent for lancewood to make the thills;
The crossbars were ash, from the straightest

The panels of white-wood, that cuts like cheese. But lasts like iron for things like these: The hubs of logs from the "Settler's ellum,"-Last of its timber,—they couldn't sell 'em, Never an axe had seen their chips. And the wedges flew from between their lips, Their blunt ends frizzled like celery-tips; 50 Step and prop-iron, bolt and screw, Spring, tire, axle, and linchpin too, Steel of the finest, bright and blue; Thoroughbrace bison-skin, thick and wide; Boot, top, dasher, from tough old hide Found in the pit when the tanner died. That was the way he "put her through."— "There!" said the Deacon, "naow she'll dew!"

Do! I tell you, I rather guess
She was a wonder, and nothing less!
Colts grew horses, beards turned gray.

660

Deacon and deaconess dropped away. Children and grandchildren—where were they? But there stood the stout old one-hoss-shay As fresh as on Lisbon-earthquake-day!

EIGHTEEN HUNDRED;—it came and found The Deacon's masterpiece strong and sound. Eighteen hundred increased by ten;—
"Hahnsum kerridge" they called it then. Eighteen hundred and twenty came;—
Running as usual; much the same.
Thirty and forty at last arrive.
And then come fifty, and FIFTY-FIVE.

Little of all we value here
Wakes on the morn of its hundredth year
Without both feeling and looking queer.
In fact, there's nothing that keeps its youth.
So far as I know, but a tree and truth.
(This is a moral that runs at large;
Take it.—You're welcome.—No extra charge.)

First of November,—the Earthquake-day.—There are traces of age in the one-hoss-shay. A general flavor of mild decay,
But nothing local, as one may say.
There couldn't be,—for the Deacon's art
Had made it so like in every part
That there wasn't a chance for one to start.
For the wheels were just as strong as the thills,
And the floor was just as strong as the floor,
And the panels just as strong as the floor,
And the whippletree neither less nor more,
And spring and axle and hub encore.
And yet, as a whole, it is past a doubt
In another hour it will be worn out!

First of November, 'Fifty-five!
This morning the parson takes a drive.
Now, small boys, get out of the way!
Here comes the wonderful one-horse-shav.
Drawn by a rat-tailed, ewe-necked bay.
"Huddup!" said the parson.—Off went they.

The parson was working his Sunday's text,—Had got to fifthly, and stopped perplexed At what the—Moses—was coming next. All at once the horse stood still, Close by the meet'n'-house on the hill.—First a shiver, and then a thrill, Then something decidedly like a spill,—And the parson was sitting upon a rock, At half-past nine by the meet'n'-house clock.—Just the hour of the Earthquake shock!

—What do you think the parson found. When he got up and stared around?

The Hanoverian kings of England—the four Georges—were of German descent.

118

1858

10

The poor old chaise in a heap or mound, As if it had been to the mill and ground! You see, of course, if you're not a dunce, How it went to pieces all at once,—All at once and nothing first,—Just as bubbles do when they burst.

End of the wonderful one-hoss-shay. Logic is logic. That's all I say. 1858

THE VOICELESS

We count the broken lyres that rest
Where the sweet wailing singers slumber,
But o'er their silent sister's breast
The wild flowers who will stoop to number?
A few can touch the magic string,
And noisy Fame is proud to win them:—
Alas for those that never sing,
But die with all their music in them!

Nay, grieve not for the dead alone
Whose song has told their hearts' sad story,—
Weep for the voiceless, who have known
The cross without the crown of glory!
Not where Leucadian <sup>1</sup> breezes sweep
O'er Sappho's memory-haunted billow,
But where the glistening night-dews weep
On nameless sorrow's churchyard pillow.

O hearts that break and give no sign
Save whitening lip and fading tresses,
Till Death pours out his longed-for wine
Slow-dropped from Misery's crushing presses,—

If singing breath or echoing chord
To every hidden pang were given,
What endless melodies were poured,
As sad as earth, as sweet as heaven!

1858

BOSTON COMMON.—THREE PICTURES

FOR THE FAIR IN AID OF THE FUND TO PROCURE BALL'S STATUE OF WASHINGTON  $^{2}$

1630

All overgrown with bush and fern,
And straggling clumps of tangled trees,
With trunks that lean and boughs that turn,
Bent eastward by the mastering breeze,—

Leucadia is one of the Ionian islands. Sappho (c. 600 B.C.), the Greek poet, is said, but without confirmation, to have thrown herself into the sea from one of its southwestern cliffs.

<sup>2</sup> Thomas Ball, 1819-1911, was an American sculptor. His equestrian statue of Washington is in the Boston Public Gardens. With spongy bogs that drip and fill A yellow pond with muddy rain. Beneath the shaggy southern hill Lies wet and low the Shawmut plain. And hark! the trodden branches crack; A crow flaps off with startled scream; A straying woodchuck canters back; A bittern rises from the stream; Leaps from his lair a frightened deer; An otter plunges in the pool;—Here comes old Shawmut's pioneer, <sup>8</sup> The parson on his brindled bull!

1774

The streets are throughd with trampling feet. The northern hill is ridged with graves, But night and morn the drum is beat 20 To frighten down the "rebel knaves." The stones of King Street 4 still are red. And yet the bloody red-coats come: I hear their pacing sentry's tread. The click of steel, the tap of drum, And over all the open green, Where grazed of late the harmless kine. The cannon's deepening ruts are seen, The war-horse stamps, the bayonets shine. The clouds are dark with crimson rain 30 Above the murderous hirelings' den. And soon their whistling showers shall stain The pipe-claved 5 belts of Gage's men.

186-

Around the green, in morning light, The spired and palaced summits blaze, And, sunlike, from her Beacon-height 6 The dome-crowned city spreads her rays; They span the waves, they belt the plains, They skirt the roads with bands of white, Till with a flash of gilded panes You farthest hillside bounds the sight. Peace, Freedom, Wealth! no fairer view, Though with the wild-bird's restless wings We sailed beneath the noontide's blue Or chased the moonlight's endless rings! Here, fitly raised by grateful hands His holiest memory to recall, The Hero's, Patriot's image stands; He led our sires who won them all! 1850

The Reverend William Blackstone (or Blaxton) was the first settler, in 1623, of Shawmut (Boston). Later he sold his land for cattle and became the first white settler of Rhode Island. In his old age, being too poor to own a horse, he frequently rode a bull to town.

tode a bull to town.

The scene of the "Boston Massacre," 1770, which led to the withdrawing from Boston of General Gates's two regiments; see Fiske, American Revolution, i.66

whitened with pipe-clay Beacon Hill

THE BOYS 1

Has there any old fellow got mixed with the

If there has, take him out, without making a noise.

Hang the Almanac's cheat and the Catalogue's

Old Time is a liar! We're twenty tonight!

We're twenty! We're twenty! Who says we are

He's tipsy,-young jackanapes!-show him the door!

"Gray temples at twenty?"—Yes! white, if we please:

Where the snow-flakes fall thickest there's nothing can freeze!

Was it snowing I spoke of? Excuse the mis-

Look close.—you will see not a sign of a flake: We want some new garlands for those we have

And these are white roses in place of the red!

We've a trick, we young fellows, you may have been told, Of talking (in public) as if we were old:—

That boy we call "Doctor," 2 and this we call "Judge"; 3—

It's a neat little fiction,—of course it's all fudge.

That fellow's the "Speaker," -the one on the

"Mr. Mayor," 5 my young one, how are you tonight?

That's our "Member of Congress," 6 we say when we chaff;

There's the "Reverend" 7 What's his name?don't make me laugh.

The boy with the grave mathematical look 8 Made believe he had written a wonderful book, And the ROYAL SOCIETY thought it was true! So they chose him right in: a good joke it was.

This poem was written for the meeting of the Harvard class of 1829 held on January 6, 1859.
 Francis Thomas
 George Tyler Bigelow, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts
 Francis B. Crowninshield, Speaker of the Massachusetty

setts House of Representatives
<sup>6</sup> G. W. Richardson of Worcester, Massachusetts

<sup>6</sup> George T. Davis <sup>7</sup> Tames Freeman Clarke, a Unitarian minister

Benjamin Peirce, an eminent mathematician, was associate member of the Royal Astronomical Society of London and honorary member of the Royal Society of London.

There's a boy, we pretend, with a three-deckerbrain.

That could harness a team with a logical chain: When he spoke for our manhood in syllabled

We called him "The Justice," but now he's "The Squire."

And there's a nice youngster of excellent pith,— Fate tried to conceal him by naming him Smith: 10

But he shouted a song for the brave and the

Just read on his medal, "My country, of thee!"

You hear that boy laughing?—You think he's all fun:

But the angels laugh, too, at the good he has

The children laugh loud as they troop to his

And the poor man that knows him laughs loudest of all!

Yes, we're boys,-always playing with tongue or with pen,-

And I sometimes have asked.—Shall we ever be men?

Shall we always be youthful and laughing and

Till the last dear companion drops smiling away?

Then here's to our boyhood, its gold and its

The stars of its winter, the dews of its May! And when we have done with our life-lasting

Dear Father, take care of thy children, THE BOYS!

1859 1859

INTERNATIONAL ODE 11

OUR FATHERS' LAND

God bless our Fathers' Land! Keep her in heart and hand One with our own! From all her foes defend, Be her brave People's Friend, On all her realms descend. Protect her Throne!

Benjamin R. Curtis, Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States 1851-1857
 Samuel Francis Smith, author of "America"

"Sung in unison by twelve hundred children of the public schools, at the visit of the Prince of Wales to Boston, October 18, 1860; air, "God Save the Queen" [Holmes's note]

10

1860

21

41

91

Father, with loving care,
Guard Thou her kingdom's Heir,
Guide all his ways:
Thine arm his shelter be,
From him by land and sea
Bid storm and danger flee,
Prolong his days!

Lord, let War's tempest cease, Fold the whole Earth in peace Under Thy wings!

Make all Thy nations one, All hearts beneath the sun, Till Thou shalt reign alone, Great King of kings!

1860

TO MY READERS

Nay, blame me not; I might have spared Your patience many a trivial verse, Yet these my earlier welcome shared, So, let the better shield the worse.

And some might say, "Those ruder songs Had freshness which the new have lost; To spring the opening leaf belongs, The chestnut-burs await the frost."

When those I wrote, my locks were brown,
When these I write—ah, well-a-day!

The autumn thistle's silvery down
Is not the purple bloom of May!

Go, little book, whose pages hold
Those garnered years in loving trust;
How long before your blue and gold <sup>1</sup>
Shall fade and whiten in the dust?

O sexton of the alcoved tomb,
Where souls in leathern cerements lie,
Tell me each living poet's doom!
How long before his book shall die?

It matters little, soon or late,
A day, a month, a year, an age,—
I read oblivion in its date,
And Finis on its title-page.

Before we sighed, our griefs were told; Before we smiled, our joys were sung; And all our passions shaped of old In accents lost to mortal tongue.

In vain a fresher mold we seek,—
Can all the varied phrases tell

<sup>1</sup> This poem was written to introduce the "Blue and Gold" edition of Holmes's poems. That Babel's wandering children <sup>2</sup> speak How thrushes sing or lilacs smell?

Caged in the poet's lonely heart,

Love wastes unheard its tenderest tone;
The soul that sings must dwell apart,

Its inward melodies unknown.

Deal gently with us, ye who read!
Our largest hope is unfulfilled,—
The promise still outruns the deed,—
The tower, but not the spire, we build. <sup>3</sup>

Our whitest pearl we never find; Our ripest fruit we never reach; The flowering moments of the mind Drop half their petals in our speech.

These are my blossoms; if they wear
One streak of morn or evening's glow,
Accept them; but to me more fair
The buds of song that never blow.

1862

DOROTHY Q.

A FAMILY PORTRAIT 4

Grandmother's mother: her age, I guess, Thirteen summers, or something less; Girlish bust, but womanly air; Smooth, square forehead with uprolled hair; Lips that lover has never kissed; Taper fingers and slender wrist; Hanging sleeves of stiff brocade; So they painted the little maid.

On her hand a parrot green
Sits unmoving and broods serene.
Hold up the canvas full in view,—
Look! there's a rent the light shines through,
Dark with a century's fringe of dust,—
That was a Red-Coat's rapier-thrust!
Such is the tale the lady old,
Dorothy's daughter's daughter, told.

Who the painter was none may tell,— One whose best was not over well; Hard and dry, it must be confessed, Flat as a rose that has long been pressed; Yet in her cheek the hues are bright, Dainty colors of red and white,

Genesis xi, 9
 Dorothy Quincy, Holmes's great-grandmother, was a niece of Josiah Quincy, a patriot of pre-Revolutionary times, whose son, the distinguished Josiah Quincy, was statesman, orator, and historian. The name came into England with the Norman Conquest as De or de Quincey, the form used by the English essayist.

20

40

And in her slender shape are seen Hint and promise of stately mien.

Look not on her with eyes of scorn,—Dorothy Q. was a lady born!

Ay! since the galloping Normans came,
England's annals have known her name;
And still to the three-hilled rebel town 1

Dear is that ancient name's renown,
For many a civic wreath they won,
The youthful sire and the gray-haired son.

O Damsel Dorothy! Dorothy Q.! Strange is the gift that I owe to you; Such a gift as never a king Save to daughter or son might bring,—All my tenure of heart and hand, All my title to house and land; Mother and sister and child and wife And joy and sorrow and death and life!

What if a hundred years ago
Those close-shut lips had answered No,
When forth the tremulous question came
That cost the maiden her Norman name,
And under the folds that look so still
The bodice swelled with the bosom's thrill?
Should I be I, or would it be
One tenth another, to nine tenths me?

Soft is the breath of a maiden's YES:
Not the light gossamer stirs with less;
But never a cable that holds so fast
Through all the battles of wave and blast,
And never an echo of speech or song
That lives in the babbling air so long!
There were tones in the voice that whispered

You may hear today in a hundred men.

O lady and lover, how faint and far
Your images hover,—and here we are.
Solid and stirring in flesh and bone,—
Edward's <sup>2</sup> and Dorothy's—all their own,—
A goodly record for Time to show
Of a syllable spoken so long ago!—
Shall I bless you, Dorothy, or forgive
For the tender whisper that bade me live?

It shall be a blessing, my little maid!

I will heal the stab of the Red-Coat's blade,
And freshen the gold of the tarnished frame,
And gild with a rime your household name
So you shall smile on us brave and bright

As first you greeted the morning's light,
And live untroubled by woes and fears
Through a second youth of a hundred years.

1871
1871

HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET

DEDICATED BY A CONTRIBUTOR TO THE COL-LEGIAN, 1830, TO THE EDITORS OF THE HARVARD ADVOCATE, 1876.

T was on the famous trotting-ground, The betting men were gathered round From far and near; the "cracks" were there Whose deeds the sporting prints declare: The swift g. m., 3 Old Hiram's nag. The fleet s. h., 4 Dan Pfeiffer's brag, With these a third-and who is he That stands beside his fast b. g.? 5 Budd Doble, whose catarrhal name 10 So fills the nasal trump of fame. There too stood many a noted steed Of Messenger and Morgan breed; Green horses also, not a few; Unknown as yet what they could do; And all the hacks that know so well The scourgings of the Sunday swell.

Blue are the skies of opening day; The bordering turf is green with May; The sunshine's golden gleam is thrown 20 On sorrel, chestnut, bay, and roan; The horses paw and prance and neigh, Fillies and colts like kittens play, And dance and toss their rippled manes Shining and soft as silken skeins; Wagons and gigs are ranged about, And fashion flaunts her gay turn-out; Here stands-each youthful Jehu's dream-The jointed tandem, ticklish team! And there in ampler breadth expand 30 The splendors of the four-in-hand; On faultless ties and glossy tiles The lovely bonnets beam their smiles; (The style's the man, so books avow: The style's the woman, anyhow); From flounces frothed with creamy lace Peeps out the pug-dog's smutty face, Or spaniel rolls his liquid eye, Or stares the wiry pet of Skye,-O woman, in your hours of ease 40 So shy with us, so free with these! 6

<sup>3</sup> gray mare
<sup>4</sup> sorrel horse
<sup>5</sup> bay gelding (Budd Doble was a man well known in racing circles as was probably Dan Pfeiffer.)
<sup>6</sup> a parody on the lines in Scott's Marmion vi, 30:

"O, woman! in our hours of ease

"O, woman! in our hours of ease Uncertain, coy, and hard to please"

&lt;sup>1</sup> Boston was originally called Trimountaine because it was built on the three-topped hill afterwards called Beacon Hill.

Dorothy Quincy married Edward Jackson.

an

50

"Come on! I'll bet you two to one I'll make him do it!" "Will you?

Done!"

What was it who was bound to do? I did not hear and can't tell you,—Pray listen till my story's through. Scarce noticed, back behind the rest. By cart and wagon rudely prest, The parson's lean and bony bay Stood harnessed in his one-horse shay—Lent to his sexton for the day; (A funeral—so the sexton said; His mother's uncle's wife was dead).

Like Lazarus bid to Dives' feast, ¹
So looked the poor forlorn old beast;
His coat was rough, his tail was bare.
The gray was sprinkled in his hair;
Sportsmen and jockeys knew him not
And yet they say he once could trot
Among the fleetest of the town,
Till something cracked and broke him down.—
The steed's, the statesman's, common lot!
"And are we then so soon forgot?"
Ah me! I doubt if one of you
Has ever heard the name "Old Blue."
Whose fame through all this region rung
In those old days when I was young!

"Bring forth the horse!" <sup>2</sup> Alas! he showed Not like the one Mazeppa rode; Scant-maned, sharp-backed, and shaky-kneed. The wreck of what was once a steed, To Lips thin, eyes hollow, stiff in joints; Yet not without his knowing points. The sexton laughing in his sleeve, As if 't were all a make-believe, Led forth the horse, and as he laughed Unhitched the breeching from a shaft, Unclasped the rusty belt beneath. Drew forth the snaffle from his teeth. Slipped off his head-stall, set him free From strap and rein,—a sight to see!

So worn, so lean, in every limb, It can't be they are saddling him! It is! his back the pig-skin strides And flaps his lank, rheumatic sides; With look of mingled scorn and mirth They buckle round the saddle-girth;

With horsy wink and saucy toss A youngster throws his leg across, And so, his rider on his back, They lead him, limping, to the track, Far up behind the starting-point, To limber out each stiffened joint.

As through the jeering crowd he past, One pitying look old Hiram cast; "Go it, ye cripple, while ye can!" Cried out unsentimental Dan; "A Fast-Day dinner for the crows!" Budd Doble's scoffing shout arose.

Slowly, as when the walking-beam
First feels the gathering head of steam.
With warning cough and threatening wheeze
The stiff old charger crooks his knees;
At first with cautious step sedate,
As if he dragged a coach of state;
He's not a colt; he knows full well
That time is weight and sure to tell;
No horse so sturdy but he fears
The handicap of twenty years.

As through the throng on either hand
The old horse nears the judges' stand,
Beneath his jockey's feather-weight
He warms a little to his gait,
And now and then a step is tried
That hints of something like a stride.

"Go!"—Through his ear the summons stung As if a battle-trump had rung;
The slumbering instincts long unstirred Start at the old familiar word;
It thrills like flame through every limb—What means his twenty years to him?
The savage blow his rider dealt Fell on his hollow flanks unfelt;
The spur that pricked his staring hide Unheeded tore his bleeding side;
Alike to him are spur and rein,—He steps a five-year-old again!

Before the quarter pole was past,
Old Hiram said, "He's going fast."
Long ere the quarter was a half,
The chuckling crowd had ceased to laugh;
Tighter his frightened jockey clung
As in a mighty stride he swung,
The gravel flying in his track,
His neck stretched out, his ears laid back,
His tail extended all the while
Behind him like a rat-tail file!
Off went a shoe,—away it spun,
Shot like a bullet from a gun;

Lazarus ate only the crumbs from Dives' table. Luke xvi, 21.
 Byron's Maseppa, 9:

&quot;Bring forth the horse!"—the horse was brought;
In truth, he was a noble steed . . .
Who looked as though the speed of thought Were in his limbs".

The quaking jockey shapes a prayer
From scraps of oaths he used to swear;
He drops his whip, he drops his rein,
He clutches fiercely for a mane;
He'll lose his hold—he sways and reels—
He'll slide beneath those trampling heels!
The knees of many a horseman quake,
The flowers on many a bonnet shake,
And shouts arise from left and right,
"Stick on! Stick on!" "Hould tight! Hould tight!"

"Cling round his neck and don't let go—
That pace can't hold—there! steady! whoa!"
But like the sable steed that bore
The spectral lover of Lenore,
His nostrils snorting foam and fire,
No stretch his bony limbs can tire;
And now the stand he rushes by,
And "Stop him!—stop him!" is the cry.
Stand back! he's only just begun—
He's having out three heats in one!

"Don't rush in front! he'll smash your brains; But follow up and grab the reins!" Old Hiram spoke. Dan Pfeiffer heard. And sprang impatient at the word; Budd Doble started on his bay. Old Hiram followed on his gray, And off they spring, and round they go, The fast ones doing "all they know." Look! twice they follow at his heels. As round the circling course he wheels, And whirls with him that clinging boy 170 Like Hector round the walls of Troy; 2 Still on, and on, the third time round! They're tailing off! they're losing ground! Budd Doble's nag begins to fail! Dan Pfeiffer's sorrel whisks his tail! And see! in spite of whip and shout, Old Hiram's mare is giving out! Now for the finish! at the turn, The old horse—all the rest astern— Comes swinging in, with easy trot; 180 By Jove! he's distanced all the lot!

That trot no mortal could explain; Some said, "Old Dutchman 3 come again!" Some took his time,—at least they tried, But what it was could none decide; One said he couldn't understand What happened to his second hand; One said 2:10; that couldn't beMore like two twenty-two or -three; Old Hiram settled it at last; "The time was two—too dee-vel-ish fast!"

The parson's horse had won the bet;
It cost him something of a sweat;
Back in the one-horse shay he went;
The parson wondered what it meant,
And murmured, with a mild surprise
And pleasant twinkle of the eyes,
"That funeral must have been a trick,
Or corpses drive at double-quick;
I shouldn't wonder, I declare,
If brother, Jehu made the prayer!"

And this is all I have to say About the parson's poor old bay, The same that drew the one-hoss shay.

Moral for which this tale is told: A horse can trot, for all he's old. 1876

1876

From THE AUTOCRAT OF THE BREAK-FAST-TABLE *

EVERY MAN HIS OWN BOSWELL $^{5}$

From 1

I was just going to say, when I was interrupted, that one of the many ways of classifying minds is under the heads of arithmetical and algebraical intellects. All economical and practical wisdom is an extension or variation of the following arithmetical formula: 2+2=4. Every philosophical proposition has the more general character of the expression a+b=c. We are mere operatives, empirics, and egotists, until we learn to think in letters instead of

They all stared. There is a divinity student lately come among us to whom I commonly Holmes in his introduction wrote: "The interruption referred to in the first sentence of the first of these papers was just a quarter of a century in duration. Two articles entitled The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table will be found in The New England Magazine, formerly published in Boston by J. T. and E. Buckinghem. The date of the first of these articles is November, 1831, and that of the second February, 1832. When The Atlantic Monthly was begun, twenty-five years afterwards, and the author was asked to write for it, the recollection of these crude products of his uncombed literary boyhood suggested the thought that it would be a curious experiment to shake the same hough again, and see if the ripe fruit were better or worse than the early windfalls. So began this series of papers, " series of papers, . . . "

Biographer of Dr. Samuel Johnson; his success lay largely in the minuteness of detail with which he recorded Johnson's life, especially his conversation.

&lt;sup>1</sup> In the ballad "Lenore" by the German poet Burger (1748-1794) the heroine is borne away by a specter lover on a specter steed. The same story is told in Scott's "William and Helen."
<sup>2</sup> Iliad xxii

<sup>3</sup> a champion American trotter

address remarks like the above, allowing him to take a certain share in the conversation, so far as assent or pertinent questions are involved. He abused his liberty on this occasion by presuming to say that Leibnitz 1 had the same observation.-No. sir. I replied, he has not. But he said a mighty good thing about mathematics, that sounds something like it, and you found it. not in the original, but quoted by Dr. Thomas Reid. 2 I will tell the company what he did say, one of these days.

-If I belong to a Society of Mutual Admiration? 3-I blush to say that I do not at this present moment. I once did, however. was the first association to which I ever heard the term applied: a body of scientific young men in a great foreign city 4 who admired their teacher, and to some extent each other. Many of them deserved it; they have become famous since. It amuses me to hear the talk of one of those beings described by Thackeray-

Letters four do form his name 5

about a social development which belongs to the very noblest stage of civilization. generous companies of artists, authors, philanthropists, men of science, are, or ought to be, Societies of Mutual Admiration. A man of genius, or any kind of superiority, is not debarred from admiring the same quality in another, nor the other from returning his admiration. They may even associate together and continue to think highly of each other. And so of a dozen such men, if any one place is fortunate enough to hold so many. being referred to above assumes several false premises. First, that men of talent necessarily hate each other. Secondly, that intimate knowledge or habitual association destroys our admiration of persons whom we esteemed highly at a distance. Thirdly, that a circle of clever fellows, who meet together to dine and have a German philosopher and mathematician (1646-1716)

 a Scottish philosopher (1710-1796)
 This term was sometimes applied to the Saturday Club in existence in Boston when the Autocrat was being written. It was a dinner-club including as members Holmes, Emerson, Agassiz, Longfallow Lowell and other prominent writters and fellow, Lowell, and other prominent writers and scientists.

scientists.

4 "The 'body of scientific young men in a great foreign city' was the Société d'Observation Medicale, of Paris, of which M. Louis was president, and MM. Barth, Grisotte, and our own Dr. Bowditch were members. They agreed in admiring their justly-honcred president, and thought highly of some of their associates, who have since made good their promise of distinction." [Holmes's note in Riverside Literature Series edition.]

5 Thackeray satirizes the snob in his Book of Snobs.

Thackeray satirizes the snob in his Book of Snobs.

The line Holmes quotes was originally from a political satire by Coleridge upon William Pitt the younger, "Fire, Famine and Slaughter."

a good time, have signed a constitutional compact to glorify themselves and to put down him and the fraction of the human race not belonging to their number. Fourthly, that it is an outrage that he is not asked to join them.

Here the company laughed a good deal, and the old gentleman who sits opposite said:

"That's it! that's it!"

I continued, for I was in the talking vein. As to clever people's hating each other, I think a little extra talent does sometimes make people jealous. They become irritated by perpetual attempts and failures, and it hurts their tempers and dispositions. Unpretending mediocrity is good, and genius is glorious: but a weak flavor of genius in an essentially common person is detestable. It spoils the grand neutrality of a commonplace character, as the rinsings of an unwashed wineglass spoil a draught of fair water. No wonder the poor fellow we spoke of, who always belongs to this class of slightly flavored mediocrities, is puzzled and vexed by the strange sight of a dozen men of capacity working and playing together in harmony. He and his fellows are always fighting. With them familiarity naturally breeds contempt. If they ever praise each other's bad drawings, or broken-winded novels, or spavined verses, nobody ever supposed it was from admiration; it was simply a contract between themselves and a publisher or dealer.

If the Mutuals have really nothing among them worth admiring, that alters the question. But if they are men with noble powers and qualities, let me tell you, that, next to youthful love and family affections, there is no human sentiment better than that which unites the Societies of Mutual Admiration. And what would literature or art be without such associations? Who can tell what we owe to the Mutual Admiration Society of which Shakespeare, and Ben Jonson, and Beaumont and Fletcher were members? 6 Or to that of which Addison and Steele formed the center, and which gave us the Spectator? Or to that where Johnson, and Goldsmith, and Burke, and Reynolds, and Beauclerk, and Boswell, most admiring among all admirers, met together? Was there any great harm in the fact that the Irvings and Paulding wrote in company? or any unpardonable cabal in the literary union of

The Elizabethan dramatists met frequently at the Mermaid Tavern; Addison, Steele, and their friends met at Button's Coffee House; Dr. Samuel Johnson, Oliver Goldsmith, Edmund Burke, Sir Joshua Reynolds the painter, Beauclerk, the friend of Johnson, and Boswell, Johnson's biographer, were all members of The Literary Club in London during the last half of the eighteenth century.

Verplanck and Bryant and Sands, 1 and as many more as they chose to associate with them?

The poor creature does not know what he is talking about when he abuses this noblest of institutions. Let him inspect its mysteries through the knot-hole he has secured, but not use that orifice as a medium for his pop-gun. Such a society is the crown of a literary metropolis; if a town has not material for it, and spirit and good feeling enough to organize it, it is a mere caravansary, fit for a man of genius to lodge in, but not to live in. Foolish people hate and dread and envy such an association of men of varied powers and influence, because it is lofty, serene, impregnable, and, by the necessity of the case, exclusive. Wise ones are prouder of the title M. S. M. A. than of all their other honors put together.

From IV

No, no!—give me a chance to talk to you, my fellow-boarders, and you need not be afraid that I shall have any scruples about entertaining you, if I can do it, as well as giving you some of my serious thoughts, and perhaps my sadder fancies. I know nothing in English or any other literature more admirable than that sentiment of Sir Thomas Browne: <sup>2</sup> "Every MAN TRULY LIVES, SO LONG AS HE ACTS HIS NATURE, OR SOME WAY MAKES GOOD THE FACULTIES OF HIMSELF."

I find the great thing in this world is not so much where we stand, as in what direction we are moving. To reach the port of heaven, we must sail sometimes with the wind and sometimes against it,-but we must sail, and not drift, nor lie at anchor. There is one very sad thing in old friendships, to every mind that is really moving onward. It is this: that one cannot help using his early friends as the seaman uses the log, to mark his progress. Every now and then we throw an old schoolmate over the stern with a string of thought tied to him, and look-I am afraid with a kind of luxurious and sanctimonious compassion—to see the rate at which the string reels off, while he lies there bobbing up and down, poor fellow! and we are dashing along with the white foam and bright sparkle at our bows;—the ruffled bosom of prosperity and progress, with a sprig of diamonds stuck in it! But this is only the sentimental side of the matter; for grow we must, if we outgrow all that we love.

Don't misunderstand that metaphor of heaving the log. I beg you. It is merely a smart way of saying that we cannot avoid measuring our rate of movement by those with whom we have long been in the habit of comparing ourselves; and when they once become stationary. we can get our reckoning from them with painful accuracy. We see just what we were when they were our peers, and can strike the balance between that and whatever we may feel ourselves to be now. No doubt we may sometimes be mistaken. If we change our last simile to that very old and familiar one of a fleet leaving the harbor and sailing in company for some distant region, we can get what we want out of There is one of our companions:—her streamers were torn into rags before she had got into the open sea, then by-and-by her sails blew out of the ropes one after another, the waves swept her deck, and as night came on we left her a seeming wreck, as we flew under our pyramid of canvas. But lo! at dawn she is still in sight,—it may be in advance of us. Some deep ocean-current has been moving her on, strong, but silent,—yes, stronger than these noisy winds that puff our sails until they are swollen as the cheeks of jubilant cherubim. And when at last the black steam-tug with the skeleton arms, which comes out of the mist sooner or later and takes us all in tow, grapples her and goes off panting and groaning with her, it is to that harbor where all wrecks are refitted. and where, alas! we, towering in our pride, may never come.

So you will not think I mean to speak lightly of old friendships, because we cannot help instituting comparisons between our present and former selves by the aid of those who were what we were, but are not what we are. Nothing strikes one more, in the race of life, than to see how many give out in the first half of the course. "Commencement day" always reminds me of the start for the "Derby," 3 when the beautiful highbred three-year olds of the season are brought up for trial. That day is the start, and life is the race. Here we are at Cambridge, and a class is just "graduating." Poor Harry! he was to have been there too, but he has paid forfeit; step out here into the grass back of the church; ah! there it is:-

Washington Irving, his brother William, and their brother-in-law, James K. Paulding, together edited Salmagundi in New York in 1807-1808. Gulian C. Verplanck, Robert C. Sands, and William Cullen Bryant issued an annual called The Talisman.

man, in 1827-30.
2 an English physician and author (1605-1682)

&lt;sup>3</sup> the annual horse race held in May or June at Epsom, southwest of London, and named for its founder, the 12th Earl of Derby

"HUNC LAPIDEM POSITERUNT SOCIL MOERENTES "1

But this is the start, and here they are.coats bright as silk, and manes as smooth as eau lustrale 2 can make them. Some of the best of the colts are pranced round, a few minutes each, to show their paces. What is that old gentleman crying about? and the old lady by him, and the three girls, what are they all covering their eves for? Oh, that is their colt which has just been trotted up on the stage. Do they really think those little thin legs can do anything in such a slashing sweepstakes as is coming off in these next forty years? Oh. this terrible gift of second-sight that comes to some of us when we begin to look through the silvered rings of the arcus senilis! 3

Ten years gone. First turn in the race. A few broken down; two or three bolted. Several show in advance of the ruck. Cassock, a black colt, seems to be ahead of the rest; those black colts commonly get the start. I have noticed, of the others, in the first quarter. Meteor has pulled up.

Twenty years. Second corner turned. Cassock has dropped from the front, and Judex, an iron-gray, has the lead. But look! how they have thinned out? Down flat,-five,-six,how many? They lie still enough! they will not get up again in this race, be very sure! And the rest of them, what a "tailing off!" Anybody can see who is going to win,—perhaps.

Thirty years. Third corner turned. Dives. bright sorrel, ridden by the fellow in a yellow jacket, begins to make play fast; is getting to be the favorite, with many. But who is that other one that has been lengthening his stride from the first, and now shows close up to the front? Don't you remember the guiet brown colt Asteroid, with the star in his forehead? That is he; he is one of the sort that lasts; look out for him! The black "colt," as we used to call him, is in the background, taking it easily in a gentle trot. There is one they used to call the Filly, on account of a certain feminine air he had; well up, you see; the Filly is not to be despised, my boy!

Forty years. More dropping off,—but places much as before.

Fifty years. Race over. All that are on the course are coming in at a walk; no more running. Who is ahead? Ahead? What! and the winning-post a slab of white or gray stone standing out from that turf where there is no more jockeving or straining for victory! Well. the world marks their places in its betting-book: but be sure that these matter very little, if they have run as well as they knew how!

-Did I not say to you a little while ago that the universe swam in an ocean of similitudes and analogies? I will not quote Cowley. 4 or Burns, or Wordsworth, just now, to show vou what thoughts were suggested to them by the simplest natural objects, such as a flower or a leaf; but I will read you a few lines, if you do not object, suggested by looking at a section of one of those chambered shells to which is given the name of Pearly Nautilus. We need not trouble ourselves about the distinction between this and the Paper Nautilus. the Argonauta 5 of the ancients. The name applied to both shows that each has long been compared to a ship, as you may see more fully in Webster's Dictionary, or the "Encyclopedia," to which he refers. If you will look into Roget's Bridgewater Treatise, 6 you will find a figure of one of these shells and a section of it. The last will show you the series of enlarging compartments successively dwelt in by the animal that inhabits the shell, which is built in a widening spiral. Can you find no lesson in this?

THE CHAMBERED NAUTILUS

This is the ship of pearl, which, poets feign,

Sails the unshadowed main. The venturous bark that flings On the sweet summer wind its purpled wings In gulfs enchanted, where the siren sings, And coral reefs lie bare. Where the cold sea-maids rise to sun their streaming hair.

Its webs of living gauze no more unfurl; Wrecked is the ship of pearl! And every chambered cell, Where its dim dreaming life was wont to dwell. As the frail tenant shaped his growing shell.

Before thee lies revealed,-Its irised ceiling rent, its sunless crypt unsealed!

Year after year beheld the silent toil That spread his lustrous coil; Still, as the spiral grew, He left the past year's dwelling for the new,

Abraham Cowley, an English poet, 1618-1667
a species of mollusk
The l'arl of Bridgewater (1758-1829) bequeathed £8,000 for the publishing of works "on the Goodness of God as manifested in the Creation." Dr. P. M. Roget, 1779-1869, wrote on Animal and Vegetable Physiology.

 &quot;Mourning friends have erected this stone."
 water used in ceremonies of purification bow of old age; opaqueness of the edge of the cornea usual in old age

Stole with soft step its shining archway through, Built up its idle door, Stretched in his last-found home, and knew the old no more.

Thanks for the heavenly message brought by thee,
Child of the wandering sea,
Cast from her lap forlorn!
From thy dead lips a clearer note is born
Than ever Triton blew from wreathed horn!
While on mine ear it rings,
Through the deep caves of thought I hear a voice that sings:—

Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea!

From vi

—Every person's feelings have a front-door and a side-door by which they may be entered. The front-door is on the street. Some keep it always open; some keep it latched; some, locked; some, bolted,—with a chain that will let you peep in, but not get in; and some nail it up, so that nothing can pass its threshold. This front-door leads into a passage which opens into an ante-room and this into the interior apartments. The side-door opens at once into the sacred chambers.

There is almost always at least one key to this side-door. This is carried for years hidden in a mother's bosom. Fathers, brothers, sisters, and friends, often, but by no means so universally, have duplicates of it. The wedding-ring conveys a right to one; alas, if none is given with it!

If nature or accident has put one of these keys into the hands of a person who has the torturing instinct, I can only solemnly pronounce the words that Justice utters over its doomed victim,—The Lord have mercy on your soul! You will probably go mad within a reasonable time,—or, if you are a man, run off and die with your head on a curb-stone, in Melbourne or San Francisco,—or, if you are a woman, quarrel and break your heart, or turn into a pale, jointed petrifaction that moves about as if it were alive, or play some real life-tragedy or other.

Be very careful to whom you trust one of these keys of the side-door. The fact of possessing one renders those even who are dear to you very terrible at times. You can keep the world out from your front-door, or receive visitors only when you are ready for them: but those of your own flesh and blood, or of certain grades of intimacy, can come in at the side-door, if they will, at any hour and in any mood. Some of them have a scale of your whole nervous system, and can play all the gamut of your sensibilities in semitones,—touching the naked nerve-pulps as a pianist strikes the keys of his instrument. I am satisfied that there are as great masters of this nerve-playing, as Vieuxtemps 2 or Thalberg in their lines of performance. Married life is the school in which the most accomplished artists in this department are found. A delicate woman is the best instrument; she has such a magnificent compass of sensibilities! From the deep inward moan which follows pressure on the great nerves of right, to the sharp cry as the filaments of taste are struck with a crashing sweep, is a range which no other instrument possesses. A few exercises on it daily at home fit a man wonderfully for his habitual labors, and refresh him immensely as he returns from them. No stranger can get a great many notes of torture out of a human soul; it takes one that knows it well,—parent, child, brother, sister, intimate. Be very careful to whom you give a side-door key; too many have them already.

—You remember the old story of the tender-hearted man, who placed a frozen viper in his bosom, and was stung by it when it became thawed? If we take a cold-blooded creature into our bosom, better that it should sting us and we should die than that its chill should slowly steal into our hearts; warm it we never can! I have seen faces of women that were fair to look upon, yet one could see that the icicles were forming round these women's hearts. I knew what freezing image lay on the white breasts beneath the laces!

A very simple intellectual mechanism answers the necessities of friendship, and even of the most intimate relations of life. If a watch tells us the hour and the minute, we can be content to carry it about with us for a lifetime, though it has no second-hand, and is not a repeater, nor a musical watch,—though it is not enameled nor jeweled,—in short, though it has little beyond the wheels required for a trustworthy instrument, added to a good face and a pair of useful hands. The more wheels there are in a watch or a brain, the more trouble they are to take care of. The movements of exaltation which belong to genius are egotistic by their very nature. A calm. clear mind. not subject to the spasms and crises which are so often met with in creative or intensely perceptive natures, is the best basis for love or friendship.—Observe, I am talking about minds. I won't say, the more intellect, the less capacity for loving; for that would do wrong to the understanding and reason:—but, on the other hand, that the brain often runs away with the heart's best blood, which gives the world a few pages of wisdom or sentiment or poetry, instead of making one other heart happy, I have no auestion.

&lt;sup>1</sup> See the last line of Wordsworth's sonnet "The World Is Too Much With Us:"

&quot;Or hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn."

&lt;sup>2</sup> A Belgian violinist and composer, 1820-1881; Thalberg was a Swiss composer for the piano, 1812-1871.

If one's intimate in love or friendship cannot or does not share all one's intellectual tastes or pursuits, that is a small matter. Intellectual companions can be found easily in men and books. After all, if we think of it, most of the world's loves and friendships have been between people that could not read nor spell.

But to radiate the heat of the affections into a clod, which absorbs all that is poured into it, but never warms beneath the sunshine of smiles or the pressure of hand or lip,—this is the great martyrdom of sensitive beings,-most of all in that perpetual auto da fé 1 where young womanhood is the sacrifice.

From VII 2

As to giving up because the almanac or the Family Bible says that it is about time to do it, I have no intention of doing any such thing. I grant you that I burn less carbon than some years ago. I see people of my standing really good for nothing, decrepit, effete, la lèvre inférieure dejà pendante, 3 with what little life they have left mainly concentrated in their epigastrium. But as the disease of old age is epidemic, endemic, and sporadic, and everybody who lives long enough is sure to catch it, I am going to say, for the encouragement of such as need it, how I treat the malady in my own case.

First. As I feel, that, when I have anything to do, there is less time for it than when I was younger, I find that I give my attention more thoroughly, and use my time more economically than ever before; so that I can learn anything twice as easily as in my earlier days. I am not. therefore, afraid to attack a new study. took up a difficult language a very few years ago with good success, and think of mathematics and metaphysics by-and-by.

Secondly. I have opened my eyes to a good many neglected privileges and pleasures within my reach, and requiring only a little courage You may well suppose it to enjoy them. pleased me to find that old Cato was thinking of learning to play the fiddle, when I had deliberately taken it up in my old age, 4 and satisfied myself that I could get much comfort. if not much music, out of it.

Thirdly. I have found that some of those active exercises, which are commonly thought to belong to young folks only, may be enjoyed at a much later period.

A young friend has lately written an admirable article in one of the journals, entitled, Saints and their Bodies. 5 Approving of his general doctrines, and grateful for his records of personal experience, I cannot refuse to add my own experimental confirmation of his eulogy of one particular form of active exercise and amusement, namely, boating. For the past nine years, I have rowed about, during a good part of the summer, on fresh or salt water. My present fleet on the river Charles consists of three row-boats. 1. A small flat-bottomed skiff of the shape of a flat-iron, kept mainly to lend to boys. 2. A fancy "dory" for two pairs of sculls, in which I sometimes go out with my young folks. 3. My own particular watersulky, a "skeleton" or "shell" race-boat, twentytwo feet long, with huge outriggers, which boat I pull with ten-foot sculls,—alone, of course, as it holds but one, and tips him out, if he doesn't mind what he is about. In this I glide around the Back Bay, down the stream, up the Charles to Cambridge and Watertown, up the Mystic, round the wharves, in the wake of steamboats, which leave a swell after them delightful to rock upon: I linger under the bridges,-those "caterpillar bridges" as my brother professor so happily called them; rub against the black sides of old wood-schooners; cool down under the overhanging stern of some tall Indiaman;

Spanish, literally "act of faith"; the sentence pronounced at a public solemnity by the courts of the Spanish Inquisition, ecclesiastical courts for detecting and trying heretics. Since in capital cases the execution of the offender followed immediately, the phrase came to apply to the execution as well as to the sentence itself.
 What fo'lows is part of the Professor's paper on "Old Are," the first part of which is omitted.
 "the lower lip already drooping"

<sup>4</sup> Cicero in De Sencctute (8) represents Cato as saying, "When I heard what Socrates had done about the lyre, I should have liked for my part to have done that too." Holmes was at this time fortynine.

Thomas Wentworth Higginson in the Atlantic Monthly, March, 1858

stretch across to the Navy-Yard, where the sentinel warns me off from the Ohio,—just as if I should hurt her by lying in her shadow: then strike out into the harbor, where the water gets clear and the air smells of the ocean,till all at once I remember, that, if a west wind blows up of a sudden, I shall drift along past the islands, out of sight of the dear old Statehouse,-plate, tumbler, knife and fork all waiting at home, but no chair drawn up at the table, -all the dear people waiting, waiting, waiting, while the boat is sliding, sliding, sliding into the great desert, where there is no tree and no fountain. As I don't want my wreck to be washed up on one of the beaches in company with devil's-aprons, bladder-weeds, dead horseshoes, and bleached crab-shells. I turn about and flap my long, narrow wings for home. When the tide is running out swiftly. I have a splendid fight to get through the bridges, but always make it a rule to beat,-though I have been jammed up into pretty tight places at times, and was caught once between a vessel swinging round and the pier, until our bones (the boat's that is) cracked as if we had been in the jaws of Behemoth. Then back to my moorings at the foot of the Common, off with the rowing-dress, dash under the green translucent wave, return to the garb of civilization, walk through my Garden, take a look at my elms on the Common, and, reaching my habitat, in consideration of my advanced period of life, indulge in the Elysian abandonment of a huge recumbent chair.

When I have established a pair of well-pronounced feathering-calluses on my thumbs, when I am in training so that I can do my fifteen miles at a stretch without coming to grief in any way, when I can perform my mile in eight minutes or a little less, then I feel as if I had old Time's head in chancery, <sup>1</sup> and could give it to him at my leisure.

I do not deny the attraction of walking. I have bored this ancient city through and through in my daily travels, until I know it as an old inhabitant of a Cheshire knows his cheese. Why, it was I who, in the course of these rambles discovered that remarkable avenue called Myrtle Street, stretching in one long line from east of the Reservoir to a precipitous and rudely paved cliff which looks down on the grim abode of Science, <sup>2</sup> and beyond it to the far hills; a promenade so delicious in its repose, so cheerfully varied with glimpses down the northern slope into busy Cambridge Street with its iron river of the horse-railroad, and wheeled barges gliding back and forward over it,—so delightfully closing at its western extremity in sunny courts and passages where I know peace, and beauty, and virtue, and serene old age must be perpetual tenants,—so alluring to all who desire to take their daily stroll, in the words of Dr. Watts.—

Alike unknowing and unknown-

that nothing but a sense of duty would have prompted me to reveal the secret of its existence. I concede, therefore, that walking is an immeasurably fine invention, of which old age ought constantly to avail itself.

Saddle-leather is in some respects even preferable to sole-leather. The principal objection to it is of a financial character. But you may be sure that Bacon and Sydenham 8 did not recommend it for nothing. One's hepar, or in vulgar language, liver,—a ponderous organ, weighing some three or four pounds,-goes up and down like the dasher of a churn in the midst of the other vital arrangements, at every step of a trotting horse. The brains also are shaken up like coppers in a money-box. Riding is good, for those that are born with a silvermounted bridle in their hand, and can ride as much and as often as they like, without thinking all the time they hear that steady grinding sound as the horse's jaws triturate with calm lateral movement the bank-bills and promises to pay upon which it is notorious that the profligate animal in question feeds day and night.

Instead, however, of considering these kinds of exercise in this empirical way, I will devote a brief space to an examination of them in a more scientific form.

The pleasure of exercise is due first to a purely physical impression, and secondly to a sense of power in action. The first source of pleasure varies of course with our condition and the state of the surrounding circumstances; the second with the amount and kind of power, and the extent and kind of action. In all forms of active exercise there are three powers simultaneously in action,—the will, the muscles, and the intellect. Each of these predominates in different kinds of exercise. In walking, the will and muscles are so accustomed to work together and perform their task with so little expenditure of force, that the intellect is left comparatively free. The mental pleasure in walking, as such, is in the sense of power over all our moving machinery. But in riding, I have the additional pleasure of governing another will, and my muscles extend to the tips of the animal's ears and to his four hoofs, instead of stopping at my hands and feet. Now in this extension of my volition and my physical frame into another animal, my tyrannical instincts and my desire for heroic strength are at once gratified. When the horse ceases to have a will of his own and his muscles require no special attention on your part, then you may live on horseback as Wesley did, 1 and write sermons or take naps, as you like. But you will observe. that, in riding on horseback, you always have a feeling, that, after all, it is not you that do the work, but the animal, and this prevents the satisfaction from being complete.

&lt;sup>1</sup> "In boxing, said of the head caught and securely held under the arm of an opponent."—New Standard Dictionary.

&lt;sup>2</sup> At the extremity of Myrtle St., which runs west from back of the State House, stood the Harvard Medical School of Holmes's day.

&lt;sup>2</sup> See Bacon Of Studies; Sydenham, 1624-1689, was an English physician and writer on medicine.

Now let us look at the conditions of rowing. I won't suppose you to be disgracing yourself in one of those miserable tubs, tugging in which is to rowing the true boat what riding a cow is to bestriding an Arab. You know the Esquimaux kayak, (if that is the name of it), don't you? Look at that model of one over my door. Sharp, rather?—On the contrary, it is a lubber to the one you and I must have; a Dutch fishwife to Psyche, 2 contrasted with what I will tell you about. Our boat, then, is something of the shape of a pickerel, as you look down upon his back, he lying in the sunshine just where the sharp edge of the water cuts in among the lily-pads. It is a kind of giant bod, as one may say,—tight everywhere, except in a little place in the middle, where you sit. Its length is from seven to ten yards, and as it is only from sixteen to thirty inches wide in its widest part, you understand why you want those "outriggers," or projecting iron frames with the rowlocks in which the oars play. My rowlocks are five feet apart; double the greatest width of the boat.

Here you are, then, affoat with a body a rod and a half long, with arms, or wings, as you may choose to call them, stretching more than twenty feet from tip to tip; every volition of yours extending as perfectly into them as if your spinal cord ran down the center strip of your boat, and the nerves of your arms tingled as far as the broad blades of your oars,—oars of spruce, balanced, leathered, and ringed under your own special direction. This, in sober earnest, is the nearest approach to flying that man has ever made or perhaps ever will make. As the hawk sails without flapping his pinions. so you drift with the tide when you will, in the most luxurious form of locomotion indulged to an embodied spirit. But if your blood wants rousing, turn round that stake in the river. which you see a mile from here: and when you come in in sixteen minutes (if you do, for we are old boys, and not champion scullers, you remember), then say if you begin to feel a little warmed up or not! You can row easily and gently all day, and you can row yourself blind and black in the face in ten minutes, just as you like. It has been long agreed that there is no way in which a man can accomplish so much labor with his muscles as in rowing. It is in the boat, then, that man finds the largest extension of his volitional and muscular existence: and vet he may tax both of them so slightly, in that most delicious of exercises, that he shall mentally write his sermon, or his poem. or recall the remarks he has made in company and put them in form for the public, as well as in his easy-chair.

1 during his work as itinerant preacher

<sup>2</sup> the personification of the soul, generally represented as a sylph-like figure

I dare not publicly name the rare joys, the infinite delights, that intoxicate me on some sweet June morning, when the river and bay are smooth as a sheet of beryl-green silk, and I run along ripping it up with my knife-edged shell of a boat, the rent closing after me like those wounds of angels which Milton tells of. 3 but the seam still shining for many a long rood behind me. To lie still over the Flats, where the waters are shallow, and see the crabs crawling and the sculpins gliding busily and silently beneath the boat,-to rustle in through the long harsh grass that leads up some tranquil creek. to take shelter from the sunbeams under one of the thousand-footed bridges, and look down its interminable colonnades, crusted with green and oozy growths, studded with minute barnacles, and belted with rings of dark muscles, while overhead streams and thunders that other river whose every wave is a human soul flowing to eternity as the river below flows to the ocean, -lying there moored unseen, in loneliness so profound that the columns of Tadmor in the Desert 4 could not seem more remote from life,-the cool breeze on one's forehead, the stream whispering against the half-sunken pillars,-why should I tell of these things, that I should live to see my beloved haunts invaded and the waves blackened with boats as with a swarm of water-beetles? What a city of idiots we must be not to have covered this glorious bay with gondolas and wherries, as we have just learned to cover the ice in winter with skaters!

Paradise Lost, vi, 330, 331
 Tadmor or Palmyra, an ancient city situated in an oasis in the desert of Syria, was famous for its temples and colonnaded streets.

I am satisfied that such a set of black-coated. stiff-jointed, soft-muscled, paste-complexioned youth as we can boast in our Atlantic cities never before sprang from loins of Anglo-Saxon lineage. Of the females that are the mates of these males I do not here speak. I preached my sermon from the lay-pulpit on this matter a good while ago. Of course, if you heard it, you know my belief is that the total climatic influences here are getting up a number of new patterns of humanity, some of which are not an improvement on the old model. Clipper-built, sharp in the bows, long in the spars, slender to look at, and fast to go, the ship, which is the great organ of our national life of relation, is but a reproduction of the typical form which the elements impress upon its builder. All this we cannot help: but we can make the best of these influences, such as they are. We have a few good boatmen,-no good horsemen that I hear of,-I cannot speak for cricketing,-but as for any great athletic feat performed by a gentleman in these latitudes, society would drop a man who should run round the Common in five minutes. Some of our amateur fencers, single-stick players, and boxers, we have no reason to be ashamed of. Boxing is rough play, but not too rough for a hearty young fellow. Anything is better than this white-blooded degeneration to which we all tend.

I dropped into a gentlemen's sparring exhibition only last evening. It did my heart good to see that there were a few young and youngish youths left who could take care of their own heads in case of emergency. It is a fine sight. that of a gentleman resolving himself into the primitive constituents of his humanity. Here is a delicate young man now, with an intellectual countenance, a slight figure, a sub-pallid complexion, a most unassuming deportment, a mild adolescent in fact, that any Hiram or Jonathan from between the plowtails would of course expect to handle with perfect ease. Oh, he is taking off his gold-bowed spectacles! Ah, he is divesting himself of his cravat! Why, he is stripping off his coat! Well, here he is, sure enough, in a tight silk shirt, and with two things that look like batter puddings in the place of his fists. Now see that other fellow with another pair of batter puddings,—the big one with the broad shoulders; he will certainly knock the little man's head off, if he strikes him. Feinting, dodging, stopping, hitting, countering.—little man's head not off yet. You might as well try to jump upon your own shadow as to hit the little man's intellectual features. He needn't have taken off the goldbowed spectacles at all. Ouick, cautious, shifty. nimble, cool, he catches all the fierce lunges or gets out of their reach, till his turn comes, and then whack goes one of the batter puddings against the big one's ribs, and bang goes the other into the big one's face, and, staggering, shuffling, slipping, tripping, collapsing, sprawling, down goes the big one in a miscellaneous bundle.—If my young friend, whose excellent article I have referred to, could only introduce the manly art of self-defense among the clergy. I am satisfied that we should have better sermons and an infinitely less guarrelsome churchmilitant. A bout with the gloves would let off the ill-nature, and cure the indigestion, which, united, have embroiled their subject in a bitter controversy. We should then often hear that a point of difference between an infallible and a heretic, instead of being vehemently discussed in a series of newspaper articles, had been settled by a friendly contest in several rounds, at the close of which the parties shook hands and appeared cordially reconciled.

But boxing you and I are too old for, I am afraid. I was for a moment tempted, by the contagion of muscular electricity last evening, to try the gloves with the Benicia Boy, who looked in as a friend to the noble art; but remembering that he had twice my weight and half my age, besides the advantage of his training. I sat still and said nothing.

There is one other delicate point I wish to speak of with reference to old age. I refer to the use of dioptric media which correct the diminished refracting power of the humors of the eye,—in other words, spectacles. I don't use them. All I ask is a large, fair type, a strong daylight or gas-light, and one yard of focal distance, and my eyes are as good as ever. But if your eyes fail, I can tell you something encouraging. There is now living in New York State an old gentleman who, perceiving his sight to fail, immediately took to exercising it on the finest print, and in this way fairly bullied Nature out of her foolish habit of taking liberties at five-and-forty, or thereabout. And now this old gentleman, performs the most extraordinary feats with his pen, showing that his eyes must be a pair of microscopes. I should be afraid to say to you how much he writes in the compass of a half-dime,—whether the Psalms or the Gospels, or the Psalms and the Gospels, I won't be positive.

But now let me tell you this. If the time comes when you must lay down the fiddle and the bow, because your fingers are too stiff, and drop the ten-foot sculls, because your arms are too weak, and after dallying awhile with eyeglasses, come at last to the undisguised reality of spectacles,-if the time comes when that fire of life we spoke of has burned so low that where its flames reverberated there is only the somber stain of regret, and where its coals glowed, only the white ashes that cover the embers of memory,-don't let your heart grow cold, and you may carry cheerfulness and love with you into the teens of your second century. if you can last so long. As our friend, the Poet, once said, in some of those old-fashioned heroics of his which he keeps for his private reading,-

Call him not old, whose visionary brain Holds o'er the past its undivided reign. For him in vain the envious seasons roll Who bears eternal summer in his soul. If yet the minstrel's song, the poet's lay, Spring with her birds, or children with their play, Or maiden's smile, or heavenly dream of art Stir the few life-drops creeping round his heart,—Turn to the record where his years are told,—Count his gray hairs,—they cannot make him old!

End of the Professor's paper.

From IX

[Aquí está encerrada el alma del licenciado Pedro Garcias.

If I should ever make a little book out of these papers, which I hope you are not getting tired of, I suppose I ought to save the above sentence for a motto on the title-page. But I want it now, and must use it. I need not say to you that the words are Spanish, nor that they are to be found in the short Introduction to Gil Blas, nor that they mean, "Here lies buried the soul of the licentiate 1 Pedro Garcias."

I warned all young people off the premises when I began my notes referring to old age. I must be equally fair with old people now. They are earnestly requested to leave this paper to young persons from the age of twelve to that of fourscore years and ten, at which latter period of life I am sure that I shall have at least one youthful reader. You know well enough what I mean by youth and age;—something in the soul, which has no more to do with the color of the hair than the vein of gold in a rock has to do with the grass a thousand feet above it.

I am growing bolder as I write. I think it requires not only youth, but genius, to read this paper. I don't mean to imply that it required any whatsoever to talk what I have here written down. It did demand a certain amount of memory, and such command of the English tongue as is given by a common school education. So much I do claim. But here I have related, at length, a string of trivialities. You must have the imagination of a poet to transfigure them. These little colored patches are stains upon the windows of a human soul: stand on the outside, they are but dull and meaningless spots of color; seen from within, they are glorified shapes with empurpled wings and sunbright aureoles.

My hand trembles when I offer you this. Many times I have come bearing flowers such as my garden grew; but now I offer you this poor, brown, homely growth, you may cast it away as worthless. And yet—and yet—it is something better than flowers; it is a seed-capsule. Many a gardener will cut you a bouquet of his choicest blossoms for small fee, but he does not love to let the seeds of his rarest varieties go out of his own hands.

It is by little things that we know ourselves: a soul would very probably mistake itself for another, when once disembodied, were it not for individual experiences which differ from those of others only in details seemingly trifling. All of us have been thirsty thousands of times, and felt, with Pindar, that water was the best of things. 2 I alone, as I think, of all mankind. remember one particular pailful of water, flavored with the white-pine of which the pail was made, and the brown mug out of which one Edmund, a red-faced and curly-haired boy, was averred to have bitten a fragment in his haste to drink; it being then high summer, and little full-blooded boys feeling very warm and porous in the low-"studded" school-room where Dame Prentiss, dead and gone, ruled over young children, many of whom are old ghosts now, and have known Abraham for twenty or thirty years of our mortal time.

Thirst belongs to humanity, everywhere, in all ages; but that white-pine pail and that brown mug belong to me in particular; and just so of my special relationships with other things and with my race. One could never remember himself in eternity by the mere fact of having loved or hated any more than by that of having thirsted; love and hate have no more individuality in them than single waves in the ocean; —but the accidents or trivial marks which distinguished those whom we loved or hated make their memory our own forever, and with it that of our own personality also.

&lt;sup>1</sup> a person licensed to perform the offices of the church

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;Best of all things is water." Olympian Odes, i, 1.

Therefore, my aged friend of five-and-twenty. or thereabouts, pause at the threshold of this particular record, and ask yourself seriously whether you are fit to read such revelations as are to follow. For observe, you have here no splendid array of petals such as poets offer you, -nothing but a dry shell, containing, if you will get out what is in it, a few small seeds of poems. You may laugh at them, if you like. I shall never tell you what I think of you for so doing. But if you can read into the heart of these things, in the light of other memories as slight, yet as dear to your soul, then you are neither more nor less than a POET, and can afford to write no more verses during the rest of your natural life,-which abstinence I take to be one of the surest marks of your meriting the divine name I have just bestowed upon

May I beg of you who have begun this paper. nobly trusting to your own imagination and sensibilities to give it the significance which it does not lay claim to without your kind assistance,-may I beg of you, I say, to pay particular attention to the brackets which enclose certain paragraphs? I want my "asides," you see, to whisper loud to you who read my notes. and sometimes I talk a page or two to you without pretending that I said a word of it to our boarders. You will find a very long "aside" to you almost as soon as you begin to read. And so, dear young friend, fall to at once. taking such things as I have provided for you; and if you turn them, by the aid of your powerful imagination, into a fair banquet, why, then. peace be with you, and a summer by the still waters of some quiet river, or by some yellow beach, where, as my friend, the Professor, says. you can sit with Nature's wrist in your hand and count her ocean-pulses.]

I should like to make a few intimate revelations relating especially to my early life, if I thought you would like to hear them.

[The schoolmistress turned a little in her chair, and sat with her face directed partly towards me.—Half-mourning now;—purple ribbon. That breastpin she wears has gray hair in it: her mother's no doubt:-I remember our landlady's daughter telling me, soon after the schoolmistress came to board with us, that she had lately "buried a payrent." That's what made her look so pale,-kept the poor dying thing alive with her own blood. Ah! long illness is the real vampyrism: think of living a year or two after one is dead, by sucking the life-blood out of a frail young creature at one's bedside! Well, souls grow white, as well as cheeks, in these holv duties: one that goes in a nurse may come out an angel. -God bless all good women!-to their soft hands and pitying hearts we must all come at last!——The schoolmistress has a better color than when she came.-Too late!-"It might have been."-Amen!-How many thoughts go to a dozen heartbeats, sometimes! There was no long pause after my remark addressed to the company, but in that time I had the train of ideas and feelings I have just given flash through my consciousness sudden and sharp as the crooked red streak that springs out of its black sheath like the creese of a Malay in his death-race, and stabs the earth right and left in its blind rage.

I don't deny that there was a pang in it. yes, a stab; but there was a prayer, too,—the "Amen" belonged to that .- Also, a vision of a four-story brick house, nicely furnished,-I actually saw many specific articles—curtains, sofas, tables, and others, and could draw the patterns of them at this moment,—a brick house, I say, looking out on the water, with a fair parlor, and books and busts and pots of flowers and bird-cages, all complete; and at the window, looking on the water, two of us.— "Male and female created He them."-These two were standing at the window, when a smaller shape that was playing near them looked up at me with such a look that I——poured out a glass of water, drank it all down, and then continued.

I said I should like to tell you some things, such as people commonly never tell, about my early recollections. Should you like to hear them?

Should we like to hear them?—said the schoolmistress;—no, but we should love to.

[The voice was a sweet one, naturally, and had something very pleasant in its tone, just then.—The four-story brick house, which had gone out like a transparency when the light behind it is quenched, glimmered again for a moment; parlor, books, busts, flower-pots. bird-cages, all complete,—and the figures as before.]

We are waiting with eagerness, sir,—said the divinity-student.

The transparency went out as if a flash of black lightning had struck it.]

If you want to hear my confessions, the next thing—I said—is to know whether I can trust you with them. It is only fair to say that there are a great many people in the world that laugh at such things. I think they are fools. but perhaps you don't all agree with me.

Here are children of tender age talked to as if they were capable of understanding Calvin's Institutes, 1 and nobody has honesty or sense enough to tell the plain truth about the little wretches: that they are as superstitious as naked savages, and such miserable spiritual cowards—that is, if they have any imagination -that they will believe anything which is taught them, and a great deal more which they teach themselves.

I was born and bred, as I have told you twenty times, among books and those who knew what was in books. I was carefully instructed in things temporal and spiritual. But up to a considerable maturity of childhood I believed Raphael and Michael Angelo 2 to have been superhuman beings. The central doctrine of the prevalent religious faith of Christendom was utterly confused and neutralized in my mind for years by one of those too common stories of actual life, which I overheard repeated in a whisper.—Why did I not ask? you will say.—You don't remember the rosy pudency of sensitive children. The first instinctive movement of the little creatures is to make a cache, and bury in it beliefs, doubts, dreams, hopes, and terrors. I am uncovering one of these caches. Do you think I was necessarily a greater fool and coward than another?

I was afraid of ships. Why, I could never The masts looked frightfully tall,—but they were not so tall as the steeple of our old yellow meeting-house. At any rate, I used to hide my eyes from the sloops and schooners that were wont to lie at the end of the bridge, and I confess that traces of this undefined terror lasted very long.—One other source of alarm had a still more fearful significance. There was a great wooden HAND,—a glove-maker's sign, which used to swing and creak in the blast, as it hung from a pillar before a certain shop a mile or two outside of the city. Oh, the dreadful hand! Always hanging there ready to catch up a little boy, who would come home to supper no more, nor vet to bed,—whose porringer would be laid away empty thenceforth. and his half-worn shoes wait until his small brother grew to fit them.

As for all manner of superstitious observances. I used once to think I must have been peculiar in having such a list of them, but I now believe that half the children of the same age go through the same experiences. No Roman soothsaver ever had such a catalogue of omens as I found in the Sibvlline leaves" of my childhood. That trick of throwing a stone at a tree and attaching some mighty issue to hitting or missing, which you will find mentioned in one or more biographies, I well remember. Stepping on or over certain particular things or spots—Dr. Johnson's especial weakness-I got the habit of at a very early age.—I won't swear that I have not some tendency to these not wise practices even at this present date. [How many of you that read these notes can say the same thing!]

With these follies mingled sweet delusions, which I loved so well I would not outgrow them, even when it required a voluntary effort to put a momentary trust in them. Here is one which I cannot help telling you.

The firing of the great guns at the Navy-Yard is easily heard at the place where I was born and lived. "There is a ship of war come in," they used to say, when they heard them. Of course, I supposed that such vessels came in unexpectedly, after indefinite years of absence,suddenly as falling stones; and that the great guns roared in their astonishment and delight at the sight of the old war-ship splitting the bay with her cutwater. Now, the sloop-of-war the Wash, 4 Captain Blakely, after gloriously capturing the Reindeer and the Avon, had disappeared from the face of the ocean, and was supposed to be lost. But there was no proof of it, and, of course, for a time, hopes were entertained that she might be heard from. Long after the last real chance had utterly vanished, I pleased myself with the fond illusion that somewhere on the waste of waters she was still floating, and there were years during which I never heard the sound of the great gun booming inland from the Navy-Yard without saying to myself, "The Wasp

 &lt;sup>1</sup> Institutes [foundations] of the Christian Religion, by John Calvin, Basel, 1536
 <sup>2</sup> the most famous Italian painter and sculptor respections.

tively

The sybils were said to have written their prophecies and omens on separate leaves. Once the order was lost the meaning could scarcely be unraveled, though none the less momentous. See Aeneid, iii, 444; vi, 7.1.

an American warship, built in 1814, which overcame the Reindeer June 28, and the Avon Sept. 1, then hailed another vessel Oct. 9, but was never heard has come!" and almost thinking I could see her, as she rolled in, crumpling the water before her, weather-beaten, barnacled, with shattered spars and threadbare canvas, welcomed by the shouts and tears of thousands. This was one of those dreams that I nursed and never told. Let me make a clean breast of it now, and say, that, so late as to have outgrown childhood, perhaps to have got far on towards manhood, when the roar of the cannon has struck suddenly on my ear, I have started with a thrill of vague expectation and tremulous delight, and the long-unspoken words have articulated themselves in the mind's dumb whisper. The Wash has come!

-Yes, children believe plenty of queer things. I suppose all of you have had the pocketbook fever when you were little?-What do I mean? Why, ripping up old pocketbooks in the firm belief that bank-bills to an immense amount were hidden in them.—So. too, you must all remember some splendid unfulfilled promise of somebody or other, which fed you with hopes perhaps for years. and which left a blank in your life which nothing has ever filled up.—O. T. 1 quitted our household carrying with him the passionate regrets of the more youthful members. He was an ingenious youngster; wrote wonderful copies, and carved the two initials given above with great skill on all available surfaces. I thought, by the way, they were all gone; but the other day I found them on a certain door which I will show you some time. How it surprised me to find them so near the ground! I had thought the boy of no trivial dimensions. Well, O. T., when he went, made a solemn promise to two of us. I was to have a ship, and the other a martin-house (last syllable pronounced as in the word tin). Neither ever came; but, oh, how many and many a time I have stolen to the corner,—the cars pass close by it at this time,—and looked up that long avenue, thinking that he must be coming now, almost sure, as I turned to look northward, that there he would be, trudging towards me, the ship in one hand and the martin-house in the other!

[You must not suppose that all I am going to say, as well as all I have said, was told to the whole company. The young fellow whom they call John was in the yard, sitting on a barrel and smoking a cheroot, the fumes of which came in, not ungrateful, through the open window. The divinity-student disappeared in the midst of our talk. The poor relation in black bombazine, who looked and moved as if all her articulations were elbow-joints, had gone off to her chamber, after waiting with a look of soul-subduing decorum at the foot of the stairs until one of the male sort had passed her and ascended into the upper regions. This is a famous point of etiquette in our boardinghouse: in fact, between ourselves, they make such an awful fuss about it, that I, for one, had a great deal rather have them simple enough not to think of such matters at all. Our landlady's daughter said, the other evening, that she was going to "retire"; whereupon the young fellow called John took up a lamp and insisted on lighting her to the foot of the staircase. Nothing would induce her to pass by him, until the schoolmistress, saving in good plain English that it was her bedtime, walked straight by them both, not seeming to trouble herself about either of them.

I have been led away from what I meant the portion included in these brackets to inform my readers about. I say, then, most of the boarders had left the table about the time when I began telling some of these secrets of mine,-all of them, in fact, but the old gentleman opposite and the schoolmistress. I understand why a young woman should like to hear these simple but genuine experiences of early life, which are, as I have said, the little brown seeds of what may yet grow to be poems with leaves of azure and gold: but when the old gentleman pushed up his chair nearer to me, and slanted round his best ear, and once, when I was speaking of some trifling, tender reminiscence, drew a long breath, with such a tremor in it that a little more and it would have been a sob, why, then, I felt there must be something of nature in them which redeemed their seeming insignificance. Tell me, man or woman with whom I am whispering, have you not a small store of recollections, such as these I am uncovering, buried beneath the dead leaves of many summers, perhaps under the unmelting snows of fast-returning winters,—a few such recollections, which, if you should write them all out, would be swept into some careless editor's drawer, and might cost a scanty half-hour's lazy reading to his subscribers,—and yet, if Death should cheat you out of them, you would not know yourself in eternity?

——I made three acquaintances at a very early period of life, my introduction to whom was never forgotten. The first unequivocal act of wrong that has left its trace in my memory was this: refusing a small favor asked of me,—nothing more than telling what had happened at school one morning. No matter who asked it; but there were circumstances which saddened and awed me. I had no heart to speak;—I faltered some miserable, perhaps petulant excuse, stole away, and the first battle of life was lost. What remorse followed I need not tell. Then and there, to the best of my knowledge, I first consciously took Sin by the hand and turned my back on Duty. Time has led me to look upon my offense more leniently; I do not believe it or any other childish wrong is infinite, as some have pretended, but infinitely finite. Yet, oh, if I had but won that battle!

<sup>1</sup> possibly some youthful chore-boy

The great Destroyer, whose awful shadow it. was that had silenced me, came near me,-but never, so as to be distinctly seen and remembered, during my tender years. There flits dimly before me the image of a little girl, whose name even I have forgotten, a schoolmate, whom we missed one day, and were told that she had died. But what death was I never had any very distinct idea, until one day I climbed the low stone wall of the old burialground and mingled with a group that were looking into a very deep, long, narrow hole, dug down through the green sod, down through the brown loam, down through the yellow gravel, and there at the bottom was an oblong red box, and a still, sharp, white face of a young man seen through an opening at one end of it. When the lid was closed, and the gravel and stones rattled down pell-mell, and the woman in black, who was crying and wringing her hands, went off with the other mourners, and left him, then I felt that I had seen Death, and should never forget him.

One other acquaintance I made at an earlier period of life than the habit of romancers authorizes.—Love, of course.—She was a famous beauty afterwards.—I am satisfied that many children rehearse their parts in the drama of life before they have shed all their milkteeth.—I think I won't tell the story of the golden blonde.—I suppose everybody has had his childish fancies; but sometimes they are passionate impulses, which anticipate all the tremulous emotions belonging to a later period. Most children remember seeing and adoring an angel before they were a dozen years old.

[The old gentleman had left his chair opposite and taken a seat by the schoolmistress and myself, a little way from the table.—It's true, it's true,—said the old gentleman.—He took hold of a steel watch-chain, which carried a large, square gold key at one end and was supposed to have some kind of timekeeper at the other. With some trouble he dragged up an ancient-looking, thick, silver, bull's-eye watch. He looked at it for a moment,—hesitated, touched the inner corner of his right eye with the pulp of his middle finger.—looked at the face of the watch.—said it was getting into the forenoon,—then opened the watch and handed me the loose outside case without a word.-The watch-paper had been pink once, and had a faint tinge still, as if all its tender life had not vet quite faded out. Two little birds, a flower, and, in small school-girl letters, a date, -17..-no matter.-Before I was thirteen years old,-said the old gentleman,-I don't know what was in that young schoolmistress's head, nor why she should have done it: but she took out the watch-paper and put it softly to her lips, as if she were kissing the poor thing that made it so long ago. The old gentleman took the watch-paper carefully from her, replaced it, turned away and walked out, holding the watch in his hand. I saw him pass the window a moment after with that foolish white hat on his head; he couldn't have been thinking of what he was about when he put it on. So the schoolmistress and I were left alone. I drew my chair a shade nearer to her, and continued.

And since I am talking of early recollections, I don't know why I shouldn't mention some others that still cling to me,—not that you will attach any very particular meaning to these same images so full of significance to me, but that you will find something parallel to them in your own memory. You remember, perhaps, what I said one day about smells. There were certain sounds also which had a mysterious suggestiveness to me,—not so intense, perhaps, as that connected with the other sense, but yet peculiar, and never to be forgotten.

The first was the creaking of the wood-sleds, bringing their loads of oak and walnut from the country, as the slow-swinging oxen trailed them along over the complaining snow, in the cold, brown light of early morning. Lying in bed and listening to their dreary music had a pleasure in it akin to the Lucretian luxury, 1 or that which Byron speaks of as to be enjoyed in looking on at a battle by one "who hath no friend, no brother there." 2

There was another sound, in itself so sweet, and so connected with one of those simple and curious superstitions of childhood of which I have spoken, that I can never cease to cherish

&lt;sup>1</sup> Later editions of the Autocrat read: "Akin to that which Lucretius describes in witnessing a ship toiling through the waves while we sit at ease on shore." Cf. Lucretius. De Rerum Natura, Bk. II, i, 1. 2 Childe Harold i, 40

a sad sort of love for it. Let me tell the superstitious fancy first. The Puritan "Sabbath," as everybody knows, began at "sundown" on Saturday evening. To such observance of it I was born and bred. As the large, round disk of day declined, a stillness, a solemnity, a somewhat melancholy hush came over us all. It was time for work to cease, and for playthings to be put away. The world of active life passed into the shadow of an eclipse, not to emerge until the sun should sink again beneath the horizon.

It was in this stillness of the world without and of the soul within that the pulsating lullaby of the evening crickets used to make itself most distinctly heard,—so that I well remember I used to think that the purring of these little creatures, which mingled with the batrachian hymns <sup>1</sup> from the neighboring swamp, was peculiar to Saturday evenings. I don't know that anything could give a clearer idea of the quieting and subduing effect of the old habit of observance of what was considered holy time, than this strange, childish fancy.

Yes, and there was still another sound which mingled its solemn cadences with the waking and sleeping dreams of my boyhood. It was heard only at times.—a deep, muffled roar, which rose and fell, not loud, but vast,-a whistling boy would have drowned it for his next neighbor, but it must have been heard over the space of a hundred square miles. I used to wonder what this might be. Could it be the roar of the thousand wheels and the ten thousand footsteps jarring and trampling along the stones of the neighboring city? That would be continuous; but this, as I have said, rose and fell in regular rhythm. I remember being told. and I suppose this to have been the true solution, that it was the sound of the waves, after a high wind, breaking on the long beaches many miles distant. I should really like to know whether any observing people living ten miles, more or less, inland from long beaches,-in such a town, for instance, as Cantabridge, in the eastern part of the Territory of the Massachusetts.—have ever observed any such sound, and whether it was rightly accounted for as above.

Mingling with these inarticulate sounds in the low murmur of memory, are the echoes of certain voices I have heard at rare intervals. I grieve to say it, but our people, I think, have not generally agreeable voices. The marrowy organisms, with skins that shed water like the backs of ducks, with smooth surfaces neatly padded beneath, and velvet linings to their singing-pipes, are not so common among us as that other pattern of humanity with angular outlines and plane surfaces, arid integuments. hair like the fibrous covering of a cocoa-nut in gloss and suppleness as well as color, and voices at once thin and strenuous; -acidulous enough to produce effervescence with alkalis, and stridulous enough to sing duets with the katydids. I think our conversational soprano, as sometimes overheard in the cars, arising from a group of young persons, who may have taken the train at one of our great industrial centers. for instance,—young persons of the female sex. we will say, who have bustled in, full-dressed, engaged in loud strident speech, and who, after free discussion, have fixed on two or more double seats, which having secured, they proceed to eat apples and hand round daguerreotypes,—I say, I think the conversational soprano, heard under these circumstances, would not be among the allurements the old Enemy would put in requisition, were he getting up a new temptation of St. Anthony. 2

There are sweet voices among us, we all know, and voices not musical, it may be, to those who hear them for the first time, yet sweeter to us than any we shall hear until we listen to some warbling angel in the overture to that eternity of blissful harmonies we hope to enjoy. But why should I tell lies? If my friends love me, it is because I try to tell the truth. I never heard but two voices in my life that frightened me by their sweetness.

——Frightened you?—said the schoolmistress.—Yes, frightened me. They made me feel as if there might be constituted a creature with such a chord in her voice to some string in another's soul, that, if she but spoke, he would leave all and follow her, though it were into the jaws of Erebus. 3 Our only chance to keep our wits is, that there are so few natural chords between others' voices and this string in our souls, and that those which at first may have jarred a little, by-and-by come into harmony with it.—But I tell you this is no fiction. You may call the story of Ulysses and the Sirens a fable, but what will you say to Mario and the poor lady who followed him? 4

<sup>1</sup> frog choruses

&lt;sup>2</sup> Anthony the Great 2x1-3x6. an ascetic, was often sorely tempted by the devil who, he said, appeared to him in the shape of beautiful women.
<sup>3</sup> hell

The sirens by their sweet music tempted sailors to turn aside from their course only to be dashed upon treacherous rocks. Mario, 1810-1883, was an Italian overa singer. A lady, whose name is not given and who never spoke to him nor sought to win his favor, was, throughout thirty years, present at all but three performances of his.

---Whose were those two voices that bewitched me so?-They both belonged to German women. One was a chambermaid, not otherwise fascinating. The key of my room at a certain great hotel was missing, and this Teutonic maiden was summoned to give information respecting it. The simple soul was evidently not long from her motherland, and spoke with sweet uncertainty of dialect. But to hear her wonder and lament and suggest, with soft. liquid inflections, and low, sad murmurs, in tones as full of serious tenderness for the fate of the lost key as if it had been a child that had strayed from its mother, was so winning, that, had her features and figure been as delicious as her accents,-if she had looked like the marble Clytie, 1 for instance,—why, all I can sav is-that I stopped short.]

[The schoolmistress opened her eyes so wide.

I was only going to say that I should have drowned myself. For Lake Erie was close by and it is so much better to accept asphyxia. which takes only three minutes by the watch. than a mésalliance, that lasts fifty years to begin with, and then passes along down the line of descent, (breaking out in all manner of boorish manifestations of feature and manner. which, if men were only as short-lived as horses. could be readily traced back through the squareroots and the cube-roots of the family stem on which you have hung the armorial bearings of the De Champignons or the De la Morues. 2 until one came to beings that ate with knives and said "Haow?"), that no person of right feeling could have hesitated for a single moment.

The second of the ravishing voices I have heard, was, as I have said, that of another German woman.—I suppose I shall ruin myself by saying that such a voice could not have come from any Americanized human being.

—What was there in it?—said the school-mistress,—and, upon my word, her tones were so very musical, that I almost wished I had said three voices instead of two, and not made the unpatriotic remark above reported.—Oh. I said, it had so much woman in it,—muliebrity, as well as femineity;—no self-assertion, such as free suffrage introduces into every word and movement; large, vigorous nature, running back to those huge-limbed Germans of Tacitus, 4 but subdued by the reverential training and tuned by the kindly culture of fifty generations. Sharp business habits, a lean soil, independence, enterprise, and east winds, are not the best things for the larynx. Still, you hear noble voices among us,—I have known families famous for them,—but ask the first person you meet a question, and ten to one there is a hard, sharp, metallic, matter-of-business clink in the accents of the answer, that produces the effect of one of those bells which small trades-people connect with their shop-doors, and which spring upon your ear with such vivacity, as you enter, that your first impulse is to retire at once from the precincts.

——Ah, but I must not forget that dear little child I saw and heard in a French hospital. Between two and three years old. Fell out of her chair and snapped both thigh-bones. Lying in bed, patient, gentle. Rough students round her, some in white aprons, looking fearfully business-like; but the child placid, perfectly still. I spoke to her, and the blessed little creature answered me in a voice of such heavenly sweetness, with that reedy thrill in it which you have heard in the thrush's even-song, that I hear it at this moment, while I am writing so many, many years afterwards.—C'est tout comme un serin 5 said the French student at my side

These are the voices which struck the keynote of my conceptions as to what the sounds we are to hear in heaven will be, if we shall enter through one of the twelve gates of pearl. There must be other things besides aërolites that wander from their own spheres to ours: and when we speak of celestial sweetness or beauty, we may be nearer the literal truth than we dream. If mankind generally are the shipwrecked survivors of some pre-Adamitic cataclysm, set adrift in these little open boats of humanity to make one more trial to reach the shore.--as some grave theologians have maintained,—if, in plain English, men are the ghosts of dead devils who have "died into life," (to borrow an expression from Keats), and walk the earth in a suit of living rags which lasts three or four score summers,-why, there must have been a few good spirits sent to keep them company, and these sweet voices I speak of must belong to them.

——I wish you could once hear my sister's voice,—said the schoolmistress.

If it is like yours, it must be a pleasant one,—said I.

I never thought mine was anything,—said the schoolmistress.

&lt;sup>1</sup> A nymph beloved by Apollo; a Clytie in marble was a frequent New England parlor decoration in Holmes's day.

the De Mushrooms and De la Codfishes: the newly rich Mulier is Latin for woman.

* Roman historian, 55-117, author of De Germania, the first systematic description of the Germans

<sup>5 &</sup>quot;It is quite like a canary."

How should you know?-said I.-People never hear their own voices,-any more than they see their own faces. There is not even a looking-glass for the voice. Of course, there is something audible to us when we speak: but that something is not our own voice as it is known to all our acquaintances. I think, if an image spoke to us in our own tones, we should not know them in the least.—How pleasant it would be, if in another state of being we could have shapes like our former selves for playthings,—we standing outside or inside of them, as we liked, and they being to us just what we used to be to others!

—I wonder if there will be nothing like what we call "play," after our earthly toys are broken.—said the schoolmistress.

Hush,-said I,-what will the divinitystudent sav?

[I thought she was hit, that time;—but the shot must have gone over her, or on one side of her: she did not flinch.]

Oh,-said the schoolmistress,-he must look out for my sister's heresies; I am afraid he will be too busy with them to take care of mine.

Do you mean to say,—said I,—that it is your sister whom that student-

The young fellow commonly known as John, who had been sitting on the barrel, smoking, jumped off just then, kicked over the barrel, gave it a push with his foot that set it rolling, and stuck his saucy-looking face in at the window so as to cut my question off in the middle; and the schoolmistress leaving the room a few minutes afterwards, I did not have a chance to finish it.

The young fellow came in and sat down in a chair, putting his heels on the top of another. Pooty girl,—said he.

A fine young lady,—I replied.

Keeps a fust-rate school, according to accounts,—said he,—teaches all sorts of things,— Latin and Italian and music. Folks rich once. -smashed up. She went right ahead as smart as if she'd been born to work. That's the kind o' girl I go for. I'd marry her, only two or three other girls would drown themselves, if I

I think the above is the longest speech of this young fellow's which I have put on record. I do not like to change his peculiar expressions, for this is one of those cases in which the style is the man, as M. de Buffon 1 says. The fact is, the young fellow is a good-hearted creature enough, only too fond of his jokes,-and if it were not for those heat-lightning winks on one side of his face. I should not mind his fun much. 1

From XI

Should you like to hear what moderate wishes life brings one to at last? I used to be very ambitious,-wasteful, extravagant, and luxurious in all my fancies. Read too much in the Arabian Nights. Must have the lamp. couldn't do without the ring. Exercise every morning on the brazen horse. Plump down into castles as full of little milk-white princesses as a nest is of young sparrows. All love me dearly at once.—Charming idea of life, but too highcolored for the reality. I have outgrown all this: my tastes have become exceedingly primitive,—almost, perhaps, ascetic. We carry happiness into our condition, but must not hope to find it there. I think you will be willing to hear some lines which embody the subdued and limited desires of my maturity.

CONTENTMENT

"Man wants but little here below." 2

Little I ask; my wants are few: I only wish a hut of stone. (A very plain brown stone will do.)

That I may call my own; And close at hand is such a one. In yonder street that fronts the sun.

Plain food is quite enough for me; Three courses are as good as ten:-If Nature can subsist on three.

Thank Heaven for three. Amen! I always thought cold victual nice:— My choice would be vanilla-ice.

I care not much for gold or land;— Give me a mortgage here and there.— Some good bank-stock,—some note of hand,

10

20

Or trifling railroad share;— I only ask that Fortune send A little more than I shall spend.

Honors are silly toys, I know, And titles are but empty names;— I would, perhaps, be Plenipo,—3

Goldsmith, The Hermit, stanza eight, but probably taken by Goldsmith from Young's Night Thoughts, iv, 118, "Man warts but little, nor that little long." 3 Minister Plenipotentiary-a representative of a country sent to a foreign state

Count de Buffon, 1707-1788, a French naturalist celebrated in literature for his essay on style which contains the words quoted, "Le style est l'homme même."

20

10

70

But only near St. James;— I'm very sure I should not care To fill our Gubernator's chair.

Jewels are baubles; 'tis a sin
To care for such unfruitful things;—
One good-sized diamond in a pin,—
Some, not so large, in rings,—
A ruby, and a pearl, or so,
Will do for me;—I laugh at show.

My dame should dress in cheap attire; (Good, heavy silks are never dear;) I own perhaps I might desire

Some shawls of true cashmere,—
Some marrowy crapes of China silk,

Like wrinkled skins on scalded milk.

I would not have the horse I drive
So fast that folks must stop and stare;
An easy gait—two, forty-five—
Suits me; I do not care;—
Perhaps, for just a single spurt,
Some seconds less would do no hurt.

Of pictures, I should like to own
Titians and Raphaels three or four.—
I love so much their style and tone,—
One Turner, and no more,—
(A landscape,—foreground golden dirt,—
The sunshine painted with a squirt.)

Of books but few,—some fifty score
For daily use, and bound for wear;
The rest upon an upper floor;—
Some little luxury there
Of red morocco's gilded gleam,
And vellum rich as country cream.

Busts, cameos, gems,—such things as these,
Which others often show for pride,
I value, for their power to please,
And selfish churls deride;—
One Stradivarius, I confess,
Two Meerschaums, I would fain possess.

Wealth's wasteful tricks I will not learn,
Nor ape the glittering upstart fool;—
Shall not carved tables serve my turn,
But all must be of buhl? 2.
Circa greening pomp its double share.

But all must be of buhl? 2. Give grasping pomp its double share.—I ask but one recumbent chair.

Thus humble let me live and die,
Nor long for Midas' golden touch;
If Heaven more generous gifts deny,
I shall not miss them much,—
Too grateful for the blessing lent
Of simple tastes and mind content!

MY LAST WALK WITH THE SCHOOL-

(A Parenthesis)

I can't say just how many walks she and I had taken together before this one. I found the effect of going out every morning was decidedly favorable on her health. Two pleasing dimples, the places for which were just marked when she came, played, shadowy, in her freshening cheeks when she smiled and nodded goodmorning to me from the school-house-steps.

I am afraid I did the greater part of the talking. At any rate, if I should try to report all that I said during the first half-dozen walks we took together, I fear that I might receive a gentle hint from my friends the publishers, that a separate volume, at my own risk and expense, would be the proper method of bringing them before the public.

 I would have a woman as true as Death. At the first real lie which works from the heart outward, she should be tenderly chloroformed into a better world, where she can have an angel for a governess, and feed on strange fruits which will make her all over again, even to her bones and marrow.—Whether gifted with the accident of beauty or not, she should have been molded in the rose-red clay of Love, before the breath of life made a moving mortal of her. Love-capacity is a congenital endowment; and I think, after a while, one gets to know the warm-hued natures it belongs to from the pretty pipe-clay counterfeits of them.-Proud she may be, in the sense of respecting herself; but pride. in the sense of contemning others less gifted than herself, deserves the two lowest circles of a vulgar woman's Inferno, where the punishments are Smallpox and Bankruptcy.-She who nips off the end of a brittle courtesy, as one breaks the tip of an icicle, to bestow upon those whom she ought cordially and kindly to recognize, proclaims the fact that she comes not merely of low blood, but of bad blood. Consciousness of unquestioned position makes people gracious in proper measure to all; but if a woman puts on airs with her real equals, she has something about herself or her family she is ashamed of, or ought to be. Middle, and more than middle-aged people, who know family histories, generally see through it. An official of standing was rude to me once. Oh, that is the maternal grandfather,—said a wise old friend to me,—he was a boor.—Better too few words, from the woman we love, than too many: while she is silent, Nature is working for her; while she talks, she is working for herself.—Love is sparingly soluble in the words of men; therefore they speak much of it; but one syllable of woman's speech can dissolve more of it than a man's heart can hold.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The paintings of the Italians Titian (1477-1576) and Raphael (1483-1520) and of the English Turner (1775-1851) are of priceless value. <sup>2</sup> inlaid work of tortoise shell, mother of pearl, and metal

&lt;sup>2</sup> In the Greek myth, everything King Midas touched turned to gold—even his food.

— Whether I said any or all of these things to the schoolmistress, or not,—whether I stole them out of Lord Bacon,—whether I cribbed them from Balzac, ¹ whether I dipped them from the ocean of Tupperian wisdom,—or whether I have just found them in my head, laid there by that solemn fowl, Experience (who, according to my observation, cackles oftener than she drops real live eggs), I cannot say. Wise men have said more foolish things,—and foolish men, I don't doubt, have said as wise things. Anyhow, the schoolmistress and I had pleasant walks and long talks, all of which I do not feel bound to report.

——You are a stranger to me, Ma'am.—I don't doubt you would like to know all I said to the schoolmistress.—I sha'n't do it;—I had rather get the publishers to return the money you have invested in this. Besides, I have forgotten a good deal of it. I shall tell only what I like of what I remember.

-My idea was, in the first place, to search out the picturesque spots which the city affords a sight of, to those who have eyes. I know a good many, and it was a pleasure to look at them in company with my young friend. There were the shrubs and flowers in the Franklin-Place front-yards or borders. Commerce is just putting his granite foot upon them. Then there are certain small seraglio-gardens, into which one can get a peep through the crevices of high fences,-one in Myrtle Street, or backing on it,-here and there one at the North and South Ends. Then the great elms in Essex Street. Then the stately horse-chestnuts in that vacant lot in Chambers Street, which hold their outspread hands over your head, (as I said in my poem the other day,) and look as if they were whispering, "May grace, mercy, and peace be with you!"—and the rest of that benediction. Nay, there are certain patches of ground, which, having lain neglected for a time. Nature, who always has her pockets full of seeds, and holes in all her pockets, has covered with hungry plebeian growths, which fight for life with each other, until some of them get broad-leaved and succulent, and you have a coarse vegetable tanestry which Raphael would not have disdained to spread over the foreground of his masterpiece. The Professor pretends that he found such a one in Charles Street, which, in its daredevil impudence of rough-and-tumble vegetation, beat the pretty-behaved flower-beds of the Public Garden as ignominiously as a group of young tatterdemalions playing pitch-and-toss heats a row of Sunday-school-boys with their teacher at their head.

But then the Professor has one of his burrows in that region, and puts everything in high colors relating to it. This is his way about everything—I hold any man cheap,—he said,—of whom nothing stronger can be uttered than that all his geese are swans.—How is that, Professor?—said I;—I should have set you down for one of that sort.—Sir,—said he,—I am proud to say, that Nature has so far enriched me, that I cannot own so much as a duck without seeing in it as pretty a swan as ever swam the basin in the garden of the Luxembourg. And the Professor showed the whites of his eyes devoutly, like one returning thanks after a dinner of many courses.

I don't know anything sweeter than this leaking in of Nature through all the cracks in the walls and floors of cities. You heap up a million tons of hewn rocks on a square mile or two of earth which was green once. The trees look down from the hill-sides and ask each other, as they stand on tiptoe,-"What are these people about?" And the small herbs at their feet look up and whisper back,-"We will go and see." So the small herbs pack themselves up in the least possible bundles, and wait until the wind steals to them at night and whispers, -"Come with me." Then they go softly with it into the great city,—one to a cleft in the pavement, one to a spout on the roof, one to a seam in the marbles over a rich gentleman's bones, and one to the grave without a stone where nothing but a man is buried,-and there they grow, looking down on the generations of men from moldy roofs, looking up from between the less-trodden pavements, looking out through iron cemetery-railings. Listen to them. when there is only a light breath stirring, and you will hear them saying to each other,-

&lt;sup>1</sup> The great French novelist, 1799-1850; Martin Farquhar Tupper, 1810-1889, an inferior English didactic poet, at one time was very popular.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The palace of the Luxembourg in Paris has beautiful formal gardens surrounding an artificial lake.

"Wait awhile!" The words run along the telegraph of those narrow green lines that border the roads leading from the city, until they reach the slope of the hills, and the trees repeat in low murmurs to each other,-"Wait awhile!" By-and-by the flow of life in the streets ebbs and the old leafy inhabitants-the smaller tribes always in front-saunter in, one by one, very careless, seemingly, but very tenacious, until they swarm so that the great stones gape from each other with the crowding of their roots, and the feldspar begins to be picked out of the granite to find them food. At last the trees take up their solemn line of march, and never rest until they have encamped in the market-place. Wait long enough and you will find an old doting oak hugging a huge worn block in its yellow underground arms; that was the cornerstone of the State-House. Oh. so patient is she, this imperturbable Nature!

-Let us cry!-

But all this has nothing to do with my walks and talks with the schoolmistress. I did not say that I would not tell you something about them. Let me alone, and I shall talk to you more than I ought to, probably. We never tell our secrets to people that pump for them.

Books we talked about, and education. It was her duty to know something of these, and of course she did. Perhaps I was somewhat more learned than she, but I found that the difference between her reading and mine was like that of a man's and a woman's dusting a library. The man flaps about with a bunch of feathers; the woman goes to work softly with a cloth. She does not raise half the dust. nor fill her own eyes and mouth with it,-but she goes into all the corners and attends to the leaves as much as to the covers.-Books are the negative pictures of thought, and the more sensitive the mind that receives their images, the more nicely the finest lines are reproduced. A woman (of the right kind), reading after a man, follows him as Ruth followed the reapers of Boaz, 1 and her gleanings are often the finest of the wheat.

But it was in talking of Life that we came most nearly together. I thought I knew something about that,—that I could speak or write about it somewhat to the purpose.

To take up this fluid earthly being of ours as a sponge sucks up water,—to be steeped and soaked in its realities as a hide fills its pores lying seven years in a tan-pit,—to have winnowed every wave of it as a mill-wheel works up the stream that runs through the flume upon its float-boards,-to have curled up in the keenest spasms and flattened out in the laxest languors of this breathing-sickness, which keeps certain parcels of matter uneasy for three or four score years,-to have fought all the devils and clasped all the angels of its delirium.-and then, just at the point when the white-hot passions have cooled down to cherry-red, plunge our experience into the ice-cold stream of some human language or other, one might think would end in a rhapsody with something of spring and temper in it. All this I thought my power and province.

The schoolmistress had tried life, too. Once in a while one meets with a single soul greater than all the living pageant which passes before it. As the pale astronomer sits in his study with sunken eyes and thin fingers, and weighs Uranus or Neptune as in a balance, so there are meek, slight women who have weighed all which this planetary life can offer, and hold it like a bauble in the palm of their slender hands. This was one of them. Fortune had left her, sorrow had baptized her; the routine of labor and the loneliness of almost friendless city-life were before her. Yet, as I looked upon her tranquil face, gradually regaining a cheerfulness which was often sprightly, as she became interested in the various matters we talked about and places we visited, I saw that eye and lip and every shifting lineament were made for love,-unconscious of their sweet office as yet, and meeting the cold aspect of Duty with the natural graces which were meant for the reward of nothing less than the Great Passion.

-I never addressed one word of love to the schoolmistress in the course of these pleasant walks. It seemed to me that we talked of everything but love on that particular morning. There was, perhaps, a little more timidity and hesitancy on my part than I have commonly shown among our people at the boarding-house. In fact, I considered myself the master at the breakfast-table; but, somehow, I could not command myself just then so well as usual. The truth is, I had secured a passage to Liverpool in the steamer which was to leave at noon, -with the condition, however, of being released in case circumstances occurred to detain me. The schoolmistress knew nothing about all this, of course, as yet.

It was on the Common that we were walking. The mall or boulevard of our Common, you know, has various branches leading from it in different directions. One of these runs down from opposite Joy Street southward across the whole length of the Common to Boylston

1858

Street. We called it the long path, and were fond of it.

I felt very weak indeed (though of a tolerably robust habit) as we came opposite the head of this path on that morning. I think I tried to speak twice without making myself distinctly audible. At last I got out the question,—Will you take the long path with me?—Certainly.—said the schoolmistress,—with much pleasure.—Think,—I said,—before you answer: if you take the long path with me now, I shall interpret it that we are to part no more!—The schoolmistress stepped back with a sudden movement, as if an arrow had struck her.

One of the long granite blocks used as seats was hard by,—the one you may still see close by the Gingko-tree.—Pray, sit down,—I said.
—No, no, she answered, softly,—I will walk the long path with you!

—The old gentleman who sits opposite met us walking, arm in arm, about the middle of the long path, and said, very charmingly,—"Good-morning, my dears!"

1858

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL 1819-1891

None other of the major American writers of the nineteenth century was so closely connected with Cambridge and Harvard as Lowell. The old colonial mansion in which he was born, where he did his most important literary work and where he died, still stands in Cambridge; almost in sight, in Mount Auburn, is the plain gravestone beneath which he is buried. Yet no American man of letters had more varied interests and wider experiences. Lowell was of intellectual ancestry. He was graduated from Harvard, 1838, studied law, but soon gave this over for literature. He became professor of modern languages at Harvard, 1855, and was editor of the Atlantic Monthly, 1857-1862, and of the North American Review, 1863-1872. He was minister to Spain, 1877-1880, and to England, 1880-1885. His poems appeared at various dates from 1841 to 1888. His most notable prose works are Conversations on Some Old Poets, 1845; Among my Books, 1870, 1876; My Study Windows, 1871; Democracy and Other Addresses, 1886; The Old English Dramatists, 1892.

In breadth of experience and the variety of his interests, Lowell differs from Longfellow, whom he followed in the chair of languages at Harvard. Lowell was not only a teacher and a poet, but an editor, an essayist, a publicist, and a successful foreign minister. Some of his early poetry has many of the characteristics of Longfellow's, though it is more personal and appealing. The Bigelow papers and the odes occasioned by the Civil War outrank in their kind the work of any of his contemporaries, for they have a virility and a largeness of view characteristically Lowell's own. In his essays we find sound judgment, wisdom, and a humor that sweetens and keeps all in balance.

Biography: It was expected by Lowell that his letters edited by C. E. Norton, 2 vols. 1894, 3 vols. 1904, would sufficiently tell the story of his life. See also H. E. Scudder, 1901; E. E. Hale (BB); F. Greenslet (AML); F. Briggs (LJ). Recent criticism: Burton; Macy; Chubb; R. E. Roberts, "James Russell Lowell: a British Estimate," Liv. Age 301:231-5; W. B. Cairns, "James Russell Lowell: A Centenary View," Nation 108: 274-7; W. R. Thayer, "James Russell Lowell as a Teacher." Scrib. M. 68:473-80.

RHOECUS 1

God sends his teachers unto every age,
To every clime, and every race of men,
With revelations fitted to their growth
And shape of mind, nor gives the realm of Truth
Into the selfish rule of one sole race:
Therefore each form of worship that hath swaved

The life of man, and given it to grasp
The master-key of knowledge, reverence,
Enfolds some germs of goodness and of right;
Else never had the eager soul, which loathes
The slothful down of pampered ignorance,

11
Found in it even a moment's fitful rest.

There is an instinct in the human heart Which makes that all the fables it hath coined. To justify the reign of its belief And strengthen it by beauty's right divine, Veil in their inner cells a mystic gift, Which, like the hazel twig, in faithful hands, Points surely to the hidden springs of truth. For, as in nature naught is made in vain. But all things have within their hull of use A wisdom and a meaning which may speak Of spiritual secrets to the ear Of spirit; so, in whatsoe'er the heart Hath fashioned for a solace to itself. To make its inspirations suit its creed, And from the niggard hands of falsehood wring Its needful food of truth, there ever is A sympathy with Nature, which reveals, Not less than her own works, pure gleams of

And earnest parables of inward lore. Hear now this fairy legend of old Greece, As full of gracious youth, and beauty still As the immortal freshness of that grace Carved for all ages on some Attic frieze.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Another treatment of the theme of Rhoecus is found in Walter Savage Landor's "Hamadryad."

A youth named Rhoecus, wandering in the Saw an old oak just trembling to its fall,

And, feeling pity of so fair a tree,
He propped its gray trunk with admiring care,
And with a thoughtless footstep loitered on.

40
But, as he turned, he heard a voice behind
That murmured "Rhoecus!" 'T was as if the leaves.

Stirred by a passing breath, had murmured it. And, while he paused bewildered, yet again It murmured "Rhoecus!" softer than a breeze. He started and beheld with dizzy eyes What seemed the substance of a happy dream Stand there before him, spreading a warm glow Within the green glooms of the shadowy oak. It seemed a woman's shape, yet far too fair To be a woman, and with eyes too meek For any that were wont to mate with gods. All naked like a goddess stood she there, And like a goddess all too beautiful To feel the guilt-born earthliness of shame. "Rhoecus, I am the Dryad of this tree," Thus she began, dropping her low-toned words Serene, and full, and clear, as drops of dew, "And with it I am doomed to live and die; The rain and sunshine are my caterers. Nor have I other bliss than simple life; Now ask me what thou wilt, that I can give. And with a thankful joy it shall be thine."

Then Rhoecus, with a flutter at the heart, Yet, by the prompting of such beauty, bold, Answered: "What is there that can satisfy The endless craving of the soul but love? Give me thy love, or but the hope of that Which must be evermore my spirit's goal.' After a little pause she said again, But with a glimpse of sadness in her tone. "I give it, Rhoecus, though a perilous gift; An hour before the sunset meet me here." And straightway there was nothing he could see But the green glooms beneath the shadowy oak, And not a sound came to his straining ears But the low trickling rustle of the leaves, And far away upon an emerald slope 79 The falter of an idle shepherd's pipe.

Now, in those days of simpleness and faith, Men did not think that happy things were dreams

Because they overstepped the narrow bourne Of likelihood, but reverently deemed Nothing too wondrous or too beautiful To be the guerdon of a daring heart. So Rhoecus made no doubt that he was blest, And all along unto the city's gate

Earth seemed to spring beneath him as he walked.

The clear, broad sky looked bluer than its wont, And he could scarce believe he had not wings, Such sunshine seemed to glitter through his veins 91

Instead of blood, so light he felt and strange.

Young Rhoecus had a faithful heart enough, But one that in the present dwelt too much, And, taking with blithe welcome whatsoe'er Chance gave of joy, was wholly bound in that, Like the contented peasant of a vale, Deemed it the world, and never looked beyond. So, haply meeting in the afternoon Some comrades who were playing at the dice, He joined them and forgot all else beside.

The dice were rattling at the merriest,
And Rhoecus, who had met but sorry luck,
Just laughed in triumph at a happy throw,
When through the room there hummed a yellow bee

That buzzed about his ear with down-dropped legs

As if to light. And Rhoecus laughed and said, Feeling how red and flushed he was with loss, "By Venus! does he take me for a rose?"

And brushed him off with rough, impatient hand.

But still the bee came back, and thrice again Rhoecus did beat him off with growing wrath. Then through the window flew the wounded bee, And Rhoecus, tracking him with angry eyes, Saw a sharp mountain-peak of Thessaly Against the red disc of the setting sun,—And instantly the blood sank from his heart, As if its very walls had caved away. Without a word he turned, and, rushing forth, Ran madly through the city and the gate,

120
And o'er the plain, which now the wood's long shade,

By the low sun thrown forward broad and dim, Darkened wellnigh unto the city's wall.

Quite spent and out of breath he reached the tree,

And, listening fearfully, he heard once more The low voice murmur "Rhoecus!" close at hand:

Whereat he looked around him, but could see Naught but the deepening glooms beneath the

Then sighed the voice, "O Rhoecus! nevermore Shalt thou behold me or by day or night, 130 Me, who would fain have blessed thee with a love

More ripe and bounteous than ever yet Filled up with nectar any mortal heart:
But thou didst scorn my humble messenger,
And sent'st him back to me with bruised wings.
We spirits only show to gentle eyes.
We ever ask an undivided love,
And he who scorns the least of Nature's works
Is thenceforth exiled and shut out from all. 139
Farewell! for thou canst never see me more."

Then Rhoecus beat his breast, and groaned aloud,
And cried, "Be pitiful! forgive me yet
This once, and I shall never need it more!"
"Alas!" the voice returned, "'tis thou art blind, 1

Not I unmerciful; I can forgive,
But have no skill to heal thy spirit's eyes;
Only the soul hath power o'er itself."
With that again there murmured "Nevermore!"
And Rhoecus after heard no other sound,
Except the rattling of the oak's crisp leaves,
Like the long surf upon a distant shore,
Raking the sea-worn pebbles up and down.
The night had gathered round him: o'er the plain

The city sparkled with its thousand lights,
And sounds of revel fell upon his ear
Harshly and like a curse; above, the sky,
With all its bright sublimity of stars,
Deepened, and on his forehead smote the breeze;

Beauty was all around him and delight, But from that eve he was alone on earth.

A CONTRAST

1843

Thy love thou sentest oft to me,
And still as oft I thrust it back;
Thy messengers I could not see
In those who everything did lack,
The poor, the outcast, and the black.

Pride held his hand before mine eyes,
The world with flattery stuffed mine ears;
I looked to see a monarch's guise,
Nor dreamed thy love would knock for years,
Poor, naked, fettered, full of tears.

Yet, when I sent my love to thee,

Thou with a smile didst take it in,
And entertain'dst it royally,

Though grimed with earth, with hunger thin,
And leprous with the taint of sin.

Now every day thy love I meet,
As o'er the earth it wanders wide,
With weary step and bleeding feet,
Still knocking at the heart of pride
And offering grace, though still denied.

TO THE DANDELION

19

1845

Dear common flower, that grow'st beside the way,

Fringing the dusty road with harmless gold,
First pledge of blithesome May,
Which children pluck, and, full of pride, uphold.

High-hearted buccaneers, o'erjoyed that they An Eldorado in the grass have found.

Which not the rich earth's ample round May match in wealth,—thou art more dear to me

Than all the prouder summer-blooms may be.

Gold such as thine ne'er drew the Spanish prow

Through the primeval hush of Indian seas, Nor wrinkled the lean brow

Of age, to rob the lover's heart of ease;
'Tis the spring's largess, which she scatters

To rich and poor alike, with lavish hand, Though most hearts never understand To take it at God's value, but pass by The offered wealth with unrewarded eye.

Thou art my tropics and mine Italy;
To look at thee unlocks a warmer clime;
The eyes thou givest me
Are in the heart, and heed not space or time:
Not in mid June the golden-cuirassed bee
Feels a more summer-like warm ravishment
In the white lily's breezy tent,
His fragrant Sybaris, 2 than I, when first
From the dark green thy yellow circles burst.

Then think I of deep shadows on the grass,
Of meadows where in sun the cattle graze,
Where, as the breezes pass,
The gleaming rushes lean a thousand ways,
Of leaves that slumber in a cloudy mass,
Or whiten in the wind, of waters blue
That from the distance sparkle through
Some woodland gap, and of a sky above,
Where one white cloud like a stray lamb doth move.

&lt;sup>1</sup> In one version of the legend the dryad in anger deprived Rhoecus of his eyesight.

&lt;sup>2</sup> an ancient Grecian city of southern Italy noted for its luxury

My childhood's earliest thoughts are linked with thee:

The sight of thee calls back the robin's song,
Who, from the dark old tree
Beside the door, sang clearly all day long,
And I, secure in childish piety,
Listened as if I heard an angel sing

With news from heaven, which he could bring

Fresh every day to my untainted ears, When birds and flowers and I were happy peers.

How like a prodigal doth nature seem,
When thou, for all thy gold, so common art!
Thou teachest me to deem
More sacredly of every human heart,
Since each reflects in joy its scanty gleam
Of heaven, and could some wondrous secret show

Did we but pay the love we owe, And with a child's undoubting wisdom look On all these living pages of God's book.

HEBE 1

I saw the twinkle of white feet, I saw the flash of robes descending; Before her ran an influence fleet, That bowed my heart like barley bending.

As, in bare fields, the searching bees Pilot to blooms beyond our finding, It led me on, by sweet degrees, Joy's simple honey-cells unbinding.

Those Graces were that seemed grim Fates; With nearer love the sky leaned o'er me;
The long-sought Secret's golden gates
On musical hinges swung before me.

I saw the brimmed bowl in her grasp Thrilling with godhood; like a lover I sprang the proffered life to clasp;— The beaker fell; the luck was over.

The Earth has drunk the vintage up; What boots it patch the goblet's splinters? Can summer fill the icy cup, Whose treacherous crystal is but winter's?

O spendthrift, haste! await the Gods; Their nectar crowns the lips of Patience; Haste scatters on unthankful sods The immortal gift in vain libations.

the personification of youth and spring; the cupbearer of the gods Coy Hebe flies from those that woo, And shuns the hands would seize upon her, Follow thy life, and she will sue To pour for thee the cup of honor.

1847

AMBROSE

Never, surely, was holier man Than Ambrose, since the world began; With diet spare and raiment thin, He shielded himself from the father of sin; With bed of iron and scourgings oft, His heart to God's hand as wax made soft.

Through earnest prayer and watchings long He sought to know 'twixt right and wrong, Much wrestling with the blessed Word To make it yield the sense of the Lord, 10 That he might build a storm-proof creed To fold the flock in at their need.

At last he builded a perfect faith, Fenced round about with The Lord thus saith, To himself he fitted the doorway's size, Meted the light to the need of his eyes, And knew, by a sure and inward sign, That the work of his fingers was divine.

Then Ambrose said, "All those shall die The eternal death who believe not as I"; 20 And some were boiled, some burned in fire, Some sawn in twain, that his heart's desire, For the good of men's souls might be satisfied, By the drawing of all to the righteous side.

One day, as Ambrose was seeking the truth In his lonely walk, he saw a youth Resting himself in the shade of a tree; It had never been given him to see So shining a face, and the good man thought 'Twere pity he should not believe as he ought.

So he sat himself by the young man's side,
And the state of his soul with questions tried;
But the heart of the stranger was hardened indeed

Nor received the stamp of the one true creed. And the spirit of Ambrose waxed sore to find Such face the porch of so narrow a mind.

"As each beholds in cloud and fire
The shape that answers his own desire,
So each," said the youth, "in the Law shall find
The figure and features of his mind;
And to each in his mercy hath God allowed
His several pillar of fire and cloud." 2

<sup>2</sup> Exodus xiii, 21

The soul of Ambrose burned with zeal And holy wrath for the young man's weal: "Believest thou then, most wretched youth," Cried he, "a dividual essence in Truth? I fear me thy heart is too cramped with sin To take the Lord in his glory in."

Now there bubbled beside them where they stood.

A fountain of waters sweet and good: The youth to the streamlet's brink drew near Saying, "Ambrose, thou maker of creeds, look here!"

Six vases of crystal then he took, And set them along the edge of the brook.

"As into these vessels the water I pour. There shall one hold less, another more, And the water unchanged, in every case, Shall put on the figure of the vase; O thou, who wouldst unity make through strife, Canst thou fit this sign to the Water of Life?"

When Ambrose looked up, he stood alone, The youth and the stream and the vases were

But he knew, by a sense of humbled grace, He had talked with an angel face to face, And felt his heart change inwardly, As he fell on his knees beneath the tree. 1848 1848

THE VISION OF SIR LAUNFAL

PRELUDE TO PART FIRST

Over his keys the musing organist, Beginning doubtfully and far away, First lets his fingers wander as they list, And builds a bridge from Dreamland for his

Then, as the touch of his loved instrument Gives hope and fervor, nearer draws his theme

First guessed by faint auroral flushes sent Along the wavering vista of his dream.

Not only around our infancy 1 Doth heaven with all its splendors lie; Daily, with souls that cringe and plot, We Sinais 2 climb and know it not.

Over our manhood bend the skies; Against our fallen and traitor lives The great winds utter prophecies:

With our faint hearts the mountain strives: Its arms outstretched, the druid 3 wood

Waits with its benedicite; 4 And to our age's drowsy blood

Still shouts the inspiring sea. Earth gets its price for what Earth gives us:

The beggar is taxed for a corner to die in. The priest hath his fee who comes and shrives

20

20

50

60

We bargain for the graves we lie in: At the devil's booth are all things sold. Each ounce of dross costs its ounce of gold: For a cap and bells 5 our lives we pay,

Bubbles we buy with a whole soul's tasking: 'Tis heaven alone that is given away. 'Tis only God may be had for the asking;

No price is set on the lavish summer; June may be had by the poorest comer.

And what is so rare as a day in Tune? 6 Then, if ever, come perfect days: Then Heaven tries earth if it be in tune.

And over it softly her warm ear lays: Whether we look, or whether we listen, We hear life murmur, or see it glisten; Every clod feels a stir of might.

An instinct within it that reaches and towers. And, groping blindly above it for light.

Climbs to a soul in grass and flowers; The flush of life may well be seen

Thrilling back over hills and valleys: The cowslip startles in meadows green. The buttercup catches the sun in its chalice,

And there's never a leaf nor a blade too mean To be some happy creature's palace:

The little bird sits at his door in the sun,

Atilt like a blossom among the leaves, And lets his illumined being o'errun

With the deluge of summer it receives; His mate feels the eggs beneath her wings, And the heart in her dumb breast flutters and sings;

He sings to the wide world, and she to her nest,-

In the nice ear of Nature which song is the best?

Now is the high-tide of the year, And whatever of life hath ebbed away Comes flooding back with a ripply cheer, Into every bare inlet and creek and bay;

10

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Wordsworth's "Ode, Intimations of Immortality"

<sup>2</sup> Moses ascended Sinai to talk with God. Exodus iii, 1; xix, 20.

The druids, ancient Celtic priests, held the oak sacred and worshiped in the forests.
 blessing (literally, be ye blessed) the regalia of the king's jester
 Cf. Lowell's less familiar description of June in Biglow Papers Second Series, No. vi.

Now the heart is so full that a drop overfills it, We are happy now because God wills it; No matter how barren the past may have been, 'Tis enough for us now that the leaves are green:

We sit in the warm shade and feel right well How the sap creeps up and the blossoms swell; We may shut our eyes but we cannot help knowing

That skies are clear and grass is growing; The breeze comes whispering in our ear, That dandelions are blossoming near,

That maize has sprouted, that streams are flowing,

That the river is bluer than the sky, That the robin is plastering his house hard by; And if the breeze kept the good news back, For other couriers we should not lack;

We could guess it all by yon heifer's lowing,—And hark! how clear bold chanticleer, Warmed with the new wine of the year, Tells all in his lusty crowing!

Joy comes, grief goes, we know not how; Everything is happy now, Everything is upward striving;

'Tis as easy now for the heart to be true As for grass to be green or skies to be blue,— 'Tis the natural way of living:

Who knows whither the clouds have fled?

In the unscarred heavens they leave no wake; And the eyes forget the tears they have shed,

The heart forgets its sorrow and ache; The soul partakes the season's youth,

And the sulphurous rifts of passion and woe Lie deep 'neath a silence pure and smooth,

Like burnt-out craters healed with snow. What wonder if Sir Launfal now Remembered the keeping of his vow?

PART FIRST

Ι

"My golden spurs now bring to me, And bring to me my richest mail, For tomorrow I go over land and sea In search of the Holy Grail; <sup>1</sup> Shall never a bed for me be spread, Nor shall a pillow be under my head, Till I begin my vow to keep;

"According to the mythology of the Romancers, the San Greal, or Holy Grail, was the cup out of which Jesus Christ partook of the Last Supper with his disciples. It was brought into England by Joseph of Arimathea, and remained there, an object of pilgrimage and adoration, for many years in the keeping of his lineal descendants. It was incumbent upon those who had charge of it to be

Here on the rushes will I sleep,
And perchance there may come a vision true
Ere day create the world anew."

Slowly Sir Launfal's eyes grew dim,
Slumber fell like a cloud on him,
And into his soul the vision flew.

TT

The crows flapped over by twos and threes,
In the pool drowsed the cattle up to their knees.

The little birds sang as if it were
The one day of summer in all the year,
And the very leaves seemed to sing on the trees:

The castle alone in the landscape lay
Like an outpost of winter, dull and gray; 20
'Twas the proudest hall in the North Countree,
And never its gates might opened be,
Save to lord or lady of high degree;
Summer besieged it on every side,
But the churlish stone her assaults defied;
She could not scale the chilly wall,
Though round it for leagues her pavilions tall
Stretched left and right,
Over the hills and out of sight;

Green and broad was every tent,
And out of each a murmur went
Till the breeze fell off at night.

ш

The drawbridge dropped with a surly clang, And through the dark arch a charger sprang, Bearing Sir Launfal, the maiden <sup>2</sup> knight, In his gilded mail, that flamed so bright It seemed the dark castle had gathered all Those shafts the fierce sun had shot over its wall

In his siege of three hundred summers long, And, binding them all in one blazing sheaf, 40 Had cast them forth: so, young and strong, And lightsome as a locust-leaf, Sir Launfal flashed forth in his maiden mail, To seek in all climes for the Holy Grail.

chaste in thought, word, and deed; but one of the keepers having broken this condition, the Holy Grail disappeared. From that time it was a favorite enterprise of the knights of Arthur's court to go in search of it.... "The plot (if I may give that name to anything so slight) of the following poem is my own, and, to serve its purposes, I have enlarged the circle of competition in search of the miraculous cup in such a manner as to include not only other persons than the heroes of the Round Table, but also a period of time subsequent to the date of King Arthur's reign."—Lowell.

2 untried

90

π

It was morning on hill and stream and tree,
And morning in the young knight's heart;
Only the castle moodily
Rebuffed the gifts of the sunshine free,
And gloomed by itself apart;
The season brimmed all other things up
Full as the rain fills the pitcher-plant's cup.

v

As Sir Launfal made morn through the darksome gate,

He was 'ware of a leper, crouched by the same.

Who begged with his hand and moaned as he safe:

And a loathing over Sir Launfal came; The sunshine went out of his soul with a thrill, The flesh 'neath his armor 'gan shrink and crawl,

And midway its leap his heart stood still Like a frozen waterfall;

For this man, so foul and bent of stature, 60 Rasped harshly against his dainty nature, And seemed the one blot on the summer morn,—

So he tossed him a piece of gold in scorn.

VI

The leper raised not the gold from the dust: "Better to me the poor man's crust, Better the blessing of the poor, Though I turn me empty from his door; That is no true alms which the hand can hold; He gives nothing but worthless gold 70 Who gives from a sense of duty; But he who gives but a slender mite. And gives to that which is out of sight, That thread of the all-sustaining Beauty Which runs through all and doth all unite,— The hand cannot clasp the whole of his alms, The heart outstretches its eager palms, For a god goes with it and makes it store To the soul that was starving in darkness before."

PRELUDE TO PART SECOND

Down swept the chill wind from the mountain peak,

From the snow five thousand summers old; On open wold and hill-top bleak It had gathered all the cold,

And whirled it like sleet on the wanderer's cheek;

It carried a shiver everywhere

From the unleafed boughs and pastures bare; The little brook heard it and built a roof 'Neath which he could house him, winterproof: All night by the white stars' frosty gleams He groined his arches and matched his beams: Slender and clear were his crystal spars As the lashes of light that trim the stars: He sculptured every summer delight In his halls and chambers out of sight: Sometimes his tinkling waters slipt Down through a frost-leaved forest-crypt. Long, sparkling aisles of steel-stemmed trees Bending to counterfeit a breeze: 20 Sometimes the roof no fretwork knew But silvery mosses that downward grew: Sometimes it was carved in sharp relief With quaint arabesques of ice-fern leaf: Sometimes it was simply smooth and clear For the gladness of heaven to shine through. and here and here

He had caught the nodding bulrush-tops
And hung them thickly with diamond drops,
That crystaled the beams of moon and sun,
And made a star of every one:
No mortal builder's most rare device
Could match this winter-palace of ice;
'Twas as if every image that mirrored lay
In his depths serene through the summer day.
Each fleeting shadow of earth and sky,
Lest the happy model should be lost,

Lest the happy model should be lost, Had been mimicked in fairy masonry By the elfin builders of the frost.

Within the hall are song and laughter,
The cheeks of Christmas glow red and jolly.
And sprouting is every corbel <sup>1</sup> and rafter
With lightsome green of ivy and holly;
Through the deep gulf of the chimney wide

Through the deep gulf of the chimney wide Wallows the Yule-log's roaring tide;
The broad flame-pennons droop and flap

And belly and tug as a flag in the wind; Like a locust shrills the imprisoned sap, Hunted to death in its galleries blind;

And swift little troops of silent sparks,
Now pausing, now scattering away as in fear,
Go threading the soot-forest's tangled darks
Like herds of startled deer.

51

But the wind without was eager and sharp, Of Sir Launfal's gray hair it makes a harp,

And rattles and wrings
The icy strings,
Singing, in dreary monotone,
A Christmas carol of its own,
Whose burden still, as he might guess,
Was—"Shelterless, shelterless, shelterless!"

<sup>1</sup> bracket

40

70

The voice of the seneschal flared like a torch
As he shouted the wanderer away from the porch,
61

And he sat in the gateway and saw all night
The great hall-fire, so cheery and bold,
Through the window-slits of the castle old,
Build out its piers of ruddy light
Against the drift of the cold.

PART SECOND

т

There was never a leaf on bush or tree,
The bare boughs rattled shudderingly;
The river was dumb and could not speak,
For the weaver Winter its shroud had spun;
A single crow on the tree-top bleak
From his shining feathers shed off the cold

sun.

Again it was morning, but shrunk and cold, As if her veins were sapless and old, And she rose up decrepitly For a last dim look at earth and sea.

TT

Sir Launfal turned from his own hard gate, For another heir in his earldom sate; An old, bent man, worn out and frail, He came back from seeking the Holy Grail; Little he recked of his earldom's loss, No more on his surcoat was blazoned the cross. But deep in his soul the sign he wore, The badge of the suffering and the poor.

Ш

Sir Launfal's raiment thin and spare 20 Was idle mail 'gainst the barbed air, For it was just at the Christmas time; So he mused, as he sat, of a sunnier clime, And sought for a shelter from cold and snow In the light and warmth of long-ago; He sees the snake-like caravan crawl O'er the edge of the desert, black and small, Then nearer and nearer, till, one by one, He can count the camels in the sun, As over the red-hot sands they pass To where, in its slender necklace of grass, The little spring laughed and leapt in the shade, And with its own self like an infant played, And waved its signal of palms.

τv

"For Christ's sweet sake, I beg an alms;"— The happy camels may reach the spring, But Sir Launfal sees only the grewsome thing. The leper, lank as the rain-blanched bone, That cowers beside him, a thing as lone And white as the ice-isles of Northern seas In the desolate horror of his disease.

v

And Sir Launfal said,—"I behold in thee
An image of Him who died on the tree;
Thou also hast had thy crown of thorns,— Thou also hast had the world's buffets and scorns.—

And to thy life were not denied The wounds in the hands and feet and side: Mild Mary's Son, acknowledge me; Behold, through him, I give to thee!"

۲/Т

Then the soul of the leper stood up in his eyes
And looked at Sir Launfal, and straightway he 50

Remembered in what a haughtier guise

He had flung an alms to leprosie,

When he girt his young life up in gilded mail
And set forth in search of the Holy Grail.

The heart within him was ashes and dust;
He parted in twain his single crust,
He broke the ice on the streamlet's brink,
And gave the leper to eat and drink,

'Twas a moldy crust of coarse brown bread,

'Twas water out of a wooden bowl,—

Yet with fine wheaten bread was the leper fed,
And 'twas red wine he drank with his thirsty soul.

VII

As Sir Launfal mused with a downcast face, A light shone round about the place; The leper no longer crouched at his side, But stood before him glorified, Shining and tall and fair and straight As the pillar that stood by the Beautiful Gate,—1

Himself the Gate whereby men can Enter the temple of God in Man.

VIII

His words were shed softer than leaves from the pine,

And they fell on Sir Launfal as snows on the brine,

That mingle their softness and quiet in one
With the shaggy unrest they float down upon;
And the voice that was softer than silence said,
"Lo, it is I, be not afraid!
In many climes, without avail,
Thou hast spent thy life for the Holy Grail;

1 Acts iii, 2

Behold it is here,—this cup which thou
Didst fill at the streamlet for me but now;
This crust is my body broken for thee,
This water His blood that died on the tree:
The Holy Supper is kept, indeed,
In whatso we share with another's need;
Not what we give, but what we share,
For the gift without the giver is bare;
Who gives himself with his alms feeds three,
Himself, his hungering neighbor, and me."

TX

Sir Launfal awoke as from a swound:
"The Grail in my castle here is found!
Hang my idle armor upon the wall,
Let it be the spider's banquet hall;
He must be fenced with stronger mail
Who would seek and find the Holy Grail."

X

The castle gate stands open now,
And the wanderer is welcome to the hall
As the hangbird is to the elm-tree bough;
No longer scowl the turrets tall,
The Summer's long siege at last is o'er;
When the first poor outcast went in at the door,
She entered with him in disguise,
And mastered the fortress by surprise;
There is no spot she loves so well on ground,
She lingers and smiles there the whole year round:

The meanest serf on Sir Launfal's land Has hall and bower at his command; And there's no poor man in the North Countree But is lord of the earldom as much as he.

1848

From A FABLE FOR CRITICS <sup>2</sup>

"There comes Emerson first, whose rich words, every one,

Are like gold nails in temples to hang trophies on.

Whose prose is grand verse, while his verse, the Lord knows, the oriole, or any bird building a hanging nest 2 A few lines from Lowell's humorous preface will explain the spirit in which this piece of penetrating banter was written: "To the Reader: This trifle, begun to please only myself and my own private fancy, was laid on the shelf. But some friends, who had seen it, induced me, by dint of saying they liked it, to put it in print. . . Having scrawled at full gal'op (as far as that goes) in a style that is neither good verse nor bad prose, and being a person whom nobody knows, some peon'e will say I am rather more free with my readers than it is becoming to be. . . . All the characters sketched in this slight jeu d'esprit,

Is some of it pr—— No, 'tis not even prose; I'm speaking of meters; some poems have welled

From those rare depths of soul that have ne'er been excelled:

They're not epics, but that doesn't matter a pin, In creating, the only hard thing's to begin; A grass-blade's no easier to make than an oak, If you've once found the way, you've achieved the grand stroke;

In the worst of his poems are mines of rich

But thrown in a heap with a crash and a clatter; Now it is not one thing nor another alone Makes a poem, but rather the general tone, The something pervading, uniting the whole, The before unconceived, unconceivable soul, So that just in removing this trifle or that,

Take away, as it were, a chief limb of the statue:

Roots, wood, bark, and leaves, singly perfect may be,

But, clapt hodge-podge together, they don't make a tree.

"But to come back to Emerson (whom by the way.

I believe we left waiting),—his is, we may say.

A Greek head on right Yankee shoulders, whose range

Has Olympus <sup>3</sup> for one pole, for t'other the Exchange; <sup>4</sup>

He seems, to my thinking, (although I'm afraid The comparison must, long ere this, have been made) 550

A Plotinus-Montaigne, 5 where the Egyptian's gold mist

And the Gascon's shrewd wit cheek-by-jowl coexist;

All admire, and yet scarcely six converts he's got

To I don't (nor they either) exactly know what:

For though he builds glorious temples, 'tis odd though, it may be, they seem, here and there, rather free, and drawn from a Mephistophelian standpoint, are meant to be faithful, and that is the grand point, and none but an owl would feel sore at a rub from a jester who tells you, without any subterfuge, that he sits in Diogenes' tub."

3 the home of the gods
4 the mart of business

Flotinus was an idealistic Greek philosopher born in Egypt c. 204 A.D. Montaigne, 1533-1592, a French essayist whose work is marked by shrewd worldliness, lived in Bordeaux in what was once the old duchy of Guienne and Gascony. He leaves never a doorway to get in a god.
'Tis refreshing to old-fashioned people like me
To meet such a primitive Pagan as he,
In whose mind all creation is duly respected
As parts of himself—just a little projected;
And who's willing to worship the stars and the sun,

A convert to—nothing but Emerson.
So perfect a balance there is in his head,
That he talks of things sometimes as if they were dead:

Life, nature, love, God, and affairs of that sort, He looks at as merely ideas: in short.

As if they were fossils stuck round in a cabinet, Of such vast extent that our earth's a mere dab in it:

Composed just as he is inclined to conjecture her,

Namely, one part pure earth, ninety-nine parts pure lecturer; 570

You are filled with delight at his clear demonstration.

Each figure, word, gesture, just fits the occasion, With the quiet precision of science he'll sort

But you can't help suspecting the whole a post mortem.

"There are persons, mole-blind to the soul's make and style,

Who insist on a likeness 'twixt him and Carlyle; To compare him with Plato would be vastly fairer.

Carlyle's the more burly, but E. is the rarer; He sees fewer objects, but clearlier, truelier, If C.'s as original, E.'s more peculiar;

That he's more of a man you might say of the

Of the other he's more of an Emerson;

C.'s the Titan, <sup>1</sup> as shaggy of mind as of limb,— E. the clear-eyed Olympian, rapid and slim;

The one's two-thirds Norseman, the other half Greek,

Where the one's most abounding, the other's to seek;

C.'s generals require to be seen in the mass— E.'s specialties gain if enlarged by the glass; C. gives nature and God his own fits of the

And rims common-sense things with mystical hues.—

E. sits in a mystery calm and intense,

And looks coolly around him with sharp common sense;

C. shows you how every-day matters unite the giant race, descended from Uranus and Gaea (Heaven and Earth) With the dim transdiurnal <sup>2</sup> recesses of night,—While E., in a plain, preternatural way,

Makes mysteries matters of mere every day; C. draws all his characters quite à la Fuseli, 3— Not sketching their bundles of muscles and thews illy, 4

But he paints with a brush so untamed and pro-

They seem nothing but bundles of muscles and thews:

E. is rather like Flaxman, 5 lines straight and severe,

And a colorless outline, but full, round, and clear:—

To the men he thinks worthy he frankly accords The design of a white marble statue in words.

C. labors to get at the center, and then

Take a reckoning from there of his actions and men;

E. calmly assumes the said center as granted, And, given himself, has whatever is wanted.

"He has imitators in scores, who omit 609
No part of the man but his wisdom and wit,—
Who go carefully o'er the sky-blue of his brain,
And when he has skimmed it once, skim it
again;

If at all they resemble him, you may be sure it is Because their shoals mirror his mists and obscurities.

As a mud-puddle seems deep as heaven for a minute.

While a cloud that floats o'er is reflected within it.

"There comes —, 6 for instance; to see him's rare sport,

Tread in Emerson's tracks with legs painfully

How he jumps, how he strains, and gets red in the face.

To keep step with the mystagogue's natural pace! 620

He follows as close as a stick to a rocket,

His fingers exploring the prophet's each pocket. Fie, for shame, brother bard; with good fruit of your own.

Can't you let Neighbor Emerson's orchards alone?

beyond the confines of the day
 John Henry Fuseli, 1741-1825, a Swiss-English painter of powerful imagination rather than technical excellence excellence

4 This line at first read, "He don't sketch . . . " Notice the great liberties Lowell takes. Cf. lines 620 and 817.

<sup>5</sup> John Flaxman, 1755-1826, an English sculptor.

6 Thoreau?

Besides, 'tis no use, you'll not find e'en a core.---- 1 has picked up all the windfalls before.

They might strip every tree, and E. never would catch 'em,

His Hesperides 2 have no rude dragon to watch

When they send him a dishful, and ask him to try 'em.

He never suspects how the sly rogues came bv 'em;

He wonders why 'tis there are none such his

And thinks 'em the best he has tasted this season

"There is Bryant, as quiet, as cool, and as dignified.

As a smooth, silent iceberg, that never is ig-

Save when by reflection 'tis kindled o' nights With a semblance of flame by the chill Northern Lights.

He may rank (Griswold 8 says so) first bard of your nation.

(There's no doubt that he stands in supreme ice-olation).

Your topmost Parnassus 4 he may set his heel

But no warm applauses come, peal following peal on,-

He's too smooth and too polished to hang any zeal on:

Unqualified merits, I'll grant, if you choose, he has 'em,

But he lacks the one merit of kindling enthusiasm:

If he stir you at all, it is just, on my soul, Like being stirred up with the very North Pole.

"He is very nice reading in summer, but

Nos, 5 we don't want extra freezing in winter: Take him up in the depth of July, my advice is, When you feel an Egyptian devotion to ices. 6 But, deduct all you can, there's enough that's right good in him,

He has a true soul for field, river, and wood

And his heart, in the midst of brick walls, or where'er it is.

1 Alcott?

 Alcott?
 2 the golden apples of the mythical gardens
 2 Rufus Wilmot Griswold compiled the anthologies Poets and Poetry of America (1842) and Prose Writers of America (1845).
 4 a mountain ridge northwest of Athens, supposed to be the haunt of Apollo and the Muses; hence the source of music and poetry
 5 between ourselves 5 between ourselves

"Note the pun on Isis, the chief goddess of the Egyptians.

Glows, softens, and thrills with the tenderest charities-

To you mortals that delve in this trade-ridden planet?

No. to old Berkshire's hills, with their limestone and granite.

If you're one who in loco (add foco here) desibis. 7

You will get of his outermost heart (as I guess) a piece;

But you'd get deeper down if you came as a precipice.

And would break the last seal of its inwardest fountain.

If you only could palm yourself off for a mountain.

Mr. Ouivis, 8 or somebody quite as discerning. Some scholar who's hourly expecting his learn-

Calls B. the American Wordsworth; but Words-

May be rated at more than your whole tuneful herd's worth.

No, don't be absurd, he's an excellent Bryant; But, my friends, you'll endanger the life of your client,

By attempting to stretch him up into a giant: If you choose to compare him, I think there are sons fit for a parallel—Thomson and Cowper; o I don't mean exactly,—there's something of

There's T.'s love of nature, C.'s penchant to

Just mix up their minds so that C.'s spice of craziness

Shall balance and neutralize T.'s turn for lazi-

And it gives you a brain cool, quite frictionless. auiet.

Whose internal police nips the buds of all riot.-

A brain like a permanent strait-jacket put on

The heart which strives vainly to burst off a button,-

A brain which, without being slow or mechanic, Does more than a larger less drilled, more volcanic:

He's a Cowper condensed, with no craziness bitten,

T"If you're one who in a place (by the fire) can be foolish."
 Mr. Anyone

Mr. Anyone
 English poets of the 18th century

"To demonstrate quickly and easily how perversely absurd 'tis to sound this name Cowper, As people in general call him named super, I remark that he rimes it himself with horse-trooper."—(Lowell's note.)

And the advantage that Wordsworth before him had written

"But, my dear little bardlings, don't prick up vour ears

Nor suppose I would rank you and Bryant as

If I call him an iceberg, I don't mean to say There is nothing in that which is grand, in its

He is almost the one of your poets that knows How much grace, strength, and dignity lie in

If he sometimes fall short, he is too wise to

His thought's modest fulness by going too far: 'Twould be well if your authors should all make a trial

Of what virtue there is in severe self-denial. And measure their writings by Hesiod's staff. 1 Which teaches that all has less value than

"There is Whittier, whose swelling and vehement heart

Strains the strait-breasted drab of the Ouaker

And reveals the live Man, still supreme and Underneath the benummying wrappers of sect: There was ne'er a man born who had more of the swing

Of the true lyric bard and all that kind of

And his failures arise (though perhaps he don't know it).

From the very same cause that has made him a poet.-

A fervor of mind which knows no separation

'Twixt simple excitement and pure inspiration.

As my Pythoness<sup>2</sup> erst sometimes erred from not knowing

If 'twere I or mere wind through her tripod was blowing;

Let his mind once get head in its favorite direction

And the torrent of verse bursts the dams of reflection.

While, borne with the rush of the meter along, The poet may chance to go right or go wrong, Content with the whirl and delirium of song;

2 a woman having power of divination as the priestess at Delphi

Then his grammar's not always correct, nor his rimes. 3

And he's prone to repeat his own lyrics some-

Not his best, though, for those are struck off at white-heats

When the heart in his breast like a trip-hammer

And can ne'er be repeated again any more

Than they could have been carefully plotted hefore .

Like old what's-his-name 4 there at the battle of Hastings

(Who, however, gave more than mere rhythmical bastings).

Our Ouaker leads off metaphorical fights

For reform and whatever they call human rights.

Both singing and striking in front of the war And hitting his foes with the mallet of Thor; 5 Anne haec, one exclaims, on beholding his knocks.

Vestis filii tui, 6 O, leather-clad Fox?

Can that be thy son, in the battle's mid din, Preaching brotherly love and then driving it in To the brain of the tough old Goliah 7 of sin, With the smoothest of pebbles from Castaly's spring, 8

Impressed on his hard moral sense with a sling?

"All honor and praise to the right-hearted

Who was true to The Voice when such service was hard,

Who himself was so free he dared sing for the

When to look but a protest in silence was brave:

All honor and praise to the women and men

3 Cf. "Maud Muller":

"For of all sad words of tongue or pen, The saddest are these: 'It might have been!'"

The saddest are these: It might have been!

4 Taillefer, Norman juggler and minstrel, who struck the first blow at the battle of Hastings, 1066, rode at the head of the Norman army singing songs of Roland and Charlemagne and throwing in the air and catching again his sword; before he fell he used his sword in earnest.

he fell he used his sword in earnest.

The hammer Mjöllnir, the Crusher, of Thor, the Scandinavian god of thunder, returned to his hand of itself when he had hulled it.

"Is this indeed the dress of thy son?" Genesis xxxvii.
32. George Fox, 1624-1691, a shoemaker, said to have worn leather breeches, was the founder of The Society of Friends, or Quakers. They were always known for their love of peace. Callyle's rhapsody over Fox's costume (Sartor Resartus), which Lowell apparently follows, is probably ill-founded.

I Samuel xvii

7 1 Samuel xvii 8 Castalia, or Castaly, was an ancient spring on Mt. Parnassus sacred to the Muses and to Apollo.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The poems of Hesiod, who is noted for his sententious philosophy, were not recited to the accompani-ment of a harp as were those of Homer, but the reciter held in his hand a laurel branch or staff.

Who spoke out for the dumb and the downtrodden then!

It needs not to name them, already for each I see History preparing the statue and niche;

They were harsh, but shall you be so shocked at hard words

Who have beaten your pruning-hooks up into swords. 1

Whose rewards and hurrahs men are surer to

By the reaping of men and of women than

Why should you stand aghast at their fierce wordy war, if

You scalp one another for Bank or for Tariff? 2 Your calling them cut-throats and knaves all day long Doesn't prove that the use of hard language is wrong; While the World's heart beats guicker to think of such men

As signed Tyranny's doom with a bloody steel-

While on Fourth-of-Julys beardless orators fright one

With hints at Harmodius and Aristogeiton, 3 You need not look shy at your sisters and brothers

Who stab with sharp words for the freedom of others:-

No, a wreath, twine a wreath for the loval and

Who, for sake of the many, dared stand with the few.

Not of blood-spattered laurel for enemies braved.

But of broad, peaceful oak-leaves for citizens saved!

"There is Hawthorne, with genius so shrinking and rare

That you hardly at first see the strength that is there:

A frame so robust, with a nature so sweet, So earnest, so graceful, so solid, so fleet, Is worth a descent from Olympus 4 to meet; 'Tis as if a rough oak that for ages had stood, With his gnarled bony branches like ribs of the 1001 wood,

1 Joel iii, 10

<sup>2</sup> The question as to the constitutionality of establishing a National Bank had agitated the country since 1787, and had not been finally settled until 1846. The tariff question had also caused much feeling. See Calhoun's and Webster's speeches, p. 445 and p- 454. 3 two Athenians, who killed Hipparchus, tyrant of Athens, and were executed 514 B.C. the home of the gods

Should bloom, after cycles of struggle and scathe.

With a single anemone trembly and rathe: 5 His strength is so tender, his wildness so meek. That a suitable parallel sets one to seek -

He's a John Bunvan Fouqué, a Puritan Tieck: 6 When Nature was shaping him, clay was not granted

For making so full-sized a man as she wanted. So, to fill out her model, a little she spared From some finer-grained stuff for a woman prepared.

And she could not have hit a more excellent

For making him fully and perfectly man.

The success of her scheme gave her so much delight.

she tried it again, shortly after, in That Dwight: "

Only, while she was kneading and shaping the

She sang to her work in her sweet childish way. And found, when she'd put the last touch to his soul.

That the music had somehow got mixed with the whole.

"Here's Cooper, who's written six volumes

He's as good as a lord: 8 well, let's grant that he's so:

If a person prefer that description of praise, Why, a coronet's certainly cheaper than bays; But he need take no pains to convince us he's

(As his enemies say) the American Scott.

Choose any twelve men, and let C. read aloud That one of his novels of which he's most proud.

And I'd lay any bet that without ever quitting Their box, they'd be all, to a man, for acauitting.

He has drawn you one character, though, that is new.

One wildflower he's plucked that is wet with the dew

Of this fresh Western world, and, the thing not to mince.

 <sup>5</sup> early; cf. "rather" (sooner)
 <sup>6</sup> i. e., a union of the allegorical vision of Bunyan with the romantic imagination of Baron de La Motte Fouqué, 1777-1843, the German author of Undine; or the union of the soberness of the Puritan with the romanticism of Ludwig Tieck (1773-1853), a German novelist

John Su'livan Dwight, 1813-1893, a musical critic of Boston

8 Cooper's display of ancestry annoyed as well as amused his countrymen. Poets were in ancient times crowned with bay leaves. See l. 1022.

He has done naught but copy it ill ever since: His Indians, with proper respect be it said. Are just Natty Bumppo 1 daubed over with

And his very Long Toms 2 are the same useful

Nat. Rigged up in duck pants and a sou'-wester hat.

(Though once in a Coffin, a good chance was

To have slipt the old fellow away underground).

All his other men-figures are clothes upon sticks.

The dernière chemise 3 of a man in a fix,

(As a captain besieged, when his garrison's small.

Sets up caps upon poles to be seen o'er the wall):

And the women he draws from one model don't vary,

All sappy as maples and flat as a prairie.

When a character's wanted, he goes to the task As a cooper would do in composing a cask;

He picks out the staves, of their qualities heedful.

Just hoops them together as tight as is needful. And, if the best fortune should crown the attempt, he

Has made at the most something wooden and empty.

"Don't suppose I would underrate Cooper's abilities.

If I thought you'd do that, I should feel very ill at ease:

The men who have given to one character life And objective existence, are not very rife,

You may number them all, both prose-writers and singers.

Without overrunning the bounds of your fin-

And Natty won't go to oblivion quicker Than Adams the parson or Primrose the vicar. 4

"There is one thing in Cooper I like, too, and that is

That on manners he lectures his countrymen

Not precisely so either, because, for a rarity, He is paid for his tickets in unpopularity. 5 in the Leather-stocking Tales

Long Tom Coffin, a sailor in *The Pilot*last shirt

*last shirt

† Parson Abraham Adams is a whimsical but manly character in Henry Fielding's novel Joseph Andrews (17,42). Mr. Primrose is the title character of The Vicar of Wakefield (1766) by Goldsmith.

*Cooper, with most loyal intentions but with little tact, on his return after seven years abroad criticized Americans very severely and aroused much antagonism

much antagonism.

Now he may overcharge his American pictures. But you'll grant there's a good deal of truth in his strictures:

And I honor the man who is willing to sink Half his present repute for the freedom to think.

And, when he has thought, be his cause strong or weak.

Will risk t'other half for the freedom to speak, Caring naught for what vengeance the mob has in store,

Let that mob be the upper ten thousand or

"There are truths you Americans need to be

And it never'll refute them to swagger and scold:

John Bull, looking o'er the Atlantic, in choler At your aptness for trade, says you worship the dollar:

But to scorn such eve-dollar-try's what very few do.

And John goes to that church as often as you

No matter what John says, don't try to outcrow him,

'Tis enough to go quietly on and outgrow him; Like most fathers. Bull hates to see Number

Displacing himself in the mind of his son, And detests the same faults in himself he'd neglected

When he sees them again in his child's glass reflected;

To love one another you're too like by half.

If he is a bull, you're a pretty stout calf, And tear your own pasture for naught but to

What a nice pair of horns you're beginning to

"There are one or two things I should just like to hint.

For you don't often get the truth told you in print;

The most of you (this is what strikes all beholders)

Have a mental and physical stoop in the shoulders;

Though you ought to be free as the winds and the waves,

You've the gait and the manners of run-away slaves;

Tho' you brag of your New World, you don't half believe in it.

And as much of the Old as is possible weave in it;

Your goddess of freedom, a tight, buxom girl. With lips like a cherry and teeth like a pearl. With eyes bold as Herè's, and hair floating free, And full of the sun as the spray of the sea.

Who can sing at a husking or romp at a shearing.

Who can trip through the forests alone without fearing.

Who can drive home the cows with a song through the grass.

Keeps glancing aside into Europe's cracked glass,

Hides her red hands in gloves, pinches up her lithe waist.

And makes herself wretched with transmarine

She loses her fresh country charm when she

Any mirror except her own rivers and lakes.

"You steal Englishmen's books 1 and think Englishmen's thought.

With their salt on her tail your wild eagle is caught:

Your literature suits its each whisper and mo-

To what will be thought of it over the ocean: The cast clothes of Europe your statesmanship

And mumbles again the old blarneys and lies:— Forget Europe wholly, your veins throb with blood.

To which the dull current in hers is but mud; Let her sneer, let her say your experiment fails, In her voice there's a tremble e'en now while she rails.

And your shore will soon be in the nature of things

Covered thick with gilt driftwood of run-away

Where alone, as it were in a Longfellow's Waif. Her fugitive pieces will find themselves safe. <sup>2</sup> O, my friends, thank your god, if you have one, that he

'Twixt the Old World and you set the gulf of

Be strong-backed, brown-handed, upright as your pines.

By the scale of a hemisphere shape your de-

Be true to yourselves and this new nineteenth

<sup>1</sup> The proposal for an international copyright law between England and the United States was long a matter of somewhat bitter discussion.

<sup>2</sup> Longfellow's collection of scattered prose pieces, Driftwood, though projected in 1852 was not published until 1857.

As a statue by Powers, 3 or a picture by Page. Plow, sail, forge, build, carve, paint, all things make new.

To your own New-World instincts contrive to be true

Keep your ears open wide to the Future's first

Be whatever you will, but yourselves first of

Stand fronting the dawn on Toil's heavenscaling peaks.

And become my new race of more practical Greeks.-

Hem! your likeness at present I shudder to tell o't.

Is that you have your slaves, and the Greek had his helot."

"There comes Poe, with his raven, like Barnaby Rudge, 4

Three fifths of him genius and two fifths sheer

Who talks like a book of iambs and pentam-

In a way to make people of common-sense damn meters.

Who has written some things quite the best of their kind.

But the heart somehow seems all squeezed out by the mind.

Who-but hey-dey! What's this? Messieurs Mathews and Poe. 6

You mustn't fling mud-balls at Longfellow so. Does it make a man worse that his character's

As to make his friends love him (as you think) too much?

Why, there is not a bard at this moment alive More willing than he that his fellows should

While you are abusing him thus, even now

He would help either one of you out of a

You may say that he's smooth and all that till you're hoarse.

But remember that elegance also is force;

After polishing granite as much as you will, The heart keeps its tough old persistency still;

Deduct all you can that still keeps you at bay;

<sup>7</sup> Hiram Powers, 1805-1873; William Page, 1811-1885 <sup>8</sup> In Dickens's Barnaby Rudge a raven figures prominently.

inently.

Poe in his critical essay "The Philosophy of Composition" had explained with great technical detail how he wrote "The Raven."

Poe in a review of Voices of the Night in Burton's Gentlaman's Magazine. "Mr. Longfellow and Other Plagiarists," had accused Longfellow of plagiarism. The Mr. Mathews is probably Cornelius Mathews, a New York writer.

Why, he'll live till men weary of Collins and Grav 1

I'm not overfond of Greek meters in English. To me rime's a gain, so it be not too jinglish, And your modern hexameter verses are no more

Like Greek ones than sleek Mr. Pope is like Homer: 2

As the roar of the sea to the coo of a pigeon is. So, compared to your moderns, sounds old 1320 Melesigenes: 3

I may be too partial, the reason, perhaps, o't is That I've heard the old blind man recite his own rhapsodies,

And my ear with that music impregnate may

Like the poor exiled shell with the soul of the

Or as one can't bear Strauss 4 when his nature is cloven

To its deeps within deeps by the stroke of Beethoven:

But, set that aside, and 'tis truth that I speak, Had Theocritus <sup>5</sup> written in English, not Greek. I believe that his exquisite sense would scarce change a line

In that rare, tender, virgin-like pastoral Evan-

That's not ancient nor modern, its place is apart

Where time has no sway, in the realm of pure

'Tis a shrine of retreat from Earth's hubbub and strife

As quiet and chaste as the author's own life.

"What! Irving? thrice welcome, warm heart and fine brain.

You bring back the happiest spirit from Spain. 6

And the gravest sweet humor, that ever were

Since Cervantes 7 met death in his gentle despair;

English poets of the 18th century Evangeline was written in dactyllic hexameters unrimed, the meter corresponding to that of Homer's Ihad. Pope's translation of the latter is so free as to be hardly Homeric.

Meles-born, a name used occasionally for Homer, who, tradition relates, composed some of his poems in a cave near the source of the river Meles in Ionia near the ancient Smyrna

Johann Strauss, an Austrian composer (1804-1849), famous for his waltz music

the great Sicilian-Greek pastoral poet of the third century B.C.

Irving returned to America in 1846 from his second residence in Spain.

Spanish poet and novelist, 1547-1616, author of Don Quixote; three years before his death he entered the order of the Franciscan friars.

Nav. don't be embarrassed, nor look so beseeching.-

I shan't run directly against my own preaching. And, having just laughed at their Raphaels and Dantes. 8

Go to setting you up beside matchless Cer-

But allow me to speak what I honestly feel.— To a true poet-heart add the fun of Dick Steele,

Throw in all of Addison, minus the chill, 9

With the whole of that partnership's stock and good-will.

Mix well, and while stirring, hum o'er, as a spell.

The fine old English Gentleman, simmer it well, Sweeten just to your own private liking, then strain.

That only the finest and clearest remain,

Let it stand out of doors till a soul it receives From the warm lazy sun loitering down through green leaves.

And you'll find a choice nature, not wholly deserving

A name either English or Yankee,—just Irving.

"There's Holmes, who is matchless among you for wit:

A Leyden-jar 10 always full-charged, from which

The electrical tingles of hit after hit;

In long poems 'tis painful sometimes and invites

A thought of the way the new Telegraph writes. 11

Which pricks down its little sharp sentences spitefully

As if you got more than you'd title to rightfully, And you find yourself hoping its wild father Lightning

Would flame in for a second and give you a fright'ning.

He has perfect sway of what I call a sham

But many admire it, the English pentameter, And Campbell, I think, wrote most commonly

With less nerve, swing, and fire in the same kind of verse,

Raphael the greatest painter and Dante the greatest poet of Italy, cf. lines 1618-1635, which apparently were written earlier.
 The warm-hearted Steele and the decorous Addison wrote The Spectator together.
 a glass jar used in condensing electricity and capable of the properties of the properties of giving a strong shock

The first telegraph line was set up between Washington and Baltimore in 1844. The primitive instruments of the first lines pricked messages upon moving strips of paper.

Nor e'er achieved aught in't so worthy of praise

As the tribute of Holmes to the grand Marseillaise 1

You went crazy last year over Bulwer's New Timon:- 2

Why, if B. to the day of his dying, should rime on.

Heaping verses on verses and tomes upon

He could ne'er reach the best point and vigor of Holmes.

His are just the fine hands, too, to weave you a lyric

Full of fancy, fun, feeling, or spiced with satyric

In a measure so kindly, you doubt if the toes That are trodden upon are your own or your foes'

"There is Lowell, who's striving Parnassus 3

With a whole bale of isms tied together with

He might get on alone, spite of brambles and boulders.

But he can't with that bundle he has on his shoulders,

The top of the hill he will ne'er come nigh reaching

Till he learns the distinction 'twixt singing and preaching;

His lyre has some chords that would ring pretty

But he'd rather by half make a drum of the shell.

And rattle away till he's old as Methusalem, At the head of a march to the last new Jerusalem."

1848 1848

BEAVER BROOK 4

Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill, And, minuting 5 the long day's loss. The cedar's shadow, slow and still, Creeps o'er its dial of gray moss.

in "A Metrical Essay": read before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Harvard, 1836 a satire published by Bulwer Lytton in 1846

a See note 8, p. 593.

Originally called "The Mill." "The little mill stands in a valley between one of the spurs of Wellington Hill and the main summit, just on the edge of Waltham. It is surely one of the loveliest spots in the world. It is one of my lions, and if you will make me a visit this spring I will take you up to hear it roar ..." Letters of James Russell Lowell, i, 149.

measuring by minutes

Warm noon brims full the valley's cup. The aspen's leaves are scarce astir, Only the little mill sends up Its busy, never-ceasing burr.

Climbing the loose-piled wall that hems The road along the mill-pond's brink. From 'neath the arching barberry-stems. My footstep scares the sly chewink.

Beneath a bony buttonwood The mill's red door lets forth the din: The whitened miller, dust-imbued. Flits past the square of dark within.

No mountain torrent's strength is here: Sweet Beaver, child of forest still. Heaps its small pitcher to the ear. And gently waits the miller's will.

Swift slips Undine 6 along the race Unheard, and then, with flashing bound, Floods the dull wheel with light and grace, And, laughing, hunts the loath drudge round.

The miller dreams not at what cost The quivering mill stones hum and whirl, Nor how for every turn, are tost Armfuls of diamonds and of pearl.

But summer cleared my happier eyes With drops of some celestial juice, To see how Beauty underlies For evermore each form of Use.

And more; methought I saw that flood, Which now so dull and darkling steals. Thick, here and there, with human blood, To turn the world's laborious wheels.

No more than doth the miller there. Shut in our several cells, do we Know with what waste of beauty rare Moves every day's machinery.

Surely the wiser time shall come When this fine overplus of might, No longer sullen, slow, and dumb, Shall leap to music and to light.

1848

In that new childhood of the Earth Life of itself shall dance and play. Fresh blood in Time's shrunk veins make mirth, And labor meet delight half-way.

6 the water spirit in Undine (1811) by Fouqué, Baron de la Motte

20

10

30

40

1848

20

30

10

THE FIRST SNOW-FALL 1

The snow had begun in the gloaming. And busily all the night Had been heaping field and highway With a silence deep and white.

Every pine and fir and hemlock Wore ermine too dear for an earl. And the poorest twig on the elm-tree Was ridged inch deep with pearl.

From sheds new-roofed with Carrara 2 Came Chanticleer's muffled crow, The stiff rails softened to swan's-down And still fluttered down the snow.

I stood and watched by the window The noiseless work of the sky. And the sudden flurries of snow-birds, Like brown leaves whirling by.

I thought of a mound in sweet Auburn Where a little headstone stood: How the flakes were folding it gently, As did robins the babes in the wood.

Up spoke our own little Mabel, Saying, "Father, who makes it snow?" And I told of the good All-father Who cares for us here below.

Again I looked at the snow-fall, And thought of the leaden sky That arched o'er our first great sorrow, When that mound was heaped so high.

I remembered the gradual patience That fell from that cloud like snow, Flake by flake, healing and hiding The scar that renewed our woe.

And again to the child I whispered, "The snow that husheth all, Darling, the merciful Father Alone can make it fall!"

Then, with eyes that saw not, I kissed her; And she, kissing back, could not know 39 That my kiss was given to her sister, Folded close under deepening snow. 1840 1849

In memory of Lowell's first child, Blanche, who had died in 1847 when but fourteen months old; she was buried in Mt. Auburn cemetery, Cambridge, very near Lowell's home.
 a very beautiful white Italian marble quarried at

Carrara

SHE CAME AND WENT

As a twig trembles, which a bird Lights on to sing, then leaves unbent. So is my memory thrilled and stirred: I only know she came and went.

As clasps some lake, by gusts unriven. The blue dome's measureless content. So my soul held that moment's heaven:-I only know she came and went.

As, at one bound, our swift spring heaps The orchards full of bloom and scent, So clove her May my wintry sleeps;-I only know she came and went.

An angel stood and met my gaze, Through the low doorway of my tent: The tent is struck, the vision stays;— I only know she came and went.

Oh, when the room grows slowly dim. And life's last oil is nearly spent, One gush of light these eyes will brim, Only to think she came and went. 1847?

1849

19

10

20

AUF WIEDERSEHEN 3

SUMMER

The little gate was reached at last. Half hid in lilacs down the lane; She pushed it wide, and, as she past, A wistful look she backward cast, And said,-"Auf wiedersehen!"

With hand on latch, a vision white Lingered reluctant, and again Half doubting if she did aright, Soft as the dews that fell that night, She said,—"Auf wiedersehen!"

The lamp's clear gleam flits up the stair; I linger in delicious pain; Ah, in that chamber, whose rich air To breathe in thought I scarcely dare, Thinks she,—"Auf wiedersehen!"

'Tis thirteen years; once more I press The turf that silences the lane; I hear the rustle of her dress. I smell the lilacs, and—ah, yes, I hear,-"Auf wiedersehen!"

Sweet piece of bashful maiden art! The English words had seemed too fain.

""May we meet again."

But these-they drew us heart to heart, Vet held us tenderly apart: She said .- "Auf wiedersehen!"

1854

DAS EWIG-WEIBLICHE 1

How was I worthy so divine a loss.

Deepening my midnights, kindling all my morns?

Why waste such precious wood to make my

Such far-sought roses for my crown of thorns?

And when she came, how earned I such a gift? Why spend on me, a poor earth-delving

The fireside sweetnesses, the heavenward lift, The hourly mercy, of a woman's soul?

Ah, did we know to give her all her right, What wonders even in our poor clay were done!

It is not Woman leaves us to our night, But our brute earth that grovels from her sun.

Our nobler cultured fields and gracious domes We whirl too oft from her who still shines on To light in vain our caves and clefts, the homes Of night-bird instincts pained till she be gone.

Still must this body starve our souls with shade:

But when Death makes us what we were before.

Then shall her sunshine all our depths invade, And not a shadow stain heaven's crystal floor

1858 1858

From THE BIGLOW PAPERS 2 [First Series, 1846-1848]

No. I-A LETTER

FROM MR. EZEKIEL BIGLOW OF TAALAM TO THE HON. JOSEPH T. BUCKINGHAM, EDITOR OF THE BOSTON COURIER, INCLOSING A POEM.

JAYLEM, june 1846.

MISTER EDDYTER: -- Our Hosea wuz down to Boston last week, and he see a cruetin Sariunt a struttin round as popler as a hen with 1

The eternally feminine; Lowell's first wife, Maria White, had died five years before.
 In these satires, which came out at intervals—the first series during the Mexican War, and the chicking, with 2 fellers a drummin and fifin arter him like all nater. the sariunt he thout Hosea hedn't gut his i teeth cut cos he looked a kindo's though he'd jest com down, so he cal'lated to hook him in, but Hosy woodn't take none o' his sarse for all he hed much as 20 Rooster's tales stuck onto his hat and eenamost enuf brass a bobbin up and down on his shoulders and figureed onto his coat and trousis, let alone wut nater hed sot in his featers, to make a 6 pounder out on.

wal. Hosea he com home considerabal riled, and arter I'd gone to bed I heern Him a thrashin round like a short-tailed Bull in fli-time. The old Woman ses she to me ses she, Zekle, ses she, our Hosee's gut the chollery or suthin anuther ses she, don't you Bee skeered, ses I, .he's oney amakin pottery [Aut insanit, aut versos facit.—H. W. 3] ses i, he's ollers on hand at that ere busynes like Da & martin. 4 and shure enuf. cum mornin. Hosy he cum down stares full chizzle, hare on eend and cote tales flyin, and sot rite of to go reed his varses to Parson Wilbur bein he haint aney grate shows o' book larnin himself, bimeby he cum back and sed the parson wuz dreffle tickled with 'em as i hoop you will Be, and said they wuz True grit.

Hosea ses taint hardly fair to call 'em hisn now, cos the parson kind o' slicked off sum o' the last varses, but he told Hosee he didn't want to put his ore in to tetch to the Rest on 'em, bein they wuz verry well As thay wuz, and then Hosy ses he sed suthin a nuther about Simplex Mundishes 5 or sum sech feller, but I guess Hosea kind o' didn't hear him, for I never hearn o' nobody o' that name in this villadge, and I've lived here man and boy 76 year cum next tater diggin, and thair aint no wheres a kitting spryer'n I be.

If you print 'em I wish you'd jest let folks know who hosy's father is, cos my ant Keziah used to say it's nater to be curus ses she, she aint livin though and he's a likely kind o' lad. EZEKIEL BIGLOW.

second series during the Civil War—Lowell, often with stinging force, puts into the mouth of the Yankee farmer the ideas current in New England at the time. Many believed that the Mexican War was begun with a view to increasing slave territory. At its close Mexico yielded to the United States much of what is now California, Nevada, Utah, Arizona, New Mexico, Colo ado, and Wyoming. H. W. or Homerus Wilbur, Esq., a pedantic minister, purports to edit the poems of his parishioner, Hosea Biglow.

3 "Either he raves or he composes verses." Horace, Satires, II, vii, ri7.

4 Messrs. Day and Martin's shoe blacking came in earthen (pottery) jars.

5 Simplex munditiis; "plain in thy neatness." Horace, Carmina, I, v, 5 second series during the Civil War-Lowell, often

Carmina, I, v, 5

20

50

Thrash away, you'll hev to rattle On them kittle-drums o' yourn,-'Taint a knowin' kind o' cattle Thet is ketched with moldy corn: Put in stiff, you fifer feller, Let folks see how spry you be.-Guess you'll toot till you are yeller 'Fore you git ahold o' me!

Thet air flag's a leetle rotten. Hope it aint your Sunday's best;— Fact! it takes a sight o' cotton To stuff out a soger's chest: Sence we farmers hev to pay fer't, Ef you must wear humps like these, Sposin' you should try salt hay fer't, It would du ez slick ez grease.

'Twouldn't suit them Southun fellers. They're a dreffle graspin' set. We must ollers blow the bellers Wen they want their irons het: May be it's all right ez preachin', But my narves it kind o' grates, Wen I see the overreachin' O' them nigger-drivin' States.

Them thet rule us, them slave-traders. Haint they cut a thunderin' swarth, (Helped by Yankee renegaders), Thru the vartu o' the North! We begin to think it's nater To take sarse an' not be riled:-Who'd expect to see a tater All on eend at bein' biled?

Ez fer war, I call it murder,— There you hev it plain an' flat; I don't want to go no furder Than my Testyment fer that; God hez sed so plump an' fairly, It's ez long ez it is broad. An' you've gut to git up airly Ef you want to take in God.

'Taint your eppyletts an' feathers Make the thing a grain more right; 'Taint afollerin' your bell-wethers Will excuse ye in His sight: Ef you take a sword an' dror it, An' go stick a feller thru. Guv'ment aint to answer for it, God'll send the bill to you.

Wut's the use o' meetin'-goin' Every Sabbath, wet or dry, Ef it's right to go amowin'

Feller-men like oats an' rve? I dunno but wut it's pooty Trainin' round in bobtail coats.-But it's curus Christian dooty This 'ere cuttin' folks's throats.

They may talk o' Freedom's airy 1 Tell they're pupple in the face.— It's a grand gret cemetary Fer the barthrights of our race: They jest want this Californy So's to lug new slave-states in To abuse ve. an' to scorn ve. An' to plunder ye like sin.

Aint it cute to see a Yankee Take sech everlastin' pains, All to git the Devil's thankee. Helpin' on 'em weld their chains? Wy, it's jest ez clear ez figgers. Clear ez one an' one make two. Chaps thet make black slaves o' niggers Want to make wite slaves o' you.

Tell ve jest the eend I've come to Arter cipherin' plaguy smart, An' it makes a handy sum, tu, Any gump could larn by heart: Laborin' man an' laborin' woman Hev one glory an' one shame, Ev'y thin' thet's done inhuman Injers all on 'em the same.

30 'Taint by turnin' out to hack folks You're agoin' to git your right, Nor by lookin' down on black folks Coz you're put upon by wite; Slavery aint o' nary color, 'Taint the hide thet makes it wus, All it keers fer in a feller 'S jest to make him fill its pus.

Want to tackle me in, du ye? I expect you'll hev to wait; Wen cold lead puts daylight thru ye You'll begin to kal'late; 'Spose the crows wun't fall to pickin' All the carkiss from your bones. Coz you helped to give a lickin' To them poor half-Spanish drones?

Jest go home an' ask our Nancy Wether I'd be sech a goose Ez to jine ye,—guess you'd fancy The etarnal bung was loose! She wants me fer home consumption, Let alone the hay's to mow,-

1 area: or possibly aerie (eagle-nest)

60

70

80

90

100

131

140

Ef you're arter folks o' gumption, You've a darned long row to hoe.

Take them editors thet's crowin'
Like a cockerel three months old,—
Don't ketch any on 'em goin',
Though they be so blasted bold;
Aint they a prime lot o' fellers?
'Fore they think on't guess they'll sprout,
(Like a peach thet's got the yellers)

With the meanness bustin' out.

Wal, go 'long to help 'em stealin'
Bigger pens to cram with slaves,
Help the men thet's ollers dealin'
Insults on your fathers' graves;
Help the strong to grind the feeble,
Help the many agin the few,
Help the men thet call your people
Witewashed slaves an' peddlin' crew!

Massachusetts, God forgive her,
She's akneelin' with the rest,
She thet ough' to ha' clung ferever
In her grand old eagle-nest;
She thet ough' to stand so fearless
Wile the wracks are round her hurled,
Holdin' up a beacon peerless
To the oppressed of all the world!

Ha'n't they sold your colored seamen?
Ha'n't they made your env'ys w'iz? '
Wut'll make ye act like free men?
Wut'll git your dander riz?
Come, I'll tell ye wut I'm thinkin'
Is our dooty in this fix,
They'd ha' done 't ez quick ez winkin'
In the days o' seventy-six.

Clang the bells in every steeple,
Call all true men to disown
The tradoocers of our people,
The enslavers o' their own;
Let our dear old Bay State proudly
Put the trumpet to her mouth,
Let her ring this messidge loudly
In the ears of all the South:—

"I'll return ye good for evil Much ez we frail mortils can, But I won't go help the Devil Makin' man the cus o' man:

Several southern states had laws forbidding solored freemen to enter their territory. Black sailors had been imprisoned and even sold as slaves in some southern ports. Mr. Samuel Hoar of Massachusetts, who had been sent to Charleston in the interests of black sailors, was expelled from South Carolina, and Mr. Hubbard, who had been sent to New Orleans, was made to leave Louisiana.

Call me coward, call me traiter,
Jest ez suits your mean idees,—
Here I stand a tyrant-hater,
An' the friend o' God an' Peace!"

150

160

Ef I'd my way I hed ruther
We should go to work an' part,—2
They take one way, we take t'other,—
Guess it wouldn't break my heart;
Man hed ough' to put asunder
Them thet God has noways jined;
An' I shouldn't gretly wonder
Ef there's thousands o' my mind.

The first recruiting sergeant on record I conceive to have been that individual who is mentioned in the Book of Job as going to and fro in the earth, and walking up and down in it. Bishop Latimer will have him to have been a bishop, but to me that other calling would appear more congenial. The sect of Cainites is not yet extinct, who esteemed the first-born of Adam to be the most worthy, not only because of that privilege of primogeniture, but inasmuch as he was able to overcome and slay his younger brother. That was a wise saying of the famous Marquis Pescara to the Papal Legate, that it was impossible for men to serve Mars and Christ at the same time. Yet in time past the profession of arms was judged to be κατ έξοχήν 3 that of a gentleman, nor does this opinion want for strenuous upholders even in our day. Must we suppose, then, that the profession of Christianity was only intended for losels, or, at best, to afford an opening for plebeian ambition? Or shall we hold with that nicely metaphysical Pomeranian, Captain Vratz, who was Count Königsmark's chief instrument in the murder of Mr. Thynne, that the Scheme of Salvation had been arranged with an especial eye to the necessities of the upper classes, and that "God would consider a gentleman and deal with him suitably to the condition and profession he had placed him in"? It may be said of us all, Exemplo plus quam ratione vivinus. 4—H. W.]

[Second Series, 1862-1866]
THE COURTIN'

God makes sech nights, all white an' still Fur'z you can look or listen, Moonshine an' snow on field an' hill, All silence an' all glisten.

"we live more by example than by reason"

&lt;sup>2</sup> The idea of secession was not confined to the South. ""par excellence"

20

50

60

70

80

90

Zekle crep' up quite unbeknown An' peeked in thru' the winder, An' there sot Huldy all alone, 'ith no one nigh to hender.

A fireplace filled the room's one side
With half a cord o' wood in—
There warn't no stoves (tell comfort died)
To bake ye to a puddin'.

The wa'nut logs shot sparkles out Towards the pootiest, bless her, An' leetle flames danced all about The chiny on the dresser.

Agin the chimbley crook-necks <sup>1</sup> hung, An' in amongst 'em rusted The ole queen's-arm <sup>2</sup> thet gran'ther Young Fetched back f'om Concord busted.

The very room, coz she was in, Seemed warm from floor to ceilin', An' she looked full ez rosy agin Ez the apples she was peelin'.

'Twas kin' o' kingdom-come to look On sech a blessed cretur, A dogrose blushin' to a brook Ain't modester nor sweeter.

He was six foot o' man, A 1, Clear grit an' human natur'; None couldn't quicker pitch a ton Nor dror a furrer straighter.

He'd sparked it with full twenty gals, He'd squired 'em, danced 'em, druv 'em, Fust this one, an' then thet, by spells— All is, he couldn't love 'em.

But long o' her his veins 'ould run All crinkly like curled maple, The side she breshed felt full o' sun Ez a south slope in Ap'il.

She thought no vice hed sech a swing Ez hisn in the choir; My! when he made Ole Hunderd ring, She knowed the Lord was nigher.

An' she'd blush scarlit, right in prayer, When her new meetin'-bunnet Felt somehow thru' its crown a pair O' blue eyes sot upun it.

Thet night, I tell ye, she looked some! She seemed to 've gut a new soul,

<sup>1</sup> squashes <sup>2</sup> musket

For she felt sartin-sure he'd come, Down to her very shoe-sole.

She heered a foot, an' knowed it tu, A-raspin' on the scraper,— All ways to once her feelin's flew Like sparks in burnt-up paper.

He kin' o' l'itered on the mat Some doubtfle o' the sekle, His heart kep' goin' pity-pat, But hern went pity Zekle.

An' yit she gin her cheer a jerk
Ez though she wished him furder,
An' on her apples kep' to work,
Parin' away like murder.

"You want to see my Pa, I s'pose?"
"Wal...no...I come dasignin'"—
"To see my Ma? She's sprinklin' clo'es Agin to-morrer's i'nin'."

To say why gals acts so or so, Or don't, 'ould be presumin'; Mebby to mean yes an' say no Comes nateral to women.

He stood a spell on one foot fust, Then stood a spell on t'other, An' on which one he felt the wust He couldn't ha' told ye nuther.

Says he, "I'd better call agin";
Says she, "Think likely, Mister":
Thet last word pricked him like a pin,
An'... Wal, he up an' kist her.

When Ma bimeby upon 'em slips, Huldy sot pale ez ashes, All kin' o' smily roun' the lips An' teary roun' the lashes.

For she was jes' the quiet kind
Whose naturs never vary,
Like streams that keep a summer mind
Snowhid in Jenooary.

The blood clost roun' her heart felt glued Too tight for all expressin', Tell mother see how metters stood, And gin 'em both her blessin'.

Then her red come back like the tide Down to the Bay o' Fundy, An' all I know is they was cried <sup>3</sup> In meetin' come nex' Sunday.

3 The marriage bans were published.

THE WASHERS OF THE SHROUD 1 OCTOBER, 1861

Along a river-side, I know not where, I walked one night in mystery of dream; A chill creeps curdling yet beneath my hair, To think what chanced me by the pallid gleam Of a moon-wraith that waned through haunted

Pale fireflies pulsed within the meadow-mist Their halos, wavering thistle-downs of light: The loon, that seemed to mock some goblin tryst.

Laughed; and the echoes, huddling in affright. Like Odin's hounds, fled baying down the night.

Then all was silent, till there smote my ear A movement in the stream that checked my hreath.

Was it the slow plash of a wading deer? But something said, "This water is of Death! The Sisters 2 wash a shroud.—ill thing to hear!"

I, looking then, beheld the ancient Three Known to the Greeks and to the Norseman's

That sit in shadow of the mystic Tree, Still crooning, as they weave their endless

One song: "Time was, Time is, and Time shall he."

No wrinkled crones were they, as I had deemed, But fair as yesterday, today, tomorrow, To mourner, lover, poet, ever seemed:

Something too deep for joy, too high for Thrilled in their tones, and from their faces gleamed.

"Still men and nations reap as they have strawn,"

So sang they, working at their task the while,— "The fatal raiment must be cleansed ere dawn:

1 In a letter to Charles Eliot Norton, Lowell wrote: "the

 In a letter to Charles Eliot Norton, Lowell wrote: "the hint [for the poem] came to me from one of those books of Souvestre's you lent me—the Breton legends." Letters of James Russell Lowell, i, 317. From the date of the poem and its imagery it is evident that Lowell greatly feared the breaking up of the Union.
 The Three Sisters or Fates; in classic mythology Clotho spun the thread of life, Lachesis measured it, and Atropos cut it. In Norse mythology the three Fates or Norns are Udur, Verdandi, and Skuld. They sit tending that root of the ash tree Yggdrasil, the supporter of the universe, which penetrates Asgard, the home of the gods. penetrates Asgard, the home of the gods.

3 hraid

For Austria? Italy? The Sea-Queen's isle? O'er what quenched grandeur must our shroud be drawn?

"Or is it for a younger, fairer corse, That gathered States like children round his

That tamed the wave to be his posting-horse. Feller of forests, linker of the seas,

Bridge-builder, hammerer, youngest son of Thor's?

"What make we, murmur'st thou? and what are we?

When empires must be wound, we bring the shroud.

The time-old web of the implacable Three: Is it too coarse for him, the young and proud? Earth's mightiest deigned to wear it, -why not

"Is there no hope?" I moaned, "so strong, so

Our Fowler whose proud bird would brook

No rival's swoop in all our western air! 4 Gather the ravens, then, in funeral file For him, life's morn yet golden in his hair?

"Leave me not hopeless, ye unpitying dames! I see, half seeing. Tell me, ye who scanned The stars, Earth's elders, still must noblest aims

Be traced upon oblivious ocean-sands? Must Hesper 5 join the wailing ghosts of names?"

"When grass-blades stiffen with red battle-dew, Ye deem we choose the victor and the slain: Say, choose we them that shall be leal and true To the heart's longing, the high faith of brain? Yet there the victory lies, if ye but knew.

"Three roots bear up Dominion: Knowledge. Will.—

These twain are strong, but stronger yet the third,

Obedience,—'tis the great tap-root that still, Knit round the rock of Duty, is not stirred, Though Heaven-loosed tempests spend their utmost skill.

France and Spain had, by 1803 and 1810 respectively, withdrawn from what is now the United States. Moreover, the "Monroe Doctrine" declared that the American continents must not be considered as subject to future colonization by European nations.

Hesperus, son of Eos, Dawn, is the evening (and so the western) star; it was regarded by the ancients as also the morning star-the bringer of light.

"Is the doom sealed for Hesper? 'Tis not we Denounce it, but the Law before all time: The brave makes danger opportunity; The waverer, paltering with the chance sublime, Dwarfs it to peril: which shall Hesper be?

"Hath he let vultures climb his eagle's seat To make Jove's bolts purveyors of their maw? Hath he the Many's plaudits found more sweet Than Wisdom? held Opinion's wind for law? Then let him hearken for the doomster's feet!

"Rough are the steps, slow-hewn in flintiest rock,

States climb to power by; slippery those with gold

Down which they stumble to eternal mock:
No chafferer's hand shall long the scepter hold,
Who, given a Fate to shape, would sell the block.

"We sing old sagas, songs of weal and woe,
Mystic because too cheaply understood;
Dark sayings are not ours: men hear and know,
See Evil weak, see strength alone in Good,
Yet hope to stem God's fire with walls of tow.

"Time Was unlocks the riddle of Time Is, That offers choice of glory or of gloom; The solver makes Time Shall Be surely his. But hasten, Sisters! for even now the tomb Grates its slow hinge and calls from the abyss."

"But not for him," I cried, "not yet for him, Whose large horizon, westering, star by star Wins from the void to where on ocean's rim The sunset shuts the world with golden bar,—Not yet his thews shall fail, his eye grow dim!

"His shall be larger manhood, saved for those That walk unblenching through the trial-fires; Not suffering, but faint heart, is worst of woes, And he no base-born son of craven sires, Whose eye need blench confronted with his foes

"Tears may be ours, but proud, for those who win

Death's royal purple in the foeman's lines; Peace, too, brings tears; and mid the battle-din, The wiser ear some text of God divines; For the sheathed blade may rust with darker sin. "God, give us peace! not such as lulls to sleep.
But sword on thigh, and brow with purpose knit!

And let our Ship of State to harbor sweep, Her ports all up, her battle-lanterns lit, And her leashed thunders gathering for their leap!"

So said I with clenched hands and passionate pain.

Thinking of dear ones by Potomac's side;
Again the loon laughed mocking, and again
The echoes bayed far down the night and died,
While, waking, I recalled my wandering brain.
1861

ODE RECITED AT THE HARVARD COMMEMORATION <sup>1</sup>

I

Weak-winged is song,
Nor aims at that clear-ethered height
Whither the brave deed climbs for light:
We seem to do them wrong.

Bringing our robin's-leaf to deck their hearse Who in warm life-blood wrote their nobler verse.

Our trivial song to honor those who come With ears attuned to strenuous trump and drum,

And shaped in squadron-strophes <sup>2</sup> their desire, Live battle-odes whose lines were steel and fire. <sup>10</sup>

Yet sometimes feathered words are strong A gracious memory to buoy up and save From Lethe's <sup>3</sup> dreamless ooze, the common grave

Of the unventurous throng.

п

Today our Reverend Mother welcomes back Her wisest Scholars, those who understood The deeper teaching of her mystic tome

And offered their fresh lives to make it good.

No lore of Greece or Rome,

No science peddling with the names of things, Or reading stars to find inglorious fates, 21

<sup>1</sup> The ode was read at Harvard College on July 21, 1865, at a solemn commemoration held in memory of the sons of the College who had fallen during the Civil War.

The strophe, or turn, was a division of the Greek choral ode, sung by one part of the Greek chorus; the response or anti-strophe was sung by the other part of the chorus.

3 the river of oblivion in Hades

Can lift our life with wings Far from Death's idle gulf that for the many waits. And lengthen out our dates

With that clear fame whose memory sings In manly hearts to come; and nerves them and dilates:

Nor such thy teaching. Mother of us all! Not such the trumpet-call

That could thy sons entice

Of thy diviner mood.

From happy homes and toils, the fruitful nest Of those half-virtues which the world calls best,

Into War's tumult rude:

But rather far that stern device The sponsors chose that round thy cradle stood

In the dim, unventured wood, The VERITAS 1 that lurks beneath The letter's unprolific sheath,

Life of whate'er makes life worth living, Seed-grain of high emprise, immortal food, One heavenly thing whereof earth hath the giving.

Many loved Truth, and lavished life's best oil Amid the dust of books to find her, Content at last, for guerdon of their toil, With the cast mantle she hath left behind her; 2

Many in sad faith sought for her, Many with crossed hands sighed for her. But these, our brothers, fought for her. At life's dear peril wrought for her, 50 So loved her that they died for her, Tasting the raptured fleetness Of her divine completeness:

Their higher instinct knew

Those love her best who to themselves are true. And what they dare to dream of dare to do:

They followed her and found her Where all may hope to find,

Not in the ashes of the burnt-out mind, But beautiful, with danger's sweetness round her:

60 Where faith, made whole with deed, Breathes its awakening breath Into the lifeless creed, They saw her, plumed and mailed, With sweet, stern face unveiled,

And all-repaying eyes, look proud on them in death.

Our slender life runs rippling by, and glides Into the silent hollow of the past;

1 Veritas (L. truth) motto on Harvard University seal 2 knowledge of the past

What is there that abides

To make the next age better for the last? Is earth too poor to give us

Something to live for here that shall outlive us?

Some more substantial boon

Than such as flows and ebbs with Fortune's fickle moon?

The little that we see From doubt is never free: 3 The little that we do Is but half-nobly true:

With our laborious hiving What men call treasure, and the gods call dross, Life seems a jest of Fate's contriving,

Only secure in every one's conniving, A long account of nothings paid with loss, Where we poor puppets, jerked by unseen wires.

After our little hour of strut and rave. 4 With all our pasteboard passions and desires, Loves, hates, ambitions, and immortal fires,

Are tossed pell-mell together in the grave.

Ah, there is something here Unfathomed by the cynic's sneer; 90 Something that gives our feeble light

A high immunity from Night; Something that leaps life's narrow bars

To claim its birthright with the hosts of heaven: 5

A seed of sunshine that doth leaven Our earthly dulness with the beams of stars, And glorify our clay

With light from fountains elder than the Day;

100

110

A conscience more divine than we, A gladness fed with secret tears,

A vexing, forward-reaching sense

Of some more noble permanence;

A light across the sea, Which haunts the soul and will not let it be, Still glimmering from the heights of undegenerate years.

Whither leads the path To ampler fates that leads? Not down through flowery meads, To reap an aftermath Of youth's vainglorious weeds; But up the steep, amid the wrath

And shock of deadly-hostile creeds,

3 Cf. Browning in "Bishop Blougram's Apology," 11. 100-

"All we have gained then by our unbelief
Is a life of doubt diversified by faith,
For one of faith diversified by doubt:
We called the chess-board white,—we call it black."

4 Cf. Macbeth V, v, 25.
5 Cf. Wordsworth's "Ode, Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood," ix.

Where the world's best hope and stay By battle's flashes grope a desperate way, And every turf the fierce foot clings to bleeds.

Peace hath her not ignoble wreath, Ere yet the sharp, decisive word

Lights the black lips of cannon, and the sword Dreams in its easeful sheath:

But some day the live coal behind the thought, Whether from Baäl's <sup>1</sup> stone obscene, <sup>120</sup>

Or from the shrine serene Of God's pure altar brought,

Bursts up in flame; the war of tongue and pen Learns with what deadly purpose it was fraught. And, helpless in the fiery passion caught, Shakes all the pillared state with shock of men. Some day the soft Ideal that we wooed Confronts us fiercely, foe-beset, pursued, And cries reproachful; Was it, then, my praise,

And not myself was loved? Prove now thy

I claim of thee the promise of thy youth; Give me thy life, or cower in empty phrase, The victim of thy genius, not its mate!"

Life may be given in many ways, And loyalty to Truth be sealed As bravely in the closet as the field, truth!

So generous is Fate;

But then to stand beside her,
When craven churls deride her,
To front a lie in arms and not to yield,
This shows methinks God's plan

This shows, methinks, God's plan And measure of a stalwart man, Limbed like the old heroic breeds.

Who stands self-poised on manhood's solid earth,

Not forced to frame excuses for his birth, Fed from within with all the strength he needs.

VI

Such was he, our Martyr-Chief, <sup>2</sup>
Whom late the Nation he had led,

With ashes on her head,
Wept with the passion of an angry grief:
Forgive me, if from present things I turn
To speak what in my heart will beat and burn,
And hang my wreath on his world-honored urn.

Nature, they say, doth dote, And cannot make a man Save on some worn-out plan, Repeating us by rote:

For him her Old-World mold aside she threw, And, choosing sweet clay from the breast

A Canaanitish deity, god of abundance and fertility; his worship, attended with wild orgies, was introduced among the Israelites during the time of the kings.

<sup>2</sup> Abraham Lincoln, assassinated April 14, 1865

Of the unexhausted West, 160 With stuff untainted shaped a hero new, Wise, steadfast in the strength of God, and

How beautiful to see

Once more a shepherd of mankind indeed, Who loved his charge but never loved to lead; One whose meek flock the people joyed to be,

Not lured by any cheat of birth,

But by his clear-grained human worth, And brave old wisdom of sincerity!

They knew that outward grace is dust; 170 They could not choose but trust

In that sure-footed mind's unfaltering skill,

And supple-tempered will That bent like perfect steel to spring again and thrust.

Nothing of Europe here—
Or, then, of Europe fronting mornward still,
Ere any names of Serf and Peer
Could Nature's equal scheme deface:
Here was a type of the true elder race,

And one of Plutarch's men <sup>3</sup> talked with us face to face.

I praise him not: it were too late; And some innative weakness there must be In him who condescends to victory Such as the Present gives, and cannot wait,

> Safe in himself as in a fate. So always firmly he:

> He knew to bide his time, And can his fame abide,

Still patient in his simple faith sublime,

Till the wise years decide.

Great captains, with their guns and drums,
Disturb our judgment for the hour,

But at last silence comes;

These all are gone, and, standing like a tower, Our children shall behold his fame,

The kindly-earnest, brave, foreseeing man, Sagacious, patient, dreading praise, not blame, New birth of our new soil, the first American.

VII

Long as man's hope insatiate can discern
Or only guess some more inspiring goal
Outside of Self, enduring as the pole,
Along whose course the flying axles burn
Of spirits bravely-pitched, earth's manlier brood;

Long as below we cannot find The meed that stills the inexorable mind; So long this faith to some ideal Good, Under whatever mortal names it masks— Freedom, Law, Country,—this ethereal mood

<sup>3</sup> Plutarch, a Greek historian of the first century, wrote the lives of forty-six of the most famous Greeks and Romans. That thanks the Fates for their severer tasks. 210 Feeling its challenged pulses leap While others skulk in subterfuges cheap, And, set in Danger's van, has all the boon it asks.

Shall win man's praise and woman's love, Shall be a wisdom that we set above All other skills and gifts to culture dear. A virtue round whose forehead we enwreathe Laurels that with a living passion breathe When other crowns are cold and soon grow

What brings us thronging these high rites to pay.

And seal these hours the noblest of our year, Save that our brothers found this better

VIII

We sit here in the Promised Land 1 That flows with Freedom's honey and milk; But 't was they won it, sword in hand, Making the nettle danger 2 soft for us as silk. We welcome back our bravest and our best-Ah me! not all! some come not with the rest,

Who went forth brave and bright as any here! I strive to mix some gladness with my strain, But the sad strings complain,

And will not please the ear:

I sweep them for a paean, 3 but they wane Again and yet again

Into a dirge and die away in pain. In these brave ranks I only see the gaps, Thinking of dear ones whom the dumb turf wraps,

Dark to the triumph which they died to gain: Fitlier may others greet the living,

For me the past is unforgiving;

I with uncovered head Salute the sacred dead,

Who went, and who return not.—Say not so! 'T is not the grapes of Canaan 4 that repay, But the high faith that failed not by the way: Virtue treads paths that end not in the grave; No ban of endless night exiles the brave;

And to the saner mind We rather seem the dead that stayed behind. Blow, trumpets, all your exultations blow! For never shall their aureoled presence lack: I see them muster in a gleaming row. With ever-youthful brows that nobler show; We find in our dull road their shining track;

<sup>1</sup> Cf. the land of Canaan promised to the Israelites, Exodus iii, 8.

<sup>2</sup> "Out of this nettle, danger, we pluck this flower, safety." Shakespeare, 1 Henry IV, II, iii.
<sup>3</sup> song of triumph <sup>4</sup> See Numbers xiii, 17, ff.

In every nobler mood We feel the orient of their spirit glow, Part of our life's unalterable good, Of all our saintlier aspiration;

They come transfigured back. Secure from change in their high-hearted ways. Beautiful evermore, and with the rays Of morn on their white Shields of Expectation!

Who now shall sneer? Who dare again to say we trace Our lines to a plebeian race? Roundhead and Cavalier! 5

Dreams are those names erewhile in battle loud:

Forceless as is the shadow of a cloud, They live but in the ear:

That is best blood that hath most iron in 't To edge resolve with, pouring without stint

For what makes manhood dear. Tell us not of Plantagenets,

Hapsburgs, and Guelfs, 6 whose thin bloods crawl

Down from some victor in a border-brawl! How poor their outworn coronets, Matched with one leaf of that plain civic wreath

Our brave for honor's blazon shall bequeath. Through whose desert a rescued Nation sets Her heel on treason, and the trumpet hears Shout victory, tingling Europe's sullen ears With vain resentments and more vain regrets!

240

Not in anger, not in pride. Pure from passion's mixture rude Ever to base earth allied. But with far-heard gratitude, Still with heart and voice renewed, To heroes living and dear martyrs dead,

The strain should close that consecrates our 290

Lift the heart and lift the head! Lofty be its mood and grave, Not without a martial ring, Not without a prouder tread And a peal of exultation: Little right has he to sing Through whose heart in such an hour

The Roundheads, or Puritans, and the Cavaliers, or monarchists, were the two parties in the Puritan Revolution, 1642-1646, in England.
 The Plantagenets were the rulers of England from 1154 to 1390; the Hapsburgs were sovereigns of the Holy Roman Empire, Austria, and Spain for many centuries, and still rule Spain; and the Guelphs were ancestors of the House of Hanover, the present ruling family in England.

20

Beats no march of conscious power, Sweeps no tumult of elation! T is no Man we celebrate. By his country's victories great, 300 A hero half, and half the whim of Fate, But the pith and marrow of a Nation Drawing force from all her men. Highest, humblest, weakest, all, Pulsing it again through them, Till the basest can no longer cower. Feeling his soul spring up divinely tall, Touched but in passing by her mantle-hem. Come back, then, noble pride, for 't is her dower! How could poet ever tower, 310 If his passions, hopes, and fears, If his triumphs and his tears. Kept not measure with his people?

Boom, cannon, boom to all the winds and waves!
Clash out, glad bells, from every rocking steeple! Banners, advance with triumph, bend your staves!

And from every mountain-peak
Let beacon-fire to answering beacon speak,
Katahdin tell Monadnock, Whiteface he,
And so leap on in light from sea to sea,
Till the glad news be sent

Across a kindling continent, Making earth feel more firm and air breathe braver:

"Be proud! for she is saved, and all have helped to save her!

She that lifts up the manhood of the poor, She of the open soul and open door, With room about her hearth for all mankind! The helm from her bold front she doth un-

Sends all her handmaid armies back to spin, And bids her navies hold their thunders in. No challenge sends she to the elder world,

That looked askance and hated; a light scorn 331

Plays on her mouth, as round her mighty knees

She calls her children back, and waits the

Of nobler day, enthroned between her subject seas."

XI

Bow down, dear Land, for thou hast found release!

Thy God, in these distempered days,

Mount Katahdin is the highest mountain in Maine; Monadnock and Whiteface are mountains in New Hampshire. Hath taught thee the sure wisdom of His ways, And through thine enemies hath wrought thy peace.

Bow down in prayer and praise!

O Beautiful! my Country! ours once more!

Smoothing thy gold of war-dishevelled hair
O'er such sweet brows as never other wore,

And letting thy set lips,
Freed from wrath's pale eclipse,
The rosy edges of their smile lay bare,
What words divine of lover or of poet
Could tell our love and make thee know it,
Among the Nations bright beyond compare?

What were our lives without thee?
What all our lives to save thee;
We reck not what we gave thee;
We will not dare to doubt thee;
But ask whatever else, and we will dare!

But ask whatever else, and we will dare! 1865

AFTER THE BURIAL

YES, faith is a goodly anchor; <sup>2</sup>
When skies are sweet as a psalm,
At the bows it lolls so stalwart,
In its bluff, broad-shouldered calm.

And when over breakers to leeward
The tattered surges are hurled,
It may keep our head to the tempest,
With its grip on the base of the world.

But, after the shipwreck, tell me
What help in its iron thews,
Still true to the broken hawser,
Deep down among sea-weed and ooze?

In the breaking gulfs of sorrow,
When the helpless feet stretch out
And find in the deeps of darkness
No footing so solid as doubt.

Then better one spar of Memory, One broken plank of the Past, That our human heart may cling to, Though hopeless of shore at last!

To the spirit its splendid conjectures, To the flesh its sweet despair, Its tears o'er the thin-worn locket With its anguish of deathless hair!

Immortal? I feel it and know it, Who doubts it of such as she?

2 The first draft of the first six stanzas of "After the Burial" was written at the death of Lowell's second little infant, Rose, in 1850. Before the poem was finished he had lost a little son and his wife, Maria White.

40

50

1868

But that is the pang's very secret,— Immortal away from me.

There's a narrow ridge in the graveyard Would scarce stay a child in his race, But to me and my thought it is wider Than the star-sown vague of Space.

Your logic, my friend, is perfect,
Your moral most drearily true;
But, since the earth clashed on her coffin,
I keep hearing that, and not you.

Console if you will, I can bear it;
'T is a well-meant alms of breath;
But not all the preaching since Adam
Has made Death other than Death.

It is pagan; but wait till you feel it,—
That jar of our earth, that dull shock
When the plowshare of deeper passion
Tears down to our primitive rock.

Communion in spirit! Forgive me, But I, who am earthly and weak, Would give all my incomes from dreamland For a touch of her hand on my cheek.

That little shoe in the corner, So worn and wrinkled and brown, With its emptiness confutes you, And argues your wisdom down. 1868

IN A COPY OF OMAR KHAYYAM

THESE pearls of thought in Persian gulfs were bred,

Each softly lucent as a rounded moon; The diver Omar plucked them from their bed, Fitzgerald strung them on an English thread.

Fit rosary for a queen, in shape and hue, When Contemplation tells her pensive beads Of mortal thoughts, forever old and new. Fit for a queen? Why, surely then for you!

The moral? Where Doubt's eddies toss and twirl

Faith's slender shallop till her footing reel, 10 Plunge; if you find not peace beneath the whirl,

Groping, you may like Omar grasp a pearl.

1888
e Rubàiyàt (quatrains) by Omar Khayyàm, the

<sup>1</sup> The Rubàiyàt (quatrains) by Omar Khayyàm, the Persian poet of the 11th and 12th centuries, is one of the world's great poems. The best translation is that of Edward Fitzgerald, 1859.

"FRANCISCUS DE VERULAMIO SIC

THAT'S a rather bold speech, my Lord Bacon, For, indeed, is't so easy to know Just how much we from others have taken, And how much our own natural flow?

Since your mind bubbled up at its fountain, How many streams made it elate, While it calmed to the plain from the mountain,

As every mind must that grows great?

While you thought 't was You thinking as newly

As Adam still wet with God's dew,
You forgot in your self-pride that truly
The whole Past was thinking through you.

Greece, Rome, nay, your namesake, old Roger, <sup>3</sup>

With Truth's nameless delvers who wrought In the dark mines of Truth, helped to prod your Fine brain with the goad of their thought.

As mummy 4 was prized for a rich hue
The painter no elsewhere could find,
So't was buried men's thinking with which you
Gave the ripe mellow tone to your mind. 20

I heard the proud strawberry saying,
"Only look what a ruby I've made!"
It forgot how the bees in their maying
Had brought it the stuff for its trade.

And yet there's the half of a truth in it, And my Lord might his copyright sue; For a thought's his who kindles new youth in it.

Or so puts it as makes it more true.

The birds but repeat without ending
The same old traditional notes,
Which some, by more happily blending,
Seem to make over new in their throats;

<sup>2</sup> The heading to the preface of Bacon's great philosophical work, the Instauratio Magna, is:

Franciscus de Verulamio sic cogitavit, talemque apud se rationem instituit; quam viventibus et posteris notam fieri, ipsorum interesse putavit.

[Francis Bacon thought as fo'lows and reached conclusions such as these, which he thought when made known to the living and their descendants would be of concern to them.]

3 Roger Bacon, 1214-1294, an English philosopher and scientist

4 an oil-painters' color that was made from asphalt taken from mummies

And we men through our old bit of song run, Until one just improves on the rest, And we call a thing his, in the long run.

Who utters it clearest and best 1888

JONES VERY 1813-1880

Very was the son of a sea captain with whom he made several voyages to Europe. He was graduated from Harvard in 1836 and was for two years afterwards tutor in Greek there. He was licensed to preach as a Unitarian clergyman but was never a pastor. After his Harvard experience he lived a retired life at Salem, where he was born and where, also, he died, preaching occasionally and engaged in literary work. Essays and Poems appeared in 1839 and again in a completed edition under the same title in 1886. It is easy to see that the idealism of these sonnets carries out, on a different plane, the spirit of Emerson and Thoreau.

THE SOLDIER

He was not armed like those of eastern clime, Whose heavy axes <sup>1</sup> felled their heathen foe; Nor was he clad like those of later time, Whose breast-worn cross betraved no cross

below: 2

Nor was he of the tribe of Levi 3 born,

Whose pompous rites proclaim how vain their prayer,

Whose chilling words are heard at night and morn.

Who rend their robes, but still their hearts would spare;

But he nor steel nor sacred robe had on,
Yet went he forth in God's almighty power,
And spake the word whose will is ever done
From day's first dawn till earth's remotest hour:

And mountains melted from his presence down, And hell affrighted fled before his frown.

THE DEAD 4

I see them,—crowd on crowd they walk the earth.

Dry leafless trees no autumn wind laid bare; And in their nakedness find cause for mirth, And all unclad would winter's rudeness dare; No sap doth through their clattering branches flow.

1 Battle-axes were used in war by the Jews.

Some of the Crusaders were prompted quite as much by personal ambition as by religious devotion.

The Levites, originally attendants and assistants of the Jewish priests, in later times assumed the offices of priesthood.

This strange somet characterizes those who, though

This strange sonnet characterizes those who, though alive in body, are really dead to all that is best. Whence springing leaves and blossoms bright appear:

Their hearts the living God have ceased to know

Who gives the spring time to th' expectant year;

They mimic life, as if from him to steal His glow of health to paint the livid cheek; 10 They borrow words for thoughts they cannot feel

That with a seeming heart their tongue may

And in their show of life more dead they live Than those that to the earth with many tears they give.

THE WAR 5

I saw a war, yet none the trumpet blew, Nor in their hands the steel-wrought weapons hare:

And in that conflict armed there fought but few.

And none that in the world's loud tumults share:

They fought against their wills,—the stubborn foe

That mail-clad warriors left unfought within, And wordy champions left unslain below,— The ravening wolf though drest in fleecy skin; They fought for peace,—not that the world can give.

Whose tongue proclaims the war its hands have ceased,

And bids us as each other's neighbor live, Ere haughty Self within us has deceased; They fought for him whose kingdom must increase,

Good will to men, on earth forever peace.

THE WILD ROSE OF PLYMOUTH

Upon the Plymouth shore the wild rose blooms As when the Pilgrims lived beside the bay, And scents the morning air with sweet per-

Though new this hour, more ancient far than they:

More ancient than the wild yet friendly race
That roved the land before the Pilgrims came,
And here for ages found a dwelling-place,
Of whom our histories tell us but the name!
Though new this hour, out from the past it springs.

Telling this summer morning of earth's prime; And happy visions of the future brings

5 the battle in the heart between right and wrong

That reach beyond, e'en to the verge of time; Wreathing earth's children in one flowery chain Of love and beauty, ever to remain.

RICHARD HENRY DANA, IR. 1815-1882

Interest in ships and the sea may rise or fall, but such an account as Dana's of a phase of sea life that has passed away will last for its sheer narrative interest. Dana was born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, son of Richard Henry Dana. His Harvard career was interrupted by ill-health which occasioned a sea voyage to California, the basis of his classic of sea life, Two Years Before the Mast, 1840. He was graduated in 1837, studied and practiced law, contributed to legal and political periodicals, and was pursuing the study of international law abroad at the time of his death at Rome.

Thousands of sailors have been through all that Dana experienced and more, but the narrative of this Boston lad is unique. It is the crude stuff of life handled with unforced, spontaneous vigor. Dana leans hard on his facts, makes these tell their own story. Masefield has done much the same thing in verse.

"Dana and our Literature of the Sea." Nation 101:487-8; J. London, "A Classic of the Sea," Ind. 71:1297-9; Outlook 99:928-9.

From TWO YEARS BEFORE THE MAST 1 CHAPTER XXXI

There began now to be a decided change in the appearance of things. The days became shorter and shorter; the sun running lower in its course each day, and giving less and less heat, and the nights so cold as to prevent our sleeping on deck; the Magellan Clouds 2 in sight, of a clear night; the skies looking cold

<sup>1</sup> Dana gives in this book an account of a voyage he na gives in this book an account of a voyage he took, at the age of nineteen, because of weakness of eyesight, just after his junior year at Harvard. Shipping as an ordinary sailor, he left Boston in the Pilgrim, August 14, 1834, for California via Cape Horn. The cargo consisted, as Dana says, "of everything under the sun—spirits of all kinds, "of everything under the sun—spirits of all kinds, tea, coffee, sugar, spices, raisins, molasses, hardware, crockery, tinware, cutlery, clothing... in fact everything that can be imagined from Chinese fireworks to English cart-wheels." See Chap. XIII. On May 8, 1836, Dana started from San Diego on the return trip in the Alert, which carried a cargo of forty thousand hides. The crew of the Alert consisted of fourteen sailors, a carnetter cook stayard three mates and the carpenter, cook, steward, three mates, and the captain. They were, at the opening of Chapter XXXI, eighteen hundred miles northwest of Cape Horn. Only those nautical terms have been annotated which are needed for a general understanding of the narrative, most explanations of rigging and of sailing directions being therefore omitted. For more detailed explanations see the Lake English Classics edition of Two Years Before the Mast.

2 three cloud-like nebulae in the southern heavens discovered by Magellan, 1480-1541 and angry; and, at times, a long, heavy, ugly sea, setting in from the southward, told us what we were coming to. Still, however, we had a fine, strong breeze, and kept on our way, under as much sail as our ship would bear. Toward the middle of the week, the wind hauled to the southward, which brought us upon a taut bowline, made the ship meet, nearly head-on, the heavy swell which rolled from that direction; and there was something not at all encouraging in the manner in which she met it. Being so deep and heavy, she wanted the buoyancy which should have carried her over the seas, and she dropped heavily into them. the water washing over the decks; and every now and then, when an unusually large sea met her fairly upon the bows, she struck it with a sound as dead and heavy as that with which a sledge-hammer falls upon the pile, and took the whole of it in upon the forecastle, and, rising, carried it aft in the scuppers, 3 washing the rigging off the pins, and carrying along with it everything which was loose on deck. She had been acting in this way all of our forenoon watch below; as we could tell by the washing of the water over our heads, and the heavy breaking of the seas against her bows, (with a sound as though she were striking against a rock.) only the thickness of the plank from our heads, as we lay in our berths, which are directly against the bows. At eight bells, 4 the watch was called, and we came on deck, one hand going aft to take the wheel, and another going to the galley to get the grub for dinner. I stood on the forecastle, looking at the seas, which were rolling high, as far as the eye could reach, their tops white with foam, and the body of them of a deep indigo blue, reflecting the bright rays of the sun. Our ship rose slowly over a few of the largest of them, until one immense fellow came rolling on, threatening to cover her, and which I was sailor enough to know, by the "feeling of her" under my feet, she would not rise over. I sprang upon the knight-heads, 5 and, seizing hold of the forestay, drew myself up upon it. My feet were just off the stanchion when she struck fairly into the middle of the sea, and it washed her fore and aft, burying her in the water. As soon as she rose out of it, I looked aft, and everything forward of the mainmast, except the

&lt;sup>3</sup> holes at the side of the deck, to let water run off, and the channels leading to them
<sup>4</sup> Noon: a bell is rung for every half hour that has elapsed, beginning with twelve, four, and eight o'clock, day and night.

Upright timbers placed to hold the bowsprit; they come up through the forward deck and extend a few long-boat, which was griped and double-lashed down to the ring-bolts, was swept off clear. The galley, 1 the pigsty, the hencoop, and a large sheep-pen which had been built upon the forehatch, were all gone in the twinkling of an eye,-leaving the deck as clean as a chin newreaped.—and not a stick left to show where they had stood. In the scuppers lay the galley. bottom up, and a few boards floating about. the wreck of the sheep-pen,—and half a dozen miserable sheep floating among them, wet through, and not a little frightened at the sudden change that had come upon them. As soon as the sea had washed by, all hands sprang up out of the forecastle to see what had become of the ship; and in a few moments the cook and Old Bill crawled out from under the galley. where they had been lying in the water, nearly smothered, with the galley over them. Fortunately, it rested against the bulwarks, or it would have broken some of their bones. When the water ran off, we picked the sheep up, and put them in the long-boat, got the galley back in its place, and set things a little to rights; but, had not our ship had uncommonly high bulwarks and rail, everything must have been washed overboard, not excepting Old Bill and the cook. Bill had been standing at the galleydoor, with the kid 2 of beef in his hand for the forecastle mess, when away he went, kid, beef, and all. He held on to the kid till the last. like a good fellow, but the beef was gone, and when the water had run off we saw it lying high and dry, like a rock at low tide—nothing could hurt that. We took the loss of our beef very easily, consoling ourselves with the recollection that the cabin had more to lose than we; and chuckled not a little at seeing the remains of the chicken-pie and pancakes floating in the scuppers. "This will never do!" was what some said, and every one felt. Here we were, not yet within a thousand miles of the latitude of Cape Horn, and our decks swept by a sea not one half so high as we must expect to find there. Some blamed the captain for loading his ship so deep when he knew what he must expect; while others said that the wind was always southwest, off the Cape, in the winter; and that, running before it, we should not mind the seas so much. When we got down into the forecastle, Old Bill, who was somewhat of a croaker,-having met with a great many accidents at sea,—said that if that was the way she was going to act, we might as well make our wills, and balance the books at once, and put on a clean shirt. "Yast there, you bloody old owl! you're always hanging out blue lights! You're frightened by the ducking you got in the scuppers, and can't take a joke! What's the use in being always on the lookout for Davy Jones?" 3 "Stand by!" says another, "and we'll get an afternoon watch below, by this scrape"; but in this they were disappointed, for at two bells 4 all hands were called and set to work, getting lashings upon everything on deck; and the captain talked of sending down the long topgallant masts; but as the sea went down toward night, and the wind hauled abeam, we left them standing, and set the studding sails.

The next day all hands were turned-to upon unbending the old sails, and getting up the new ones; for a ship, unlike people on shore, puts on her best suit in bad weather. The old sails were sent down, and three new topsails, and new fore and main courses, jib, and fore-top-mast staysail, which were made on the coast, and never had been used, were bent, with a complete set of new earings, robands, and reefpoints; and reef-tackles were rove to the courses, and spilling-lines to the topsails. These, with new braces and clew-lines fore and aft, gave us a good suit of running rigging.

The wind continued westerly, and the weather and sea less rough since the day on which we shipped the heavy sea, and we were making great progress under studding-sails, with our light sails all set, keeping a little to the eastward of south; for the captain, depending upon westerly winds off the Cape, had kept so far to the westward that, though we were within about five hundred miles of the latitude of Cape Horn, we were nearly seventeen hundred miles to the westward of it. Through the rest of the week we continued on with a fair wind, gradually, as we got more to the southward, keeping a more easterly course, and bringing the wind on our larboard quarter, until—

Sunday, June 26th; when, having a fine, clear day, the captain got a lunar observation, as well as his meridian altitude, which made us in lat. 47° 50′ S., long. 113° 49′ W.; Cape Horn bearing, according to my calculation, E. S. E. ½ E., and distant eighteen hundred miles.

Monday, June 27th. During the first part of this day the wind continued fair, and, as we were going before it, it did not feel very cold, so that we kept at work on deck in our common clothes and round jackets. Our watch had an afternoon watch below for the first time since leaving San Diego; and, having inquired of the third mate what the latitude was at noon.

2 wooden dish

<sup>4</sup> one o'clock

and made our usual guesses as to the time she would need to be up with the Horn, we turned-in for a nap. We were sleeping away "at the rate of knots," when three knocks on the scuttle 1 and "All hands, ahoy!" started us from our berths. What could be the matter? It did not appear to be blowing hard, and, looking up through the scuttle, we could see that it was a clear day overhead; yet the watch were taking in sail. We thought there must be a sail in sight, and that we were about to heave-to and speak her; and were just congratulating ourselves upon it.—for we had seen neither sail nor land since we left port,-when we heard the mate's voice on deck (he turned-in "all standing," and was always on deck the moment he was called) singing out to the men who were taking in the studding-sails, and asking where his watch 2 were. We did not wait for a second call, but tumbled up the ladder: and there, on the starboard bow, was a bank of mist, covering sea and sky, and driving directly for us. I had seen the same before, in my passage round in the Pilgrim, and knew what it meant, and that there was no time to be lost. We had nothing on but thin clothes, yet there was not a moment to spare, and at it we went.

The boys of the other watch were in the tops. taking in the topgallant studding sails and the lower and topmast studding sails were coming down by the run. It was nothing but "haul down and clew up," until we got all the studding-sails in, and the royals, flying jib, and mizzen topgallant sail furled, and the ship kept off a little, to take the squall. The fore and main topgallant sails were still on her, for the "old man" did not mean to be frightened in broad daylight, and was determined to carry sail till the last minute. We all stood waiting for its coming, when the first blast showed us that it was not to be trifled with. Rain, sleet, snow, and wind enough to take our breath from us, and make the toughest turn his back to windward! The ship lay nearly over upon her beam-ends; the spars and rigging snapped and cracked; and her topgallant-masts bent like whipsticks. "Clew up the fore and main topgallant sails!" shouted the captain, and all hands sprang to the clew lines. The decks were standing nearly at an angle of forty-five degrees, and the ship going like a mad steed

¹ hatchway
² "The crew are divided into two divisions as equally as may be, called the watches. . . They divide the time between them, being on and off duty, or as it is called, on deck and below, every other four hours." [Dana's note.]

through the water, the whole forward part of her in a smother of foam. The halvards were let go and the vard clewed down, and the sheets started, and in a few minutes the sails smothered and kept in by clewlines and buntlines. "Furl 'em, sir?" asked the mate. "Let go the topsail halvards, fore and aft!" shouted the captain in answer, at the top of his voice. Down came the topsail vards, the reef-tackles were manned and hauled out, and we climbed up to windward, and sprang into the weather rigging. The violence of the wind, and the hail and sleet, driving nearly horizontally across the ocean, seemed actually to pin us down to the rigging. It was hard work making head against them. One after another we got out upon the yards. And here we had work to do; for our new sails which had hardly been bent long enough to get the starch out of them, and the new earings and reef-points, stiffened with the sleet, knotted like pieces of iron wire. Having only our round jackets and straw hats on, we were soon wet through, and it was every moment growing colder. Our hands were soon stiffened and numbed, which, added to the stiffness of everything else, kept us a good while on the yard. After we had got the sail hauled upon the yard, we had to wait a long time for the weather earing to be passed; but there was no fault to be found, for French John was at the earing, and a better sailor never laid out on a yard; so we leaned over the yard and beat our hands upon the sail to keep them from freezing. At length the word came-"Haul out to leeward,"-and we seized the reef points and hauled the band taut for the lee earing. "Taut band-Knot away," and we got the first reef fast, and were just going to lay down, when-"Two reefs-two reefs!" shouted the mate, and we had a second reef to take, in the same way. When this was fast we laid down on deck, manned the halvards to leeward, nearly up to our knees in water, set the topsail, and then laid aloft on the main topsail yard, and reefed that sail in the same manner; for, as I have before stated, we were a good deal reduced in numbers, and, to make it worse, the carpenter, only two days before, had cut his leg with an axe, so that he could not go aloft. This weakened us so that we could not well manage more than one topsail at a time, in such weather as this, and, of course, our labor was doubled. From the main topsail yard, we went upon the main yard, and took a reef in the mainsail. No sooner had we got on deck than-"Lay aloft there, mizzen-top-men, and close-reef mizzen topsail!" This called me; and being nearest the rigging, I got first aloft, and out to the weather earing. English Ben was on the yard just after me, and took the lee earing, and the rest of our gang were soon on the vard, and began to fist the sail, when the mate considerately sent up the cook and steward to help us. I could now account for the long time it took to pass the other earings, for, to do my best, with a strong hand to help me at the dog's-ear, I could not get it passed until I heard them beginning to complain in the bunt. One reef after another we took in, until the sail was close-reefed, when we went down and hoisted away at the halyards. In the mean time, the jib had been furled and the staysail set, and the ship, under her reduced sail had got more upright, and was under management: but the two topgallant sails were still hanging in the buntlines, and slatting and jerking as though they would take the masts out of her. We gave a look aloft, and knew that our work was not done yet; and sure enough, no sooner did the mate see that we were on deck than —"Lay aloft there, four of you, and furl the topgallant sails!" This called me again, and two of us went aloft up the fore rigging, and two more up the main, upon the topgallant vards. The shrouds were now iced over, the sleet having formed a crust or cake round all the standing rigging, and on the weather side of the masts and yards. When we got upon the yard, my hands were so numb that I could not have cast off the knot of the gasket to have saved my life. We both lay over the yard for a few seconds, beating our hands upon the sail, until we started the blood into our fingers' ends, and at the next moment our hands were in a burning heat. My companion on the yard was a lad, who came out in the ship a weak, puny boy, from one of the Boston schools,-"no larger than a spritsail-sheet knot," nor "heavier than a paper of lamp-black," and "not strong enough to haul a shad off a gridiron," but who was now "as long as a spare topmast, strong enough to knock down an ox, and. hearty enough to eat him." We fisted the sail together, and, after six or eight minutes of hard hauling and pulling and beating down the sail which was as stiff as sheet iron, we managed to get it furled; and snugly furled it must be, for we knew the mate well enough to be certain that if it got adrift again, we should be called up from our watch below, at any hour of the night, to furl it.

I had been on the lookout for a chance to jump below and clap on a thick jacket and southwester; but when we got on deck we found that eight bells had been struck, and the other watch gone below, so that there were two hours of dog watch for us, and a plenty of work to do. It had now set in for a steady gale from the southwest; but we were not yet far enough to the southward to make a fair wind of it, for we must give Terra del Fuego a wide berth. The decks were covered with snow, and there was a constant driving of sleet. In fact, Cape Horn had set in with good earnest. In the midst of all this. and before it became dark, we had all the studding-sails to make up and stow away, and then to lay aloft and rig in all the booms, fore and aft, and coil away the tacks, sheets, and halvards. This was pretty tough work for four or five hands, in the face of a gale which almost took us off the yards, and with ropes so stiff with ice that it was almost impossible to bend them. I was nearly half an hour out on the end of the fore yard, trying to coil away and stop down the topmast studding sail tack and lower halyards. It was after dark when we got through, and we were not a little pleased to hear four bells 1 struck, which sent us below for two hours, and gave us each a pot of hot tea with our cold beef and bread, and, what was better yet, a suit of thick, dry clothing, fitted for the weather, in place of our thin clothes, which were wet through and now frozen stiff.

This sudden turn, for which we were so little prepared, was as unacceptable to me as to any of the rest; for I had been troubled for several days with a slight toothache, and this cold weather and wetting and freezing were not the best things in the world for it. I soon found that it was getting strong hold, and running over all parts of my face; and before the watch was out I went aft to the mate, who had charge of the medicine chest, to get something for it. But the chest showed like the end of a long voyage, for there was nothing that would answer but a few drops of laudanum, which must be saved for any emergency; so I had only to bear the pain as well as I could.

When we got on deck at eight bells, 2 it had stopped snowing, and there were a few stars out, but the clouds were still black, and it was blowing a steady gale. Just before midnight, I went aloft and sent down the mizzen royal yard, and had the good luck to do it to the satisfaction of the mate, who said it was done "out of hand and shipshape." The next four hours below were but little relief to me, for I lay awake in my berth the whole time, from the pain in my face, and heard every bell strike, and, at four o'clock, turned out with the watch, feeling little spirit for the hard duties of the day. Bad weather and hard work at sea can be borne up against very well if one only has spirit and health; but there is nothing brings a man down, at such a time, like bodily pain and want of sleep. There was, however, too much to do to allow time to think; for the gale of yesterday, and the heavy seas we met with a few days before, while we had yet ten degrees more southing to make, had convinced the captain that we had something before us which was not to be trifled with, and orders were given to send down the long topgallant masts. The topgallant and royal yards were accordingly struck, the flying jib-boom rigged in, and the topgallant masts sent down on deck, and all lashed together by the side of the long-boat. The rigging was then sent down and colled away below, and everything made snug aloft. There was not a sailor in the ship who was not rejoiced to see these sticks come down; for, so long as the yards were aloft, on the least sign of a lull, the topgallant sails were loosed, and then we had to furl them again in a snow-squall, and shin up and down single ropes caked with ice, and send royal yards down in the teeth of a gale coming right from the south pole. It was an interesting sight, too, to see our noble ship, dismantled of all her tophamper of long tapering masts and yards, and boom pointed with spear-head, which ornamented her in port; and all that canvas, which a few days before had covered her like a cloud, from the truck to the water's edge, spreading far out beyond her hull on either side, now gone; and she stripped, like a wrestler for the fight. It corresponded, too, with the desolate character of her situation,-alone, as she was, battling with storms, wind, and ice, at this extremity of the globe, and in almost constant night.

1 six o'clock

2 eight o'clock

Friday, July 1st. We were now nearly up to the latitude of Cape Horn, and having over forty degrees of easting to make, we squared away the yards before a strong westerly gale. shook a reef out of the fore-top sail, and stood on our way, east-by-south, with the prospect of being up with the Cape in a week or ten days. As for myself, I had had no sleep for forty-eight hours; and the want of rest, together with constant wet and cold, had increased the swelling, so that my face was nearly as large as two, and I found it impossible to get my mouth open wide enough to eat. In this state, the steward applied to the captain for some rice to boil for me, but he only got a—"No!d——you! Tell him to eat salt junk and hard bread, like the rest of them." For this, of course, I was much obliged to him, and in truth it was just what I expected. However, I did not starve, for the mate, who was a man as well as a sailor, and had always been a good friend to me, smuggled a pan of rice into the galley, and told the cook to boil it for me, and not let the "old man" see it. Had it been fine weather, or in port, I should have gone below and lain by until my face got well; but in such weather as this, and short-handed as we were, it was not for me to desert my post; so I kept on deck, and stood my watch and did my duty as well as I could.

Saturday, July 2d. This day the sun rose fair, but it ran too low in the heavens to give any heat, or thaw out our sails and rigging; yet the sight of it was pleasant; and we had a steady "reef-topsail breeze" from the westward. The atmosphere, which had previously been clear and cold, for the last few hours grew damp, and had a disagreeable, wet chilliness in it: and the man who came from the wheel said he heard the captain tell "the passenger" that the thermometer had fallen several degrees since morning, which he could not account for in any other way than by supposing that there must be ice near us; though such a thing had never been heard of in this latitude at this season of the year. At twelve o'clock we went below, and had just got through dinner, when the cook put his head down the scuttle and told us to come on deck and see the finest sight that we had ever seen. "Where away. cook?" asked the first man who was up. "On the larboard bow." And there lay, floating in the ocean, several miles off, an immense, irregular mass, its top and points covered with snow, and its center of a deep indigo color. This was an iceberg, and of the largest size, as one of our men said who had been in the Northern ocean. As far as the eye could reach, the sea in every direction was of a deep blue color, the waves running high and fresh, and sparkling in the light, and in the midst lay this immense mountain-island, its cavities and valleys thrown into deep shade, and its points and pinnacles glittering in the sun. All hands were soon on deck, looking at it, and admiring in various ways its beauty and grandeur. But no description can give any idea of the strangeness, splendor, and, really, the sublimity, of the sight. Its great size.—for it must have been from two to three miles in circumference, and several hundred feet in height,-its slow motion, as its base rose and sank in the water, and its high points nodded against the clouds; the dashing of the waves upon it, which, breaking high with foam, lined its base with a white crust; and the thundering sound of the cracking of the mass, and the breaking and tumbling down of huge pieces: together with its nearness and approach, which added a slight element of fear,-all combined to give to it the character of true sublimity. The main body of the mass was, as I have said, of an indigo color, its base crusted with frozen foam; and as it grew thin and transparent toward the edges and top, its color shaded off from a deep blue to the whiteness of snow. It seemed to be drifting slowly toward the north, so that we kept away and avoided it. It was in sight all the afternoon; and when we got to leeward of it the wind died away, so that we lay-to quite near it for a greater part of the night. Unfortunately, there was no moon, but it was a clear night, and we could plainly mark the long. regular heaving of the stupendous mass, as its edges moved slowly against the stars. Several times in our watch loud cracks were heard, which sounded as though they must have run through the whole length of the iceberg, and several pieces fell down with a thundering crash. plunging heavily into the sea. Toward morning a strong breeze sprang up, and we filled away, and left it astern, and at daylight it was out of sight. The next day, which was-

Sunday, July 3rd, the breeze continued strong, the air exceedingly chilly, and the thermometer low. In the course of the day we saw several icebergs of different sizes, but none so near as the one which we saw the day before. Some of them, as well as we could judge, at the distance at which we were, must have been as large as that, if not larger. At noon we were in latitude 55° 12' south, and supposed longitude 89° 5' west. Toward night the wind hauled to the southward, and headed us off our course a little, and blew a tremendous gale; but this we did not mind, as there was no rain nor snow, and we were already under close sail.

Monday, July 4th. This was "Independence Day" in Boston. What firing of guns, and ringing of bells, and rejoicings of all sorts, in every part of our country! The ladies (who have not gone down to Nahant, for a breath of cool air, and sight of the ocean) walking the streets with parasols over their heads, and the dandies in their white pantaloons and silk stockings! What quantities of ice-cream have been eaten, and what quantities of ice brought into the city from a distance, and sold out by the lump and the pound! The smallest of the islands which we saw today would have made the fortune of poor Jack, 1 if he had had it in Boston; and I dare say he would have had no objection to being there with it. This, to be sure, was no place to keep the Fourth of July. To keep ourselves warm, and the ship out of the ice, was as much as we could do. Yet no one forgot the day; and many were the wishes and conjectures and comparisons, both serious and ludicrous, which were made among all hands. The sun shone bright as long as it was up, only that a scud of black clouds was ever and anon driving across it. At noon we were in lat. 54° 27' S., and long. 85° 5' W., having made a good deal of easting, but having lost in our latitude by the heading of the wind. Between davlight and dark—that is, between nine o'clock and three-we saw thirty-four ice islands of various sizes: some no bigger than the hull of our vessel, and others apparently nearly as large as the one that we first saw: though. as we went on, the islands became smaller and more numerous; and, at sundown of this day, a man at the mast-head saw large tracts of floating ice, called "field-ice," at the southeast. This kind of ice is much more dangerous than the large islands, for those can be seen at a distance, and kept away from; but the field-ice, floating in great quantities, and covering the ocean for miles and miles, in pieces of every size,-large, flat, and broken cakes, with here and there an island rising twenty and thirty feet, and as large as the ship's hull,—this it is very difficult to sheer clear of. A constant lookout was necessary; for any of these pieces, coming with the heave of the sea, were large enough to have knocked a hole in the ship, and that would have been the end of us: for no boat (even if we could have got one out) could have lived in such a sea; and no man could have lived in a boat in such weather. To make our condition still worse, the wind came out due east, just after sundown, and it blew a gale dead ahead, with hail and sleet and a thick fog, so that we could not see half the length of the ship. Our chief reliance, the prevailing westerly gales, was thus cut off; and here we were, nearly seven hundred miles to the westward of the Cape, with a gale dead from the eastward, and the weather so thick that we could not see the ice with which we were surrounded, until it was directly under our bows. At four P. M. (it was then quite dark) all hands were called, and sent aloft in a violent squall of hail and rain, to take in sail. We had now all got on our "Cape Horn rig"—thick boots, southwesters coming down over our necks and ears, thick trousers and jackets, and some with oil-cloth suits over all. Mittens, too, we wore on deck, but it would not do to go aloft with them on, for it was impossible to work with them, and, being wet and stiff, they might let a man slip overboard, for all the hold he could get upon a rope; so we were obliged to work with bare hands, which, as well as our faces, were often cut with the hail-stones, which fell thick and large. Our ship was now all cased with ice.—hull, spars, and standing rigging; and the running rigging so stiff that we could hardly bend it so as to belav it. or, still worse. take a knot with it; and the sails nearly as stiff as sheet iron. One at a time (for it was a long piece of work and required many hands) we furled the courses, mizzen topsail, and fore topmast staysail, and close-reefed the fore and main topsails, and hove the ship to under the fore, with the main hauled up by the clew lines and bunt lines, and ready to be sheeted home, if we found it necessary to make sail to get to windward of an island. A regular lookout was then set, and kept by each watch in turn, until the morning. It was a tedious and anxious night. It blew hard the whole time, and there was an almost constant driving of either rain, hail, or snow. In addition to this, it was "as thick as muck." and the ice was all about us. The captain was on deck nearly the whole night, and kept the cook in the galley, with a roaring fire, to make coffee for him, which he took every few hours, and once or twice gave a little to his officers: but not a drop of anything was there for the The captain, who sleeps all the daytime, and comes and goes at night as he chooses, can have his brandy-and-water in the cabin, and his hot coffee at the galley; while Jack, who has to stand through everything, and work in wet and cold, can have nothing to wet his lips or warm his stomach. This was a "temperance ship," and, like too many such ships, the temperance was all in the forecastle. sailor, who only takes his one glass as it is dealt out to him, is in danger of being drunk; while the captain, who has all under his hand, and can drink as much as he chooses, and upon whose self-possession and cool judgment the lives of all depend, may be trusted with any amount, to drink at his will. Sailors will never be convinced that rum is a dangerous thing. by taking it away from them and giving it to the officers; nor that that temperance is their friend which takes from them what they have always had, and gives them nothing in the place of it. By seeing it allowed to their officers, they will not be convinced that it is taken from them for their good; and by receiving nothing in its place they will not believe that it is done in kindness. On the contrary, many of them look upon the change as a new instrument of tyranny. Not that they prefer rum. I never knew a sailor, in my life, who would not prefer a pot of hot coffee or chocolate, in a cold night, to all the rum afloat. They all say that rum only warms them for a time; yet, if they can get nothing better, they will miss what they have lost. The momentary warmth and glow from drinking it: the break and change which is made in a long, dreary watch by the mere calling all hands aft and serving of it out; and the simply having some event to look forward to and to talk about.—all give it an importance and a use which no one can appreciate who has not stood his watch before the mast. On my passage round Cape Horn before, the vessel that I was in was not under temperance articles, and grog was served out every middle and morning watch, and after every reefing of topsails; and though I had never drunk rum before, and never intend to again, I took my. allowance then at the capstan, as the rest did. merely for the momentary warmth it gave the system, and the change in our feelings and aspect of our duties on the watch. At the same time, as I have stated, there was not a man on board who would not have pitched the rum to the dogs. (I had heard them say so a dozen times), for a pot of coffee, or chocolate; or even for our common beverage,-"water bewitched and tea begrudged," as it was. 1 The temperance reform is the best thing that ever was undertaken for the sailor; but when the grog is taken from him, he ought to have something in its place. As it is now, in most vessels, it is a mere saving to the owners; and this accounts for the sudden increase of temperance ships, which surprised even the best friends of the cause. If every merchant, when he struck grog from the list of the expenses of his ship. had been obliged to substitute as much coffee, or chocolate, as would give each man a pot-full when he came off the topsail yard, on a stormy night,-I fear Jack might have gone to ruin on the old road. 2

<sup>1</sup> the usual nickname for sailors

"The proportions of the ingredients of the tea that was made for us (and ours, as I have before stated, was a favorable specimen of American merchantmen) were a pint of tea and a pint and a half of molasses to about three gallons of water. These are all boiled down together in the "coppers," and, before serving it out, the mess is stirred up with a stick, so as to give each man his fair share of sweetening and tea-leaves. The tea for the cabin is, of course, made in the usual way, in a teapot, and drunk with sugar." [Dana's note.]

2 "I do not wish these remarks, so far as they relate to the saving of expense in the outfit, to be ap-

But this is not doubling Cape Horn. Eight hours of the night our watch was on deck, and during the whole of that time we kept a bright lookout; one man on each bow, another in the bunt of the fore yard, the third mate on the scuttle, one on each quarter, and a man always standing by the wheel. The chief mate was everywhere, and commanded the ship when the captain was below. When a large piece of ice was seen in our way, or drifting near us, the word was passed along, and the ship's head turned one way and another; and sometimes, the vards squared or braced up. There was little else to do than to look out; and we had the sharpest eyes in the ship on the forecastle. The only variety was the monotonous voice of the lookout forward.—"Another island!" "Ice ahead!" "Ice on the lee bow!" "Hard up the helm!" "Keep her off a little!" "Stead-y!"

In the mean time the wet and cold had brought my face into such a state that I could neither eat nor sleep; and though I stood it out all night, yet, when it became light, I was in such a state that all hands told me I must go below, and lie-by for a day or two, or I should be laid up for a long time, and perhaps have the lock-jaw. When the watch was changed I went into the steerage, and took off my hat and comforter, and showed my face to the mate, who told me to go below at once, and stay in my berth until the swelling went down, and gave the cook orders to make a poultice for me, and said he would speak to the captain.

I went below and turned-in, covering myself over with blankets and jackets, and lay in my berth nearly twenty-four hours, half asleep and half awake, stupid from the dull pain. I heard the watch called, and the men going up and down, and sometimes a noise on deck, and a cry of "ice," but I gave little attention to anything. At the end of twenty-four hours the pain went down, and I had a long sleep, which brought me back to my proper state; yet my plied to the owners of our ship, for she was supplied with an abundance of stores of the best kind that are given to seamen; though the dispensing of them is necessarily left to the captain. And I learned, on our return, that the captain withheld many of the stores from us, from mere ugliness. He brought several barrels of flour home, but would not give us the usual twice-aweek duff, and so as to other stores. Indeed, so high was the reputation of 'the e.np'oy' a 'ong men and officers for the character and outfit of their vesse's, and for their libe ality in conducting their voyages, that when it was known that they had the Alert fitting out for a long voyage, and that hands were to be shipped at a certain time,—a half hour before the time, as one of the crew told me, sailors were steering down the wharf, hopping over the barrels, like a drove of sheep."

face was so swollen and tender that I was obliged to keep to my berth for two or three days longer. During the two days I had been below, the weather was much the same that it had been,-head winds, and snow and rain: or. if the wind came fair, too foggy, and the ice too thick, to run. At the end of the third day the ice was very thick: a complete fog-bank covered the ship. It blew a tremendous gale from the eastward, with sleet and snow, and there was every promise of a dangerous and fatiguing night. At dark, the captain called all hands aft, and told them that not a man was to leave the deck that night; that the ship was in the greatest danger; any cake of ice might knock a hole in her, or she might run on an island and go to pieces. No one could tell whether she would be a ship the next morning. The lookouts were then set, and every man was put in his station. When I heard what was the state of things, I began to put on my clothes to stand it out with the rest of them, when the mate came below, and looking at my face, ordered me back to my berth, saying that if we went down, we should all go down together, but if I went on deck I might lay myself up for life. This was the first word I had heard from aft: for the captain had done nothing, nor inquired how I was, since I went below.

In obedience to the mate's orders, I went back to my berth; but a more miserable night I never wish to spend. I never felt the curse of sickness so keenly in my life. If I could only have been on deck with the rest, where something was to be done and seen and heard. where there were fellow-beings for companions in duty and danger; but to be cooped up alone in a black hole, in equal danger, but without the power to do, was the hardest trial. Several times, in the course of the night, I got up, determined to go on deck; but the silence which showed that there was nothing doing, and the knowledge that I might make myself seriously ill, for nothing, kept me back. It was not easy to sleep, lying as I did with my head directly against the bows, which might be dashed in by an island of ice, brought down by the very next sea that struck her. This was the only time I had been ill since I left Boston, and it was the worst time it could have happened. I felt almost willing to bear the plagues of Egypt for the rest of the vovage, if I could but be well and strong for that one night. Yet it was a dreadful night for those on deck. A watch of eighteen hours, with wet and cold and constant anxiety, nearly wore them out; and when they came below at nine o'clock for breakfast, they almost dropped asleep on their chests, and some of them were so stiff that they could with difficulty sit down. Not a drop of anything had been given them during the whole time. (though the captain, as on the night that I was on deck had his coffee every four hours). except that the mate stole a pot-full of coffee for two men to drink behind the galley, while he kept a lookout for the captain. Every man had his station, and was not allowed to leave it: and nothing happened to break the monotony of the night, except once setting the main topsails, to run clear of a large island to leeward, which they were drifting fast upon. Some of the boys got so sleepy and stupefied that they actually fell asleep at their posts; and the young third mate, whose station was the exposed one of standing on the fore scuttle, was so stiff, when he was relieved, that he could not bend his knees to get down. By a constant lookout, and a quick shifting of the helm, as the islands and pieces came in sight, the ship went clear of everything but a few small pieces, though daylight showed the ocean covered for miles. At daybreak it fell a dead calm, and with the sun the fog cleared a little, and a breeze sprang up from the westward, which soon grew into a gale. We had now a fair wind, daylight, and comparatively clear weather; yet, to the surprise of every one, the ship continued hove-to. "Why does not he run?" "What is the captain about?" was asked by everyone: and from questions it soon grew into complaints and murmurings. When the daylight was so short, it was too bad to lose it, and a fair wind, too, which every one had been praying for. As hour followed hour, and the captain showed no sign of making sail, the crew became impatient, and there was a good deal of talking and consultation together on the forecastle. They had been beaten out with the exposure and hardship, and impatient to get out of it, and this unaccountable delay was more than they could bear in quietness, in their excited and restless state. Some said that the captain was frightened,-completely cowed by the dangers and difficulties that surrounded us, and was afraid to make sail; while others said that in his anxiety and suspense he had made a free use of brandy and opium, and was unfit for his duty. The carpenter, who was an intelligent man, and a thorough seaman, and had great influence with the crew, came down into the forecastle, and tried to induce the crew to go aft and ask the captain why he did not run, or request him, in the name of all hands, to make sail. This appeared to be a very reasonable request, and the crew agreed that if he did not make sail before noon they would go aft. Noon came, and no sail was made. A consultation was held again, and it was proposed to take the ship from the captain and give the command of her to the mate, who had been heard to say that if he could have his way the ship would have been half the distance to the Cape before night,—ice or no ice. And so irritated and impatient had the crew become, that even this proposition, which was open mutiny, punishable with state prison, was entertained, and the carpenter went to his berth. leaving it tacitly understood that something serious would be done if things remained as they were many hours longer. When the carpenter left, we talked it over. and I gave my advice strongly against it. Another of the men, too, who had known something of the kind attempted in another ship by a crew who were dissatisfied with their captain, and which was followed with serious consequences, was opposed to it. Stimson, who soon came down, joined us, and we determined to have nothing to do with it. By these means, they were soon induced to give it up for the present, though they said they would not lie where they were much longer without knowing the reason.

The affair remained in this state until four o'clock, when an order came forward for all hands to come aft upon the quarter-deck. In about ten minutes they came forward again. and the whole affair had been blown. The carpenter, very prematurely, and without any authority from the crew, had sounded the mate as to whether he would take command of the ship, and intimated an intention to displace the captain; and the mate, as in duty bound, had told the whole to the captain, who immediately sent for all hands aft. Instead of violent measures, or, at least, an outbreak of quarterdeck bravado, threats, and abuse, which they had every reason to expect, a sense of common danger and common suffering seemed to have tamed his spirit, and begotten something like a humane fellow-feeling; for he received the crew in a manner quiet, and even almost kind. He told them what he had heard, and said that he did not believe that they would try to do any such thing as was intimated; that they had always been good men,-obedient, and knew their duty, and he had no fault to find with them, and asked them what they had to complain of; said that no one could say that he was slow to carry sail (which was true enough), and that, as soon as he thought it was safe and proper, he should make sail. He added a few words about their duty in their present situation, and sent them forward, saying that he should take no further notice of the matter; but, at the same time, told the carpenter to recollect whose power he was in, and that if he heard another word from him he would have cause to remember him to the day of his death.

This language of the captain had a very good effect upon the crew, and they returned quietly to their duty.

For two days more the wind blew from the southward and eastward: or in the short intervals when it was fair, the ice was too thick to run: vet the weather was not so dreadfully bad, and the crew had watch and watch. still remained in my berth, fast recovering, yet still not well enough to go safely on deck. And I should have been perfectly useless; for, from having eaten nothing for nearly a week, except a little rice which I forced into my mouth the last day or two, I was as weak as an infant. To be sick in a forecastle is miserable indeed. It is the worst part of a dog's life, especially in bad weather. The forecastle, shut up tight to keep out the water and cold air; the watch either on deck or asleep in their berths; no one to speak to: the pale light of the single lamp, swinging to and fro from the beam, so dim that one can scarcely see, much less read. by it; the water dropping from the beams and carlines and running down the sides, and the forecastle so wet and dark and cheerless, and so lumbered up with chests and wet clothes. that sitting up is worse than lying in the berth! These are some of the evils. Fortunately, I needed no help from any one, and no medicine; and if I had needed help I don't know where I should have found it. Sailors are willing enough, but it is true, as is often said, no one ships for nurse on board a vessel. Our merchant ships are always undermanned, and if one man is lost by sickness, they cannot spare another to take care of him. A sailor is always presumed to be well, and if he's sick he's a poor dog. One has to stand his wheel, and another his lookout, and the sooner he gets on deck again the better.

Accordingly, as soon as I could possibly go back to my duty, I put on my thick clothes and boots and southwester, and made my appearance on deck. Though I had been but a few days below, yet everything looked strangely enough. The ship was cased in ice,—decks, sides, masts, yards, and rigging. Two close-reefed top-sails were all the sail she had on, and every sail and rope was frozen so stiff in its place that it seemed as though it would be impossible to start anything. Reduced, too, to her topmasts, she had altogether a most forlorn and crippled appearance. The sun had come up brightly; the snow was swept off the decks and ashes thrown upon them so that we could walk, for they had been as slippery as glass. It was, of course, too cold to carry on any ship's work, and we had only to walk the deck and keep ourselves warm. The wind was still ahead, and the whole ocean, to the eastward. covered with islands and field-ice. At four bells the order was given to square away the yards; and the man who came from the helm said that the captain had kept her off to N.N.E. What could this mean? Some said that he was going to put into Valparaiso and winter, and others that he was going to run out of the ice and cross the Pacific, and go home round the Cape of Good Hope. Soon, however, it leaked out, and we found that we were running for the Straits of Magellan. The news soon spread through the ship, and all tongues were at work talking about it. No one on board had been through the straits; but I had in my chest an account of the passage of the ship A. J.Donelson, of New York, through those straits a few years before. The account was given by the captain, and the representation was as favorable as possible. It was soon read by every one on board, and various opinions pronounced. The determination of our captain had at least this good effect: it gave us something to think and talk about, made a break in our life, and diverted our minds from the monotonous dreariness of the prospect before us. Having made a fair wind of it, we were going off at a good rate, and leaving the thickest of the ice behind us. This, at least, was something.

Having been long enough below to get my hands well warmed and softened, the first handling of the ropes was rather tough; but a few days hardened them, and as soon as I got my mouth open wide enough to take in a piece of salt beef and hard bread, I was all right again.

Sunday, July 10th. Lat. 54° 10′, long. 79° 07′. This was our position at noon. The sun was out bright; the ice was all left behind, and things had quite a cheering appearance. We brought our wet pea-jackets and trousers on deck, and hung them up in the rigging, that the breeze and the few hours of sun might dry them a little; and, by the permission of the cook, the galley was nearly filled with stockings and mittens, hung round to be dried.

Boots, too, were brought up; and, having got a little tar and slush from below, we gave them a thick coat. After dinner all hands were turned-to, to get the anchors over the bows. bend on the chains, etc. The fish-tackle was got up, the fish davit 1 rigged out, and, after two or three hours of hard and cold work, both the anchors were ready for instant use, a couple of kedges got up, a hawser coiled away upon the fore-hatch, and the deep-sea lead-line overhauled and got ready. Our spirits returned with having something to do; and when the tackle was manned to bowse the anchor home, notwithstanding the desolation of the scene, we struck up "Cheerly, ho!" in full chorus. This pleased the mate, who rubbed his hands and cried out, "That's right, my boys; never say die! That sounds like the old crew!" and the captain came up, on hearing the song, and said to the passenger, within hearing of the man at the wheel, "That sounds like a lively crew. They'll have their song so long as there're enough left for a chorus!"

This preparation of the cable and anchors was for the passage of the straits; for, being very crooked, and with a variety of currents, it is necessary to come frequently to anchor. This was not, by any means, a pleasant prospect; for, of all the work that a sailor is called upon to do in cold weather, there is none so bad as working the ground-tackle. The heavy chain-cables to be hauled and pulled about decks with bare hands; wet hawsers, slip-ropes, and buoy-ropes to be hauled aboard dripping in water, which is running up your sleeves, and freezing; clearing hawse under the bows; getting under way and coming-to at all hours of the night and day, and a constant lookout for rocks and sands and turns of tides,—these are some of the disagreeables of such a navagation to a common sailor. Fair or foul, he wants to have nothing to do with the ground-tackle between port and port. One of our hands, too, had unluckily fallen upon a half of an old newspaper which contained an account of the passage, through the straits, of a Boston brig, called, I think, the Peruvian, in which she lost every cable and anchor she had, got aground twice, and arrived at Valparaiso in distress. This was set off against the account of the A. J. Donelson, and led us to look forward with less confidence to the passage, especially as no one on board had ever been through, and the captain had no very perfect charts. However, we were spared any further experience on the point: for the next day, when we must have been near the Cape of Pillars, which is the southwest point of the mouth of the straits, a gale set in from the eastward, with a heavy fog, so that we could not see half of the ship's length ahead. This, of course, put an end to the project for the present; for a thick fog and a gale blowing dead ahead are not the most favorable circumstances for the passage of difficult and dangerous straits. This weather, too, seemed likely to last for some time, and we could not think of beating about the mouth of the straits for a week or two, waiting for a favorable opportunity; so we braced up on the larboard tack, put the ship's head due south. and struck her off for Cape Horn again.

1834-1840

1840

JULIA WARD HOWE 1819-1910

Though Mrs. Howe was engaged in many social and philanthropic activities, and composed several small volumes of verse, she will be most remembered for the stirring patriotic song of the Civil War here printed. She was born in New York City in a family of high standing. Marrying a physician whose chief professional interest was in the blind and the mentally deficient, she was led by circumstances to adopt philanthropy almost as a career. She was active in the anti-slavery movement and later in the work for woman suffrage. She died in South Portsmouth, Rhode Island. Her best known writings aside from collections of poems published in 1854, 1857, and 1866 are Life of Margaret Fuller, 1883; Reminiscences, 1899.

BATTLE HYMN OF THE REPUBLIC

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord:

He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored;

He hath loosed the fateful lightning of his terrible swift sword:

His truth is marching on.

I have seen him in the watch-fires of a hundred circling camps;

They have builded him an altar in the evening dews and damps;

I can read his righteous sentence by the dim and flaring lamps:

His day is marching on.

I have read a fiery gospel, writ in burnished rows of steel:

"As ye deal with my contemners, so with you my grace shall deal;

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;A short spar with a sheave at the end used as a crane to hoist the flukes of the anchor to the top of the bow." Worcester.

Let the Hero, born of woman, crush the serpent with his heel.

Since God is marching on."

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat:

He is sifting out the hearts of men before his judgment-seat:

Oh. be swift, my soul, to answer him! be jubilant, my feet!

Our God is marching on.

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea.

With a glory in his bosom that transfigures you and me:

As he died to make men holy, let us die to make men free,

While God is marching on.

1862 1861

EDWARD EVERETT HALE 1822-1909

Born in Boston, spending his life there, and dying in the suburbs, Hale was an embodiment of the New England spirit of his generation, especially in its higher aspects. He graduated at Harvard, 1839, studied theology, entered the Unitarian ministry in 1846, and from 1856 until his death was pastor and pastor emeritus of the South Congregational (Unitarian) Church, Boston. He was a frequent contributor to magazines and newspapers, and to historical compilations. Among his books are Sketches of Christian History, 1850; The Man Without a Country and Other Tales, 1868; Ten Times One is Ten, 1870; In His Name, 1873; Philip Nolan's Friends, 1876; Life of George Washington, 1888; James Russell Lowell and his Friends, 1899; A New England Boyhood, 1893.

Almost all of Hale's writing was done with a didactic purpose. In the present story the "moral," strong as it is, does not spoil the narrative. The reason perhaps lies in the amazing air of truth Hale gives to his invention; by thousands of readers of the day the story was taken to be a record of fact.

See Cur. Opinion 64:343; Outlook 104:273-4.

THE MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY 1

I suppose that very few casual readers of the New York Herald of August 13th [1863] observed, in an obscure corner, among the

<sup>1</sup> This story was written "in the dar'est period of the Civil War to show what love of country is." Phi'ip No'an was an entirely fictitious character. "Frederic Ingham, the 'I' of the nar ative, is supposed to be a retired officer of the United States Navy." (See Hale's note in the edition copyrighted by Messrs. Little, Brown and Company 1808) pany, 1898.)

"Deaths." the announcement.-

"Nolan. Died on board U. S. Corvette Levant, Lat. 2° 11' S., Long. 131° W., on the 11th of May, Philip Nolan."

I happened to observe it, because I was stranded at the old Mission House in Mackinac. waiting for a Lake Superior steamer which did not choose to come, and I was devouring to the very stubble all the current literature I could get hold of, even down to the deaths and marriages in the Herald. My memory for names and people is good, and the reader will see, as he goes on, that I had reason enough to remember Philip Nolan. There are hundreds of readers who would have paused at that announcement, if the officer of the Levant who reported it had chosen to make it thus: "Died. May 11th, The Man without a Country." For it was as "The Man without a Country" that poor Philip Nolan had generally been known by the officers who had him in charge during some fifty years, as, indeed, by all the men who sailed under them. I dare say there is many a man who has taken wine with him once a fortnight, in a three years' cruise, who never knew that his name was "Nolan," or whether the poor wretch had any name at all.

There can now be no possible harm in telling this poor creature's story. Reason enough there has been till now, ever since Madison's administration went out in 1817, for very strict secrecy, the secrecy of honor itself, among the gentlemen of the navy who have had Nolan in successive charge. And certainly it speaks well for the esprit de corps of the profession, and the personal honor of its members, that to the press this man's story has been wholly unknown,-and, I think, to the country at large also. I have reason to think, from some investigations I made in the Naval Archives when I was attached to the Bureau of Construction, that every official report relating to him was burned when Ross 2 burned the public buildings at Washington. One of the Tuckers, or possibly one of the Watsons, had Nolan in charge at the end of the war; and when, on returning from his cruise, he reported at Washington to one of the Crowninshields,—who was in the Navy Department when he came home, -he found that the Department ignored the whole business. Whether they really knew nothing about it, or whether it was a "Non mi ricordo," 3 determined on as a piece of policy, I do not know. But this I do know, that since

<sup>2</sup> Robert Ross, 1766-1814, a British general, captured Washington in 1814 and before evacuating the city burned the public buildings.
3 "I do not remember."

1817, and possibly before, no naval officer has mentioned Nolan in his report of a cruise.

But, as I say, there is no need for secrecy any longer. And now the poor creature is dead, it seems to me worth while to tell a little of his story, by way of showing young Americans of today what it is to be A MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY.

PHILIP NOLAN was as fine a young officer as there was in the "Legion of the West," as the Western division of our army was then called. When Aaron Burr 1 made his first dashing expedition down to New Orleans in 1805, at Fort Massac, or somewhere above on the river, he met, as the Devil would have it, this gay, dashing, bright young fellow; at some dinner-party, I think. Burr marked him, talked to him, walked with him, took him a day or two's voyage in his flat-boat, and, in short, fascinated him. For the next year, barrack-life was very tame to poor Nolan. He occasionally availed himself of the permission the great man had given him to write to him. Long, high-worded, stilted letters the poor boy wrote and rewrote and copied. But never a line did he have in reply from the gay deceiver. The other boys in the garrison sneered at him, because he sacrificed in this unrequited affection for a politician the time which they devoted to Monongahela, sledge, and high-low-jack. Bourbon, euchre, and poker were still unknown. But one day Nolan had his revenge. This time Burr came down the river, not as an attorney seeking a place for his office, but as a disguised conqueror. He had defeated I know not how many districtattorneys: he had dined at I know not how many public dinners; he had been heralded in I know not how many Weekly Arguses, and it was rumored that he had an army behind him and an empire before him. It was a great day —his arrival—to poor Nolan. Burr had not been at the fort an hour before he sent for him. That evening he asked Nolan to take him out in his skiff to show him a cane-brake or a cotton-wood tree, as he said,—really to seduce him; and by the time the sail was over, Nolan was enlisted body and soul. From that time, though he did not yet know it, he lived as A MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY.

Aaron Burr, who had been elected vice-president of the United States in 1800, had lost his influence by 1804, and was then defeated in his effort to become Governor of New York. Angered by Alexander Hamilton's open stand against him, he challenged Hamilton to a duel and killed him. His reputation ruined, Burr, now desperate, conceived the idea of founding a republic of which he himself should be president, which should include Texas and perhaps Mexico, and have New Orleans as its capital. He visited the West, secured a large tract of land on the Washita River, and was known to have been in correspondence with the British and Spanish ministers at Washington. He was indicted for treason at Richmond, Virginia, May, 1807, but from lack of sufficient evidence he was acquitted.

What Burr meant to do I know no more than you, dear reader. It is none of our business just now. Only, when the grand catastrophe came, and Tefferson and the House of Virginia 2 of that day undertook to break on the wheel all the possible Clarences of the then House of York, by the great treason trial at Richmond. some of the lesser fry in that distant Mississippi Valley, which was farther from us than Puget's Sound is today, introduced the like novelty on their provincial stage; and, to while away the monotony of the summer at Fort Adams, got up, for spectacles, a string of court-martials on the officers there. One and another of the colonels and majors were tried, and, to fill out the list, little Nolan, against whom, Heaven knows, there was evidence enough,-that he was sick of the service, had been willing to be false to it, and would have obeyed any order to march any-whither with any one who would follow him had the order only been signed. "By command of His Exc. A. Burr." The courts dragged on. The big flies escaped.—rightly for all I know. Nolan was proved guilty enough, as I say; yet you and I would never have heard of him, reader, but that, when the president of the court asked him at the close whether he wished to say anything to show that he had always been faithful to the United States, he cried out, in a fit of frenzy,-

"D—n the United States! I wish I may never hear of the United States again!"

I suppose he did not know how the words shocked old Colonel Morgan, 3 who was holding the court. Half the officers who sat in it had served through the Revolution, and their lives, not to say their necks, had been risked for the very idea which he so cavalierly cursed in his madness. He, on his part, had grown up in the West of those days, in the midst of "Spanish plot," "Orleans plot," and all the rest. 4 He had been educated on a plantation where the finest company was a Spanish officer or a French

3 "Colonel Morgan is a fictitious character, like all the others in this book except Aaron Burr." (Hale's note, in the edition copyrighted 1898 by Messrs. Little, Brown and Company.)

The years following our Revolution were marked by plots of the Mississioni Valley settlers to gain possession of the mouth of the Mississippi, then held by Spain.

<sup>2</sup> As in the Wars of the Roses the houses of York and Lancaster were rivals, so, Hale implies, the Virginia statesmen regarded the statesmen of the North as their natural enemies. George, Duke of Clarence, a Yorkist, was imprisoned for treason in the Tower of London and there murdered.
3 "Coloral Margan is a feitieur character libe." The Property of the P merchant from Orleans. His education, such as it was, had been perfected in commercial expeditions to Vera Cruz, and I think he told me his father once hired an Englishman to be a private tutor for a winter on the plantation. He had spent half his youth with an older brother. hunting horses in Texas: and, in a word, to him "United States" was scarcely a reality. Yet he had been fed by "United States" for all the vears since he had been in the army. He had sworn on his faith as a Christian to be true to "United States." It was "United States" which gave him the uniform he wore, and the sword by his side. Nay, my poor Nolan, it was only because "United States" had picked you out first as one of her own confidential men of honor that "A. Burr" cared for you a straw more than for the flat-boat men who sailed his ark for him. I do not excuse Nolan; I only explain to the reader why he damned his country, and wished he might never hear her name again.

He never did hear her name but once again. From that moment, September 23, 1807. till the day he died, May 11, 1863, he never heard her name again. For that half century and more he was a man without a country.

Old Morgan, as I said, was terribly shocked. If Nolan had compared George Washington to Benedict Arnold, or had cried "God save King George," Morgan would not have felt worse. He called the court into his private room, and returned in fifteen minutes, with a face like a sheet, to say,—

"Prisoner, hear the sentence of the Court! The Court decides, subject to the approval of the President, that you never hear the name of the United States again."

Nolan laughed. But nobody else laughed. Old Morgan was too solemn, and the whole room was hushed dead as night for a minute. Even Nolan lost his swagger in a moment. Then Morgan added,—

"Mr. Marshal, take the prisoner to Orleans in an armed boat, and deliver him to the naval commander there."

The marshal gave his orders and the prisoner was taken out of court.

"Mr. Marshal," continued old Morgan, "see that no one mentions the United States to the prisoner. Mr. Marshal, make my respects to Lieutenant Mitchell at Orleans, and request him to order that no one shall mention the United States to the prisoner while he is on board ship. You will receive your written orders from the officer on duty here this evening. The Court is adjourned without day."

I have always supposed that Colonel Morgan himself took the proceedings of the court to Washington City, and explained them to Mr. Jefferson. Certain it is that the President approved them,—certain, that is, if I may believe the men who say they have seen his signature. Before the Nautilus got round from New Orleans to the northern Atlantic coast with the prisoner on board, the sentence had been approved, and he was a man without a country.

The plan then adopted was substantially the same which was necessarily followed ever after. Perhaps it was suggested by the necessity of sending him by water from Fort Adams and Orleans. The Secretary of the Navy—it must have been the first Crowninshield, though he is a man I do not remember—was requested to put Nolan on board a government vessel bound on a long cruise, and to direct that he should be only so far confined there as to make it certain that he never saw or heard of the country. We had few long cruises then, and the navy was very much out of favor; and as almost all of this story is traditional, as I have explained, I do not know certainly what his first cruise was. But the commander to whom he was entrusted. -perhaps it was Tingey or Shaw, though I think it was one of the younger men,-we are all old enough now,--regulated the etiquette and the precautions of the affair, and according to his scheme they were carried out. I suppose, till Nolan died.

When I was second officer of the Intrepid, some thirty years after, I saw the original paper of instructions. I have been sorry ever since that I did not copy the whole of it. It ran, however, much in this way:—

"Washington (with a date, which must have been late in 1807).

"Sir,—You will receive from Lieutenant Neale the person of Philip Nolan, late a lieutenant in the United States army.

"This person on his trial by court-martial expressed, with an oath, the wish that he might 'never hear of the United States again.'

"The Court sentenced him to have his wish fulfilled.

"For the present, the execution of the order is entrusted by the President to this Department.

"You will take the prisoner on board your ship, and keep him there with such precautions as shall prevent his escape.

"You will provide him with such quarters, rations, and clothing as would be proper for an officer of his late rank, if he were a passenger on your vessel on the business of his Government.

"The gentlemen on board will make any arrangements agreeable to themselves regarding his society.

He is to be exposed to no indignity of any kind, nor is he ever unnecessarily to be reminded that he is a prisoner.

"But under no circumstances is he ever to hear of his country or to see any information regarding it; and you will specially caution all the officers under your command to take care, that, in the various indulgences which may be granted, this rule, in which his punishment is involved, shall not he broken.

"It is the intention of the Government that he shall never again see the country which he has disowned. Before the end of your cruise you will receive orders which will give effect to this intention.

"Respectfully yours,
"W. SOUTHARD, for the "Secretary of the Navy."

If I had only preserved the whole of this paper, there would be no break in the beginning of my sketch of this story. For Captain Shaw, if it was he, handed it to his successor in the charge, and he to his, and I suppose the commander of the Levant has it today as his authority for keeping this man in this mild custody.

The rule adopted on board the ships on which I have met "the man without a country" was. I think, transmitted from the beginning. No mess liked to have him permanently, because his presence cut off all talk of home or of the prospect of return, of politics or letters, of peace or of war,-cut off more than half the talk men like to have at sea. But it was always thought too hard that he should never meet the rest of us, except to touch hats, and we finally sank into one system. He was not permitted to talk with the men, unless an officer was by. With officers he had unrestrained intercourse, as far as they and he chose. But he grew shy, though he had favorites: I was one. Then the captain always asked him to dinner on Monday. Every mess in succession took up the invitation in its turn. According to the size of the ship, you had him at your mess more or less often at dinner. His breakfast he ate in his own state-room,-he always had a state-room,which was where a sentinel or somebody on the watch could see the door. And whatever else he ate or drank, he ate or drank alone. Sometimes, when the marines or sailors had any special jollification, they were permitted to invite "Plain-Buttons," as they called him. Then Nolan was sent with some officer, and the men were forbidden to speak of home while he was there. I believe the theory was that the sight of his punishment did them good. They called him "Plain-Buttons," because, while he always chose to wear a regulation army-uniform, he was not permitted to wear the army-button, for the reason that it bore either the initials or the insignia of the country he had disowned.

I remember, soon after I joined the navv. I was on shore with some of the older officers from our ship and from the Brandywine, which we had met at Alexandria. We had leave to make a party and go up to Cairo and the Pyramids. As we jogged along (you went on donkeys then), some of the gentlemen (we boys called them "Dons," but the phrase was long since changed) fell to talking about Nolan, and some one told the system which was adopted from the first about his books and other reading. As he was almost never permitted to go on shore, even though the vessel lay in port for months, his time at the best hung heavy; and everybody was permitted to lend him books, if they were not published in America and made no allusion to it. These were common enough in the old days, when people in the other hemisphere talked of the United States as little as we do of Paraguay. He had almost all the foreign papers that came into the ship, sooner or later; only somebody must go over them first, and cut out any advertisement or stray paragraph that alluded to America. This was a little cruel sometimes. when the back of what was cut out might be as innocent as Hesiod. 1 Right in the midst of one of Napoleon's battles, or one of Canning's 2 speeches, poor Nolan would find a great hole, because on the back of the page of that paper there had been an advertisement of a packet for New York, or a scrap from the President's message. I say this was the first time I ever heard of this plan, which afterwards I had enough and more than enough to do with. I remember it, because poor Phillips, who was of the party, as soon as the allusion to reading was made, told a story of something which happened at the Cape of Good Hope on Nolan's first voyage; and it is the only thing I ever knew of that voyage. They had touched at the Cape, and had done the civil thing with the English Admiral and the fleet, and then, leaving for a long cruise up the Indian Ocean, Phillips had borrowed a lot of English books from an officer, which, in those days, as indeed in these, was quite a windfall. Among them, as the Devil would order, was the Lay of the Last Minstrel, which they had all of them heard of, but which most of them had never seen. I think it could not have been published long. Well, nobody thought there could be any risk of anything national in that, though Phillips swore old Shaw had cut out The Tempest from Shakespeare before he let Nolan have it, because he said "the Bermudas ought to be ours, and, by Iove, should be one day." So Nolan was permitted to join the circle one afternoon when a lot of them sat on deck smoking and reading aloud. People do not do such things so often now: but when I was young we got rid of a great deal of time so. Well, so it happened that in his turn Nolan took the book and read to the others; and he read very well, as I know. Nobody in the circle knew a line of the poem, only it was all magic and Border chivalry, and was ten thousand years ago. Poor Nolan read steadily through the fifth canto, stopped a minute and drank something, and then began, without a thought of what was coming.--

 &lt;sup>1</sup> a Greek poet of probably the eighth century B.C.
 <sup>2</sup> George Canning, 1770-1827, was a celebrated English statesman and orator.

Breathes there a man, with soul so dead, Who never to himself hath said.—

It seems impossible to us that anybody ever heard this for the first time; but all these fellows did then, and poor Nolan himself went on, still unconsciously or mechanically.—

This is my own, my native land!

Then they all saw something was to pay; but he expected to get through, I suppose, turned a little pale, but plunged on,—

Whose heart hath ne'er within him burned, As home his footsteps he hath turned From wandering on a foreign strand?—
If such there breathe, go, mark him well,—

By this time the men were all beside themselves, wishing there was any way to make him turn over two pages; but he had not quite presence of mind for that; he gagged a little, colored crimson, and staggered on,—

For him no minstrel raptures swell; High though his titles, proud his name, Bouhdless his wealth as wish can claim, Despite these titles, power, and pelf, The wretch, concentered all in self,— and here the poor fellow choked, could not go on, but started up, swung the book into the sea, and vanished into his state-room, "And by Jove," said Phillips, "we did not see him for two months again. And I had to make up some beggarly story to that English surgeon why I did not return his Walter Scott to him."

That story shows about the time when Nolan's braggadocio must have broken down. At first, they said, he took a very high tone, considered his imprisonment a mere farce, effected to enjoy the voyage, and all that: but Phillips said that after he came out of his stateroom he never was the same man again. He never read aloud again, unless it was the Bible or Shakespeare, or something else he was sure of. But it was not that merely. He never entered in with the other young men exactly as a companion again. He was always shy afterwards, when I knew him,-very seldom spoke, unless he was spoken to, except to a very few friends. He lighted up occasionally. —I remember late in his life hearing him fairly eloquent on something which had been suggested to him by one of Fléchier's 1 sermons, but generally he had the nervous, tired look of a heart-wounded man.

When Captain Shaw was coming home,—if, as I say, it was Shaw,—rather to the surprise of everybody they made one of the Windward Islands, and lay off and on for nearly a week. The boys said the officers were sick of saltjunk, and meant to have turtle-soup before they came home. But after several days the Warren came to the same rendezvous; they exchanged signals; she sent to Phillips and these homeward-bound men letters and papers. and told them she was outward-bound, perhaps to the Mediterranean, and took poor Nolan and his traps on the boat back to try his second cruise. He looked very blank when he was told to get ready to join her. He had known enough of the signs of the sky to know that till that moment he was going "home." But this was a distinct evidence of something he had not thought of, perhaps,—that there was no going home for him, even to a prison. And this was the first of some twenty such transfers, which brought him sooner or later into half our best vessels, but which kept him all his life at least some hundred miles from the country he had hoped he might never hear of again.

It may have been on that second cruise,—it was once when he was up the Mediterranean,—that Mrs. Graff, the celebrated Southern beauty of those days, danced with him. They had been lying a long time in the Bay of Naples, and the officers were very intimate in the English fleet, and there had been great festivities, and our men thought they must give a great ball on board the ship. How they ever did it on board the Warren I am sure I do not know. Perhaps it was not the Warren, or perhaps ladies did not take up so much room as they do now. They wanted to use Nolan's stateroom for something, and they hated to do it without asking him to the ball; so the captain said they might ask him, if they would be responsible that he did not talk with the wrong people, "who would give him intelligence." So the dance went on, the finest party that had ever been known, I dare say; for I never heard of a man-of-war ball that was not. For ladies they had the family of the American consul, one or two travelers who had adventured so far, and a nice bevy of English girls and matrons. perhaps Lady Hamilton 1 herself.

Esprit Fléchier, 1632-1710, a French bishop, noted for his pulpit eloquence

Well, different officers relieved each other in standing and talking with Nolan in a friendly way, so as to be sure that nobody else spoke to him. The dancing went on with spirit, and after a while even the fellows who took this honorary guard of Nolan ceased to fear any contretemps. 2 Only when some English lady -Lady Hamilton, as I said, perhaps-called for a set of "American dances," an odd thing happened. Everybody then danced contradances. The black band, nothing loath, conferred as to what "American dances" were, and started off with "Virginia Reel," which they followed with "Money-Musk," which, in its turn in those days, should have been followed by "The Old Thirteen." But just as Dick, the leader, tapped for his fiddles to begin, and bent forward, about to say, in true negro state, "'The Old Thirteen,' gentlemen and ladies!" as he had said "'Virginny Reel,' if you please!" and "'Money-Musk,' if you please!" the captain's boy tapped him on the shoulder, whispered to him, and he did not announce the name of the dance; he merely bowed, began on the air, and they all fell to,—the officers teaching the English girls the figure, but not telling them why it had no name.

But that is not the story I started to tell.—As the dancing went on, Nolan and our fellows all got at ease, as I said,—so much so, that it seemed quite natural for him to bow to that splendid Mrs. Graff, and say,—

"I hope you have not forgotten me, Miss Rutledge. Shall I have the honor of dancing?" He did it so quickly, that Shubrick, who was with him, could not hinder him. She laughed and said .--

"I am not Miss Rutledge any longer, Mr. Nolan; but I will dance all the same," just nodded to Shubrick, as if to say he must leave Mr. Nolan to her, and led him off to the place where the dance was forming.

Nolan thought he had got his chance. He had known her at Philadelphia, and at other places had met her, and this was a godsend. You could not talk in contra-dances, as you do in cotillions, or even in the pauses of waltzing; but there were chances for tongues and sounds, as well as for eyes and blushes. He began with her travels, and Europe, and Vesuvius, and the French; and then, when they had worked down, and had that long talking time at the bottom of the set, he said boldly,—a little pale, she said, as she told me the story years after.—

"And what do you hear from home, Mrs. Graff?"

And that splendid creature looked through him. Jove! how she must have looked through him!

"Home!! Mr. Nolan!!! I thought you were the man who never wanted to hear of home again!"—and she walked directly up the deck to her husband, and left poor Nolan alone, as he always was.—He did not dance again.

I cannot give any history of him in order; nobody can now; and, indeed, I am not trying to. These are the traditions, which I sort out, as I believe them, from the myths which have been told about this man for forty years. The lies that have been told about him are legion. The fellows used to say he was the "Iron Mask"; 3 and poor George Pons went to his grave in the belief that this was the author of "Junius," 4 who was being punished for his celebrated libel on Thomas Jefferson. Pons was not very strong in the historical line. A happier story than either of these I have told is of the war. 5 That came along soon after. I have heard this affair told in three or four ways,-and, indeed, it may have happened more than once. But which ship it was on I cannot tell. However, in one, at least, of the great frigate-duels with the English, in which the navy was really baptized, it happened that a round shot from the enemy entered one of our ports square, and took right down the officer of the gun himself, and almost every man of the gun's crew. Now you may say what you choose about courage, but that is not a nice thing to see. But, as the men who were not killed picked themselves up, and as they and the surgeon's people were carrying off the bodies, there appeared Nolan, in his shirt-sleeves, with

&lt;sup>1</sup> a celebrated beauty and diplomatic intriguer, wife of Sir William Hamilton, the diplomatist and archeologist, who was ambassador at Naples, 1764-1800
<sup>2</sup> mishap, mischance

&lt;sup>3</sup> a French prisoner of state in the Bastile who from 1673 (?) until his death in 1703 wore a mask which tradition made iron

<sup>4</sup> the unknown writer of a series of letters against the English Government, which appeared in London papers from November, 1768, to January, 1772
5 of 1812

the rammer in his hand, and, just as if he had been the officer, told them off with authority. who should go to the cock-pit with the wounded men, who should stay with him,—perfectly cheery, and with that way which makes men feel sure all is right and is going to be right. And he finished loading the gun with his own hands, aimed it, and bade the men fire. And there he stayed, captain of that gun, keeping those fellows in spirits, till the enemy struck, sitting on the carriage while the gun was cooling, though he was exposed all the time,—showing them easier ways to handle heavy shot. -making the raw hands laugh at their own blunders,—and when the gun cooled again, getting it loaded and fired twice as often as any other gun on the ship. The captain walked forward by way of encouraging the men, and Nolan touched his hat and said,-

"I am showing them how we do this in the artillery, sir."

And this is the part of the story where all the legends agree: that Commodore said,-

"I see you do, and I thank you, sir; and I shall never forget this day, sir, and you never shall, sir."

And after the whole thing was over, and he had the Englishman's sword, in the midst of the state and ceremony of the quarter-deck, he said.—"Where is Mr. Nolan? Ask Mr. Nolan to come here."

And when Nolan came, the captain said,-

"Mr. Nolan, we are all very grateful to you today; you are one of us today; you will be named in the despatches."

And then the old man took off his own sword of ceremony, and gave it to Nolan, and made him put it on. The man told me this who saw it. Nolan cried like a baby, and well he might. He had not worn a sword since that infernal day at Fort Adams. But always afterwards on occasions of ceremony, he wore that quaint old French sword of the Commodore's.

The captain did mention him in the despatches. It was always said he asked that he might be pardoned. He wrote a special letter to the Secretary of War. But nothing ever came of it. As I said, that was about the time when they began to ignore the whole transaction at Washington, and when Nolan's imprisonment began to carry itself on because there was nobody to stop it without any new orders from home.

I have heard it said that he was with Porter 1 when he took possession of the Nukahiwa Islands. Not this Porter, you know, but old Porter, his father. Essex Porter.—that is, the old Essex Porter, not this Essex. As an artillery officer, who had seen service in the West, Nolan knew more about fortifications, embrasures, ravelins, 2 stockades, and all that, than any of them did: and he worked with a right good-will in fixing that battery all right. I have always thought it was a pity Porter did not leave him in command there with Gamble. That would have settled all the question about his punishment. We should have kept the islands, and at this moment we should have one station in the Pacific Ocean. Our French friends, too, when they wanted this little watering-place, would have found it was preoccupied. 3 But Madison and the Virginians, of course, flung all that away.

All that was near fifty years ago. If Nolan was thirty then, he must have been near eighty when he died. He looked sixty when he was forty. But he never seemed to me to change a hair afterwards. As I imagine his life, from what I have seen and heard of it, he must have been in every sea, and vet almost never on land. He must have known, in a formal way, more officers in our service than any man living knows. He told me once, with a grave smile, that no man in the world lived so methodical a life as he. "You know the boys say I am the Iron Mask, and you know how busy he was." He said it did not do for any one to try to read all the time, more than to do anything else all the time; and that he read just five hours a day. "Then," he said, "I keep up my notebooks, writing in them at such and such hours from what I have been reading; and I include in these my scrap-books." These were very curious indeed. He had six or eight, of different subjects. There was one of History, one of Natural Science, one which he called "Odds and Ends." But they were not merely books of extracts from newspapers. They had bits of plants and ribbons, shells tied on, and carved scraps of bone and wood, which he had taught the men to cut for him, and they were beautifully illustrated. He drew admirably. He had some of the funniest drawings he took formal possession of the Marquesas Islands, in the Pacific, the largest of which is Nukahiva. These, however, the American Government did not seem to consider worth endeavoring to hold. David Porter's son, David Dixon Porter, "this Poiter," 1813-1801, was an admiral in the Civil War. Or, reference may be to Commodore William David Porter, who commanded the gunboat Essex in the Civil War.

&lt;sup>1</sup> David Porter, 1780-1843, commanded the American man-of-war Essex in the War of 1812; in 1813

<sup>2</sup> an A-shaped outwork of a fortification

The French took possession of the Marquesas Islands

<sup>3</sup> The French took possession of the Marquesas Islands in 1842.

there, and some of the most pathetic, that I have ever seen in my life. I wonder who will have Nolan's scrap-books.

Well, he said his reading and his notes were his profession, and that they took five hours and two hours respectively of each day. "Then," said he, "every man should have a diversion as well as a profession. My Natural History is my diversion." That took two hours a day more. The men used to bring him birds and fish, but on a long cruise he had to satisfy himself with centipedes and cockroaches and such small game. He was the only naturalist I ever met who knew anything about the habits of the house-fly and the mosquito. All those people can tell you whether they are Lepidoptera or Steptopotera; 1 but as for telling how you can get rid of them, or how they get away from you when you strike them,-why Linnaeus 2 knew as little of that as John Foy the idiot did. These nine hours made Nolan's regular daily "occupation." The rest of the time he talked or walked. Till he grew very old, he went aloft a great deal. He always kept up his exercise; and I never heard that he was ill. If any other man was ill, he was the kindest nurse in the world; and he knew more than half the surgeons do. Then if anybody was sick or died, or if the captain wanted him to. on any other occasion, he was always ready to read prayers. I have remarked that he read beautifully.

My own acquaintance with Philip Nolan began six or eight years after the war, on my first voyage after I was appointed a midshipman. It was in the first days after our Slave-Trade treaty, 3 while the Reigning House, which was still the House of Virginia, had still a sort of sentimentalism about the suppression of the horrors of the Middle Passage, and something was sometimes done that way. We were in the South Atlantic on that business. From the time I joined, I believe I thought Nolan was a sort of lay chaplain,-a chaplain with a blue coat. I never asked about him. Everything in the ship was strange to me. I knew it was green to ask questions, and I suppose I thought there was a "Plain-Buttons" on every ship. We had him to dine in our mess once a week, and the caution was given that on that day nothing was to be said about home. But if they had told us not to say anything about the planet Mars or the book of Deuteronomy. I should not have asked why: there were a great many things which seemed to me to have as little reason. I first came to understand anything about "the man without a country" one day when we overhauled a dirty little schooner which had slaves on board. An officer was sent to take charge of her, and, after a few minutes, he sent back his boat to ask that some one might be sent him who could speak Portuguese. We were all looking over the rail when the message came. and we all wished we could interpret, when the captain asked who spoke Portuguese. But none of the officers did; and just as the captain was sending forward to ask if any of the people could, Nolan stepped out and said he should be glad to interpret, if the captain wished, as he understood the language. The captain thanked him, fitted out another boat with him, and in this boat it was my luck to go.

When we got there, it was such a scene as you seldom see, and never want to. Nastiness beyond account, and chaos run loose in the midst of the nastiness. There were not a great many of the negroes; but by way of making what there were understand that they were free, Vaughan had had their hand-cuffs and ankle-cuffs knocked off, and, for convenience' sake, was putting them upon the rascals of the schooner's crew. The negroes were, most of them, out of the hold, and swarming all round the dirty deck, with a central throng surrounding Vaughan and addressing him in every dialect and patois of a dialect, from the Zulu click up to the Parisian of Beledeliereed. 4

As we came on deck, Vaughan looked down from a hogshead, on which he had mounted in desperation, and said:—

"For God's love, is there anybody who can make these wretches understand something? The men gave them rum, and that did not quiet them. I knocked that big fellow down twice, and that did not soothe him. And then I talked Choctaw to all of them together; and I'll be hanged if they understand that as well as they understood the English."

1 Lepidoptera are insects distinguished primarily by their having four membranous wings covered with overlapping scales. Steptopotera: Hale has, perhaps, coined the word for the occasion.

The famous Swedish naturalist, 1707-1778; John Foy is the chief chalacter in Wordsworth's poem, The Idiot Boy The Idiot Boy.

By the Treaty of Ghent, 1814, Great Britain and the United States agreed to abolish the slave traffic. In 1820 slave-trade was made piracy punishable by death. Washington, Jefferson, Madison. and Monroe were all from Virginia. The "Middle Passage" was that part of the Atlantic between the west African coast and the West Indies most traversed by slave shing. traversed by slave ships.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Beled el Jerid, "country of dates," a region in the northern Sahara; Hale probably implies that its language is Parisian in comparison to the Zulu dialect; or he may refer in irony to its actual commercial language, which is corrupt French, mixed with other tongues.

Nolan said he could speak Portuguese, and one or two fine-looking Kroomen 1 were dragged out, who, as it had been found already, had worked for the Portuguese on the coast at Fernando Po.

"Tell them they are free," said Vaughan; "and tell them that these rascals are to be hanged as soon as we can get rope enough."

Nolan "put that into Spanish,"—that is, he explained it in such Portuguese as the Kroomen could understand, and they in turn to such of the negroes as could understand them. Then there was such a yell of delight, clinching of fists, leaping and dancing, kissing of Nolan's feet, and a general rush made to the hogshead by way of spontaneous worship of Vaughan, as the deus ex machina? of the occasion.

"Tell them," said Vaughan, well pleased, "that I will take them all to Cape Palmas."

This did not answer so well. Cape Palmas was practically as far from the homes of most of them as New Orleans, or Rio Janeiro was; that is, they would be eternally separated from home there. And their interpreters, as we could understand, instantly said, "Ah, non Palmas," and began to propose infinite other expedients in most voluble language. Vaughan was rather disappointed at this result of his liberality, and asked Nolan eagerly what they said. The drops stood on poor Nolan's white forehead, as he hushed the men down, and said:—

"He says, 'Not Palmas.' He says, 'Take us home, take us to our own country, take us to our own house, take us to our own pickaninnies and our own women.' He says he has an old father and mother who will die if they do not see him. And this one says he left his people all sick, and paddled down to Fernando to beg the white doctor to come and help them, and that these devils caught him in the bay just in sight of home, and that he has never seen anybody from home since then. And this one says," choked out Nolan, "that he has not heard a word from his home in six months, while he has been locked up in an infernal barracoon." 3

Vaughan always said he grew gray himself while Nolan struggled through this interpretation. I, who did not understand anything of the passion involved in it, saw that the very elements were melting with fervent heat, and that something was to pay somewhere. Even the negroes themselves stopped howling, as they saw Nolan's agony, and Vaughan's almost equal agony of sympathy. As quick as he could get words, he said:—

3 slave pen

"Tell them yes, yes, yes; tell them they shall go to the Mountains of the Moon, if they will. If I sail the schooner through the Great White Desert, they shall go home!"

And after some fashion Nolan said so. And then they all fell to kissing him again, and wanted to rub his nose with theirs.

But he could not stand it long; and getting Vaughan to say he might go back, he beckoned me down into our boat. As we lav back in the stern-sheets and the men gave way, he said to me: "Youngster, let that show you what it is to be without a family, without a home, and without a country. And if you are ever tempted to say a word or to do a thing that shall put a bar between you and your family, your home, and your country, pray God in his mercy to take you that instant home to his own heaven. Stick by your family, boy; forget you have a self. while you do everything for them. Think of your home, boy; write and send, and talk about it. Let it be nearer and nearer to your thought. the farther you have to travel from it: and rush back to it when you are free, as that poor black slave is doing now. And for your country, boy," and the words rattled in his throat, "and for that flag," and he pointed to the ship, "never dream a dream but of serving her as she bids you, though the service carry you through a thousand hells. No matter what happens to you, no matter who flatters you or who abuses you, never look at another flag, never let a night pass but you pray God to bless that flag. Remember, boy, that behind all these men you have to do with, behind officers, and government, and people even, there is the Country Herself, your Country, and that you belong to Her as you belong to your own mother. Stand by Her, boy, as you would stand by your mother, if those devils there had got hold of her today!"

I was frightened to death by his calm, hard passion; but I blundered out that I would, by all that was holy, and that I had never thought of doing anything else. He hardly seemed to hear me; but he did, almost in a whisper, say,—"Oh, if anybody had said so to me when I was of your age!"

I think it was this half-confidence of his, which I never abused, for I never told this story till now, which afterward made us great friends. He was very kind to me. Often he sat up, or even got up, at night, to walk the deck with me, when it was my watch. He explained to me a great deal of my mathematics, and I owe to him my taste for mathematics. He lent me books, and helped me about my reading. He never alluded so directly to his story again; but from one and another officer I have learned, in When we thirty years, what I am telling. parted from him in St. Thomas harbor, at the end of our cruise, I was more sorry than I can tell. I was very glad to meet him again in 1830; and later in life, when I thought I had some influence in Washington, I moved heaven and earth to have him discharged. But it was like getting a ghost out of prison. They pretended there was no such man, and never was such a man. They will say so at the Department now! Perhaps they do not know. It will not be the first thing in the service of which the Department appears to know nothing!

¹ an industrious tribe, never enslaved, living in Liberia ² "A god from a machine"; this expression means the person who, at a critical moment, solves a difficulty or hastens a dénouement; it refers to the device used in ancient drama of letting a god down from above by machinery when divine intervention was needed.

There is a story that Nolan met Burr once on one of our vessels, when a party of Americans came on board in the Mediterranean. But this I believe to be a lie; or rather, it is a myth, ben trovato, i involving a tremendous blowing-up with which he sunk Burr,—asking him how he liked to be "without a country." But it is clear from Burr's life, that nothing of the sort could have happened; and I mention this only as an illustration of the stories which get a-going where there is the least mystery at bottom.

For him, poor fellow, he repented of his folly, and then, like a man, submitted to the fate he had asked for. He never intentionally added to the difficulty or delicacy of the charge of those who had him in hold. Accidents would happen; but they never happened from his fault. Lieutenant Truxton told me that, when Texas was annexed, there was a careful discussion among the officers, whether they should get hold of Nolan's handsome set of maps and cut Texas out of it,-from the map of the world and the map of Mexico. The United States had been cut out when the atlas was bought for him. But it was voted, rightly enough, that to do this would be virtually to reveal to him what had happened, or, as Harry Cole said, to make him think Old Burr had succeeded. So it was from no fault of Nolan's that a great botch happened at my own table, when, for a short time, I was in command of the George Washington corvette, on the South American station. We were lying in the La Plata, and some of the officers, who had been on shore and had just joined again, were entertaining us with accounts of their misadventures in riding the half-wild horses of Buenos Ayres. Nolan was at table, and was in an unusually bright and talkative mood. Some story of a tumble reminded him of an adventure of his own when he was catching wild horses in Texas with his brother Stephen, at a time when he must have been quite a boy. He told the story with a good deal of spirit,-so much so, that the silence which often follows a good story hung over the table for an instant, to be broken by Nolan himself. For he asked perfectly unconsciously, -"Pray, what has become of Texas? After the Mexicans got their independence, I thought that province of Texas would come forward very fast. It is really one of the finest regions on earth: it is the Italy of this continent. But I have not seen or heard a word of Texas for near twenty years."

There were two Texan officers at the table. The reason he had never heard of Texas was that Texas and her affairs had been painfully cut out of his newspapers since Austin 2 began his settlements; so that, while he read of Honduras and Tamaulipas, 3 and, till quite lately, of California,-this virgin province, in which his brother had traveled so far, and, I believe, had died, had ceased to be to him. Waters and Williams, the two Texas men. looked grimly at each other and tried not to laugh. Edward Morris had his attention attracted by the third link in the chain of the captain's chandelier. Watrous was seized with a convulsion of sneezing. Nolan himself saw that something was to pay, he did not know what. And I. as master of the feast, had to say,-

"Texas is out of the map, Mr. Nolan. Have you seen Captain Back's curious account of Sir Thomas Roe's Welcome?" 4

After that cruise I never saw Nolan again. I wrote to him at least twice a year, for in that voyage we became even confidentially intimate; but he never wrote to me. The other men tell me that in those fifteen years he aged very fast, as well he might indeed, but that he was still the same gentle, uncomplaining, silent sufferer that he ever was, bearing as best he could his self-

&lt;sup>1</sup> well invented (For some years Burr was virtually an exile from the United States; was expelled from England, and rebuffed by Napoleon.)

<sup>2</sup> Stephen Fuller Austin in 1821 first led a colony of settlers from the United States into Texas, thus carrying out the purpose of his father, Moses Austin.

<sup>3</sup> a Mexican state that borders on Texas
4 Captain Back was a famous English Arctic explorer of Hale's time. Sir Thomas Roe was a traveler and English diplomat of the seventeenth century. He was a patron of an exploring expedition under Captain Luke Fox, who in 1631 named an island north of Hudson's Bay "Sir Thomas Roe's Welcome Island." The name "Welcome" is now confined to the straits surrounding the island.

appointed punishment,—rather less social, perhaps, with new men whom he did not know, but more anxious, apparently, than ever to serve and befriend and teach the boys, some of whom fairly seemed to worship him. And now it seems the dear old fellow is dead. He has found a home at last, and a country.

Since writing this, and while considering whether or no I would print it, as a warning to the young Nolans and Vallandighams <sup>1</sup> and Tatnalls of today of what it is to throw away a country, I have received from Danforth, who is on board the Levant, a letter which gives an account of Nolan's last hours. It removes all my doubts about telling this story.

To understand the first words of the letter. the non-professional reader should remember that after 1817, the position of every officer who had Nolan in charge was one of the greatest delicacy. The government had failed to renew the order of 1807 regarding him. What was a man to do? Should he let him go? What, then. if he were called to account by the Department for violating the order of 1807? Should he keep him? What, then, if Nolan should be liberated some day, and should bring an action for false imprisonment or kidnapping against every man who had had him in charge? I urged and pressed this upon Southard, and I have reason to think that other officers did the same thing. But the Secretary always said, as they often do at Washington, that there were no special orders to give, and that we must act on our own judgment. That means, "if you succeed, you will be sustained; if you fail, you will be disavowed." Well, as Danforth says, all that is over now, though I do not know but I expose myself to a criminal prosecution on the evidence of the very revelation I am making.

Here is the letter:-

Levant, 2° 2′ S. @ 131° W.

"DEAR FRED:—I try to find heart and life to tell you that it is all over with dear old Nolan. I have been with him on this voyage more than I ever was, and I can understand wholly now the way in which you used to speak of the dear old fellow. I could see that he was not strong, but I had no idea the end was so near. The doctor has been watching him very carefully. and yesterday morning came to me and told me that Nolan was not so well, and had not left his state-room,—a thing I never remember before. He had let the doctor come and see him as he lay there,-the first time the doctor had been in the state-room,-and he said he should like to see me. Oh, dear! do you remember the mysteries we boys used to invent about his room in the old Intrebid days? Well, I went in, and there, to be sure, the poor fellow lay in his berth, smiling pleasantly as he gave me his hand, but looking very frail. I could not help a glance round, which showed me what a little shrine he had made of the box he was lying in. The stars and stripes were triced up above and around a picture of Washington, and he had painted a majestic eagle, with lightnings blazing from his heak and his foot just clasping the whole globe, which his wings over-shadowed. The dear old boy saw my glance, and said, with a sad smile, 'Here, you see, I have a country!' And then he pointed to the foot of his bed, where I had not seen before a great map of the United States. as he had drawn it from memory, and which he had there to look upon as he lay. Quaint, queer old names were on it, in large letters: 'Indiana Territory,' 'Mississippi Territory,' and 'Louisiana Territory,' as I suppose our fathers learned such things: but the old fellow had patched in Texas, too; he had carried his western boundary all the way to the Pacific, but on that shore he had defined nothing.

"'O Danforth,' he said, 'I know I am dying. I cannot get home. Surely you will tell me something now?—Stop! stop. Do not speak till I say what I am sure you know, that there is not in this ship, that there is not in America, -God bless her!-a more loyal man than I. There cannot be a man who loves the old flag as I do, or prays for it as I do, or hopes for it as I do. There are thirty-four stars in it now, Danforth. I thank God for that, though I do not know what their names are. There has never been one taken away: I thank God for that. I know by that that there has never been any successful Burr. O Danforth, Danforth,' he sighed out, 'how like a wretched night's dream a boy's idea of personal fame or of separate sovereignty seems, when one looks back on it after such a life as mine! But tell me,-tell me something,-tell me everything, Danforth, be-

"Ingham, I swear to you that I felt like a monster that I had not told him everything before. Danger or no danger, delicacy or no delicacy, who was I, that I should have been acting the tyrant all this time over this dear, sainted old man, who had years ago expiated. in his whole manhood's life, the madness of a boy's treason? 'Mr. Nolan,' said I, 'I will tell you everything you ask about. Only, where shall I begin?'

&lt;sup>1</sup> Clement Vallandigham, leader of the "Copper-heads," i.e., Northerners who were believed to sympathize unduly with the South in the Civil War, was once arrested by the Federal troops and banished to the Confederate lines. Commodore Josiah Tattnall, a gallant naval officer, resigned from the Federal navy to join the Confederate navy. It must be remembered that Hale's partisanship belonged to the times.

"Oh, the blessed smile that crept over his white face! and he pressed my hand and said, 'God bless you! Tell me their names,' he said. and he pointed to the stars on the flag. 'The last I know is Ohio. My father lived in Kentucky. But I have guessed Michigan and Indiana and Mississippi.—that was where Fort Adams is,-they make twenty. But where are your other fourteen? You have not cut up any of the old ones, I hope?'

"Well, that was not a bad text, and I told him the names in as good order as I could, and he bade me take down his beautiful map and draw them in as I best could with my pencil. He was wild with delight about Texas, told me how his brother died there: he had marked a gold cross where he supposed his brother's grave was; and he had guessed at Texas. Then he was delighted as he saw California and Oregon;that, he said, he had suspected partly, because he had never been permitted to land on that shore, though the ships were there so much. 'And the men,' said he, laughing, 'brought off a good deal besides furs.' Then he went back heavens, how far!—to ask about the Chesapeake, 1 and what was done to Barron for surrendering her to the Leopard, and whether Burr ever tried again,—and he ground his teeth with the only passion he showed. But in a moment that was over, and he said, 'God forgive me, for I am sure I forgive him.' Then he asked about the old war,—told me the true story of his serving the gun the day we took the Java,—asked about dear old David Porter, as he called him. Then he settled down more quietly, and very happily, to hear me tell in an hour the history of fifty vears.

"How I wished it had been somebody who knew something! But I did as well as I could. I told him of the English war. I told him about Fulton and the steamboat beginning. I told him about old Scott, and Jackson; told him all I could think about the Mississippi, and New Orleans, and Texas, and his own old Kentucky. And do you think, he asked me who was in command of the 'Legion of the West.' I told him it was a very gallant officer named Grant. and that, by our last news, he was about to establish his headquarters at Vicksburg. Then. 'Where was Vicksburg?' I worked that out on the map: it was about a hundred miles, more or less, above his old Fort Adams; and I thought Fort Adams must be a ruin now. 'It must be at old Vick's plantation, said he: 'well. that is a change!'

"I tell you, Ingham, it was a hard thing to condense the history of half a century into that talk with a sick man. And I do not now know what I told him.—of emigration, and the means of it,-of steamboats, and railroads, and telegraphs.—of inventions, and books, and literature,—of the colleges, and West Point, and the Naval School,—but with the queerest interruptions that ever you heard. You see it was Robinson Crusoe asking all the accumulated questions of fifty-six years!

"I remember he asked, all of a sudden, who was President now; and when I told him, he asked if Old Abe was General Benjamin Lincoln's 2 son. He said he met old General Lincoln, when he was quite a boy himself, at some Indian treaty. I said no, that Old Abe was a Kentuckian like himself, but I could not tell him of what family; he had worked up from the ranks. 'Good for him!' cried Nolan; 'I am glad of that. As I have brooded and wondered, I have thought our danger was in keeping up those regular successions in the first families.' Then I got talking about my visit to Washington. I told him of meeting the Oregon Congressman, Harding; I told him about the Smithsonian, and the Exploring Expedition; 3 I told him about the Capitol, and the statues for the pediment, and Crawford's Liberty, 4 and Greenough's Washington: Ingham, I told him everything I could think of that would show the grandeur of his country and its prosperity; but I could not make up my mouth to tell him a word about this infernal rebellion!

"And he drank it in and enjoyed it as I cannot tell you. He grew more and more silent,

&lt;sup>1</sup> In 1807 the American frigate Chesapeake, commanded by James Barron, was pursued by the English frigate Leopard, whose commander demanded the delivery of four men, thee of whom were native Americans. Barron refused and the Leopard opened fire. The Chesapeake was unprepared, and after three of her men had been killed and sixteen woulded she was boarded from the sixteen wounded she was boarded from the Leopard and the four men were seized. One was hanged, one died in prison, and two were not returned for five years. The incident aroused strong feeling.

 &lt;sup>2</sup> a Revolutionary general, secretary of war 1781-84
 <sup>3</sup> John C. Frémont in 1842 explored parts of the Rocky Mountains, and in 1843-44 and 1845 the Pacific slope; in 1853 he discovered a route to California.
 <sup>4</sup> Thomas Crawford, 1814-1857, an American sculptor, designed the Statue of Liberty surmounting the Capitol at Washington, and the bronze doors depicting the life of Washington. The statue of Washington near the Capitol is by another American sculptor. Horatio Greenough 1802-1852. can sculptor, Horatio Greenough, 1805-1852.

vet I never thought he was tired or faint. I gave him a glass of water, but he just wet his lips. and told me not to go away. Then he asked me to bring the Presbyterian 'Book of Public Prayer' which lav there, and said, with a smile, that it would open at the right place. and so it did. There was his double red mark down the page; and I knelt down and read and he repeated with me, 'For ourselves and our country, O gracious God, we thank Thee, that, notwithstanding our manifold transgressions of Thy holy laws, Thou hast continued to us Thy marvelous kindness.'—and so to the end of that thanksgiving. Then he turned to the end of the same book, and I read the words more familiar to me: 'Most heartly we beseech Thee with Thy favor to behold and bless Thy servant, the President of the United States, and all others in authority,'--and the rest of the Episcopal collect. 'Danforth,' said he, 'I have repeated those prayers night and morning, it is now fifty-five years.' And then he said he would go to sleep. He bent me down over him and kissed me; and he said, 'Look in my Bible, Danforth, when I am gone.' And I went away.

"But I had no thought it was the end. I thought he was tired and would sleep. I knew he was happy, and I wanted him to be alone.

"But in an hour, when the doctor went in gently, he found Nolan had breathed his life away with a smile. He had something pressed close to his lips. It was his father's badge of the Order of Cincinnati. 1

"We looked in his Bible, and there was a slip of paper at the place where he had marked the text:-

"'They desire a country, even a heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for He hath prepared for them a city.'

"On this slip of paper he had written:

"'Bury me in the sea; it has been my home, and I love it. But will not some one set up a stone for my memory at Fort Adams or at Orleans, that my disgrace may not be more than I ought to bear? Say on it:-

'In Memory of 'PHILIP NOLAN,

'Lieutenant in the Army of the United States.

'He loved his country as no other man has loved her; but no man deserved less at her hands."

An association of the regular officers of the American Army of the Revolution; Washington was its first president.

HERMAN MELVILLE 1819-1891

Although he was born in the city of New York and died there, the leading traits of Melville's character were derived from his New England ancestors. After a good schooling he went to sea at the age of nineteen, and at the age of twenty-two signed articles for a whaling voyage. Deserting on the Marquesas, he spent several years in the Pacific islands. On his return home he rapidly produced several narratives of sea adventure, the most notable being Typee, 1846; Omoo, 1847; Mardi, 1849; White-Jacket, 1850; Moby Dick. 1851.

Much interest and a revived study of Melville about the time of his centenary has brought him the understanding criticism and the fame that he seems to have lacked during his lifetime. Recent estimates point out that he first discovered the romance of the South Seas, later developed by Stevenson and minor writers, and that together with Dana he showed for the first time the real life of the sailor in the forecastle of the merchant ship and the whaler. His style cannot be characterized in a word: Typee is idyllic; Moby Dick, now considered Melville's masterpiece, is, to Augustine Birrell, notable for "its most amazing eloquence and its mingling an ever-present romanticism of style with an almost savage reality of narrative."

Biography and criticism: J. Freeman, (EML); C. Van Doren, "Lucifer from Nantucket," Cent. 110:494-501; "Rediscovering the Genius of Herman Melville," Cur. Opinion 72:101-3; R. M. Weaver, "The Centennial of Herman Melville," Nation 109:145-6; A. Birrell, "The Immortal White Whale," Liv. Age 308:659-61.

From TYPEE 2 CHAPTER X

Midnight Reflections-Morning Visitors-A Warrior in Costume—A Savage Aesculapius -Practice of the Healing Art-Body Servant-A Dwelling-house of the Valley described—Portraits of its Inmates.

Various and conflicting were the thoughts which oppressed me during the silent hours that followed the events related in the preceding chapter. Toby, wearied with the fatigues of the day, slumbered heavily by my side; but the pain under which I was suffering effectually prevented my sleeping, and I remained distressingly alive to all the fearful circumstances of our present situation. Was it possible that after

On his whaling voyage, Melville found conditions so intolerable that with a single companion, Toby, he deserted at the Marquesas, the two sailors hiding ashore till the ship had sailed. To avoid arrest they plunged into the jungle, but lost their way while seeking the friendly Happar tribe, and found themselves, after four days, captive among the dreaded cannibal tribe of Typee, Melville himself disabled by exposure. all our vicissitudes we were really in the terrible valley of Typee, and at the mercy of its inmates, a fierce and unrelenting tribe of savages?

Typee or Happar? I shuddered when I reflected that there was no longer any room for doubt; and that, beyond all hope of escape, we were now placed in those very circumstances from the bare thought of which I had recoiled with such abhorrence but a few days before. What might not be our fearful destiny? To be sure, as yet we had been treated with no violence: nav. had been even kindly and hospitably entertained. But what dependence could be placed upon the fickle passions which sway the bosom of a savage? His inconstancy and treachery are proverbial. Might it not be that beneath these fair appearances the islanders covered some perfidious design, and that their friendly reception of us might only precede some horrible catastrophe? How strongly did these forebodings spring up in my mind as I lay restlessly upon a couch of mats, surrounded by the dimly revealed forms of those whom I so greatly dreaded.

From the excitement of these fearful thoughts I sank towards morning into an uneasy slumber; and on awaking, with a start, in the midst of an appalling dream, looked up into the eager countenances of a number of the natives, who were bending over me.

It was broad day; and the house was nearly filled with young females, fancifully decorated with flowers, who gazed upon me as I rose with faces in which childish delight and curiosity were vividly portrayed. After waking Toby, they seated themselves round us on the mats, and gave full play to that prying inquisitiveness which time out of mind has been attributed to the adorable sex.

As these unsophisticated young creatures were attended by no jealous duennas, their proceedings were altogether informal, and void of artificial restraint. Long and minute was the investigation with which they honored us, and so uproarious their mirth, that I felt infinitely sheepish; and Toby was immeasurably outraged at their familiarity.

These lively young ladies were at the same time wonderfully polite and humane; fanning aside the insects that occasionally lighted on our brows; presenting us with food; and compassionately regarding me in the midst of my afflictions. But in spite of all their blandishments, my feelings of propriety were exceedingly shocked, for I could not but consider them as having overstepped the due limits of female decorum.

Having diverted themselves to their hearts' content, our young visitants now withdrew, and gave place to successive troops of the other sex, who continued flocking towards the house until near noon; by which time I have no doubt that the greater part of the inhabitants of the valley had bathed themselves in the light of our beniemant countenances.

At last, when their numbers began to diminish, a superb-looking warrior stooped the towering plumes of his head-dress beneath the low portal, and entered the house. I saw at once that he was some distinguished personage, the natives regarding him with the utmost deference, and making room for him as he approached. His aspect was imposing. splendid long drooping tail-feathers of the tropical bird, thickly interspersed with the gaudy plumage of the cock, were disposed in an immense upright semicircle upon his head, their lower extremities being fixed in a crescent of guinea-beads which spanned the forehead. Around his neck were several enormous necklaces of boar's tusks, polished like ivory, and disposed in such a manner as that the longest and largest were upon his capacious chest. Thrust forward through the large apertures in his ears were two small and finely-shaped sperm whale teeth, presenting their cavities in front. stuffed with freshly-plucked leaves, and curiously wrought at the other end into strange little images and devices. These barbaric trinkets. garnished in this manner at their open extremities, and tapering and curving round to a point behind the ear, resembled not a little a pair of cornucopias.

The loins of the warrior were girt about with heavy folds of a dark-colored tappa, <sup>1</sup> hanging before and behind in clusters of braided tassels, while anklets and bracelets of curling human hair completed his unique costume. In his right hand he grasped a beautifully carved paddlespear, nearly fifteen feet in length, made of the bright koarwood, <sup>2</sup> one end sharply pointed and the other flattened like an oar-blade. Hanging obliquely from his girdle by a loop of sinnate, <sup>3</sup> was a richly decorated pipe; the slender reed forming its stem was colored with a red pigment, and round it, as well as the idol-bowl, fluttered little streamers of the thinnest tappa.

But that which was most remarkable in the appearance of this splendid islander was the elaborate tattooing displayed on every noble tapa (cloth made of bark fibers soaked in water and then pounded together) perhaps koa, a handsome acacia wood of the Pacific islands 's sennit: flat, loosely-braided cordage limb. All imaginable lines and curves and figures were delineated over his whole body, and in their grotesque variety and infinite profusion I could only compare them to the crowded groupings of quaint patterns we sometimes see in costly pieces of lacework. The most simple and remarkable of all these ornaments was that which decorated the countenance of the chief. Two broad stripes of tattooing, diverging from the center of his shaven crown, obliquely crossed both eves—staining the lids—to a little below either ear, where they united with another stripe which swept in a straight line along the lips and formed the base of the triangle. The warrior, from the excellence of his physical proportions, might certainly have been regarded as one of Nature's noblemen, and the lines drawn upon his face may possibly have denoted his exalted rank.

This warlike personage, upon entering the house, seated himself at some distance from the spot where Toby and myself reposed, while the rest of the savages looked alternately from us to him, as if in expectation of something they were disappointed in not perceiving. Regarding the chief attentively, I thought his lineaments appeared familiar to me. As soon as his full face was turned upon me, and I again beheld its extraordinary embellishment, and met the strange gaze to which I had been subjected the preceding night, I immediately, in spite of the alteration in his appearance, recognized the noble Mehevi. 1 On addressing him, he advanced at once in the most cordial manner, and greeting me warmly, seemed to enjoy not a little the effect his barbaric costume had produced upon me.

I forthwith determined to secure, if possible, the good will of this individual, as I easily perceived he was a man of great authority in his tribe, and one who might exert a powerful influence upon our subsequent fate. In the endeavor I was not repulsed; for nothing could surpass the friendliness he manifested towards both my companion and myself. He extended his sturdy limbs by our side, and endeavored to make us comprehend the full extent of the kindly feelings by which he was actuated. The almost insuperable difficulty in communicating to one another our ideas affected the chief with no little mortification. He evinced a great desire to be enlightened with regard to the customs and peculiarities of the far-off country we had left behind us, and to which under the name of Maneeka 2 he frequently alluded.

<sup>1</sup> a chieftain who had greeted them the evening before <sup>2</sup> America

But that which more than any other subject engaged his attention was the late proceedings of the "France," as he called the French, in the neighboring bay of Nukuheva. This seemed a never-ending theme with him, and one concerning which he was never weary of interrogating us. All the information we succeeded in imparting to him on this subject was little more than that we had seen six men-of-war lying in the hostile bay at the time we had left it. When he received this intelligence, Mehevi, by the aid of his fingers, went through a long numerical calculation, as if estimating the number of Frenchmen the squadron might contain.

It was just after employing his faculties in this way that he happened to notice the swelling in my limb. He immediately examined it with the utmost attention, and after doing so, despatched a boy who happened to be standing by, with some message.

After the lapse of a few moments the stripling reëntered the house with an aged islander, who might have been taken for old Hippocrates 4 himself. His head was as bald as the polished surface of a cocoa-nut shell, which article it precisely resembled in smoothness and color, while a long silvery beard swept almost to his girdle of bark. Encircling his temples was a bandeau of the twisted leaves of the omoo tree, pressed closely over the brows to shield his feeble vision from the glare of the sun. His tottering steps were supported by a long slim staff, resembling the wand with which a theatrical magician appears on the stage, and in one hand he carried a freshly plaited fan of the green leaflets of the cocoa-nut tree. A flowing robe of tappa, knotted over the shoulder. hung loosely round his stooping form, and heightened the venerableness of his aspect.

Mehevi, saluting this old gentleman, motioned him to a seat between us, and then uncovering my limb, desired him to examine it. The leech gazed intently from me to Toby, and then proceeded to business. After diligently observing the ailing member, he commenced manipulating it; and on the supposition probably that the complaint had deprived the leg of all sensation, began to pinch and hammer it in such a manner that I absolutely roared with the pain. Thinking that I was as capable of making an application of thumps and pinches to the part as any one else, I endeavored to resist this species of medical treatment. But it was not so easy a matter to get out of the clutches quesas.

<sup>3</sup> The French had lately taken possession of the Mar-

The Greek physician, called the "Father of Medicine";
he died about 377 B.C.

of the old wizard; he fastened on the unfortunate limb as if it were something for which he had been long seeking, and muttering some kind of incantation continued his discipline, pounding it after a fashion that set me well nigh crazy; while Mehevi, upon the same principle which prompts an affectionate mother to hold a struggling child in a dentist's chair, restrained me in his powerful grasp, and actually encouraged the wretch in this infliction of torture

Almost frantic with rage and pain, I yelled like a bedlamite; while Toby, throwing himself into all the attitudes of a posture-master, vainly endeavored to expostulate with the natives by signs and gestures. To have looked at my companion, as, sympathizing with my sufferings, he strove to put an end to them, one would have thought that he was the deaf and dumb alphabet incarnated. Whether my tormentor yielded to Toby's entreaties, or paused from sheer exhaustion, I do not know; but all at once he ceased his operations, and at the same time the chief relinquishing his hold upon me, I fell back, faint and breathless with the agony I had endured.

My unfortunate limb was now left much in the same condition of a rump-steak after undergoing the castigating process which precedes cooking. My physician, having recovered from the fatigues of his exertions, as if anxious to make amends for the pain to which he had subjected me, now took some herbs out of a little wallet that was suspended from his waist, and moistening them in water, applied them to the inflamed part, stooping over it at the same time, and either whispering a spell, or having a little confidential chat with some imaginary demon located in the calf of my leg. My limb was now swathed in leafy bandages, and grateful to Providence for the cessation of hostilities, I was suffered to rest.

Mehevi shortly after rose to depart; but before he went he spoke authoritatively to one of the natives whom he addressed as Kory-Kory; and from the little I could understand of what took place, pointed him out to me as a man whose peculiar business thenceforth would be to attend upon my person. I am not certain that I comprehended as much as this at the time, but the subsequent conduct of my trusty body-servant fully assured me that such must have been the case.

I could not but be amused at the manner in which the chief addressed me upon this occasion, talking to me for at least fifteen or twenty minutes as calmly as if I could understand every word that he said. I remarked this peculiarity very often afterwards in many other of the islanders.

Mehevi having now departed, and the family physician having likewise made his exit, we were left about sunset with the ten or twelve natives, who by this time I had ascertained composed the household of which Toby and I were members. As the dwelling to which we had been first introduced was the place of my permanent abode while I remained in the valley, and as I was necessarily placed upon the most intimate footing with its occupants, I may as well here enter into a little description of it and its inhabitants. This description will apply also to nearly all the other dwelling-places in the vale, and will furnish some idea of the generality of the natives.

Near one side of the valley, and about midway up the ascent of a rather abrupt rise of ground waving with the richest verdure, a number of large stones were laid in successive courses, to the height of nearly eight feet, and disposed in such a manner that their level surface corresponded in shape with the habitation which was perched upon it. A narrow space, however, was reserved in front of the dwelling, upon the summit of this pile of stones (called by the natives a "pi-pi"), which being enclosed by a little picket of canes, gave it somewhat the appearance of a veranda. The frame of the house was constructed of large bamboos planted uprightly, and secured together at intervals by transverse stalks of the light wood of the hibiscus, lashed with thongs of bark. The rear of the tenement—built up with successive ranges of cocoa-nut boughs bound one upon another, with their leaflets cunningly woven together-inclined a little from the vertical, and extended from the extreme edge of the "pi-pi" to about twenty feet from its surface; whence the shelving roof—thatched with the long tapering leaves of the palmetto-sloped steeply off to within about five feet of the floor; leaving the eaves drooping with tassel-like appendages over the front of the habitation. This was constructed of light and elegant canes, in a kind of open screen-work, tastefully adorned with bindings of variegated sinnate, which served to hold together its various parts. The sides of the house were similarly built; thus presenting three quarters for the circulation of the air, while the whole was impervious to the rain.

In length this picturesque building was perhaps twelve yards, while in breadth it could not have exceeded as many feet. So much for the exterior; which, with its wire-like reed-twisted sides, not a little reminded me of an immense aviary.

Stooping a little, you passed through a narrow aperture in its front: and facing you, on entering, lay two long, perfectly straight, and well-polished trunks of the cocoa-nut tree, extending the full length of the dwelling; one of them placed closely against the rear, and the other lying parallel with it some two yards distant, the interval between them being spread with a multitude of gaily-worked mats, nearly all of a different pattern. This space formed the common couch and lounging place of the natives, answering the purpose of a divan in Oriental countries. Here would they slumber through the hours of the night, and recline luxuriously during the greater part of the day. The remainder of the floor presented only the cool shining surfaces of the large stones of which the "pi-pi" was composed.

From the ridge-pole of the house hung suspended a number of large packages enveloped in coarse tappa; some of which contained festival dresses, and various other matters of the wardrobe, held in high estimation. These were easily accessible by means of a line, which, passing over the ridge-pole, had one end attached to a bundle, while with the other, which led to the side of the dwelling and was there secured, the package could be lowered or elevated at pleasure.

Against the farther wall of the house were arranged in tasteful figures a variety of spears and javelins, and other implements of savage warfare. Outside of the habitation, and built upon the piazza-like area in its front, was a little shed used as a sort of larder or pantry, and in which were stored various articles of domestic use and convenience. A few yards from the pi-pi was a large shed built of cocoanut boughs, where the process of preparing the "poee-poee" was carried on, and all culinary operations attended to.

Thus much for the house, and its appurtenances; and it will be readily acknowledged that a more commodious and appropriate dwelling for the climate and the people could not possibly be devised. It was cool, free to admit the air, scrupulously clean, and elevated above the dampness and impurities of the ground.

But now to sketch the inmates; and here I claim for my tried servitor and faithful valet Kory-Kory the precedence of a first description. As his character will be gradually unfolded in the course of my narrative, I shall for the present content myself with delineating his personal appearance. Kory-Kory, though the most devoted and best natured serving-man in the world, was, alas! a hideous obiect to look upon. He was some twenty-five years of age, and about six feet in height, robust and well made, and of the most extraordinary aspect. His head was carefully shaven, with the exception of two circular spots, about the size of a dollar, near the top of the cranium. where the hair, permitted to grow of an amazing length, was twisted up in two prominent knots, that gave him the appearance of being decorated with a pair of horns. His beard, plucked out by the root from every other part of his face, was suffered to droop in hairy pendants, two of which garnished his upper lip, and an equal number hung from the extremity of his chin.

Kory-Kory, with a view of improving the handiwork of nature, and perhaps prompted by a desire to add to the engaging expression of his countenance, had seen fit to embellish his face with three broad longitudinal stripes of tattooing, which, like those country roads that go straight forward in defiance of all obstacles, crossed his nasal organ, descended into the hollow of his eyes, and even skirted the borders of his mouth. Each completely spanned his physiognomy; one extending in a line with his eyes, another crossing the face in the vicinity of the nose, and the third sweeping along his lips from ear to ear. His countenance thus triply hooped, as it were, with tattooing, always reminded me of those unhappy wretches whom I have sometimes observed gazing out sentimentally from behind the grated bars of a prison window: whilst the entire body of my savage valet, covered all over with representations of birds and fishes, and a variety of most unaccountable-looking creatures, suggested to me the idea of a pictorial museum of natural history, or an illustrated copy of Goldsmith's Animated Nature. 2

But it seems really heartless in me to write thus of the poor islander, when I owe perhaps to his unremitting attentions the very existence I now enjoy. Kory-Kory, I mean thee no harm in what I say in regard to thy outward adornings; but they were a little curious to my unaccustomed sight, and therefore I dilate upon them. But to underrate or forget thy faithful services is something I could never be guilty of, even in the giddiest moment of my life.

The father of my attached follower was a native of gigantic frame, and had once possessed prodigious physical powers; but the lofty form was now yielding to the inroads of time, though the hand of disease seemed never to have been laid upon the aged warrior. Marheyo—for such was his name—appeared to have retired from all active participation in the affairs of the valley, seldom or never accompanying the natives in their various expeditions; and employing the greater part of his time in throwing up a little shed just outside the house, upon which he was engaged to my certain knowledge for four months, without appearing to make any sensible advance. I suppose the old gentleman was in his dotage, for he manifested in various ways the characteristics which mark this particular stage of life.

A starchy food prepared from taro root or breadfruit variously compounded; it is fermented and forms a glutinous paste.

&lt;sup>2</sup>a compilation produced by Oliver Goldsmith in 1774

I remember in particular his having a choice pair of ear-ornaments, fabricated from the teeth of some sea-monster. These he would alternately wear and take off at least fifty times in the course of the day, going and coming from his little hut on each occasion with all the tranquillity imaginable. Sometimes slipping them through the slits in his ears, he would seize his spear-which in length and slightness resembled a fishing-pole-and go stalking beneath the shadows of the neighboring groves, as if about to give a hostile meeting to some cannibal knight. But he would soon return again, and hiding his weapon under the projecting eaves of the house, and rolling his clumsy trinkets carefully in a piece of tappa, would resume his more pacific operations as quietly as if he had never interrupted them.

But despite his eccentricities, Marheyo was a most paternal and warm-hearted old fellow. and in this particular not a little resembled his son Kory-Kory. The mother of the latter was the mistress of the family, and a notable housewife, and a most industrious old lady she was. If she did not understand the art of making jellies, jams, custards, tea-cakes, and such like trashy affairs, she was profoundly skilled in the mysteries of preparing "amar," "poee-poee," and "kokoo," with other substantial matters. She was a genuine busy-body; bustling about the house like a country landlady at an unexpected arrival; forever giving the young girls tasks to perform, which the little hussies as often neglected; poking into every corner, and rummaging over bundles of old tappa, or making a prodigious clatter among the calabashes. Sometimes she might have been seen squatting upon her haunches in front of a huge wooden basin, and kneading poee-poee with terrific vehemence, dashing the stone pestle about as if she would shiver the vessel into fragments; on other occasions, galloping about the valley in search of a particular kind of leaf, used in To tell the truth, Kory-Kory's mother was the only industrious person in all the valley of Typee; and she could not have employed herself more actively had she been left an exceedingly muscular and destitute widow, with an inordinate supply of young children, in the bleakest part of the civilized world. There was not the slightest necessity for the greater portion of the labor performed by the old lady: but she seemed to work from some irresistible impulse; her limbs continually swaying to and fro, as if there were some indefatigable engine concealed within her body which kept her in perpetual motion.

Never suppose that she was a termagant or a shrew for all this; she had the kindliest heart in the world, and acted towards me in particular in a truly maternal manner, occasionally putting some little morsel of choice food into my hand, some outlandish kind of savage sweetmeat or pastry, like a doting mother petting a sickly urchin with tarts and sugar plums. Warm indeed are my remembrances of the dear, good, affectionate old Tinor!

Besides the individuals I have mentioned, there belonged to the household three young men, dissipated, good-for-nothing, roystering blades of savages, who were either employed in prosecuting love affairs with the maidens of the tribe, or grew boozy on "arva" <sup>2</sup> and tobacco in the company of congenial spirits, the scape-graces of the valley.

Among the permanent inmates of the house were likewise several lovely damsels, who instead of thrumming pianos and reading novels, like more enlightened young ladies, substituted for these employments the manufacture of a fine species of tappa; but for the greater portion of the time were skipping from house to house, gadding and gossiping with their acquaintances.

From the rest of these, however, I must except the beauteous nymph Fayaway, who was my peculiar favorite. Her free, pliant figure was the very perfection of female grace and beauty. Her complexion was a rich and mantling olive, and when watching the glow upon her cheeks I could almost swear that beneath the transparent medium there lurked the blushes of a faint vermilion. The face of this girl was a rounded oval, and each feature as perfectly formed as the heart or imagination of man could desire. Her full lips, when parted with a smile, disclosed teeth of a dazzling whiteness; some of her recondite operations, and returning home, toiling and sweating, with a bundle, under which most women would have sunk.

<sup>1</sup> articles of food

&lt;sup>2</sup> a fermented drink made from green cocoa-nut juice

and when her rosy mouth opened with a burst of merriment, they looked like the milk-white seeds of the "arta," a fruit of the valley, which, when cleft in twain, shows them reposing in rows on either side, imbedded in the red and iuicv pulp. Her hair of the deepest brown, parted irregularly in the middle, flowed in natural ringlets over her shoulders, and whenever she chanced to stoop, fell over and hid from view her levely bosom. Gazing into the depths of her strange blue eyes, when she was in a contemplative mood, they seemed most placid yet unfathomable; but when illuminated by some lively emotion, they beamed upon the beholder like stars. The hands of Fayaway were as soft and delicate as those of any countess: for an entire exemption from rude labor marks the girlhood and even prime of a Typee woman's life. Her feet, though wholly exposed, were as diminutive and fairly shaped as those which peep from beneath the skirts of a Lima lady's dress. The skin of this young creature, from continual ablutions and the use of mollifying ointments, was inconceivably smooth and soft.

I may succeed, perhaps, in particularizing some of the individual features of Fayaway's beauty, but that general loveliness of appearance which they all contributed to produce I will not attempt to describe. The easy unstudied graces of a child of nature like this, breathing from infancy an atmosphere of perpetual summer, and nurtured by the simple fruits of the earth; enjoying a perfect freedom from care and anxiety, and removed effectually from all injurious tendencies, strike the eye in a manner which cannot be portrayed. This picture is no fancy sketch; it is drawn from the most vivid recollections of the person delineated.

Were I asked if the beauteous form of Fayaway was altogether free from the hideous blemish of tattooing, I should be constrained to answer that it was not. But the practitioners of this barbarous art, so remorseless in their inflictions upon the brawny limbs of the warriors of the tribe, seem to be conscious that it needs not the resources of their profession to augment the charms of the maidens of the vale.

The females are very little embellished in this way, and Fayaway, and all the other young girls of her age, were even less so than those of their sex more advanced in years. The reason of this peculiarity will be alluded to hereafter. All the tattooing that the nymph in question exhibited upon her person may be easily described. Three minute dots, no bigger than pin-heads, decorated either lip, and at a little distance were not at all discernible. Just upon the fall of the shoulder were drawn two parallel lines half an inch apart, and perhaps three inches in length, the interval being filled with delicately executed figures. These narrow bands of tattooing, thus placed, always reminded me of those stripes of gold lace worn by officers in undress, and which are in lieu of epaulettes to denote their rank.

Thus much was Fayaway tattooed. The audacious hand which had gone so far in its desecrating work stopping short, apparently wanting the heart to proceed.

But I have omitted to describe the dress worn by this nymph of the valley.

Favawav-I must avow the fact-for the most part clung to the primitive and summer garb of Eden. But how becoming the costume! It showed her fine figure to the best possible advantage: and nothing could have been better adapted to her peculiar style of beauty. On ordinary occasions she was habited precisely as I have described the two youthful savages whom we had met on first entering the valley. At other times, when rambling among the groves, or visiting at the houses of her acquaintances, she wore a tunic of white tappa, reaching from her waist to a little below the knees: and when exposed for any length of time to the sun, she invariably protected herself from its rays by a floating mantle of the same material, loosely gathered about the person. Her gala dress will be described hereafter.

As the beauties of our own land delight in bedecking themselves with fanciful articles of jewelry, suspending them from their ears, hanging them about their necks, and clasping them around their wrists; so Fayaway and her companions were in the habit of ornamenting themselves with similar appendages.

Flora was their jeweler. Sometimes they wore necklaces of small carnation flowers, strung like rubies upon a fiber of tappa, or displayed in their ears a single white bud, the stem thrust backward through the aperture, and showing in front the delicate petals folded together in a beautiful sphere, and looking like a drop of the purest pearl. Chaplets too, resembling in their arrangement the strawberry coronal worn by an English peeress, and composed of intertwined leaves and blossoms, often crowned their temples; and bracelets and anklets of the same tasteful pattern were frequently to be seen. Indeed, the maidens of the island were passionately fond of flowers, and never wearied of decorating their persons with them; a lovely trait in their character, and one that ere long will be more fully alluded to.

Though in my eyes, at least, Fayaway was indisputably the loveliest female I saw in Typee, yet the description I have given of her will in some measure apply to nearly all the youthful portion of her sex in the valley. Judge ye then, reader, what beautiful creatures they must have been

1846

BAYARD TAYLOR 1825-1878

Taylor was born in Chester County, Pennsylvania, apprenticed as a printer, and began early to contribute to newspapers. He went to Europe as a special writer for the New York Tribune, traveling afoot all over western Europe, 1844-1846, visited California during the gold excitement, and later nearly all the countries of the civilized world. He had a diplomatic post at Petrograd, 1862-1863, and had but recently been appointed minister to Germany when he died. Aside from many books of travel between 1846 and 1869, notably Views Afoot. 1846; El Dorado, 1850; and Greece and Russia, 1859. Taylor produced Ximena (poem), 1844; Rhymes of Travel, 1848; Translation of Faust, 1870-1871; Lars: A Pastoral of Norway, 1873; Studies in German Literature, 1879.

His appeal to his countrymen was first as a traveler and lecturer. His journeys were eagerly followed in newspapers and books by isolated men and women hungry for news of countries and peoples of the modern world; and though it is said that he traveled farther and saw less than any other American wanderer, his lectures upon his travels were everywhere crowded. A second appeal, made to another class of people, was through his excellent translation of Faust, in which he aided in the introduction of German literature to America. Taylor was too versatile and worked too rapidly for lasting results. His poetry though vigorous is diffuse and lacks high imagination. Changes in literary reputation are well illustrated in Taylor's case, for many of his contemporaries ranked him among the foremost American men of letters.

Biography and criticism: A. H. Smythe, Bayard Taylor (AML); M. Hansen and H. Scudder, Life and Letters of Bayard Taylor, 2 vols. 1884; H. W. Mabie, "Bayard Taylor: Adventurer," Bookm. 43:51-9; R. Armstrong, "Bayard Taylor's Romance," Bookm. 42:270-5; "Memories of Bayard Taylor," Dial 39:200-2.

From VIEWS A-FOOT CHAPTER XXX

PASSAGE OF THE ST. GOTHARD

Leaving Amstegg, I passed the whole day among snowy, sky-piercing Alps, torrents, chasms, and clouds! The clouds appeared to be breaking up as we set out, and the white top of the Reussberg was now and then visible in the sky. Just above the village are the remains of Zwing Uri, the castle begun by the tyrant Gessler. 1 for the complete subjugation of the canton. Following the Reuss up through a narrow valley. we passed the Bristenstock, which lifts its jagged crags nine thousand feet in the air, while on the other side stand the snowy summits which lean towards the Rhone Glacier and St. Gothard. From the deep glen where the Reuss foamed down towards the Lake of the Forest Cantons, the mountains rose with a majestic sweep so far into the sky that the brain grew dizzy in following their outlines. Woods, chalets. and slopes of herbage covered their bases, where the mountain cattle and goats were browsing. while the herd-boys sang their native melodies or woke the ringing echoes with the loud, sweet sounds of their wooden horns; higher up, the sides were broken into crass and covered with stunted pines; then succeeded a belt of bare rock with a little snow lying in the crevices, and the summits of dazzling white looked out from the clouds half-way to the zenith. Sometimes when the vale was filled with clouds it was startling to see them parting around a solitary summit, apparently isolated in the air at an immense height, for the mountain to which it belonged was hidden to the very base!

The road passed from one side of the valley to the other, crossing the Reuss on bridges sometimes ninety feet high. After three or four hours' walking, we reached a frightful pass called the Schöllenen. So narrow is the defile that before reaching it, the road seemed to enter directly into the mountain. Precipices a thousand feet high tower above, and the stream roars and boils in the black depth below. The road is a wonder of art; it winds around the edge of horrible chasms or is carried on lofty arches across, with sometimes a hold apparently so frail that one involuntarily shudders. At a place called the Devil's Bridge, the Reuss leaps about seventy feet in three or four cascades, sending up a continual cloud of spray, while a wind created by the fall, blows and whirls around, with a force that nearly lifts one from his feet.

Beyond the Devil's Bridge, the mountains which nearly touched before, interlock into each other, and a tunnel three hundred and seventy-five feet long leads through the rock into the vale of Urseren, surrounded by the Upper Alps. The little town of Andermatt lies in the middle of this valley, which with the peaks around is covered with short, yellowish-brown grass. We met near Amstegg a little Italian boy walking home from Germahy, quite alone and without money, for we saw him give his last kreutzer to a blind beggar along the road. We therefore took him with us, as he was afraid to cross the St. Gothard alone.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The tyrant whom William Tell defied; the story is now thought to be legendary.

After refreshing ourselves at Andermatt, we started, five in number, including a German student, for the St. Gothard. Behind the village of Hospiz, which stands at the bottom of the valley leading to Realp and the Furca pass, the way commences winding backwards and forwards, higher and higher, through a valley covered with rocks, with the mighty summits of the Alps around, untenanted save by the chamois and mountain eagle. Not a tree was to be seen. The sides of the mountains were covered with loose rocks waiting for the next rain to wash them down, and the tops were robed in eternal snow. A thick cloud rolled over us as we went on, following the diminishing brooks to their snowy source in the peak of St. Gothard. We cut off the bends of the road by footpaths up the rocks, which we ascended in single file, little Pietro with his staff and bundle bringing up the The rarefied air we breathed, seven thousand feet above the sea, was like exhilarat-We felt no fatigue, but ran and shouted and threw snowballs, in the middle of August!

After three hours' walk we reached the two clear and silent lakes which send their waters to the Adriatic and the North Sea. Here as we looked down on the Italian side, the sky became clear; we saw the top of St. Gothard many thousand feet above, and stretching to the south the summits of the mountains which guard the vales of the Ticino and the Adda. The former monastery 1 has been turned into an inn; there is, however, a kind of church attached, attended by a single monk. It was so cold that although late, we determined to descend to the first village. The Italian side is very steep, and the road, called the Via Trimola, is like a thread dropped down and constantly doubling back upon itself. The deep chasms were filled with snow, although exposed to the full force of the sun, and for a long distance there was scarcely a sign of vegetation.

I thought as we went down, that every step was bringing me nearer to a sunnier land—that the glories of Italy, which had so long lain in the airy background of the future, would soon spread themselves before me in their real or imagined beauty. Reaching at dusk the last height above the vale of the Ticino, we saw the little village of Airolo with its musical name, lying in a hollow of the mountains. A few minutes of leaping, sliding, and rolling, took us down the grassy declivity, and we found we had descended from the top in an hour and a half, although the distance by the road is nine miles! I need not say how glad we were to relieve our trembling knees and exhausted limbs.

When, at night, I looked out of my chamberwindow, the silver moon of Italy, (for we fancied that her light was softer and that the skies were already bluer) hung trembling above the fields of snow that stretched in their wintry brilliance along the mountains around. I heard the roar of the Ticino and the deepened sound of falling cascades, and thought, if I were to take those waters for my guide, to what glorious places they would lead me!

We left Airolo early the next morning, to continue our journey down the valley of the Ticino. The mists and clouds of Switzerland were exchanged for a sky of the purest blue, and we felt, for the first time in ten days, uncomfortably warm. The mountains which flank the Alps on this side, are still giants—lofty and bare, and covered with snow in many places. The limit of the German dialect is on the summit of St. Gothard, and the peasants saluted us with a "buon giorno," 2 as they passed. This, with the clearness of the skies and the warmth of the air, made us feel that Italy was growing nearer.

On our first day's journey we passed through two terrific mountain gorges, almost equaling in grandeur the defile of the Devil's Bridge. The Ticino, in its course to Lago Maggiore, has to make a descent of nearly three thousand feet. passing through three valleys, which lie like terraces, one below the other. In passing from one to the other, it forces its way in twenty cataracts through a cleft in the mountains. The road, constructed with the umost labor, threads these dark chasms, sometimes carried in a tunnel through the rock, sometimes passing on arches above the boiling flood. I here noticed a very beautiful effect of the water, perhaps attributable to some mineral substance it contained. The spray and foam thrown up in the dashing of the vexed current, was of a light, delicate pink, although the stream itself was a soft blue; and the contrast of these two colors was very remarkable.

As we kept on, however, there was a very perceptible change in the scenery. The gloomy pines disappeared and the mountains were covered in their stead, with picturesque chestnut trees, with leaves of a shining green. The grass and vegetation were much more luxuriant than on the other side of the Alps, and fields of maize and mulberry orchards covered the valley. We saw the people busy at work reeling silk in the villages. Every mile we advanced made a sensible change in the vegetation. The chestnuts were larger, the maize higher, the few straggling grapevines increased into bowers and vineyards, while the gardens were filled with plum, pear, and fig-trees, and the display of delicious fruit which we saw in the villages, gave us promise of the luxuriance that was to come.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The hospice there dates from the fourteenth century.

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;Good day."

The vineyards are much more beautiful than the German fields of stakes. 1 The vines are not trimmed, but grow from year to year over a frame higher than the head, supported through the whole field on stone pillars. They interlace and form a complete leafy screen, while the clusters hang below. The light came dimly through the green, transparent leaves, and nothing was wanting to make them real bowers of Arcadia. Although we were still in Switzerland. the people began to have that lazy indolent look which characterizes the Italians; most of the occupations were carried on in the open air. and brown-robed, sandaled friars were going about from house to house, collecting money and provisions for their support.

We passed Faido and Giornico, near which last village are the remains of an old castle, supposed to have been built by the ancient Gauls, and stopped for the night at Cresciano, which being entirely Italian, we had an opportunity to put in practice the few words we had picked up from Pietro. The little fellow had parted from us with regret a few hours before, at Biasco, where he had relations. The rustic landlord at Cresciano was an honest young fellow, who tried to serve us as well as he could, but we made some ludicrous mistakes through our ignorance of the language.

Three hours' walk brought us to Bellinzona, the capital of the canton. Before reaching it, our road joined that of the Splügen which comes down through the valley of Bernardino. From the bridge where the junction takes place we had a triple view, the grandeur of which took me by surprise, even after coming from Switzerland. We stood at the union of three valleys—that leading to St. Gothard, terminated by the glaciers of the Bernese Oberland, that running off obliquely to the Splügen, and finally the broad vale of the Ticino, extending to Lago Maggiore, whose purple mountains closed the vista. Each valley was perhaps two miles broad and from twenty to thirty long, and the mountains that enclosed them from five to seven thousand feet in height, so you may perhaps form some idea what a view down three such avenues in this Alpine temple would be.

We left Bellinzona at noon, and saw, soon after, from an eminence, the blue line of Lago Maggiore stretched across the bottom of the valley. We saw sunset fade away over the lake, but it was clouded, and did not realize my ideal of such a scene in Italy. A band of wild Italians paraded up and down the village, drawing one of their number in a hand-cart. They made a great noise with a drum and trumpet, and were received everywhere with shouts of laughter. A great jug of wine was not wanting, and the whole seemed to me a very characteristic scene.

We were early awakened at Magadino, at the head of Lago Maggiore, and after swallowing a hasty breakfast, went on board the steamboat San Carlo, for Sesto Calende. We got under way at six o'clock, and were soon in motion over the crystal mirror. The water is of the loveliest green hue, and so transparent that we seemed to be floating in mid-air. Another heaven arched far below us; other chains of mountains joined their bases to those which surrounded the lake. and the mirrored cascades leaped upward to meet their originals at the surface. It may be because I have seen it more recently, that the water of Lago Maggiore appears to me the most beautiful in the world. I was delighted with the Scotch lakes, and enraptured with the Traunsee and "Zurich's waters," but this last exceeds them both. I am now incapable of any stronger feeling, until I see the Egean from the Grecian

The morning was cloudy, and the white wreaths hung low on the mountains, whose rocky sides were covered everywhere with the rank and luxuriant growth of this climate. As we advanced further over this glorious mirror, the houses became more Italian-like; the lower stories rested on arched passages, and the windows were open, without glass, while in the gardens stood the solemn, graceful cypress, and vines, heavy with ripening grapes, hung from bough to bough through the mulberry orchards. Half-way down, in a broad bay, which receives the waters of a stream that descends with the Simplon, are the celebrated Borromean Islands. They are four in number, and seem to float like fairy creations on the water, while the lofty hills form a background whose grandeur enhances by contrast their exquisite beauty.

<sup>1</sup> stakes for supporting the vines

On passing by Isola Madre, we could see the roses in its terraced gardens and the broadleaved aloes clinging to the rocks. Isola Bella. the loveliest of them all, as its name denotes. was farther off; it rose like a pyramid from the water, terrace above terrace to the summit, and its gardens of never fading foliage, with the glorious panorama around, might make it a paradise, if life were to be dreamed away. On the northern side of the bay lies a large town with a lofty Romanesque tower, and noble mountains sweep around as if to shut out the world from such a scene. The lake was perfectly calm, and groves and gardens slept mirrored in the dark green wave, while the Alps rose afar through the dim, cloudy air. Towards the other end the hills sink lower, and slope off into the plains of Lombardy. Near Arona, on the western side, is a large monastery, overlooking the lower part of the lake. Beside it, on a hill, is a colossal statue of San Carlo Borromeo, who gave his name to the lovely islands above.

After a seven hours' passage, we ran into Sesto Calende, at the foot of the lake. Here passengers and baggage were tumbled promiscuously on shore, the latter gathered into the office to be examined, and the former left at liberty to ramble about an hour until their passports could be signed. We employed the time in trying the flavor of the grapes and peaches of Lombardy, and in looking at the groups of travelers who had come down from the Alps with the annual avalanche at this season. The custom house officers were extremely civil and obliging, as they did not think it necessary to examine our knapsacks, and our passports being soon signed, we were at liberty to enter again into the dominions of His Majesty of Austria. Our companion, the German, whose feet could carry him no further, took a seat on the top of a diligence for Milan; we left Sesto Calende on foot, and plunged into the cloud of dust which was whirling towards the capital of Northern Italy.

We spent the night at the little village of Casina, about sixteen miles from Milan, and here made our first experience of the honesty of Italian inns. We had taken the precaution to inquire beforehand the price of a bed; but it seemed unnecessary and unpleasant, as well as evincing a mistrustful spirit, to do the same with every article we asked for, so we decided to leave it to the host's conscience not to overcharge us. Imagine our astonishment, however, when at starting, a bill was presented to us, in which the smallest articles were set down at three or four times their value. We remonstrated, but to little purpose; the fellow knew scarcely any French, and we as little Italian, so rather than lose time and temper, we paid what he demanded and went on, leaving him to laugh at the successful imposition.

About noon, the road turned into a broad and beautiful avenue of poplars, down which we saw, at a distance, the triumphal arch terminating the Simplon road, which we had followed from Sesto Calende. Beyond it rose the slight and airy pinnacle of the Duomo. <sup>1</sup> We passed by the exquisite structure, gave up our pasports at the gates, traversed the broad Piazzi d'Armi, and found ourselves at liberty to choose one of the dozen streets that led into the heart of the city.

1846

BEDOUIN SONG

From the Desert I come to thee
On a stallion shod with fire;
And the winds are left behind
In the speed of my desire.
Under thy window I stand,
And the midnight hears my cry:
I love thee, I love but thee,
With a love that shall not die
Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment
Book unfold!

10

Look from thy window and see
My passion and my pain;
I lie on the sands below,
And I faint in thy disdain.
Let the night-winds touch thy brow
With the heat of my burning sigh,
And melt thee to hear the vow
Of a love that shall not die
Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment
Book unfold!

20

My steps are nightly driven,
By the fever in my breast,
To hear from thy lattice breathed
The word that shall give me rest.
Open the door of thy heart,

<sup>1</sup> the Gothic cathedral of Milan

And open thy chamber door,
And my kisses shall teach thy lips
The love that shall fade no more
Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment
Book unfold!

1853

TO THE NILE

Mysterious flood,—that through the silent sands Hast wandered, century on century, Watering the length of great Egyptian lands, Which were not, but for thee,—

Art thou the keeper of that eldest lore, Written ere yet thy hieroglyphs began, When dawned upon thy fresh, untrampled shore The earliest life of man?

Thou guardest temple and vast pyramid,
Where the gray past records its ancient speech;

But in thine unrevealing breast lies hid What they refuse to teach.

All other streams with human joys and fears Run blended, o'er the plains of history: Thou tak'st no note of man; a thousand years Are as a day to thee.

What were to thee the Osirian <sup>1</sup> festivals? Or Memnon's <sup>2</sup> music on the Theban plain? The carnage, when Cambyses <sup>3</sup> made thy halls Ruddy with royal slain? <sup>20</sup>

Even then thou wast a God, and shrines were

For worship of thine own majestic flood; For thee the incense burned,—for thee was spilt The sacrificial blood.

And past the bannered pylons 4 that arose
Above thy palms, the pageantry and state,
Thy current flowed, calmly as now it flows,
Unchangeable as fate.

Thou givest blessings as a God might give, Whose being is his bounty: from the slime 30

Osiris was an Egyptian deity.
 Memnon was a Greek solar hero, son of the dawn.
 The G eeks gave his name to a colossal statue near Thebes that was said to give forth a musical note when struck by the rays of the rising sun.

when struck by the rays of the rising sun.

Cambyses III, King of Persia, conquered Egypt 525 B.C. and is said to have caused the murder of the king Psammetichus III.

4 massive gateways

Shaken from off thy skirts the nations live, Through all the years of time.

In thy solemnity, thine awful calm,
Thy grand indifference of destiny,
My soul forgets its pain, and drinks' the balm
Which thou dost proffer me.

Thy godship is unquestioned still: I bring
No doubtful worship to thy shrine supreme;

But thus my homage as a chaplet fling, To float upon thy stream!

40 1855

10

20

30

ARTEL IN THE CLOVEN PINE 5

Now the frosty stars are gone:
I have watched them one by one,
Fading on the shores of Dawn.
Round and full the glorious sun
Walks with level step the spray,
Through his vestibule of Day,
While the wolves that late did howl
Slink to dens and coverts foul,
Guarded by the demon owl,
Who, last night, with mocking croon,
Wheeled athwart the chilly moon,
And with eyes that blankly glared
On my direful torment stared.

The lark is flickering in the light; Still the nightingale doth sing;— All the isle, alive with spring, Lies, a jewel of delight, On the blue sea's heaving breast: Not a breath from out the west. But some balmy smell doth bring From the sprouting myrtle buds, Or from meadowy vales that lie Like a green inverted sky, Which the yellow cowslip stars, And the bloomy almond woods, Cloud-like, cross with roseate bars. All is life that I can spy, To the farthest sea and sky, And my own the only pain Within this ring of Tyrrhene 6 main.

<sup>6</sup> Ariel, the spirit of the air in Shakespeare's Tempest, had been imprisoned in a pine by the witch Sycorax.

"Thou . . . wast then her servant;
And, for thou wast a spirit too delicate
To act her earthy amd abhorr'd commands,
Refusing her grand hests, she did confine thee,
By help of her more potent ministers
And in her most unmitigable rage,
Into a cloven pine; within which rift
Imprison'd thou didst painfully remain
A dozen years";

The Tempest I, ii, 270 6 that part of the Mediterranean west of Italy

90

10

20

30

In the gnarled and cloven Pine Where the hell-born hag did chain me, All this orb of cloudless shine. All this youth in Nature's veins Tingling with the season's wine. With a sharper torment pain me. Pansies in soft April rains Fill their stalks with honeved sap Drawn from Earth's prolific lap: But the sluggish blood she brings To the tough Pine's hundred rings, Closer locks their cruel hold. Closer draws the scaly bark Round the crevice, damp and cold, Where my useless wings I fold,— Sealing me in iron dark. By this coarse and alien state Is my dainty essence wronged; Finer senses that belonged To my freedom, chafe at Fate, Till the happier elves I hate, Who in moonlight dances turn Underneath the palmy fern, Or in light and twinkling bands Follow on with linked hands To the Ocean's yellow sands.

Primrose-eyes each morning ope In their cool, deep beds of grass; Violets make the airs that pass Telltales of their fragrant slope. I can see them where they spring Never brushed by fairy wing. All those corners I can spy In the island's solitude. Where the dew is never dry, Nor the miser bees intrude. Cups of rarest hue are there, Full of perfumed wine undrained,— Mushroom banquets, ne'er profaned, Canopied by maiden-hair. Pearls I see upon the sands. Never touched by other hands, And the rainbow bubbles shine On the ridged and frothy brine, Tenantless of voyager Till they burst in vacant air. O, the songs that sung might be, And the mazy dances woven, Had that witch ne'er crossed the sea And the Pine been never cloven!

Many years my direst pain Has made the wave-rocked isle complain Winds, that from the Cyclades <sup>1</sup> Came, to blow in wanton riot Round its shore's enchanted quiet, Bore my wailings on the seas: Sorrowing birds in autumn went Through the world with my lament. Still the bitter fate is mine, All delight unshared to see, Smarting in the cloven Pine, While I wait the tardy axe Which, perchance, shall set me free From the damned Witch Sycorax.

THE SONG OF THE CAMP

"Give us a song!" the soldiers cried,
The outer trenches guarding,
When the heated guns of the camps allied <sup>2</sup>
Grew weary of bombarding.

The dark Redan, <sup>3</sup> in silent scoff,
Lay, grim and threatening, under;
And the tawny mound of Malakoff
No longer belched its thunder.

There was a pause. A guardsman said, "We storm the forts tomorrow; Sing while we may, another day Will bring enough of sorrow."

They lay along the battery's side,
Below the smoking cannon:
Brave hearts, from Severn and from Clyde,
And from the banks of Shannon.

They sang of love, and not of fame; Forgot was Britain's glory: Each heart recalled a different name, But all sang "Annie Lawrie."

Voice after voice caught up the song, Until its tender passion Rose like an anthem, rich and strong,— Their battle-eve confession.

Dear girl, her name he dared not speak, But, as the song grew louder, Something upon the soldier's cheek Washed off the stains of powder.

Beyond the darkening ocean burned
The bloody sunset's embers,
While the Crimean valleys learned
How English love remembers.

In the Crimean war, 1853-1856, to which the poem refers, France and England were allied with Turkey and Sardinia against Russia.
 The Redan and the Malakoff were fortifications of Sebastopol finally captured by the allies.

<sup>1</sup> islands in the Aegean Sea

And once again a fire of hell
Rained on the Russian quarters,
With scream of shot, and burst of shell,
And bellowing of the mortars!

And Irish Nora's eyes are dim
For a singer, dumb and gory;
And English Mary mourns for him
Who sang of "Annie Lawrie."

Sleep, soldiers! still in honored rest Your truth and valor wearing: The bravest are the tenderest,— The loving are the daring.

THOMAS BUCHANAN READ 1822-1872

Born in Chester County, Pennsylvania, Read died in New York City. After working at various handicrafts, he studied art, settling for a while at Rome, and making portrait painting a specialty. He published poems at various dates from 1847 to 1867, including The House by the Sea, 1855, and The Wagoner of the Alleghanies, 1862. Today Read is chiefly known as the author of the popular ballad-lyric that follows.

SHERIDAN'S RIDE

Up from the south, at break of day, Bringing to Winchester <sup>1</sup> fresh dismay, The affrighted air with a shudder bore. Like a herald in haste, to the chieftain's door, The terrible grumble and rumble and roar, Telling the battle was on once more, And Sheridan twenty miles away.

And wider still those billows of war
Thundered along the horizon's bar,
And louder yet into Winchester rolled
The roar of that red sea, uncontrolled,
Making the blood of the listener cold
As he thought of the stake in that fiery fray,
And Sheridan twenty miles away.

But there is a road from Winchester town, A good broad highway leading down; And there, through the flush of the morning light.

A steed as black as the steeds of night
Was seen to pass as with eagle flight,
As if he knew the terrible need:

He stretched away with his utmost speed;

<sup>1</sup> Although the poem is not historically accurate, it is true that Sheridan's presence saved the day at the battle of Winchester (or Opequan), September 19-20, 1864. See Sheridan's Memoirs, Vol. II, Ch. 3. Hills rose and fell, but his heart was gay, With Sheridan fifteen miles away.

Still sprung from those swift hoofs, thundering south,

The dust, like smoke from the cannon's mouth Or the trail of a comet, sweeping faster and

Foreboding to traitors the doom of disaster; The heart of the steed and the heart of the

Were beating like prisoners assaulting their walls,

Impatient to be where the battlefield calls: Every nerve of the charger was strained to full play.

With Sheridan only ten miles away.

Under his spurning feet the road Like an arrowy Alpine river flowed; And the landscape sped away behind Like an ocean flying before the wind; And the steed, like a bark fed with furnace ire, Swept on with his wild eye full of fire. But lo, he is nearing his heart's desire; He is snuffing the smoke of the roaring fray, 40 With Sheridan only five miles away.

The first that the general saw were the groups Of stragglers, and then the retreating troops, What was done? what to do? a glance told him both:

Then striking his spurs, with a terrible oath, He dashed down the line 'mid a storm of

And the wave of retreat checked its course there, because

The sight of the master compelled it to pause. With foam and with dust the black charger was gray;

By the flash of his eye and the red nostril's play

He seemed to the whole great army to say, "I have brought you Sheridan, all the way From Winchester, down to save the day!"

Hurrah, hurrah, for Sheridan!
Hurrah, hurrah, for horse and man!
And when their statues are placed on high,
Under the dome of the Union sky
(The American soldiers' Temple of Fame),
There with the glorious general's name,
Be it said, in letters both bold and bright,
"Here is the steed that saved the day
By carrying Sheridan into the fight,

From Winchester, twenty miles away!"

1865

10

20

30

GEORGE HENRY BOKER 1823-1890

Boker was born and died in Philadelphia. He was graduated from Princeton College in 1842 and then studied law, but did not practice. From 1871 to 1875 he was minister to Turkey, and from 1875 to 1879 minister to Russia. From 1848 to 1886 he was engaged in literary work, producing many poems and plays.

DIRGE FOR A SOLDIER 1

Close his eyes: his work is done! What to him is friend or foeman. Rise of moon, or set of sun, Hand of man, or kiss of woman? Lay him low, lay him low, In the clover or the snow! What cares he? he cannot know: Lav him low!

As man may, he fought his fight, Proved his truth by his endeavor: Let him sleep in solemn night, Sleep forever and forever. Lav him low, lav him low, In the clover or the snow! What cares he? he cannot know: Lay him low!

Fold him in his country's stars. Roll the drum and fire the volley! What to him are all our wars? What but death bemocking folly? Lay him low, lay him low, In the clover or the snow! What cares he? he cannot know: Lay him low!

Leave him to God's watching eye; Trust him to the hand that made him. Mortal love weeps idly by; God alone has power to aid him. Lay him low, lay him low. In the clover or the snow! What cares he? he cannot know: Lav him low!

1862

RICHARD HENRY STODDARD 1825-1903

For an intimate account of Stoddard's early struggles, varied experiences, and numerous friends, one should turn to his Recollections Personal and Literary, 1903. He was born in Hingham, Massachusetts, son of a sea captain lost at sea. He went

1 General Philip Kearney, killed at Chantilly, Va., September 1, 1862

as a boy to New York, attended public schools for a time, and at twenty-one was molder in a foundry. All this time he was also serving his literary apprenticeship, reading widely and writing

Before long this self-made man was intimate with Taylor, Read, Hawthorne, and other influential men of letters, wrote for magazines and newspapers, and was literary editor of the New York World and the Mail and Express. He died in New Stoddard was essavist, biographer, and critic, but was best known for his lyric poetry. Though he was not a major poet, his verse is characterized by spontaneity, freshness, melody, and simplicity of diction.

Criticism: E. C. Stedman, Genius and Other Essays, 141-53; 166-73; also Putnam's 1:18-21; S. W. Halsey, American Authors, 17-27; S. H. Ward, "The Last of the Stoddards," Ind. 55: 1202-5; "Richard Henry Stoddard," Outlook 74: 216-8. See also Dial 35:299-301; Atlan. 93:82-3; Harbers 108:479-81.

SILENT SONGS

If I could ever sing the songs Within me day and night. The only fit accompaniment Would be a lute of light!

A thousand dreamy melodies. Begot with pleasant pain, Like incantations float around The chambers of my brain!

But when I strive to utter one. It mocks my feeble art. And leaves me silent, with the thorns Of Music in my heart! 1852

THE SEA

[STORM]

Through the night, through the night, In the saddest unrest, Wrapt in white, all in white, With her babe on her breast. Walks the mother so pale, Staring out on the gale, Through the night!

Through the night, through the night, Where the sea lifts the wreck. 10 Land in sight, close in sight, On the surf-flooded deck Stands the father so brave. Driving on to his grave. Through the night!

1852

10

10

1854

1857

OUT TO SEA

The wind is blowing east, And the waves are running free; Let's hoist the sail at once, And stand out to sea, (You and me.) I am growing more and more A-weary of the shore; It was never so before-Out to sea!

The wind is blowing east. How it swells the straining sail! A little further out We shall have a jolly gale. (Cling to me.) The waves are running high, And the gulls, how they fly! We shall only see the sky Out to sea.

The wind is blowing east From the dark and bloody shore, Where flash a million swords, And the dreadful cannon roar. (Woe is me.) There's a curse upon the land. (Is that blood upon my hand?) What can we do but stand Out to sea?

BIRDS

Birds are singing round my window, Tunes the sweetest ever heard, And I hang my cage there daily, But I never catch a bird.

So with thoughts my brain is peopled, And they sing there all day long: But they will not fold their pinions In the little cage of song! 1857

THE SKY

The sky is a drinking cup, That was overturned of old, And it pours in the eyes of men Its wine of airy gold!

We drink that wine all day, Till the last drop is drained up, And are lighted off to bed By the jewels in the cup!

THERE ARE GAINS FOR ALL OUR LOSSES 1

There are gains for all our losses, There are balms for all our pain: But when youth, the dream, departs, It takes something from our hearts, And it never comes again.

We are stronger, and are better, Under manhood's sterner reign: Still we feel that something sweet Followed youth, with flying feet, And will never come again.

Something beautiful is vanished, And we sigh for it in vain: We behold it everywhere, On the earth, and in the air, But it never comes again!

ADSUM<sup>2</sup>

DECEMBER 23-24, 1863

The Angel came by night, (Such angels still come down), And like a winter cloud Passed over London town; Along its lonesome streets, Where Want had ceased to weep, Until it reached a house Where a great man lay asleep: The man of all his time Who knew the most of men, The soundest head and heart, The sharpest, kindest pen. It paused beside his bed, And whispered in his ear; He never turned his head, But answered, "I am here."

Into the night they went. At morning, side by side, They gained the sacred Place Where the greatest Dead abide. Where grand old Homer sits In godlike state benign; Where broods in endless thought The awful Florentine; Where sweet Cervantes walks, A smile on his grave face;

<sup>1</sup> This poem was later entitled "The Flight of Youth."
<sup>2</sup> "I am here"; an answer to a roll-call; the poem refers to the death of Thackeray. See note 1, p. 247.

1857

10

10

20

Where gossips quaint Montaigne. The wisest of his race: Where Goethe looks through all With that calm eve of his: Where-little seen but Light-The only Shakespeare is! When the new Spirit came, They asked him, drawing near "Art thou become like us?" He answered, "I am here."

1863

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS 1824-1892

On account of his generous, whole-hearted devotion to the service of literature and his country. Curtis deserves a twofold recognition. He was born in Providence, Rhode Island, of a family in good circumstances, and was privately educated. He was for a time at the Brook Farm community. Then he lived in Concord, on terms of intimacy with its famous men, and influenced by the theories of Emerson and Thoreau. He helped Thoreau build his hut at Walden Pond. Proving unsuited to commercial life, he roamed for four years through Europe and the East, preserving his impressions in Nile Notes of a Howadji, 1851, and Lotus Eating,

After 1852 he was connected with New York periodicals-The Tribune, Putnam's Monthly, Harpers Magazine, and Harpers Weekly-and was an influential shaper of public opinion, writing and lecturing widely against slavery and for Civil Service reform. His writing is a delightful mingling of humorous effects and exquisite ideals; the chief titles are Potiphar Papers, 1853; Prue and I, 1856; From the Easy Chair, 1891-1894; Orations and Addresses, 1893-1894. His friend William Winter characterized him as "the illustrious orator, the wise and gentle philosopher, the serene and delicate artist, the incorruptible patriot, the supreme gentleman."

Biography: E. Cary, (AML) 1894. Criticism: W. Winter, G. W. Curtis, a Eulogy, 1893; in Old Friends, 223-74; E. E. Hale, in Five Prophets of Today, 1892; Payne; L. H. Vincent, in American Literary Masters, 417-35; C. Schurz, "George William Curtis, Friend of the Republic," McClure 23: 614-23; H. M. Alden, Cur. Lit. 36:237-8; "Some Early Letters of George William Curtis," Atlan. 114:363-76; "War-time Letters of Charles Eliot Norton to George William Curtis," Atlan. 110:

597-614.

From PRUE AND I

A WORD TO THE GENTLE READER

An old bookkeeper, who wears a white cravat and black trousers in the morning, who rarely goes to the opera, and never dines out, is clearly a person of no fashion and of no superior sources of information. His only journey is from his house to his office: his only satisfaction is in doing his duty; his only happiness is in his Prue and his children.

What romance can such a life have? What stories can such a man tell?

Yet I think, sometimes, when I look up from the parquet at the opera, and see Aurelia smiling in the boxes, and holding her court of love, and youth, and beauty, that the historians have not told of a fairer queen, nor the travelers seen devouter homage. And when I remember that it was in misty England that quaint old George Herbert sang of the-

> Sweet day so cool, so calm, so bright The bridall of the earth and skie. 1

I am sure that I see days as lovely in our clearer air, and do not believe that Italian sunsets have a more gorgeous purple or a softer gold.

So, as the circle of my little life revolves, I console myself with believing, what I cannot help believing, that a man need not be a vagabond to enjoy the sweetest charm of travel, but that all countries and all times repeat themselves in his experience. This is an old philosophy, I am told, and much favored by those who have traveled; and I cannot but be glad that my faith has such a fine name and such competent witnesses. I am assured, however, upon the other hand, that such a faith is only imagination. But, if that be true, imagination is as good as many voyages—and how much cheaper! —a consideration which an old bookkeeper can never afford to forget.

I have not found, in my experience, that travelers always bring back with them the sunshine of Italy or the elegance of Greece. They tell us that there are such things, and that they have seen them; but, perhaps, they saw them, as the apples in the garden of the Hesperides 2 were sometimes seen—over the wall. I prefer the fruit which I can buy in the market to that which a man tells me he saw in Sicily, but of which there is no flavor in his story. Others, like Moses Primrose, 3 bring us a gross of such spectacles as we prefer not to see; so that I begin to suspect a man must have Italy and Greece in his heart and mind, if he would ever see them with his eyes.

 &lt;sup>1</sup> from "Virtue," by the English poet Herbert, 1593-1633
 <sup>3</sup> maidens who guarded the golden apples that Earth had caused to grow as a wedding gift for Hera
 <sup>3</sup> A character in Goldsmith's novel The Vicar of Wakefield; he goes to the county fair to sell a ho.se, and brings back nothing in exchange but a gross of green spectacles the mountings of which are of copper.

· I know that this may be only a device of that compassionate imagination designed to comfort me, who shall never take but one other journey than my daily beat. Yet there have been wise men who taught that all scenes are but pictures upon the mind; and if I can see them as I walk the street that leads to my office, or sit at the office-window looking into the court, or take a little trip down the bay or up the river, why are not my pictures as pleasant and as profitable as those which men travel for years, at great cost of time, and trouble, and money, to behold?

For my part, I do not believe that any man can see softer skies than I see in Prue's eves: nor hear sweeter music than I hear in Prue's voice: nor find a more heaven-lighted temple than I know Prue's mind to be. And when I wish to please myself with a lovely image of peace and contentment, I do not think of the plain of Sharon, nor of the valley of Enna, nor of Arcadia, nor of Claude's pictures; 1 but, feeling that the fairest fortune of my life is the right to be named with her. I whisper gently, to myself, with a smile—for it seems as if my very heart smiled within me, when I think of her-"Prue and I."

SEA FROM SHORE

Come unto these yellow sands. -The Tempest Argosies of magic sails, Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales.

-Tennyson

In the month of June, Prue and I like to walk upon the Battery 2 toward sunset, and watch the steamers, crowded with passengers, bound for the pleasant places along the coast where people pass the hot months. Sea-side lodgings are not very comfortable, I am told; but who would not be a little pinched in his chamber, if his windows looked upon the sea?

In such praises of the ocean do I indulge at such times, and so respectfully do I regard the sailors who may chance to pass, that Prue often says, with her shrewd smiles, that my mind is a kind of Greenwich Hospital, 3 full of abortive marine hopes and wishes, broken-legged intentions, blind regrets, and desires, whose hands have been shot away in some hard battle of experience, so that they cannot grasp the results towards which they reach.

She is right, as usual. Such hopes and intentions do lie, ruined and hopeless now, strewn about the placid contentment of my mental life. as the old pensioners sit about the grounds at Greenwich, maimed and musing in the quiet morning sunshine. Many a one among them thinks what a Nelson he would have been if both his legs had not been prematurely carried away: or in what a Trafalgar 4 of triumph he would have ended, if, unfortunately, he had not happened to have been blown blind by the explosion of that unlucky magazine.

So I dream, sometimes, of a straight scarlet collar, stiff with gold lace, around my neck, instead of this limp white cravat: and I have even brandished my quill at the office so cutlass-wise, that Titbottom 5 has paused in his additions and looked at me as if he doubted whether I should come out quite square in my petty cash. Yet he understands it. Titbottom was born in Nantucket.

That is the secret of my fondness for the sea; I was born by it. Not more surely do Savovards pine for the mountains, nor Cockneys for the sound of Bow bells, 6 than those who are born within sight and sound of the ocean to return to it and renew their fealty. In dreams the children of the sea hear its voice.

I have read in some book of travels that certain tribes of Arabs have no name for the ocean, and that when they came to the shore for the first time, they asked with eager sadness, as if penetrated by the conviction of a superior beauty, "what is that desert of water more beautiful than the land?" And in the translations of German stories which Adoniram and the other children read, and into which I occasionally look in the evening when they are gone to bed—for I like to know what interests my children—I find that the Germans, who do not live near the sea, love the fairy lore of water, and tell the sweet stories of Undine and Melusina, 7 as if they had especial charm for them, because their country is inland.

We who know the sea have less fairy feeling about it, but our realities are romance. My French legend.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The plain of Sharon in Palestine was noted for its fertility. Enna is not a valley but a mountain in central Sicily, once rich in luxuriant gardens. Arcadia is the mythical home of ideal simplicity. Claude Lorrain was a great French landscape nainter.

<sup>2</sup> a once fashionable park at the south end of New York City

a a seamen's hospital and pensioners' home in Greenwich, England

*the great naval victory over the French won by Admiral Nelson off Cape Trafatgar, southern Spain, in 1805

an assistant bookkeeper in the office, who drew only $900.00 a year but also had castles in Spain

Savoyards, inhabitants of the former duchy of Savoy, a mountainous district of eastern France; Cocka mountainous district of eastern France; Cockneys, traditionally, dwellers within the sound of the bells of St. Mary le Bow, a church in London Undine is a water-spirit in a romance (1811) by Fouqué, Baron de la Motte, 1777-1843; Melusina, another water-spirit, is a character in an ancient earliest remembrances are of a long range of old, half dilapidated stores; red brick stores with steep wooden roofs, and stone windowframes and door-frames, which stood upon docks built as if for immense trade with all quarters of the globe. 1

Generally there were only a few sloops moored to the tremendous posts, which I fancied could easily hold fast a Spanish Armada in a tropical hurricane. But sometimes a great ship, an East Indiaman, with rusty, seamed, blistered sides, and dingy sails, came slowly moving up the harbor, with an air of indolent self-importance and consciousness of superiority, which inspired me with profound respect. If the ship had ever chanced to run down a row-boat, or a sloop, or any specimen of smaller craft, I should only have wondered at the temerity of any floating thing in crossing the path of such supreme majesty. The ship was leisurely chained and cabled to the old dock, and then came the disembowelling.

How the stately monster had been fattening upon foreign spoils! How it had gorged itself (such galleons did never seem to me of the feminine gender) with the lucious treasures of the tropics! It had lain its lazy length along the shores of China, and sucked in whole flowery harvests of tea. The Brazilian sun flashed through the strong wicker prisons, bursting with bananas and nectarean fruits that eschew the temperate zone. Steams of camphor, of sandal-wood, arose from the hold. chanting cabalistic strains, that had to my ear a shrill and monotonous pathos, like the uniform rising and falling of an autumn wind, turned cranks that lifted the bales, and boxes, and crates, and swung them ashore.

But to my mind, the spell of their singing raised the fragrant freight, and not the crank. Madagascar and Ceylon appeared at the mystic bidding of the song. The placid sunshine of the docks was perfumed with India. The universal calm of southern seas poured from the bosom of the ship over the quiet, decaying, old northern port.

Long after the confusion of unloading was over, and the ship lay as if all voyages were ended, I dared to creep timorously along the edge of the dock, and at great risk of falling in the black water of its huge shadow, I placed my hand upon the hot hulk, and so established a mystic and exquisite connection with Pacific islands, with palm groves and all the passionate beauties they embower; with jungles, Bengal tigers, pepper, and the crushed feet of Chinese fairies. I touched Asia, the Cape of Good Hope, and the Happy Islands. 2 I would not believe that the heat I felt was of our northern sun: to my finer sympathy it burned with equatorial fervors

The freight was piled in the old stores. I believe that many of them remain, but they have lost their character. When I knew them, not only was I younger, but partial decay had overtaken the town; at least the bulk of its India trade had shifted to New York and Boston. But the appliances remained. There was no throng of busy traffickers, and after school, in the afternoon, I strolled by and gazed into the solemn interiors.

Silence reigned within,—silence, dimness, and piles of foreign treasure. Vast coils of cable, like tame boa-constrictors, served as seats for men with large stomachs, and heavy watchseals, and nankeen trousers, who sat looking out of the door toward the ships, with little other sign of life than an occasional low talking, as if in their sleep. Huge hogsheads perspiring brown sugar and oozing slow molasses, as if nothing tropical could keep within bounds, but must continually expand, and exude, and overflow. stood against the walls, and had an architectural significance, for they darkly reminded me of Egyptian prints, and in the duskiness of the low-vaulted store seemed cyclopean columns incomplete. Strange festoons and heaps of bags, square piles of square boxes cased in mats, bales of airy summer stuffs, which, even in winter, scoffed at cold, and shamed it by audacious assumptions of eternal sun, little specimen boxes of precious dyes that even now shine through my memory, like old Venetian schools unpainted, 3-these were all there in rich confusion.

The stores had a twilight of dimness, the air was spicy with mingled odors. I liked to look suddenly in from the glare of sunlight outside. and then the cool sweet dimness was like the palpable breath of the far-off island-groves; and if only some parrot or macaw hung within, would flaunt with glistening plumage in his cage, and as the gay hue flashed in a chance sunbeam, call in his hard, shrill voice, as if thrusting sharp sounds upon a glistening wire from out that grateful gloom, then the enchantment was complete, and without moving, I was circumnavigating the globe.

<sup>1</sup> Curtis's boyhood was passed in Providence, which then had a large sea-trade.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The Isles of the Blest or The Fortunate Islands were imagina y lands in the western ocean: later, the names were applied to the Canary and Madeira Is.
<sup>3</sup> perhaps paintings (never done) in the rich manner of the Venetian school

From the old stores and the docks slowly crumbling, touched, I know not why or how, by the pensive air of past prosperity, I rambled out of town on those well-remembered afternoons, to the fields that lay upon hillsides over the harbor, and there sat, looking out to sea, fancying some distant sail proceeding to the glorious ends of the earth, to be my type and image, who would so sail, stately and successful, to all the glorious ports of the Future. Going home. I returned by the stores, which black porters were closing. But I stood long looking in, saturating my imagination, and as it appeared, my clothes, with the spicy suggestion. For when I reached home my thrifty mother another Prue—came snuffing and smelling about

"Why! my son (snuff, snuff,) where have you been (snuff, snuff)? Has the baker been making (snuff) ginger-bread? You smell as if you'd been in (snuff, snuff,) a bag of cinnamon."

"I've only been on the wharves, mother." "Well, my dear, I hope you haven't stuck up your clothes with molasses. Wharves are dirty places, and dangerous. You must take care of yourself, my son. Really this smell is (snuff, snuff,) very strong."

But I departed from the maternal presence, proud and happy. I was aromatic. I bore about me the true foreign air. Whoever smelt me smelt distant countries. I had nutmeg. spices, cinnamon, and cloves, without the jolly red nose. I pleased myself with being the representative of the Indies. I was in good odor with myself and all the world.

I do not know how it is, but surely Nature makes kindly provision. An imagination so easily excited as mine could not have escaped disappointment if it had had ample opportunity and experience of the lands it so longed to see. Therefore, although I made the India voyage, I have never been a traveler, and saving the little time I was ashore in India, I did not lose the sense of novelty and romance, which the first sight of foreign lands inspires.

That little time was all my foreign travel. I am glad of it. I see now that I should never have found the country from which the East Indiaman of my early days arrived. The palm groves do not grow, with which that hand laid upon the ship placed me in magic conception. As for the lovely Indian maid whom the palmy arches bowered, she has long since clasped some native lover to her bosom, and, ripened into mild maternity, how should I know her now?

"You would find her quite as easily now as then," says my Prue, when I speak of it.

She is right again, as usual, that precious woman: and it is therefore I feel that if the chances of life have moored me fast to a bookkeeper's desk, they have left all the lands I longed to see fairer and fresher in my mind than they could ever be in my memory. Upon my only voyage I used to climb into the top and search the horizon for the shore. But now in a moment of calm thought I see a more Indian India than ever mariner discerned, and do not envy the youths who go there and make fortunes, who wear grass-cloth jackets, drink iced beer, and eat curry; whose minds fall asleep, and whose bodies have liver complaints.

Unseen by me forever, nor ever regretted shall wave the Egyptian palms and the Italian pines. Untrodden by me, the Forum shall still echo with the footfall of imperial Rome, and the Parthenon unrifled of its marbles, look, perfect, across the Aegean blue.

My young friends return from their foreign tours elate with the smiles of a nameless Italian or Parisian belle. I know not such cheap delights: I am suitor of Vittoria Colonna: 1 I walk with Tasso 2 along the terraced garden of the Villa d'Este, and look to see Beatrice smiling down the rich gloom of the cypress shade. You stayed at the Hôtel Europa in Venice, at Danielli's, or the Leone bianco; 3 I am the guest of Marino Faliero, and I whisper to his wife as we climb the giant staircase in the summer moonlight.

> Ah! senza amare Andare sul mare, Col sposo del mare, Non puo consolare. 4

It is for the same reason that I did not care to dine with you and Aurelia, that I am content not to stand in St. Peter's. Alas! if I could see the end of it, it would not be St. Peter's. For those of us whom Nature means to keep at home, she provides entertainment. One man goes four thousand miles to Italy, and does not see it, he is so short-sighted. Another is so far-sighted that he stays in his room and sees more than Italy.

&lt;sup>1</sup> an Italian poet,—the only woman known to have been beloved by Michael Angelo
<sup>2</sup> One of the four greatest Italian poets; he served the family of Este, whose seat of power was Fe.ra.a. He is said to have loved the princess Leonora d'Este. Curtis may have confused Tasso's experiences there with those of the poet Boiardo, of a century before, who was patronized by Duke Hercules d'Este, whose daughter Beatrice was one of the most beautiful and accomplished women of Italy. Lâter, as Duchess of Milan she was herself a patron of art and letters.

<sup>3</sup> "The White Lion," a hotel in Venice; Marino Faliero, doge (ruler) of Venice, died 1355.

<sup>4</sup> "Ah, without love to put forth to sea with the consort of the sea,—for that there is no solace."

But for this very reason that it washes the shores of my possible Europe and Asia, the sea draws me constantly to itself. Before I came to New York, while I was still a clerk in Boston, courting Prue, and living out of town, I never knew of a ship sailing for India or even for England and France, but I went up to the State House cupola or to the observatory on some friend's house in Roxbury, where I could not be interrupted, and there watched the departure.

The sails hung ready; the ship lay in the stream; busy little boats and puffing steamers darted about it, clung to its sides, paddled away for it, or led the way to sea, as minnows might pilot a whale. The anchor was slowly swung at the bow; I could not hear the sailors' song but I knew they were singing. I could not see the parting friends, but I knew farewells were spoken. I did not share the confusion, although I knew what bustle there was. what hurry, what shouting, what creaking, what fall of ropes and iron, what sharp oaths, low laughs, whispers, sobs. But I was cool, high, separate. To me it was ## a painted ship Upon a painted ocean.

The sails were shaken out, and the ship began to move. It was a fair breeze, perhaps, and no steamer was needed to tow her away. receded down the bay. Friends turned back-I could not see them-and waved their hands. and wiped their eyes, and went home to dinner. Farther and farther from the ships at anchor. the lessening vessel became single and solitary upon the water. The sun sank in the west: but I watched her still. Every flash of her sails, as she tacked and turned, thrilled my

Yet Prue was not on board. I had never seen one of the passengers or the crew. I did not know the consignees, nor the name of the vessel. I had shipped no adventure, nor risked any insurance, nor made any bet, but my eyes clung to her as Ariadne's to the fading sail of Theseus. 2 The ship was freighted with more than appeared upon her papers, yet she was not a smuggler. She bore all there was of that nameless lading, yet the next ship would carry as much. She was freighted with fancy. My hopes, and wishes, and vague desires, were all on board. It seemed to me a treasure not less rich than that which filled the East Indiaman at the old dock in my boyhoood.

1 from Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner," Part II <sup>2</sup> All the various myths concerning the loves of Theseus and Ariadne, although differing as to the cause, agree that Theseus left Ariadne on the island of Naxos.

When, at length, the ship was a sparkle upon the horizon. I waved my hand in last farewell. I strained my eyes for a last glimpse. My mind had gone to sea, and had left noise behind. But now I heard again the multitudinous murmur of the city, and went down rapidly, and threaded the short, narrow streets to the office. Yet, believe it, every dream of that day, as I watched the vessel, was written at night to Prue. She knew my heart had not sailed away.

Those days are long past now, but still I walk upon the Battery and look towards the Narrows, and know that beyond them, separated only by the sea, are many of whom I would so gladly know, and so rarely hear. The sea rolls between us like the lapse of dusky They trusted themselves to it, and it bore them away far and far as if into the past. Last night I read of Antony, but I have not heard from Christopher these many months, and by so much farther away is he, so much older and more remote than Antony. As for William, he is as vague as any of the shepherd kings of ante-Pharaonic dynasties.

It is the sea that has done it, it has carried them off and put them away upon its other side. It is fortunate the sea did not put them upon its under-side. Are they hale and happy still? Is their hair gray, and have they mustachios? Or have they taken to wigs and crutches? Are they popes or cardinals yet? Do they feast with Lucrezia Borgia, 3 or preach red republicanism to the Council of Ten? 4 Do they sing, Behold how brightly breaks the morning with Masaniello? 5 Do they laugh at Ulysses and skip ashore to the Sirens? 6 Has Mesrour, chief of the Eunuchs, caught them with Zobeide 7 in the Caliph's garden, or have they made cheese cakes without pepper? Friends of my youth, where in your wanderings have you tasted the blissful Lotus, 8 that you neither come nor send us tidings?

Across the sea also came idle rumors, as false reports steal into history and defile fair fames. Was it longer ago than yesterday that I walked Lucrezia, 1480-1519, one of the famous Italian family of Borgia, a patron of learning and art.

 a powerful secret tribunal instituted when Venice was a republic

a song in the opera La Muette de Portici, better known as Masanuello, produced in 1828 by Auber, the French composer

the French composer

The sirens were sea-nymphs who by their songs tempted seamen passing their island to turn aside from their course, and then destroyed them. Ulysses filled the ears of his companions with wax so that they could not hear the music.

Twife of the caliph Harun al Raschid in the Arabian

Nights

&lt;sup>8</sup> A plant of northern Africa whose fruit, it was said, caused travelers to wish no longer to return to their native land; see Tennyson's "The Lotus Eaters."

with my cousin, then recently a widow, and talked with her of the countries to which she meant to sail? She was young, and dark-eyed, and wore great hoops of gold, barbaric gold, in her ears. The hope of Italy, the thought of living there, had risen like a dawn in the darkness of her mind. I talked and listened by rapid turns

Was it longer ago than yesterday that she told me of her splendid plans, how palaces tapestried with gorgeous paintings should be cheaply hired, and the best of teachers lead her children to the completest and most various knowledge; how,—and with her slender pittance!—she should have a box at the opera, and a carriage, and liveried servants, and in perfect health and youth, lead a perfect life in a perfect climate?

And now what do I hear? Why does a tear sometimes drop so audibly upon my paper. that Titbottom looks across with a sort of mild rebuking glance of inquiry, whether it is kind to let even a single tear fall, when an ocean of tears is pent up in hearts that would burst and overflow if but one drop should force its way Why across the sea came faint gusty stories, like low voices in the wind, of a cloistered garden and sunny seclusion-and a life of unknown and unexplained luxury. What is this picture of a pale face showered with streaming black hair, and large sad eyes looking upon lovely and noble children playing in the sunshine-and a brow pained with thought straining into their destiny? Who is this figure, a man tall and comely, with melting eyes and graceful motion, who comes and goes at pleasure, who is not a husband, yet has the key of the cloistered garden?

I do not know. They are secrets of the sea. The pictures pass before my mind suddenly and unawares, and I feel the tears rising that I would gladly repress. Titbottom looks at me, then stands by the window of the office and leans his brow against the cold iron bars, and looks down into the little square paved court. I take my hat and steal out of the office for a few minutes, and slowly pace the hurrying streets. Meek-eyed Alice! magnificent Maud! sweet baby Lilian! why does the sea imprison you so far away, when will you return, where do you linger? The water laps idly about the docks, lies calm, or gaily heaves. Why does it bring me doubts and fears now, that brought such bounty of beauty in the days long gone?

I remember that the day when my darkhaired cousin, with hoops of barbaric gold in her ears, sailed for Italy, was quarter-day, and we balanced the books at the office. It was nearly noon, and in my impatience to be away, I had not added my columns with sufficient care. The inexorable hand of the office clock pointed sternly towards twelve, and the remorseless pendulum ticked solemnly to noon.

To a man whose pleasures are not many, and rather small, the loss of such an event as saying farewell and wishing God-speed to a friend going to Europe, is a great loss. It was so to me, especially, because there was always more to me, in every departure, than the parting and the farewell. I was gradually renouncing this pleasure, as I saw small prospect of ending before noon, when Titbottom, after looking at me a moment, came to my side of the desk, and said:

"I should like to finish that for you."

I looked at him: poor Titbottom! he had no friends to wish God-speed upon any journey. I quietly wiped my pen, took down my hat, and went out. It was in the days of sail packets and less regularity, when going to Europe was more of an epoch in life. How gaily my cousin stood upon the deck and detailed to me her plan! How merrily the children shouted and sang! How long I held my cousin's little hand in mine, and gazed into her great eyes, remembering that they would see and touch the things that were invisible to me for ever, but all the more precious and fair! She kissed me-I was younger then—there were tears. I remember, and prayers, and promises, a waving handkerchief.—a fading sail.

It was only the other day that I saw another parting of the same kind. I was not a principal, only a spectator; but so fond am I of sharing, afar off, as it were, and unseen, the sympathies of human beings, that I cannot avoid often going to the dock upon steamer-days and giving myself to that pleasant and melancholy observation. There is always a crowd, but this day it was almost impossible to advance through the masses of people. The eager faces hurried by; a constant stream poured up the gangway into the steamer, and the upper deck, to which I gradually made my way, was crowded with the passengers and their friends.

There was one group upon which my eyes first fell, and upon which my memory lingers. A glance, brilliant as daybreak,—a voice,

Her voice's music,—call it the well's bubbling, the bird's warble, a goddess girdled with flowers, and smiling farewell upon a circle of worshipers, to each one of whom that gracious calmness made the smile sweeter, and the farewell more sad—other figures, other flowers, an angel face—all these I saw in that group as I was swayed up and down the deck by the eager swarm of people. The hour came, and I went on shore with the rest. The plank was drawn away—the captain raised his hand—the huge steamer slowly moved—a cannon was fired—the ship was gone.

The sun sparkled upon the water as they sailed away. In five minutes the steamer was as much separated from the shore as if it had been at sea a thousand years.

I leaned against a post upon the dock and looked around. Ranged upon the edge of the wharf stood that band of worshipers, waving handkerchiefs and straining their eyes to see the last smile of farewell—did any eager selfish eye hope to see a tear? They to whom the hand-kerchiefs were waved stood high upon the stern, holding flowers. Over them hung the great flag, raised by the gentle wind into the graceful folds of a canopy,—say rather a gorgeous gonfalon waved over the triumphant departure, over that supreme youth, and bloom, and beauty, going out across the mystic ocean to carry a finer charm and more human splendor into those realms of my imagination beyond the

"You will return, O youth and beauty!" I said to my dreaming and foolish self, as I contemplated those fair figures, "richer than Alexander with Indian spoils. 1 All that historic association, that copious civilization, those grandeurs and graces of art, that variety and picturesqueness of life, will mellow and deepen your experience even as time silently touches those old pictures into a more persuasive and pathetic beauty, and as this increasing summer sheds ever softer lustre upon the landscape. You will return conquerors and not conquered. You will bring Europe, even as Aurelian brought Zenobia captive, 2 to deck your homeward triumph. I do not wonder that these clouds break away. I do not wonder that the sun presses out and floods all the air, and land, and water, with light that graces with happy omens your stately farewell."

But if my faded face looked after them with such earnest and longing emotion,—I, a solitary old man, unknown to those fair beings, and standing apart from that band of lovers, yet in that moment bound more closely to them than they knew,—how was it with those whose hearts sailed away with that youth and beauty? I watched them closely from behind my post. I knew that life had paused with them; that the world stood still. I knew that the long, long summer would be only a yearning regret. I knew that each asked himself the mournful question, "Is this parting typical—this slow. sad, sweet, recession?" And I knew that they did not care to ask whether they should meet again, nor dare to contemplate the chances of the sea

The steamer swept on, she was near Staten Island, and a final gun boomed far and low across the water. The crowd was dispersing, but the little group remained. Was it not all Hood had sung?

I saw thee, lovely Inez,
Descend along the shore,
With bands of noble gentlemen,
And banners waved before;
And gentle youths and maidens gay,
And snowy plumes they wore;—
It would have been a beauteous dream,—
If it had been no more!

"O youth!" I said to them without speaking, "be it gently said, as it is solemnly thought, should they return no more, yet in your memories the high hour of their loveliness is for ever enshrined. Should they come no more they never will be old. nor changed, to you. You will wax and wane, you will suffer, and struggle, and grow old; but this summer vision will smile, immortal, upon your lives, and those fair faces shall shed, forever, from under that slowly waving flag, hope and peace."

It is so elsewhere; it is the tenderness of Nature. Long, long ago we lost our first-born, Prue and I. Since then, we have grown older and our children with us. Change comes, and grief, perhaps, and decay. We are happy, our children are obedient and gay. But should Prue live until she has lost us all, and laid us, gray and weary, in our graves, she will have always one babe in her heart. Every mother who has lost an infant, has gained a child of immortal youth. Can you find comfort here, lovers, whose mistress has sailed away?

I did not ask the question aloud, I thought it only, as I watched the youths, and turned away while they still stood gazing. One, I observed, climbed a post and waved his black hat before the white-washed side of the shed over the dock, whence I supposed he would tumble into the water. Another had tied a handkerchief to the end of a somewhat baggy umbrella, and in the eagerness of gazing, had forgotten to wave it, so that it hung mournfully down, as if overpowered with grief it could not express. The entranced youth still held the umbrella

Alexander the Great in 327 B.C. invaded India.
 Aurelian, Roman Emperor from 270 to 275, having conquered Palmyra, east of Syria, took Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra, to Rome.

* from Hood's "Fair Ines"

aloft. It seemed to me as if he had struck his flag; or as if one of my cravats were airing in that sunlight. A negro carter was joking with an apple-woman at the entrance of the dock. The steamer was out of sight.

I found that I was belated and hurried back to my desk. Alas! poor lovers; I wonder if they are watching still? Has he fallen exhausted from the post into the water? Is that handkerchief, bleached and rent, still pendant upon that somewhat baggy umbrella?

"Youth and beauty went to Europe today," said I to Prue, as I stirred my tea at evening.

As I spoke, our youngest daughter brought me the sugar. She is just eighteen, and her name should be Hebe. <sup>1</sup> I took a lump of sugar and looked at her. She had never seemed so lovely, and as I dropped the lump in my cup, I kissed her. I glanced at Prue as I did so. The dear woman smiled, but did not answer my exclamation.

Thus, without traveling, I travel, and share the emotions of those I do not know. But sometimes the old longing comes over me as in the days when I timidly touched the huge East Indiaman, and magnetically sailed around the world.

It was but a few days after the lovers and I waved farewell to the steamer, and while the lovely figures standing under the great gonfalon were as vivid in my mind as ever, that a day of premature sunny sadness, like those of the Indian summer, drew me away from the office early in the afternoon: for fortunately it is our dull season now, and even Titbottom sometimes leaves the office by five o'clock. Although why he should leave it, or where he goes, or what he does, I do not well know. Before I knew him, I used sometimes to meet him with a man whom I was afterwards told was Bartleby, the scrivener. 2 Even then it seemed to me that they rather clubbed their loneliness than made society for each other. Recently I have not seen Bartleby; but Titbottom seems no more solitary because he is alone.

I strolled into the Battery as I sauntered about. Staten Island looked so alluring, tenderhued with summer and melting in the haze, that I resolved to indulge myself in a pleasure-trip. It was a little selfish, perhaps, to go alone, but I looked at my watch, and saw that if I should hurry home for Prue the trip would be lost; then I should be disappointed, and she would be grieved.

Ought I not rather (I like to begin questions, which I am going to answer affirmatively, with ought,) to take the trip and recount my adventures to Prue upon my return, whereby I should actually enjoy the excursion and the pleasure of telling her; while she would enjoy my story and be glad that I was pleased? Ought I wilfully to deprive us both of this various enjoyment by aiming at a higher, which, in losing, we should lose all?

Unfortunately, just as I was triumphantly answering "Certainly not!" another question marched into my mind, escorted by a very defiant ought.

"Ought I to go when I have such a debate about it?"

But while I was perplexed, and scoffing at my own scruples, the ferry-bell suddenly rang, and answered all my questions. Involuntarily I hurried on board. The boat slipped from the dock. I went up on deck to enjoy the view of the city from the bay, but just as I sat down, and meant to have said "how beautiful!" I found myself asking:

"Ought I to have come?"

Lost in perplexing debate, I saw little of the scenery of the bay; but the remembrance of Prue and the gentle influence of the day plunged me into a mood of pensive reverie which nothing tended to destroy, until we suddenly arrived at the landing.

As I was stepping ashore, I was greeted by Mr. Bourne, who passes the summer on the island and who hospitably asked if I were going his way. His way was toward the southern end of the island, and I said yes. His pockets were full of papers and his brow of wrinkles; so when we reached the point where he should turn off, I asked him to let me alight, although he was very anxious to carry me wherever I was going.

"I am only strolling about," I answered, as I clambered carefully out of the wagon.

"Strolling about?" asked he, in a bewildered manner; "do people stroll about, now-a-days?"

"Sometimes," I answered, smiling, as I pulled my trousers down over my boots, for they had dragged up, as I stepped out of the wagon, "and beside, what can an old bookkeeper do better in the dull season than stroll about this pleasant island, and watch the ships at sea?"

Bourne looked at me with his weary eyes.

"I'd give five thousand dollars a year for a dull season," said he, "but as for strolling, I've forgotten how."

As he spoke, his eyes wandered dreamily across the fields and woods, and were fastened upon the distant sails.

&lt;sup>1</sup> goddess of youth and spring, cupbearer of the gods <sup>2</sup> copyist

&lt;sup>3</sup> a millionaire, once in love with Prue, and still unmarried

"It is pleasant," he said musingly, and fell into silence. But I had no time to spare, so I wished him good-afternoon.

"I hope your wife is well," said Bourne to me, as I turned away. Poor Bourne! He drove on alone in his wagon.

But I made haste to the most solitary point upon the southern shore, and there sat, glad to be so near the sea. There was that warm, sympathetic silence in the air, that gives to Indiansummer days almost a human tenderness of feeling. A delicate haze, that seemed only the kindly air made visible, hung over the sea. The water lapped languidly among the rocks, and the voices of children in the boat beyond, rang musically, and gradually receded, until they were lost in the distance.

It was some time before I was aware of the outline of a large ship, drawn vaguely upon the mist, which I supposed, at first, to be only a kind of mirage. But the more steadfastly I gazed, the more distinct it became, and I could no longer doubt that I saw a stately ship lying at anchor, not more than half a mile from the land.

"It is an extraordinary place to anchor," I said to myself, "or can she be ashore?"

There were no signs of distress; the sails were carefully clewed up, and there were no sailors in the tops, nor upon the shrouds. A flag, of which I could not see the device or the nation, hung heavily at the stern, and looked as if it had fallen asleep. My curiosity began to be singularly excited. The form of the vessel seemed not to be permanent; but within a quarter of an hour, I was sure that I had seen half a dozen different ships. As I gazed, I saw no more sails nor masts, but a long range of oars, flashing like a golden fringe, or straight and stiff, like the legs of a sea-monster.

"It is some bloated crab, or lobster, magnified by the mist," I said to myself, complacently.

But, at the same moment, there was a concentrated flashing and blazing in one spot among the rigging, and it was as if I saw a beatified ram, or, more truly, a sheep-skin, splendid as the hair of Berenice. <sup>1</sup>

"Is that the golden fleece?" I thought. "But, surely, Jason and the Argonauts have gone home long since. Do people go on gold-fleecing expeditions now?" I asked myself, in perplexity. "Can this be a California steamer?"

<sup>1</sup> Wife of Ptolemy Euergetes, King of Egypt 247-222 B.C.; to insure the safe return of her husband from a military expedition, she sacrificed to the gods her beautiful hair. It was later believed to have been turned into the constellation Coma Berenices. Jason, a mythical Greek, sailed with other heroes in the ship Argo to Cholchis to obtain the golden fleece. Medea, the daughter of Aeëtes, king of that land, enabled Jason to fulfill her father's conditions and to overcome the dragon that guarded the fleece.

How could I have thought it a steamer? Did I not see those sails, "thin and sere"? <sup>2</sup> Did I not feel the melancholy of that solitary bark? It had a mystic aura; a boreal brilliancy shimmered in its wake, for it was drifting seaward. A strange fear curdled along my veins. That summer sun shone cool. The weary, battered ship was gashed, as if gnawed by ice. There was terror in the air, as a "skinny hand so brown" waved to me from the deck. I lay as one bewitched. The hand of the ancient mariner seemed to be reaching for me, like the hand of death.

Death? Why, as I was inly praying Prue's forgiveness for my solitary ramble and consequent demise, a glance like the fulness of summer splendor gushed over me; the odor of flowers and of eastern gums made all the atmosphere. I breathed the orient, and lay drunk with balm, while that strange ship, a golden galley now, with glittering draperies festooned with flowers, paced to the measured beat of oars along the calm, and Cleopatra smiled alluringly from the great pageant's heart. <sup>8</sup>

Was this a barge for summer waters, this peculiar ship I saw? It had a ruined dignity, a cumbrous grandeur, although its masts were shattered, and its sails rent. It hung preternaturally still upon the sea, as if tormented and exhausted by long driving and drifting. I saw no sailors, but a great Spanish ensign floated over, and waved, a funereal plume. I knew it then. The armada was long since scattered; but, floating far ### on desolate rainy seas,

lost for centuries, and again restored to sight, here lay one of the fated ships of Spain. The huge galleon seemed to fill all the air, built up against the sky, like the gilded ships of Claude Lorrain <sup>4</sup> against the sunset.

But it fled, for now a black flag fluttered at the mast-head—a long low vessel darted swiftly where the vast ship lay; there came a shrill piping whistle, the clash of cutlasses, fierce ringing oaths, sharp pistol cracks, the thunder of command, and over all the gusty yell of a demoniac chorus,

My name was Robert Kidd, when I sailed.

—There were no clouds longer, but under a serene sky I saw a bark moving with festal

<sup>2</sup> Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner," Part V <sup>3</sup> Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra, II, ii, 196, ff.

* a French landscape painter

pomp thronged with grave senators in flowing robes, and one with ducal bonnet in the midst. holding a ring. The smooth bark swam upon a sea like that of southern latitudes. I saw the Bucentoro and the nuptials of Venice and the Adriatic. 1

Who were those coming over the side? Who crowded the boats, and sprang into the water, men in old Spanish armor, with plumes and swords, and bearing a glittering cross? Who was he standing upon the deck with folded arms and gazing towards the shore, as lovers on their mistresses and martyrs upon heaven? Over what distant and tumultuous seas had this small craft escaped from other centuries and distant shores? What sounds of foreign hymns, forgotten now, were these, and what solemnity of debarkation? Was this grave form Columbus?

Yet these were not so Spanish as they seemed just now. This group of stern-faced men with high peaked hats, who knelt upon the cold deck and looked out upon a shore which. I could see by their joyless smile of satisfaction, was rough, and bare, and forbidding. In that soft afternoon, standing in mournful groups upon the small deck, why did they seem to me to be seeing the sad shores of wintry New England? That phantom ship could not be the Mayflower!

I gazed long upon the shifting illusion.

"If I should board this ship," I asked myself. "where should I go? whom should I meet? what should I see? Is not this the vessel that shall carry me to my Europe, my foreign countries, my impossible India, the Atlantis 2 that I have lost?"

As I sat staring at it I could not but wonder whether Bourne had seen this sail when he looked upon the water? Does he see such sights every day, because he lives down here? Is it not perhaps a magic yacht of his; and does he slip off privately after business hours to Venice, and Spain, and Egypt, perhaps to El Dorado? Does he run races with Ptolemy Philopater, and Hiero of Syracuse, rare regattas on fabulous seas? 3

In the ceremony of wedding the Adriatic, the doge, from the Bucentaur, the Venetian state galley, dropped a ring into the sea, saying, "We espouse thee, Sea, in token of true and lasting dominion." This was to commemorate the victory of the Venetians over Frederick Barbarossa, Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, 1155-1189.

A legendary island situated, according to ancient tradition, in the Atlantic Ocean just beyond the Straits of Gibraltar, and believed to have been swallowed up in a cataclysm; it was first mentioned by Plato, who makes it the seat of an ideal commonwealth.

<sup>5</sup> Ptolemy Philopator was king of Egypt, 221-204 B.C.; Hiero, Tyrant of Syracuse, 478 B.C., maintained a great fleet.

Why not? He is a rich man, too, and why should not a New York merchant do what a Syracuse tyrant and an Egyptian prince did? Has Bourne's vacht those sumptuous chambers, like Philopater's galley, of which the greater part was made of split cedar, and of Milesian cypress; and has he twenty doors put together with beams of citronwood with many ornaments? Has the roof of his cabin a carved golden face, and is his sail linen with a purple fringe?

"I suppose it is so," I said to myself, as I looked wistfully at the ship, which began to glimmer and melt in the haze.

"It certainly is not a fishing-smack?" asked, doubtfully,

No, it must be Bourne's magic yacht; I was sure of it. I could not help laughing at poor old Hiero, whose cabins were divided into many rooms, with floors composed of mosaic work, of all kinds of stones tessellated. And, on this mosaic, the whole story of the Iliad was depicted in a marvelous manner. He had gardens "of all sorts of most wonderful beauty, enriched with all sorts of plants, and shadowed by roofs of lead or tiles. And, besides this, there were tents roofed with boughs of white ivy and of the vine—the roots of which derived their moisture from casks full of earth, and were watered in the same manner as the gardens. There were temples, also, with doors of ivory and citronwood, furnished in the most exquisite manner, with pictures and statues, and with goblets and vases of every form and shape imaginable."

"Poor Bourne!" I said. "I suppose his is finer than Hiero's, which is a thousand years old. Poor Bourne! I don't wonder that his eyes are weary, and that he would pay so dearly for a day of leisure. Dear me! is it one of the prices that must be paid for wealth, the keeping of a magic yacht?"

Involuntarily, I had asked the question aloud. "The magic yacht is not Bourne's," answered a familiar voice. I looked up, and Titbottom stood by my side. "Do you not know that all Bourne's money would not buy the yacht?" asked he. "He cannot even see it. And if he could, it would be no magic yacht to him, but only a battered and solitary hulk."

The haze blew gently away, as Titbottom spoke, and there lay my Spanish galleon, my Bucentoro, my Cleopatra's galley, Columbus's Santa Maria, and the Pilgrims' Mayflower, an old bleaching wreck upon the beach.

"Do you suppose any true love is in vain?" asked Titbottom solemnly, as he stood bareheaded, and the soft sunset wind played with his few hairs. "Could Cleopatra smile upon Antony, and the moon upon Endymion, 1 and the sea not love its lovers?"

The fresh air breathed upon our faces as he spoke. I might have sailed in Hiero's ship, or in Roman galleys, had I lived long centuries ago, and been born a nobleman. But would it be so sweet a remembrance, that of lying on a marble couch, under a golden-faced roof, and within doors of citron-wood and ivory, and sailing in that state to greet queens who are mumies now, as that of seeing those fair figures. standing under the great gonfalon, themselves as lovely as Egyptian belles, and going to see more than Egypt dreamed?

The yacht was mine, then, and not Bourne's. I took Titbottom's arm, and we sauntered toward the ferry. What sumptuous sultan was I, with this sad vizier? My languid odalisque, 2 the sea, lay at my feet as we advanced, and sparkled all over with a sunset smile. Had I trusted myself to her arms, to be borne to the realms that I shall never see, or sailed long voyages towards Cathay, 3 I am not sure I should have brought a more precious present to Prue, than the story of that afternoon.

"Ought I to have gone alone?" I asked her, as I ended.

"I ought not to have gone with you," she replied, "for I had work to do. But how strange that you should see such things at Staten Island. I never did, Mr. Titbottom," said she, turning to my deputy, whom I had asked to tea.

"Madam," answered Titbottom, with a kind of wan and quaint dignity, so that I could not help thinking he must have arrived in that stray ship from the Spanish armada, "neither did Mr. Bourne."

1856

SOUTHERN LYRICS OF THE CIVIL WAR

Almost all of the lyrics of the present group arose from the war between the states. They vary much in tone and attitude, from those charged with the fierce passion of conflict to those suffused with the more sustained mood of pathos and heroism. As a whole they represent the spirit of the South at the time of its greatest crisis.

ALBERT PIKE, 1809-1891, though a Bostonian and a graduate of Harvard, is claimed by the South.

After teaching school, emigrating to Arkansas, editing and publishing The Arkansas Advocate, and practicing law, he served in the Mexican War as a captain of cavalry, and during the Civil War he was a brigadier general in the Confederate service. He died at Washington. His Hymns to the Gods was published in Blackwood's in 1839, and Poems appeared in 1873 and 1881.

THEODORE O'HARA, 1820-1867, was a Kentuckian, born in Danville and educated at St. Joseph's College, Bardstown. He gave up his law practice for an appointment as captain in the United States army in the Mexican War, and was brevetted colonel. During the Civil War he served as colonel in the Confederate army. He died at Guerrytown, Alabama.

Margaret Preston, 1820-1897, the daughter of a Presbyterian clergyman, was born in Milton, Pennsylvania, was educated in private schools, married Colonel J. T. L. Preston of the Virginia Military Institute, and died in Baltimore. She wrote Silverwood (novel), 1856; Beechenbrook (verse), 1865; Old Songs and New, 1870; Colonial Ballads, 1887

Francis Orray Ticknor, 1822-1874, though born in Baldwin County, Georgia, was educated in Massachusetts and studied medicine in New York and Philadelphia. He became a practicing physician at Columbus, Georgia, and died in that vicinity. His Poems were published in 1879.

John R. Thompson, 1823-1873, was born in Richmond, Virginia, and was a graduate of the state university. He studied law, but turned to literature and was editor of The Southern Literary Messenger, 1847-1860. In 1864 he went to London, where for some time he contributed to Blackwood's Magazine. Afterwards he was literary editor of the New York Evening Post and a frequent contributor to American literary magazines. His death took place in New York.

Thaddeus Oliver, 1826-1864, was born at Jeffersonville, Georgia, was a lawyer by profession, served in the Confederate army, and died at Charleston, South Carolina, of a wound received in battle. He was the author of several pleasing lyrics, and is supposed, for good reasons, to have written "All Quiet Along the Potomac Tonight," though there are other claimants to the authorship.

James Barron Hope, 1827-1887, was born in Norfolk, Virginia, was educated at William and Mary College, and was a frequent contributor to The Southern Literary Messenger. After serving as captain in the Confederate army during the Civil War, he engaged in education and in newspaper work at Norfolk, where he died. Among his books are Elegiac Ode and Other Poems, 1875; Under the Empire, 1878.

ABRAM JOSEPH RYAN, 1839-1886, was born in Norfolk, Virginia, studied from youth for the

&lt;sup>1</sup> He fell in love with Selene, the moon, who kissed him as he lay sleeping on Mt. Latmos. Cf. Keats's Endymton.

&lt;sup>2</sup> female slave <sup>3</sup> ancient name for northern China, and, by extension, the Orient

30

39

Roman Catholic priesthood, was ordained, and soon became chaplain to a Confederate regiment with which he served, sometimes in the ranks, until the close of the war. Afterwards he engaged in religious newspaper work in New Orleans and in Augusta, Georgia, as well as in pastoral duties. He died in Louisville, Kentucky. His Poems were published in 1880.

ALBERT PIKE

DIXIE

Southrons, hear your country call you! Up, lest worse than death befall you! To arms! To arms! To arms, in Dixie! Lo! all the beacon-fires are lighted,-Let all hearts be now united! To arms! To arms! To arms, in Dixie! Advance the flag of Dixie! Hurrah! Hurrah! For Dixie's land we take our stand, And live or die for Dixie! To arms! To arms! And conquer peace for Dixie! To arms! To arms! And conquer peace for Dixie!

Hear the Northern thunders mutter, Northern flags in South winds flutter: Send them back your fierce defiance! Stamp upon the accursed alliance!

Fear no danger! Shun no labor! Lift up rifle, pike, and saber! Shoulder pressing close to shoulder, Let the odds make each heart bolder!

How the South's great heart rejoices At your cannons' ringing voices, For faith betrayed, and pledges broken, Wrongs inflicted, insults spoken!

Strong as lions, swift as eagles, Back to their kennels hunt these beagles! Cut the unequal bonds asunder: Let them hence each other plunder!

Swear upon your country's altar Never to submit or falter, Till the spoilers are defeated, Till the Lord's work is completed.

Halt not till our Federation Secures among earth's powers its station: Then at peace, and crowned with glory, Hear your children tell the story!

If the loved ones weep in sadness, Victory soon shall bring them gladness,—

To arms! Exultant pride soon banish sorrow. Smiles chase tears away tomorrow. To arms! To arms! To arms, in Dixie! Advance the flag of Dixie! Hurrah! hurrah! For Dixie's land we take our stand. And live or die for Dixie! To arms! To arms! 50 And conquer peace for Dixie! To arms! To arms!

And conquer peace for Dixie! 1861

1861?

10

20

30

THEODORE O'HARA

THE BIVOUAC OF THE DEAD 1

The muffled drum's sad roll has beat The soldier's last tattoo; 2 No more on life's parade shall meet That brave and fallen few. On Fame's eternal camping-ground Their silent tents are spread, And Glory guards, with solemn round, The bivouac of the dead.

No rumor of the foe's advance Now swells upon the wind; No troubled thought at midnight haunts Of loved ones left behind: No vision of the morrow's strife The warrior's dream alarms: No braying horn nor screaming fife At dawn shall call to arms.

Their shivered swords are red with rust; Their plumed heads are bowed: Their haughty banner, trailed in dust, Is now their martial shroud. And plenteous funeral tears have washed The red stains from each brow, And the proud forms, by battle gashed, Are free from anguish now.

The neighing troop, the flashing blade, The bugle's stirring blast, The charge, the dreadful cannonade, The din and shout, are past; Nor war's wild note nor glory's peal Shall thrill with fierce delight Those breasts that never more may feel The rapture of the fight.

<sup>1</sup> This poem was written in memory of Kentucky com-rades killed in the Mexican War and buried in Frankfort, Ky.

A drum call to repair to quarters for the night;

"taps" is "lights out."

60

70

Like a fierce northern hurricane
That sweeps this great plateau,
Flushed with triumph yet to gain,
Came down the serried foe. <sup>1</sup>
Who heard the thunder of the fray
Break o'er the field beneath,
Knew well the watchword of that day
Was "Victory or Death."

Long had the doubtful conflict raged
O'er all that stricken plain,
For never fiercer fight had waged
The vengeful blood of Spain;
And still the storm of battle blew,
Still swelled the gory tide;
Not long, our stout old chieftain 2 knew,
Such odds his strength could bide.

'Twas in that hour his stern command
Called to a martyr's grave
The flower of his beloved land
The nation's flag to save.
By rivers of their fathers' gore
His first-born laurels grew,
And well he deemed the sons would pour
Their lives for glory too.

Full many a norther's breath has swept
O'er Angostura's plain 3—
And long the pitying sky has wept
Above its moldered slain.
The raven's scream, or eagle's flight,
Or shepherd's pensive lay,
Alone awakes each sullen height
That frowned o'er that dread fray.

Sons of the Dark and Bloody Ground, <sup>4</sup>
Ye must not slumber there,
Where stranger steps and tongues resound
Along the heedless air.
Your own proud land's heroic soil
Shall be your fitter grave;
She claims from War his richest spoil—
The ashes of her brave.

Thus 'neath their parent turf they rest,
Far from the gory field;
Borne to a Spartan mother's breast
On many a bloody shield;
The sunlight of their native sky
Smiles sadly on them here,
And kindred eyes and hearts watch by
The heroes' sepulcher.

 The Mexican forces numbered over twenty thousand.
 General Zachary Taylor
 a ridge or tableland near Buena Vista where on February 22-23, 1847, General Taylor won a great the meaning of the Indian word Kentucky

Rest on, embalmed and sainted dead,
Dear as the blood ye gave;
No impious footstep here shall tread
The herbage of your grave;
Nor shall your glory be forgot
While Fame her record keeps,
Or Honor points the hallowed spot
Where Valor proudly sleeps.

Yon marble minstrel's voiceless stone
In deathless song shall tell,
When many a vanished age hath flown,
The story how ye fell;
Nor wreck, nor change, nor winter's blight,
Nor Time's remorseless doom,
Shall dim one ray of glory's light
That gilds your glorious tomb.

1847

MARGARET JUNKIN PRESTON

THE SHADE OF THE TREES

What are the thoughts that are stirring his breast?

What is the mystical vision he sees?
"Let us pass over the river and rest
Under the shade of the trees." 5

Has he grown sick of his toils and his tasks? Sighs the worn spirit for respite or ease? Is it a moment's cool halt that he asks Under the shade of the trees?

Is it the gurgle of waters whose flow
Ofttime has come to him borne on the breeze,
Memory listens to, lapsing so low,
Under the shade of the trees?

Nay—though the rasp of the flesh was so sore, Faith, that had yearnings far keener than these,

Saw the soft sheen of the Thitherward Shore, Under the shade of the trees;—

Caught the high psalms of ecstatic delight, Heard the harps harping like soundings of seas.

Watched earth's assoiled ones walking in white Under the shade of the trees.

O, was it strange he should pine for release, Touched to the soul with such transports as these.

He who so needed the balsam of peace, Under the shade of the trees?

These were the last words of General Thomas Jonathan Jackson, better known as Stonewall Jackson, who was mortally wounded at the battle of Chancellorsville, May, 1863.

Yes, it was noblest for him—it was best (Questioning naught of our Father's decrees)
There to pass over the river and rest
Under the shade of the trees!

1863

FRANCIS ORRAY TICKNOR

LITTLE GIFFEN 1

Out of the focal and foremost fire, Out of the hospital walls as dire, Smitten of grapeshot and gangrene, Eighteenth battle and he sixteen— Specter such as you seldom see, Little Giffen of Tennessee.

"Take him and welcome," the surgeon said;
"Not the doctor can help the dead!"
So we took him and brought him where
The balm was sweet in our summer air;
And we laid him down on a wholesome bed;
Utter Lazarus, heel to head!

And we watched the war with abated breath, Skeleton boy against skeleton death! Months of torture, how many such! Weary weeks of the stick and crutch,—And still a glint in the steel-blue eye Told of a spirit that wouldn't die,

And didn't! Nay! more! in death's despite The crippled skeleton learned to write— <sup>2</sup> "Dear mother!" at first, of course, and then "Dear Captain!" inquiring about the men. Captain's answer: "Of eighty and five, Giffen and I are left alive."

"Johnston 2 pressed at the front," they say;— Little Giffen was up and away! A tear, his first, as he bade good-by, Dimmed the glint of his steel-blue eye. "I'll write, if spared!" There was news of fight, But none of Giffen—he did not write!

I sometimes fancy that were I King
Of the courtly Knights of Arthur's ring,
With the voice of the minstrel in mine ear
And the tender legend that trembles here,
I'd give the best on his bended knee—
The whitest soul of my chivalry—
For Little Giffen of Tennessee.

"Little Giffen" is "A true story of a boy whom Dr. Ticknor nursed back to life at Torch Hill, Georgia." (Quoted from Riverside Classics, "Southern Poems," Houghton Mifflin Company.)
 General Joseph E. Johnston of Virginia

THE VIRGINIANS OF THE VALLEY

The Knightliest of the Knightly race,
That since the days of old,
Have kept the lamp of chivalry
Alive in hearts of gold.
The kindliest of the kindly band
That, rarely hating ease,
Yet rode with Raleigh round the land,
With Smith around the seas.

Who climbed the blue embattled hills Against uncounted foes, And planted there, in valleys fair, The Lily and the Rose! Whose fragrance lives in many lands, Whose beauty stars the earth; And lights the hearths of happy homes With loveliness and worth!

10

20

10

We thought they slept! the sons who kept The names of noble sires.
And slumbered, while the darkness crept Around their vigil fires!
But aye! the "Golden Horseshoe" Knights Their Old Dominion keep, Whose foes have found enchanted ground But not a knight asleep.

TOHN R. THOMPSON

MUSIC IN CAMP

Two armies covered hill and plain, Where Rappahannock's waters Ran deeply crimsoned with the stain Of battle's recent slaughters. <sup>3</sup>

The summer clouds lay pitched like tents In meads of heavenly azure; And each dread gun of the elements Slept in its hid embrasure.

The breeze so softly blew it made
No forest leaf to quiver,
And the smoke of the random cannonade
Rolled slowly from the river.

And now, where circling hills looked down With cannon grimly planted, O'er listless camp and silent town The golden sunset slanted.

When on the fervid air there came A strain, now rich, now tender;

<sup>3</sup> After the battle of Fredericksburg on the Rappahannock River, one of the severest battles of the Civil War, December 13, 1862, the Union and Confederate armies remained all winter encamped on the opposite banks of the river.

20

30

40

60

The music seemed itself aflame With day's departing splendor.

A Federal band, which, eve and morn, Played measures brave and nimble, Had just struck up, with flute and horn And lively clash of cymbal.

Down flocked the soldiers to the banks, Till, margined by its pebbles, One wooded shore was blue with "Yanks," And one was gray with "Rebels."

Then all was still, and then the band, With movement light and tricksy, Made stream and forest, hill and strand, Reverberate with "Dixie."

The conscious stream with burnished glow Went proudly o'er its pebbles, But thrilled throughout its deepest flow With yelling of the Rebels.

Again a pause, and then again
The trumpets pealed sonorous,
And "Yankee Doodle" was the strain
To which the shore gave chorus.

The laughing ripple shoreward flew,
To kiss the shining pebbles;
Loud shrieked the swarming Boys in Blue
Defiance to the Rebels.

And yet once more the bugle sang
Above the stormy riot;
No shout upon the evening rang—
There reigned a holy quiet.

The sad, slow stream its noiseless flood
Poured over the glistening pebbles;
All silent now the Yankees stood,
And silent stood the Rebels.

No unresponsive soul had heard
That plaintive note's appealing.
So deeply "Home, Sweet Home" had stirred
The hidden founts of feeling.

Or Blue, or Gray, the soldier sees,
As by the wand of fairy,
The cottage 'neath the live-oak trees,
The cabin by the prairie.

Or cold, or warm, his native skies
Bend in their beauty o'er him;
Seen through the tear mist in his eyes,
His loved ones stand before him.

As fades the iris after rain
In April's tearful weather,
The vision vanished, as the strain
And daylight died together.

But Memory, waked by Music's art, Expressed in simplest numbers, Subdued the sternest Yankee's heart, Made light the Rebel's slumbers.

And fair the form of Music shines, That bright celestial creature, Who still, 'mid war's embattled lines, Gave this one touch of Nature.

THADDEUS OLIVER

ALL QUIET ALONG THE POTOMAC TONIGHT

"All quiet along the Potomac," they say,
"Except now and then a stray picket
Is shot, as he walks on his beat to and fro,
By a rifleman hid in the thicket.

'Tis nothing—a private or two now and then
Will not count in the news of the battle;
Not an officer lost—only one of the men.
Moaning out, all alone, the death-rattle."

All quiet along the Potomac tonight,
Where the soldiers lie peacefully dreaming;
Their tents in the rays of the clear autumn
moon,

Or the light of the watch-fires, are gleaming. A tremulous sigh as the gentle night-wind Through the forest-leaves softly is creeping; While stars up above, with their glittering eyes. Keep guard, for the army is sleeping.

There's only the sound of the lone sentry's tread,

As he tramps from the rock to the fountain, And thinks of the two in the low trundlebed Far away in the cot on the mountain. 20 His musket falls slack; his face, dark and grim, Grows gentle with memories tender,

As he mutters a prayer for the children asleep. For their mother—may Heaven defend her!

The moon seems to shine just as brightly as then.

That night, when the love yet unspoken

Leaped up to his lips—when low-murmured vows

Were pledged to be ever unbroken.
Then drawing his sleeve roughly over his eyes.
He dashes off tears that are welling,
And gathers his gun closer up to its place
As if to keep down the heart-swelling.

He passes the fountain, the blasted pine tree, The footstep is lagging and weary;

Yet onward he goes, through the broad belt of light,

Toward the shades of the forest so dreary. Hark! was it the night-wind that rustled the

Was it moonlight so wondrously flashing? It looked like a rifle. . . "Ha! Mary, good-bye!" The red life-blood is ebbing and plashing. 40

All quiet along the Potomac tonight,
No sound save the rush of the river;
While soft falls the dew on the face of the dead—
The picket's off duty forever.

1861

JAMES BARRON HOPE OUR ANGLO-SAXON TONGUE

Good is the Saxon speech! clear, short, and strong,

Its clean-cut words, fit both for prayer and song:

Good is this tongue for all the needs of life; Good for sweet words with friend, or child, or wife.

Seax—short sword—and like a sword its sway
Hews out a path 'mid all the forms of speech,
For in itself it hath the power to teach
Itself, while many tongues slow fade away.

'Tis good for laws; for vows of youth and maid:

Good for the preacher; or shrewd folk in trade:

Good for sea-calls when loud the rush of spray;

Good for war-cries where men meet hilt to hilt,

And man's best blood like new-trod wine is spilt —

Good for all times, and good for what thou wilt!

DREAMERS

Fools laugh at dreamers, and the dreamers smile

In answer, if they any answer make:

They know that Saxon Alfred could not bake

The oaten cakes, but that he snatched his Back from the fierce and bloody-handed Dane.

And so, they leave the plodders to their gains—

Quit money-changing for the student's lamp,

And tune the harp to gain thereby some

And tune the harp to gain thereby some camp,

Where what they learn is worth a kingdom's crown:

They fashion bows and arrows to bring

The mighty truths which sail the upper air; To them the facts which make the fools despair

Become familiar, and a thousand things Tell them the secrets they refuse to kings.

UNDER ONE BLANKET

The sun went down in flame and smoke,
The cold night passed without alarms,
And when the bitter morning broke
Our men stood to their arms.

But not a foe in front was found After the long and stubborn fight. The enemy had left the ground Where we had lain that night.

In hollows where the sun was lost
Unthawed still lay the shining snow,
And on the rugged ground the frost
In slender spears did grow.

Close to us, where our final rush
Was made at closing in of day,
We saw, amid an awful hush,
The rigid shapes of clay:

Things, which but yesterday had life, And answered to the trumpet's call, Remained as victims of the strife, Clods of the Valley all!

Then, the grim detail marched away
A grave from the hard soil to wrench
Wherein should sleep the Blue and Gray
All in a ghastly trench!

20

A thicket of young pines arose, Midway upon that frosty ground; A shelter from the winds and snows. And by its edge I found

Two stiffened forms, where they had died.

As sculptured marble white and cold.

Lying together side by side

Beneath one blanket's fold.

20

30

49

My heart already touched and sad
The blanket down I gently drew
And saw a sturdy form, well clad
From head to heel in Blue.

Beside him, gaunt from a many a fast, A pale and boyish "rebel" lay, Free of all pangs of life, at last, In tattered suit of Gray.

There side by side those soldiers slept
Each for the cause that he thought good,
And bowing down my head I wept
Through human brotherhood.

Oh, sirs! it was a piteous thing
To see how they had vainly tried
With strips of shirts, and bits of string
To stay life's ebbing tide!

The story told itself aright;
(Print scarce were plainer to the eye) 50
How they together in the night
Had laid them down to die.

The story told itself, I say,
How smitten by their wounds and cold
They'd nestled close, the Blue and Gray,
Beneath one blanket's fold.

All their poor surgery could do

They did to stop their wounds so deep,
Until at last the Gray and Blue
Like comrades fell asleep.

60

We dug for them a generous grave, Under that somber thicket's lee, And there we laid the sleeping brave To wait God's reveillé.

That grave by many a tear was graced From ragged heroes ranged around As in one blanket they were placed In consecrated ground.

Aye! consecrated, without flaw, Because upon that bloody sod, My soul uplifted stood and saw Where Christ had lately trod!

ABRAM JOSEPH RYAN

THE CONQUERED BANNER

Furl that Banner, for 'tis weary; Round its staff 'tis drooping dreary; Furl it, fold it,—it is best; For there's not a man to wave it,
And there's not a sword to save it.
And there's not one left to lave it
In the blood which heroes gave it;
And its foes now scorn and brave it;
Furl it, hide it.—let it rest!

Take that Banner down! 'tis tattered;
Broken is its staff and shattered;
And the valiant hosts are scattered,
Over whom it floated high.
Oh, 'tis hard for us to fold it,
Hard to think there's none to hold it,
Hard that those who once unrolled it
Now must furl it with a sigh!

Furl that Banner—furl it sadly!
Once ten thousands hailed it gladly,
And ten thousands wildly, madly,
Swore it should forever wave—
Swore that foeman's sword should never Hearts like theirs entwined dissever.

Till that flag should float forever

O'er their freedom or their grave!

Furl it! for the hands that grasped it,
And the hearts that fondly clasped it,
Cold and dead are lying low;
And that Banner—it is trailing,
While around it sounds the wailing
Of its people in their woe.

For, though conquered, they adore it— Love the cold, dead hands that bore it, Weep for those who fell before it, Pardon those who trailed and tore it— But oh, wildly they deplore it, Now who furl and fold it so!

Furl that Banner! True, 'tis gory,
Yet 'tis wreathed around with glory,
And 'twill live in song and story
Though its folds are in the dust!
For its fame on brightest pages,
Penned by poets and by sages,
Shall go sounding down the ages—
Furl its folds though now we must.

Furl that Banner, softly, slowly,
Treat it gently—it is holy,
For it droops above the dead.
Touch it not—unfold it never;
Let it droop there, furled forever,—
For its people's hopes are fled!

1865

HENRY TIMROD 1829-1867

Timrod was the first of three Southern poets who are linked by a similarity in their tragic lives and in their work. He belonged to a family of fighters and poets. He received a good education in a private school in Charleston, South Carolina, the place of his birth, and at seventeen entered the University of Georgia. Lack of funds cut short his attendance after two years, and he turned to law, but soon found himself unfit for that profession. For ten years he taught, and contributed to Russell's Magazine and The Southern Literary Messenger. Denied active service during the Civil War by his delicate physique, he engaged in journalism as correspondent and editor of South Carolina newspapers, rallying the Confederacy by his splendid battle lyrics. The war took the little property he had possessed, and the rest of his short life, spent in Columbia, South Carolina, was a losing fight against destitution and disease.

Timrod's poems were published in 1859, again in 1873, when they were edited by his friend Hayne, and also in a memorial edition, 1899. They fall into three groups: like Wordsworth he interpreted the world of nature with simplicity and restrained emotion; as a poet of love he did some of his best work; his war lyrics include his most notable verse.

Poems (memorial edition), with memoir and portrait, 1899. Criticism: G. A. Wauchope, Henry Timrod: Man and Poet, a Critical Study, 1915; "A Southern Poet," Outlook 68:107-8; Holliday.

I KNOW NOT WHY, BUT ALL THIS WEARY DAY

I know not why, but all this weary day, Suggested by no definite grief or pain, Sad fancies have been flitting through my brain; Now it has been a vessel losing way, Rounding a stormy headland; now a gray Dull waste of clouds above a wintry main; And then, a banner, drooping in the rain, And meadows beaten into bloody clay. Strolling at random with this shadowy woe At heart, I chanced to wander hither! Lo! 10 A league of desolate marsh-land, with its lush, Hot grasses in a noisome, tide-left bed, And faint, warm airs that rustle in the hush, Like whispers round the body of the dead.

MOST MEN KNOW LOVE BUT AS A PART OF LIFE

Most men know love but as a part of life; They hide it in some corner of the breast, Even from themselves; and only when they rest In the brief pauses of that daily strife, Wherewith the world might else be not so rife, They draw it forth (as one draws forth a toy To soothe some ardent, kiss-exacting boy)
And hold it up to sister, child, or wife.
Ah me! why may not love and life be one?
Why walk we thus alone, when by our side, 10
Love, like a visible God, might be our guide?
How would the marts grow noble! and the Worn like a dungeon floor by weary feet, Seem then a golden court-way of the Sun!

1859

CHARLESTON 1

Calm as that second summer which precedes
The first fall of the snow,
In the broad sunlight of heroic deeds,
The city bides the foe.

As yet, behind their ramparts stern and proud, Her bolted thunders sleep,— Dark Sumter, like a battlemented cloud, Looms o'er the solemn deep.

No Calpe <sup>2</sup> frowns from lofty cliff or scar To guard the holy strand; <sup>10</sup> But Moultrie holds in leash her dogs of war Above the level sand.

And down the dunes a thousand guns lie couched,
Unseen, beside the flood,—
Like tigers in some Orient jungle crouched,

That wait and watch for blood

Meanwhile, through streets still echoing with

Walk grave and thoughtful men,
Whose hands may one day wield the patriot's blade
As lightly as the pen.

20

And maidens, with such eyes as would grow dim

Over a bleeding hound,

Seem each one to have caught the strength of Whose sword she sadly bound.

Thus girt without and garrisoned at home,
Day patient following day,
Old Charleston looks from roof and spire and dome,

Across her tranquil bay.

<sup>1</sup> Timrod, "the laureate of the Confederacy," here voices the war feeling so strong in Charleston, where the first engagement of the Civil War took place at Fort Sumter, April, 1861. When he wrote the poem, both Sumter and Moultrie were in the hands of the Confederates.

<sup>2</sup> the ancient name for the rock of Gibraltar

Ships, through a hundred foes, from Saxon 1 lands

And spicy Indian ports. Bring Saxon steel and iron to her hands. And summer to her courts

But still, along von dim Atlantic line. The only hostile smoke Creeps like a harmless mist above the brine. From some frail floating oak.

Shall the spring dawn, and she, still clad in smiles.

And with an unscathed brow.

Rest in the strong arms of her palm-crowned

As fair and free as now?

We know not: in the temple of the Fates God has inscribed her doom: And, all untroubled in her faith, she waits The triumph or the tomb. 1861-62? 1862

SPRING

Spring, with that nameless pathos in the air Which dwells with all things fair, Spring, with her golden suns and silver rain, Is with us once again.

Out in the lonely woods the jasmine burns Its fragrant lamps, and turns Into a royal court with green festoons The banks of dark lagoons.

In the deep heart of every forest tree 10 The blood is all aglee. And there's a look about the leafless bowers As if they dreamed of flowers.

Yet still on every side we trace the hand Of winter in the land. Save where the maple reddens on the lawn. Flushed by the season's dawn;

Or where, like those strange semblances we find That age to childhood bind, The elm puts on, as if in Nature's scorn, 20 The brown of autumn corn.

As yet the turf is dark, although you know That, not a span below, A thousand germs are groping through the gloom.

And soon will burst their tomb.

Already, here and there, on frailest stems Appear some azure gems. Small as might deck, upon a gala day. The forehead of a fay.

In gardens you may note amid the dearth The crocus breaking earth: And near the snowdrop's tender white and green. The violet in its screen.

But many gleams and shadows need must pass Along the budding grass. And weeks go by, before the enamored South Shall kiss the rose's mouth.

Still there's a sense of blossoms vet unborn In the sweet airs of morn: One almost looks to see the very street 40 Grow purple at his feet.

At times a fragrant breeze comes floating by, And brings, you know not why, A feeling as when eager crowds await Before a palace gate

Some wondrous pageant; and you scarce would start,

If from a beech's heart,

A blue-eved Dryad, 2 stepping forth, should say,

"Behold me! I am May!"

Ah! who would couple thoughts of war 3 and crime 50 With such a blessed time! Who in the west wind's aromatic breath Could hear the call of Death!

Yet not more surely shall the spring awake The voice of wood and brake, Than she shall rouse, for all her tranquil charms. A million men to arms.

There shall be deeper hues upon her plains Than all her sunlit rains, And every gladdening influence around. ഒവ Can summon from the ground.

Oh! standing on this desecrated mold, Methinks that I behold. Lifting her bloody daisies up to God, Spring kneeling on the sod.

And calling, with the voice of all her rills, Upon the ancient hills

&lt;sup>1</sup> British supplies came to the South in English ships.

<sup>2</sup> wood nymph 3 the Civil War

To fall and crush the tyrants and the slaves Who turn her meads to graves.

1862

18627

THE COTTON BOLL

While I recline At ease beneath This immemorial pine. Small sphere! (By dusky fingers brought this morning here And shown with boastful smiles), I turn thy cloven sheath, Through which the soft white fibers peer. That, with their gossamer bands, Unite, like love, the sea-divided lands, And slowly, thread by thread, Draw forth the folded strands, Than which the trembling line. By whose frail help yon startled spider fled Down the tall spear-grass from his swinging bed. Is scarce more fine: And as the tangled skein Unravels in my hands.

Betwixt me and the noonday light, A veil seems lifted, and for miles and miles The landscape broadens on my sight, As, in the little boll, there lurked a spell Like that which, in the ocean shell, With mystic sound.

Breaks down the narrow walls that hem us round.

And turns some city lane Into the restless main, With all his capes and isles!

And lo!

Yonder bird. Which floats, as if at rest, In those blue tracts above the thunder, where No vapors cloud the stainless air, And never sound is heard, Unless at such rare time When, from the City of the Blest, Rings down some golden chime. Sees not from his high place So vast a cirque of summer space As widens round me in one mighty field, Which, rimmed by seas and sands, Doth hail its earliest daylight in the beams Of gray Atlantic dawns; And, broad as realms made up of many lands, Is lost afar Behind the crimson hills and purple lawns Of sunset, among plains which roll their streams Against the Evening Star!

To the remotest point of sight, Although I gaze upon no waste of snow. The endless field is white: And the whole landscape glows, For many a shining league away, With such accumulated light As Polar lands would flash beneath a tropic Nor lack there (for the vision grows, And the small charm within my hands— More potent even than the fabled one. Which oped whatever golden mystery 60 Lay hid in fairy wood or magic vale, The curious ointment of the Arabian tale 1— Beyond all mortal sense Doth stretch my sight's horizon, and I see, Beneath its simple influence, As if, with Uriel's 2 crown, I stood in some great temple of the Sun. And looked, as Uriel, down!) Nor lack there pastures rich and fields all green With all the common gifts of God, For temperate airs and torrid sheen Weave Edens of the sod: Through lands which look one sea of billowy Broad rivers wind their devious ways; A hundred isles in their embraces fold A hundred luminous bays;

And through yon purple haze Vast mountains lift their plumed peaks cloud-crowned; And, save where up their sides the plowman creeps. An unhewn forest girds them grandly round, In whose dark shades a future navy sleeps! Ye Stars, which, though unseen, yet with me

Upon this loveliest fragment of the earth! Thou Sun, that kindlest all thy gentlest rays Above it, as to light a favorite hearth! Ye Clouds, that in your temples in the West See nothing brighter than its humblest flowers! And you, ye Winds, that on the ocean's breast Are kissed to coolness ere ye reach its bowers! Bear witness with me in my song of praise, And tell the world that, since the world began,

No fairer land hath fired a poet's lays, Or given a home to man!

<sup>1</sup>In the story of the Blind Baba, Abdalla, the magic ointment if applied to the left eye caused one to behold all the treasures of the earth, but if applied to the right eye destroyed the sight. Abdalla, doubting, applied it to both and lost both treasures and sight.

<sup>2</sup> One of the seven archangels mentioned in the Books of Esdras and by Milton; he is generally thought of as an angel of light.

But these are charms already widely blown! His be the meed whose pencil's trace Hath touched our very swamps with grace, And round whose tuneful way All Southern laurels bloom; The Poet of "The Woodlands," unto whom Alike are known
The fute's low breathing and the trumpets'

And the soft west wind's sighs;
But who shall utter all the debt,
O Land wherein all powers are met
That bind a people's heart,
The world doth owe thee at this day,
And which it never can repay,
Yet scarcely deigns to own!
Where sleeps the poet who shall fitly sing
The source wherefrom doth spring
That mighty commerce which, confined
To the mean channels of no selfish mart,
Goes out to every shore
Of this broad earth, and throngs the sea with ships

That bear no thunders; hushes hungry lips In alien lands; Joins with a delicate web remotest strands;

Joins with a delicate web remotest strands; And gladdening rich and poor, Doth gild Parisian domes,

Or feed the cottage-smoke of English homes, And only bounds its blessings by mankind! 120 In offices like these, thy mission lies, My Country! and it shall not end As long as rain shall fall and heaven bend In blue above thee; though thy foes be hard And cruel as their weapons, it shall guard Thy hearth-stones as a bulwark; make thee

In white and bloodless state;
And haply, as the years increase—
Still working through its humbler reach

Still working through its humbler reach
With that large wisdom which the ages teach—

Revive the half-dead dream of universal peace! As men who labor in that mine
Of Cornwall, hollowed out beneath the bed
Of ocean, when a storm rolls overhead,
Hear the dull booming of the world of brine
Above them, and a mighty muffled roar
Of winds and waters, yet toil calmly on,
And split the rock, and pile the massive ore,
Or carve a niche, or shape the arched roof;
So I, as calmly, weave my woof
Of song, chanting the days to come,
Unsilenced, though the quiet summer air
Stirs with the bruit of battles, and each dawn
Wakes from its starry silence to the hum

Of many gathering armies. Still. In that we sometimes hear. Upon the Northern winds, the voice of woe Not wholly drowned in triumph, though I know The end must crown us, and a few brief years Drv all our tears. I may not sing too gladly. To Thy will Resigned, O Lord! we cannot all forget That there is much even Victory must regret. And, therefore, not too long From the great burthen of our country's wrong Delay our just release! And, if it may be, save These sacred fields of peace From stain of patriot or of hostile blood! Oh, help us, Lord! to roll the crimson flood Back on its course, and, while our banners Northward, strike with us! till the Goth 2 shall cling

To his own blasted altar-stones, and crave
Mercy; and we shall grant it, and dictate
The lenient future of his fate

There, where some rotting ships and crumbling quays

Shall one day mark the Port which ruled the Western seas.

1861-65

AT MAGNOLIA CEMETERY 3

Sleep sweetly in your humble graves, Sleep, martyrs of a fallen cause; Though yet no marble column craves The pilgrim here to pause.

In seeds of laurel in the earth
The blossom of your fame is blown,
And somewhere, waiting for its birth,
The shaft is in the stone!

Meanwhile, behalf the tardy years
Which keep in trust your storied tombs,
Behold! your sisters bring their tears,
And these memorial blooms.

Small tributes! but your shades will smile More proudly on these wreaths today, Than when some cannon-molded pile Shall overlook this bay.

Stoop, angels, hither from the skies! There is no holier spot of ground

<sup>2</sup> Timrod thought of the Northern so'diers as like the Goths and Vandals who came down upon Rome.
<sup>3</sup> This poem, written for Memorial Day, 1867, in honor of the Confederate soldiers buried in Magnolia Cemetery, Charleston, was Timrod's last work.

the home of William Gilmore Simms

Than where defeated valor lies, By mourning beauty crowned.

1867

PAUL HAMILTON HAYNE 1830-1886

Hayne, often called "the poet of the pine," was born in Charleston, South Carolina; he came of good old Southern stock, and was a nephew of Senator Hayne of South Carolina. After graduating from the University of South Carolina he devoted himself to literature. He edited in succession several periodicals and contributed to The Southern Literary Messenger. Volumes of his poems appeared from 1855 to 1882: separate titles are Avolio and Other Poems, 1857; Legends and Lyrics, 1872; The Mountain of the Lovers, 1875. After serving through the Civil War on General

After serving through the Civil War on General Pickett's staff, Hayne retired, ruined in fortune and health, to "Copse Hill," a humble cottage in the pine barrens near Augusta, Georgia, where for fifteen years he struggled courageously to support himself and his family. Hamilton Mabie says: "He touched the two themes which lay deepest in his heart, love of nature and love of the personal ideals of the old South, with perfect sincerity, with deep tenderness, and with lyric sweetness." But it is as a poet of nature that he excelled.

Poems, complete ed. with biographical sketch by Margaret J. Preston, 1882. "Last of the Literary Cavaliers," Ind. 87:92, a short sketch by his son. "Some Unpublished Letters of Wilkie Collins." Bookm. 37:66-71; Holliday.

SHELLEY

Because they thought his doctrines were not just, 1

Mankind assumed for him the chastening rod, And tyrants reared in pride, and strong in lust. Wounded the noblest of the sons of God; The heart's most cherished benefactions riven, Basely they strove to humble and malign A soul whose charities were wide as heaven, Whose deeds, if not his doctrines, were divine; And in the name of Him, whose sunshine warms The evil as the righteous, deemed it good 10 To wreak their bigotry's relentless storms On one whose nature was not understood. Ah, well! God's ways are wondrous; it may

His seal hath not been set to man's decree.

1857

ODE TO SLEEP

Beyond the sunset and the amber sea

To the lone depths of ether, cold and bare,

Percy Bysshe Shelley, 1792-1822, was criticized for his extreme political and social views.

9 Thy influence, soul of all tranquillity.

Hallows the earth and awes the reverent air; Yon laughing rivulet quells its silvery tune; The pines, like priestly watchers tall and grim.

Stand mute against the pensive twilight dim, Breathless to hail the advent of the moon; From the white beach the ocean falls away Coyly, and with a thrill; the sea-birds

Ghostlike from out the distance, and depart With a gray fleetness, moaning the dead day; The wings of Silence, overfolding space.

Droop with dusk grandeur from the heavenly

And through the stillness gleams thy starry face.—

Serenest Angel-Sleep!

Come! woo me here, amid these flowery charms, Breathe on my eyelids; press thy odorous lips

Close to mine own, enwreathe me in thine arms,
And cloud my spirit with thy sweet eclipse;
20

No dreams! no dreams! keep back the motley throng,—

For such are girded round with ghastly might, And sing low burdens of despondent song, Decked in the mockery of a lost delight;

I ask oblivion's balsam! the mute peace Toned to still breathings, and the gentlest sighs;

Not music woven of rarest harmonies Could yield me such elysium of release: The tones of earth are weariness,—not only 'Mid the loud mart, and in the walks of trade,

But where the mountain Genius broodeth lonely, In the cool pulsing of the sylvan shade;

Then bear me far into thy noiseless land; Surround me with thy silence, deep on deep, Until serene I stand

Close by a duskier country, and more grand, Mysterious solitude, than thine, O Sleep!

As he whose veins a feverous frenzy burns, Whose life-blood withers in the fiery drouth, Feebly and with a languid longing turns

To the spring breezes gathering from the South,

So, feebly and with languid longing, I Turn to thy wishes nepenthe, <sup>2</sup> and implore

The golden dimness, the purpureal gloom Which haunt thy poppied realm, and make the shore

<sup>2</sup> originally an Egyptian drug—possibly opium: poetically, anything that causes sleep Of thy dominion balmy with all bloom: In the clear gulfs of thy serene profound, Worn passions sink to quiet, sorrows pause, Suddenly fainting to still-breathed rest; Thou own'st a magical atmosphere, which awes

The memories seething in the turbulent breast;

breast;
Which, muffling up the sharpness of all sound
Of mortal lamentations,—solely bears
The silvery minor toning of our woe,
All mellowed to harmonious underflow,
Soft as the sad farewells of dying years,—
Lulling as sunset showers that veil the west,
And sweet as Love's last tears
When over-welling hearts do mutely weep:
O griefs! O wailings! your tempestuous mad-

Merged in a regal quietude of sadness, Wins a strange glory by the streams of sleep!

Then woo me here, amid these flowery charms. Breathe on my eyelids, press thy odorous lips Close to mine own,—enfold me in thine arms. And cloud my spirit with thy sweet eclipse: And while from waning depth to depth I fall. Down lapsing 1 to the utmost depths of all. Till wan forgetfulness obscurely stealing. Creeps like an incantation on the soul, And o'er the slow ebb of my conscious life Dies the thin flush of the last conscious feel-

And like abortive thunder, the dull roll
Of sullen passions ebbs far, far away,—
O Angel! loose the chords which cling to strife.
Sever the gossamer bondage of my breath,
And let me pass, gently as winds in May,
From the dim realm which owns thy shadowy sway,

To thy diviner sleep, O sacred Death! 1857

THE MOCKING-BIRDS

Oh, all day long they flood with song
The forest shades, the fields of light;
Heaven's heart is stilled and strangely thrilled
By ecstasies of lyric might;
From flower-crowned nooks of splendid dyes,
Lone dells a shadowy quiet girds;
Far echoes, wakening, gently rise,
And o'er the woodland track send back
Soft answers to the mocking-birds.

The winds, in awe, no gusty flaw

Dare breathe in rhythmic Beauty's face;

Nearer the pale-gold cloudlets draw
Above a charmed, melodious place:
Entrancèd Nature listening knows
No music set to mortal words,
Nor nightingales that woo the rose,
Can vie with these deep harmonies
Poured from the minstrel mocking-birds.

But, vaguely seen through gulfs of green,
We glimpse the plumed and choral throng—
Sole poets born whose instincts scorn
To do Song's lowliest utterance wrong:
Whate'er they sing, a sylvan art,
On each wild, wood-born note conferred,
Guides the hot brain and hurtling heart.
Oh magical flame, whence pulsing came
This passion of the mocking-bird?

Aye—pause and hark—be still, and mark
What countless grades of voice and tone
From bosk and tree, from strand and sea,
These small, winged genii make their own:
31

Fine lyric memories live again,
From tuneful burial disinterred,
To magnify the fiery strain
Which quivering trills and smites the hills
With rapture of the mocking-bird.

Aye—pause and hark—be still, and mark
How downward borne from Song's high clime
(No loftier haunts the English lark)
They revel, each a jocund mime: 2 40
Their glad sides shake in bush and brake;
And farm-girls, bowed o'er cream and curd.
Glance up to smile, and think the while
Of all blithe things that flit on wings
None match the jovial mocking-bird.

When fun protrudes gay interludes
Of blissful, glorious unrestraint,
They run, all wild with motley moods,
Thro' Mirth's rare gamut, sly and quaint:
Humors grotesque and arabesque
Flash up from spirits brightly stirred;
And even the pedant at his desk,
Feeling in turn his spirit burn,
Laughs with the loudest mocking-bird.

Oh, all day long the world with song
Is flooded, till the twilight dim;
What time its whole mysterious soul
Seems rippling to the conscious brim:
Arcadian Eve through tranquil skies
Pastures her stars in radiant herds;

60

Pastures her stars in radiant herds And still the unwearied echoes rise,

1 gliding

<sup>2</sup> mimic

And down a silvery track send back Fond greeting to the mocking-birds.

At last, fair boon, the summer moon,
Beyond the hazed horizon shines;
Ah, soon through night they wing their flight
To coverts of Aeolian pines:
A tremulous hush—then sweet and grand,
From depths the dense, fair foliage girds,
Their love notes fill the enchanted land;
Through leaf-wrought bars they storm the stars,
These love songs of the mocking-birds.

VICKSBURG 1

For sixty days and upwards,
A storm of shell and shot
Rained round us in a flaming shower,
But still we faltered not.
"If the noble city perish,"
Our grand young leader said,
"Let the only walls the foe shall scale
Be ramparts of the dead!"

For sixty days and upwards,
The eye of heaven waxed dim;
And even throughout God's holy morn,
O'er Christian prayer and hymn,
Arose a hissing tumult,
As if the fiends in air
Strove to engulf the voice of faith
In the shrieks of their despair.

There was wailing in the houses,
There was trembling on the marts,
While the tempest raged and thundered,
'Mid the silent thrill of hearts;
But the Lord, our shield, was with us,
And ere a month had sped,
Our very women walked the streets
With scarce one throb of dread.

And the little children gamboled,
Their faces purely raised,
Just for a wondering moment,
As the huge bombs whirled and blazed;
Then turned with silvery laughter
To the sports which children love,
Thrice-mailed in the sweet, instinctive thought
That the good God watched above.

Yet the hailing bolts fell faster, From scores of flame-clad ships,

Vicksburg was besieged from May 18 until July 4, 1863, and then fell into the hands of the Union forces. And about us, denser, darker,
Grew the conflict's wild eclipse,
Till a solid cloud closed o'er us,
Like a type of doom and ire,
Whence shot a thousand quivering tongues
Of forked and yengeful fire.

But the unseen hands of angels
Those death-shafts warned aside,
And the dove of heavenly mercy
Ruled o'er the battle tide;
In the houses ceased the wailing,
And through the war-scarred marts
The people strode, with step of hope,
To the music in their hearts.

ASPECTS OF THE PINES

Tall, somber, grim, against the morning sky
They rise, scarce touched by melancholy airs.
Which stir the fadeless foliage dreamfully.
As if from realms of mystical despairs.

Tall, somber, grim, they stand with dusky gleams

Brightening to gold within the woodland's core,

Beneath the gracious noontide's tranquil beams,— But the weird winds of morning sigh no more.

A stillness, strange, divine, ineffable,

Broods round and o'er them in the wind's surcease,

And on each tinted copse and shimmering dell

And on each tinted copse and shimmering dell Rests the mute rapture of deep-hearted peace.

Last, sunset comes—the solemn joy and might Borne from the west when cloudless day declines—

Low, flute-like breezes sweep the waves of light, And, lifting dark green tresses of the pines.

Till every lock is luminous—gently float,
Fraught with hale odors up the heavens afar,
To faint when twilight on her virginal throat
Wears for a gem the tremulous vesper star.
20

THE ROSE AND THORN

She's loveliest of the festal throng
In delicate form and Grecian face,—
A beautiful, incarnate song,
A marvel of harmonious grace,
And yet I know the truth I speak:
From those gay groups she stands apart,

A rose upon her tender cheek. A thorn within her heart

Though bright her eyes' bewildering gleams, Fair tremulous lips and shining hair. A something born of mournful dreams Breathes round her sad enchanted air: No blithesome thoughts at hide and seek From out her dimples smiling start: If still the rose be on her cheek. A thorn is in her heart.

Young lover, tossed 'twixt hope and fear, Your whispered yow and yearning eyes Yon marble Clytie 1 pillared near 20 Could move as soon to soft replies: Or, if she thrill at words you speak, Love's memory prompts the sudden start; The rose has paled upon her cheek, The thorn has pierced her heart.

THE PINE'S MYSTERY

Listen! the somber foliage of the Pine A swart Gitana 2 of the woodland trees, Is answering what we may but half divine. To those soft whispers of the twilight breeze!

Passion and mystery murmur through the leaves.

Passion and mystery, touched by deathless

Whose monotone of long, low anguish grieves For something lost that shall not live again!

A LITTLE WHILE I FAIN WOULD LINGER YET 3

A little while (my life is almost set!) I fain would pause along the downward way, Musing an hour in this sad sunset-ray, While, Sweet! our eyes with tender tears are

A little hour I fain would linger yet.

A little while I fain would linger yet, All for love's sake, for love that cannot tire; Though fervid youth be dead, with youth's desire,

And hope has faded to a vague regret, 10 A little while I fain would linger yet.

A little while I fain would linger here:

1 a nymph loved by Apollo

2 gypsy maiden
 3 This and the following poem were written shortly before the death of Hayne.

Behold! who knows what strange, mysterious hars

'Twixt souls that love may rise in other

Nor can love deem the face of death is fair: A little while I still would linger here.

A little while I yearn to hold thee fast. Hand locked in hand, and loval heart to (O pitving Christ! those woeful words, "We part!")

So ere the darkness fall, the light be past, A little while I fain would hold thee fast.

A little while, when night and twilight Behind, our broken years! before, the deep Weird wonder of the last unfathomed sleep.— A little while I still would clasp thee Sweet:

A little while, when night and twilight meet.

A little while I fain would linger here: Behold! who knows what soul-dividing bars Earth's faithful loves may part in other

Nor can love deem the face of death is fair: A little while I still would linger here.

IN HARBOR

I think it is over, over, I think it is over at last: Voices of foeman and lover. The sweet and the bitter have passed: Life, like a tempest of ocean Hath outblown its ultimate blast: There's but a faint sobbing seaward While the calm of the tide deepens leeward, And behold! like the welcoming quiver Of heart-pulses throbbed through the river. Those lights in the harbor at last. The heavenly harbor at last!

I feel it is over! over! For the winds and the waters surcease: Ah, few were the days of the rover That smiled in the beauty of peace! And distant and dim was the omen That hinted redress or release! From the ravage of life, and its riot, 20 What marvel I yearn for the quiet Which bides in the harbor at last,-For the lights, with their welcoming quiver That throbs through the sanctified river, Which girdles the harbor at last. This heavenly harbor at last?

I know it is over, over,
I know it is over at last!

Down sail! the sheathed anchor uncover,
For the stress of the voyage has passed:

Life, like a tempest of ocean

Hath outbreathed its ultimate blast:

There's but a faint sobbing to seaward, While the calm of the tide deepens leaward; And behold! like the welcoming quiver Of heart-pulses throbbed through the river, Those lights in the harbor at last, The heavenly harbor at last!

FROM THE CIVIL WAR TO THE END OF THE CENTURY

HE thirty-five years between 1865 and 1900 produced in the United States a greater amount of writing than the previous two and a half centuries. The tremendous growth of these years in population, native and immigrant, the increase in wealth following the push westward to the Pacific, and the development of eastern manufactures to meet the demands of a richer and more thickly settled America combined to give both desire and means for literary expression. Newspapers and magazines grew apace; great numbers of schools and colleges sprang up; the popular imagination was stirred by life upon the advancing border; the scientific discoveries of the middle of the century were already quickening thought and enlarging its borders. All these facts made for the growth of an extensive and many-sided literature.

During this period regional writings developed; "local color" came out of South, East, and West—Harris, Miss Wilkins, Bret Harte may stand as examples. A new romance came into being from the life of ranch and mine and the Pacific seaboard, a romance growing directly out of the conditions of American life, and founded upon a realism quite in line with the spread of scientific consciousness. This mingling of the real and the romantic is found even in the growing body of "nature essays" as in seen in the writings of Muir and Burroughs.

During these years the influence of Whitman was strengthening. His inroads upon existing literary forms and vogues did not produce wide-spread results before 1900; but his worship of "the man on the street" stimulated the literary imagination from the first: the continent, it seemed, might be conquered by and for a truly democratic population, and the abstract equality and brotherhood of man implied in the Declaration of Independence and the Revolution might be realized. Despite Whitman's rough and raucous utterance there was in his view of American life a largeness that approached majesty and began to give color to the writings of the period. Gradually through these years, American literature was becoming recognizable as such, not by virtue of the local color in Southern streams and Western hills, but by virtue of a national tone that proclaimed a distinctive way of thought.

WALT WHITMAN 1819-1892

Contemporary with the New England poets-for he was born in the same year with Lowell and died in the year after Lowell's death-Whitman stands as much apart from them as if he belonged to a different world of art and of thought. His ancestry was partly Dutch, partly English Quaker; his father was a farmer-carpenter and building contractor at Westhills, Long Island, where his son was born. Whitman received some education in the public schools of Brooklyn and New York, and learned the trades of carpentry and typesetting; but though at times he followed these, his life was more or less wandering and experimental. most significant employment was the editing of newspapers in Brooklyn and New Orleans. For these papers he wrote some conventional verse. Leaves of Grass appeared in 1855, but because it abandoned traditional poetic forms attracted little favorable attention except from Emerson. In 1862 Whitman became a nurse in the Union Army and remained in this service until after the close of the war. Afterwards he was made clerk in the Treasury Department, where he worked until he suffered a stroke of paralysis in 1873. Aside from Leaves of Grass, which appeared in eleven editions during his life. his chief works are Drum Taps, 1865; Specimen Days and Collect, prose, 1882; Good-bye, My Fancy, 1891.

Since the publication of Leaves of Grass, Whitman has been the most discussed American poet both at home and abroad. His poems, daring in their rejection of established poetic form, were—largely for that very reason—hailed by Europeans as a product that revealed, at length, the real American art. For that same reason, too, he was largely repudiated at home. He exalted the common people, yet he was received joyfully only by the sophisticated and enlightened. Whitman's poetry and formal poetry are at one in spirit and substance. Both come from and touch the emotions; both are full of image and picture; both suggest rather than explain the idea. The body is the same. It is the garb that differs. In form and method of expression Whitman has been followed by poets of genuine worth; he has also been copied by many poetasters without message or imagination, or patience to master the technique of an art. His rather confused utterances concerning democracy may fade in importance, but his services to poetry remain: he awakened it from a too complacent faith in its conventional forms, and he showed the limitless possibilities of the commonplace in arousing emotions.

Even respecting democracy, Whitman's sober opinions were less visionary than may commonly be supposed. He knew that democracy could be attained only through the slow development of social forces. In "Democratic Vistas" (1871) he

"The purpose of democracy—supplanting old belief in the necessary absoluteness of establish'd dynastic rulership, temporal, ecclesiastical, and scholastic, as furnishing the only security against chaos, crime, and ignorance—is, through many transmigrations, and amid endless ridicules, arguments, and ostensible failures, to illustrate, at all hazards, this doctrine or theory that man, properly train'd in sanest, highest freedom, may and must become a law, and series of laws, unto himself . . ."

(And:)

"In short, and to sum up, America, betaking herself to formative action (as it is about time for more solid achievement, and less windy promise,) must, for her purposes, cease to recognize a theory of character grown of feudal aristocracies, or form'd by merely literary standards, or from any ultramarine, full-dress formulas of culture, polish, caste, etc., and must sternly promulgate her own new standard, yet old enough, and accepting the old, the perennial elements, and combining them into groups, unities, appropriate to the modern, the democratic, the West, and to the practical occasions and needs of our own cities, and of the agricultural regions."

Biography and criticism: The Whitman bibliography is enormous. The following items are standard, and some are of recent date: J. Burroughs, Whitman: a Study, 1896; B. Perry, W. Whitman: His Life and Works, (AML) 1906; G. R. Carpenter, W. Whitman, (EML) 1909; J. Bailey (EML ns) 1925; I. H. Platt, (BB) 1904; E. Hubbard, (LJ) 1896; H. Traubel, With Walt Whitman in Camden, 3 vols. 1906-1914; E. Holloway, Whitman, an Interpretation in Narrative. 1926; C. Rogers, The Magnificent Idler, (imaginative, based on fact) 1926; Sherman; More (Shel. 4); C. E. Stedman, "Walt Whitman," Scrib. M. (now Cent.) 21:47-64; same, Poets of America, 1885; G. Bradford, "Portraits of American Authors," Bookm. 42: 533-48; W. R. Thayer, "Personal Recollections of Walt Whitman," Scrib. M. 65:674-87; W. B. Cairns, "Walt Whitman," Yale R. ns 8:737-54; N. Foerster, "Whitman and the Cult of Confusion," No. Am. 213:799-812.

From SONG OF MYSELF

Ι

I celebrate myself, and sing myself, And what I assume you shall assume, For every atom belonging to me as good belongs to you.

I loafe and invite my soul, I lean and loafe at my ease observing a spear of summer grass.

My tongue, every atom of my blood, form'd from this soil, this air,

Born here of parents born here from parents the same, and their parents the same, Hoping to cease not till death.

By permission of Underwood and Underwood

WALT WHITMAN

Creeds and schools in abevance.

Retiring back a while sufficed at what they are, but never forgotten.

I harbor for good or bad, I permit to speak at every hazard.

Nature without check with original energy. 1855

From *LEAVES OF GRASS*CROSSING BROOKLYN FERRY

1

Flood-tide below me! I see you face to face! Clouds of the west—sun there half an hour high—I see you also face to face.

Crowds of men and women attired in the usual costumes, how curious you are to me!
On the ferry-boats the hundreds and hundreds that cross, returning home, are more curious to me than you suppose,

And you that shall cross from shore to shore years hence are more to me, and more in my meditations, than you might suppose.

2

The impalpable sustenance of me from all things at all hours of the day,

The simple, compact, well-join'd scheme, myself disintegrated, every one disintegrated yet part of the scheme,

The similitudes of the past and those of the future.

The glories strung like beads on my smallest sights and hearings, on the walk in the street and the passage over the river,

The current rushing so swiftly and swimming with me far away,

The others that are to follow me, the ties between me and them,

The certainty of others, the life, love, sight, hearing of others.

Others will enter the gates of the ferry and cross from shore to shore,

Others will watch the run of the flood-tide,

Others will see the shipping of Manhattan north and west, and the heights of Brooklyn to the south and east,

Others will see the islands large and small; Fifty years hence, others will see them as they cross, the sun half an hour high,

A hundred years hence, or ever so many hundred years hence, others will see them,

Will enjoy the sunset, the pouring-in of the flood-tide, the falling-back to the sea of the ebb-tide.

3

It avails not, time nor place—distance avails not.

I am with you, you men and women of a generation, or ever so many generations hence

Just as you feel when you look on the river and sky, so I felt,

Just as any of you is one of a living crowd, I was one of a crowd,

Just as you are refresh'd by the gladness of the river and the bright flow, I was refresh'd.

Just as you stand and lean on the rail, yet hurry with the swift current, I stood yet was hurried.

Just as you look on the numberless masts of ships and the thick-stemm'd pipes of steamboats, I look'd.

I too many and many a time cross'd the river of old.

Watched the Twelfth-month 1 sea-gulls, saw them high in the air floating with motionless wings, oscillating their bodies,

Saw how the glistening yellow lit up parts of their bodies and left the rest in strong shadow,

Saw the slow-wheeling circles and the gradual edging toward the south,

Saw the reflection of the summer sky in the water,

Had my eyes dazzled by the shimmering track of beams.

Look'd at the fine centrifugal spokes of light round the shape of my head in the sunlit

Look'd on the haze on the hills southward and south-westward.

Look'd on the vapor as it flew in fleeces tinged with violet,

Look'd toward the lower bay to notice the vessels arriving.

Saw their approach, saw aboard those that were near me,

Saw the white sails of schooners and sloops, saw the ships at anchor,

The sailors at work in the rigging or out astride the spars,

The round masts, the swinging motion of the hulls, the slender serpentine pennants,

December in Quaker terminology; cf. "Ninth-month midnight" 1. 3, p. 681 and "Fifth-month grass," l. 24, p. 682, in "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking."

The large and small steamers in motion, the pilots in their pilot-houses,

The white wake left by the passage, the quick tremulous whirl of the wheels.

The flags of all nations, the falling of them at sunset.

The scallop-edged waves in the twilight, the ladled cups, the frolicsome crests and glistening.

The stretch afar growing dimmer and dimmer, the gray walls of the granite storehouses by the docks.

On the river the shadowy group, the big steamtug closely flank'd on each side by the barges, the hay-boat, the belated lighter,

On the neighboring shore the fires from the foundry chimneys burning high and glaringly into the night,

Casting their flicker of black contrasted with wild red and yellow light over the tops of houses, and down into the clefts of streets.

4

These and all else were to me the same as they are to you.

I loved well those cities, loved well the stately and rapid river.

The men and women I saw were all near to me, Others the same—others who look back on me because I look'd forward to them,

(The time will come, though I stop here today and tonight.)

5

What is it then between us?

What is the count of the scores or hundreds of years between us?

Whatever it is, it avails not—distance avails not, and place avails not,

I too lived, Brooklyn of ample hills was mine, I too walk'd the streets of Manhattan island, and bathed in the waters around it.

I too felt the curious abrupt questionings stir within me,

In the day among crowds of people sometimes they came upon me, 60

In my walks home late at night or as I lay in my bed they came upon me,

I too had been struck from the float forever held in solution,

I too had receiv'd identity by my body,

That I was I knew was of my body, and what I should be I knew I should be of my body.

б

It is not upon you alone the dark patches fall, The dark threw its patches down upon me also, The best I had done seem'd to me blank and suspicious.

My great thoughts as I supposed them, were they not in reality meager?

Nor is it you alone who know what it is to be

I am he who knew what it was to be evil, 70 I too knitted the old knot of contrariety.

Blabb'd, blush'd, resented, lied, stole, grudg'd, Had guile, anger, lust, hot wishes I dared not speak.

Was wayward, vain, greedy, shallow, sly, cowardly, malignant.

The wolf, the snake, the hog, not wanting in me, The cheating look, the frivolous word, the adulterous wish, not wanting,

Refusals, hates, postponements, meanness, laziness, none of these wanting,

Was one with the rest, the days and haps of the

Was call'd by my nighest name by clear loud voices of young men as they saw me approaching or passing,

Felt their arms on my neck as I stood, or the negligent leaning of their flesh against me as I sat.

Saw many I loved in the street or ferry-boat or public assembly, yet never told them a word

Lived the same life with the rest, the same old laughing, gnawing, sleeping,

Play'd the part that still looks back on the actor or actress,

The same old role, the role that is what we make it, as great as we like,

Or as small as we like, or both great and small.

7

Closer yet I approach you.

What thought you have of me now, I had as much of you—I laid in my stores in advance,

I consider'd long and seriously of you before you were born.

Who was to know what should come home to me?

me? Who knows but I am enjoying this?

Who knows, for all the distance, but I am as good as looking at you now, for all you cannot see me?

ጳ

Ah, what can ever be more stately and admirable to me than mast-hemm'd Man-

River and sunset and scallop-edg'd waves of flood-tide?

The sea-gulls oscillating their bodies, the hayboat in the twilight, and the belated lighter?

What gods can exceed these that clasp me by the hand, and with voices I love call me promptly and loudly by my nighest name as I approach?

What is more subtle than this which ties me to the woman or man that looks in my face?

Which fuses me into you now, and pours my meaning into you?

We understand then do we not?

What I promis'd without mentioning it, have you not accepted?

What the study could not teach—what the preaching could not accomplish is accomplish'd, is it not?

9

Flow on, river! flow with the flood-tide, and ebb with the ebb-tide!

Frolic on, crested and scallop-edg'd waves!

Gorgeous clouds of the sunset! drench with your splendor me, or the men and women generations after me!

Cross from shore to shore, countless crowds of passengers!

Stand up, tall masts of Mannahatta! stand up, beautiful hills of Brooklyn!

Throb, baffled and curious brain! throw out questions and answers!

Suspend here and everywhere, eternal float of solution!

Gaze, loving and thirsting eyes, in the house or street or public assembly!

Sound out, voices of young men! loudly and musically call me by my nighest name!

Live, old life! play the part that looks back on the actor or actress!

Play the old role, the role that is great or small according as one makes it!

Consider, you who peruse me, whether I may not in unknown ways be looking upon

Be firm, rail over the river, to support those who lean idly, yet haste with the hasting current;

Fly on, sea-birds! fly sideways, or wheel in large circles high in the air:

Receive the summer sky, you water, and faithfully hold it till all downcast eyes have time to take it from you!

Diverge, fine spokes of light, from the shape of my head, or any one's head. in the sunlit water!

Come on, ships from the lower bay! pass up or down, white-sail'd schooners, sloops.

Flaunt away, flags of all nations! be duly lower'd at sunset!

Burn high your fires, foundry chimneys! cast black shadows at nightfall! cast red and yellow light over the tops of the houses!

Appearances, now or henceforth, indicate what you are, 120

You necessary film, continue to envelop the soul.

About my body for me, and your body for you. be hung our divinest aromas.

Thrice, cities—bring your freight, bring your shows, ample and sufficient rivers,

Expand, being than which none else is perhaps more spiritual,

Keep your places, objects than which none else is more lasting.

You have waited, you always wait, you dumb, beautiful ministers,

We receive you with free sense at last, and are insatiate henceforward.

Not you any more shall be able to foil us, or withhold yourselves from us,

We use you, and do not cast you aside—we plant you permanently within us,

We fathom you not—we love you—there is perfection in you also,

You furnish your parts toward eternity,

Great or small, you furnish your parts toward the soul.

1856

OUT OF THE CRADLE ENDLESSLY ROCKING

Out of the cradle endlessly rocking,

Out of the mocking-bird's throat, the musical shuttle,

Out of the Ninth-month midnight,

Over the sterile sands and the fields beyond, where the child leaving his bed wander'd alone, bareheaded, barefoot,

Down from the shower'd halo.

Up from the mystic play of shadows twining and twisting as if they were alive,

Out from the patches of briers and blackberries.

From the memories of the bird that chanted to me.

From your memories sad brother, from the fitful risings and fallings I heard,

From under that yellow half-moon late-risen and swollen as if with tears,

From those beginning notes of yearning and love there in the mist,

From the thousand responses of my heart never to cease.

From the myriad thence-arous'd words,

From the word stronger and more delicious than

From such as now they start the scene revisiting, As a flock, twittering, rising, or overhead passing.

Borne hither, ere all eludes me, hurriedly, A man, yet by these tears a little boy again, Throwing myself on the sand, confronting the waves,

I, chanter of pains and joys, uniter of here and hereafter,

Taking all hints to use them, but swiftly leaping beyond them,

A reminiscence sing.

Once Paumanok. 1

When the lilac-scent was in the air and Fifthmonth grass was growing,

Up this seashore in some briers,

Two feather'd guests from Alabama, two together,

And their nest, and four light-green eggs spotted with brown,

And every day the he-bird to and fro near at hand,

And every day the she-bird crouch'd on her nest, silent, with bright eyes,

And every day I, a curious boy, never too close, never disturbing them,

Cautiously peering, absorbing, translating.

Shine! shine! shine! Pour down your warmth, great sun! While we bask, we two together.

Two together!
Winds blow south, or winds blow north,
Day come white, or night come black,
Home, or rivers and mountains from home,
Singing all time, minding no time,
While we two keep together.

Till of a sudden,

May-be kill'd, unknown to her mate,

One forenoon the she-bird crouch'd not on the

Nor return'd that afternoon, nor the next, Nor ever appear'd again.

And thenceforward all summer in the sound of the sea.

And at night under the full of the moon in calmer weather.

Over the hoarse surging of the sea, Or flitting from brier to brier by day,

I saw, or heard at intervals the remaining one, the he-bird.

The solitary guest from Alabama.

Blow! blow! blow!

Blow up sea-winds along Paumanok's shore; I wait and I wait till you blow my mate to me.

Yes, when the stars glisten'd, All night long on the prong of a moss-scallop'd stake.

Down almost amid the slapping waves, Sat the lone singer wonderful causing tears.

He call'd on his mate,

He pour'd forth the meanings which I of all men know.

Yes my brother I know,

The rest might not, but I have treasur'd every note,

For more than once dimly down to the beach gliding,

Silent, avoiding the moonbeams, blending myself with the shadows,

Recalling now the obscure shapes, the echoes, the sounds and sights after their sorts,

The white arms out in the breakers tirelessly tossing.

I, with bare feet, a child, the wind wafting my hair.

Listen'd long and long.

Listen'd to keep, to sing, now translating the notes,

Following you my brother.

40

Soothe! soothe! soothe! Close on its wave soothes the wave behind, And again another behind embracing and lapping, every one close,

But my love soothes not me, not me.

The Indian name for Long Island; Whitman used it at first as a pseudonym.

Low hangs the moon, it rose late,
It is lagging—O I think it is heavy with love, with love.

O madly the sea pushes upon the land, With love, with love.

O night! do I not see my love fluttering out among the breakers?

What is that little black thing I see there in the white?

Loud! loud! loud!
Loud I call to you, my love!
High and clear I shoot my voice over the waves,
Surely you must know who is here, is here,
You must know who I am, my love.

Low-hanging moon!
What is that dusky spot in your brown yellow?
O it is the shape, the shape of my mate!
O moon do not keep her from me any longer.

Land! land! O land! 90
Whichever way I turn, O I think you could give me my mate back again if you only would.

For I am almost sure I see her dimly whichever way I look.

O rising stars!

Perhaps the one I want so much will rise, will rise with some of you.

O throat! O trembling throat!
Sound clearer through the atmosphere!
Pierce the woods, the earth,
Somewhere listening to catch you must be the one I want.

Shake out carols!
Solitary here, the night's carols!
Carols of lonesome love! death's carols!
Carols under that lagging, yellow, waning moon!
O under that moon where she droops almost down into the sea!
O reckless despairing carols.

But soft! sink low!
Soft! let me just murmur,
And do you wait a moment you husky-nois'd
sea,
For somewhere I believe I heard my mate responding to me,
So faint, I must be still, be still to listen,
But not altogether still, for then she might not come immediately to me.

Hither my love! Here I am! here! With this iust-sustain'd note I announce myself to you,

This gentle call is for you my love, for you.

Do not be decov'd elsewhere.

That is the whistle of the wind, it is not my voice.

That is the fluttering, the fluttering of the spray,

Those are the shadows of leaves.

O darkness! O in vain!
O I am very sick and sorrowful.

120

O brown halo in the sky near the moon, drooping upon the sea!
O troubled reflection in the sea!
O throat! O throbbing heart!
And I singing uselessly, uselessly all the night.

O past! O happy life! O songs of joy! In the air, in the woods, over fields, Loved! loved! loved! loved! But my mate no more, no more with me! We two together no more.

The aria sinking,
All else continuing, the stars shining,
The winds blowing, the notes of the bird continuous echoing.

With angry moans the fierce old mother incessantly moaning.

On the sands of Paumanok's shore gray and rustling.

The yellow half-moon enlarged, sagging down, drooping, the face of the sea almost touching,

The boy ecstatic, with his bare feet the waves, with his hair the atmosphere dallying,

The love in the heart long pent, now loose, now at last tumultuously bursting,

The aria's meaning, the ears, the soul, swiftly depositing,

The strange tears down the cheeks coursing, The colloquy there, the trio, each uttering,

The conodity there, the tho, each ditering,

The undertone, the savage old mother incessantly crying,

141

To the boy's soul's questions sullenly timing, some drown'd secret hissing,

To the outsetting bard.

Demon or bird! (said the boy's soul), Is it indeed toward your mate you sing? or is it really to me?

For I, that was a child, my tongue's use sleeping, now I have heard you, Now in a moment I know what I am for, I awake.

And already a thousand singers, a thousand songs, clearer, louder and more sorrowful than yours,

A thousand warbling echoes have started to life within me, never to die.

O you singer solitary, singing by yourself, projecting me, 150

O solitary me listening, never more shall I cease perpetuating you,

Never more shall I escape, never more the reverberations,

Never more the cries of unsatisfied love be absent from me,

Never again leave me to be the peaceful child I was before what there in the night,

By the sea under the yellow and sagging moon, The messenger there arous'd, the fire, the sweet hell within.

The unknown want, the destiny of me.

O give me the clew! (it lurks in the night here somewhere).

O if I am to have so much, let me have more!

A word then, (for I will conquer it),
The word final, superior to all,

Subtle, sent up—what is it?—I listen;

Are you whispering it, and have been all the time, you sea-waves?

Is that it from your liquid rims and wet sands?

Whereto answering, the sea, Delaying not, hurrying not,

Whisper'd me through the night, and very plainly before daybreak,

Lisp'd to me the low and delicious word death And again death, death, death, death,

Hissing melodious, neither like the bird nor like my arous'd child's heart,

But edging near as privately for me rustling at my feet,

Creeping thence steadily up to my ears and laving me softly all over,

Death, death, death, death.

Which I do not forget,

But fuse the song of my dusky demon and brother,

That he sang to me in the moonlight on Paumanok's gray beach,

With the thousand responsive songs at random, My own songs awaked from that hour,

And with them the key, the word up from the waves,

The word of the sweetest song and all songs.

That strong and delicious word which, creeping to my feet, 181

(Or like some old crone rocking the cradle. swathed in sweet garments, bending aside)

The sea whisper'd me.

1859

ME IMPERTURBE 1

Me imperturbe, standing at ease in Nature, Master of all or mistress of all, aplomb in the midst of irrational things.

Imbued as they, passive, receptive, silent as they.

Finding my occupation, poverty, notoriety, foibles, crimes, less important than I thought.

Me toward the Mexican sea, or in the Mannahatta or the Tennessee, or far north or inland.

A river man, or a man of the woods or of any farm-life of these States or of the coast, or the lakes or Kanada,

Me wherever my life is lived, O to be self-balanced for contingencies.

To confront night, storms, hunger, ridicule, accidents, rebuffs, as the trees and animals do.

1860

POETS TO COME

Poets to come! orators, singers, musicians to

Not today is to justify me and answer what I am for,

But you, a new brood, native, athletic, continental, greater than before known,

Arouse! for you must justify me.

I myself but write one or two indicative words for the future,

I but advance a moment only to wheel and hurry back in the darkness.

I am a man who, sauntering along without fully stopping, turns a casual look upon you and then averts his face,

Leaving it to you to prove and define it, Expecting the main things from you.

1860

As here, Whitman often coins words to fit his purpose the correct Latin form being me imperturbato, "I undisturbed." It is interesting to note the extreme range of Whitman's vocabulary, which includes such quasi-learned words as "fetor," "libertad," the "parturient earth," and such phrases as "so long."

I HEAR AMERICA SINGING

I hear America singing, the varied carols I hear, Those of mechanics, each one singing his as it should be blithe and strong.

The carpenter singing his as he measures his plank or beam.

The mason singing his as he makes ready for work, or leaves off work.

The boatman singing what belongs to him in his boat, the deck-hand singing on the steamboat deck.

The shoemaker singing as he sits on his bench, the hatter singing as he stands.

The wood-cutter's song, the plowboy's on his way in the morning, or at noon intermission or at sundown,

The delicious singing of the mother, or of the young wife at work, or of the girl sewing or washing,

Each singing what belongs to him or her and to none else, 9

The day what belongs to the day—at night the party of young fellows, robust, friendly, Singing with open mouths their strong melodious songs.

1860

I SAW IN LOUISIANA A LIVE-OAK GROWING

I saw in Louisiana a live-oak growing, All alone stood it and the moss hung down from the branches, Without any companion it grew there uttering joyous leaves of dark green, And its look, rude, unbending, lusty, made me think of myself.

But I wonder'd how it could utter joyous leaves standing alone there without its friend near..for I knew I could not,

And I broke off a twig with a certain number of leaves upon it, and twined around it a little moss.

And brought it away, and I have placed it in sight in my room,

It is not needed to remind me as of my own dear friends,

(For I believe lately I think of little else than of them.)

Yet it remains to me a curious token, it makes me think of manly love; 10

For all that, and though the live-oak glistens there in Louisiana solitary in a wide flat space.

Uttering joyous leaves all its life without a friend, a lover near,

I know very well I could not.

AS AT THY PORTALS ALSO DEATH

As at thy portals also death.

Entering thy sovereign, dim, illimitable grounds, To memories of my mother, to the divine blending, maternity.

To her, buried and gone, yet buried not, gone not from me.

(I see again the calm benignant face fresh and beautiful still.

I sit by the form in the coffin,

I kiss and kiss convulsively again the sweet old lips, the cheeks, the closed eyes in the coffin;)

To her, the ideal woman, practical, spiritual, of all of earth, life, love, to me the best,

I grave a monumental line, before I go, amid these songs.

And set a tombstone here.

FOR YOU, O DEMOCRACY

Come, I will make the continent indissoluble, I will make the most splendid race the sun ever shone upon,

I will make divine magnetic lands, With the love of comrades, With the life-long love of comrades.

I will plant companionship thick as trees along all the rivers of America, and along the shores of the great lakes, and all over the prairies.

I will make inseparable cities with their arms about each other's necks,

By the love of comrades,

By the manly love of comrades.

For you these from me, O Democracy, to serve you ma femme! 1

For you, for you I am trilling these songs.

1860

9

SO LONG!

To conclude, I announce what comes after me.

I remember I said before my leaves sprang at all.

I would raise my voice jocund and strong with reference to consummations.

When America does what was promis'd,

When through these States walk a hundred millions of superb persons,

When the rest part away for superb persons and contribute to them,

<sup>1860 1</sup> my wife

When breeds of the most perfect mothers denote America.

Then to me and mine our due fruition.

I have press'd through in my own right.

I have sung the body and the soul, war and peace have I sung, and the songs of life and death.

And the songs of birth, and shown that there are many births.

I have offer'd my style to every one, I have journey'd with confident step:

While my pleasure is yet at the full I whisper So long!

And take the young woman's hand and the young man's hand for the last time.

I announce natural persons to arise,

I announce justice triumphant.

I announce uncompromising liberty and equal-

I announce the justification of candor and the justification of pride.

I announce that the identity of these States is a single identity only,

I announce the Union more and more compact, indissoluble,

I announce splendors and majesties to make all the previous politics of the earth insignificant.

I announce adhesiveness, I say it shall be limitless, unloosen'd.

I say you shall yet find the friend you were looking for.

I announce a man or woman coming, perhaps you are the one, (So long!)

I announce the great individual, fluid as Nature, chaste, affectionate, compassionate, fully arm'd.

I announce a life that shall be copious, vehement, spiritual, bold,

I announce an end that shall lightly and joyfully meet its translation.

I announce myriads of youths, beautiful, gigantic, sweet-blooded,

I announce a race of splendid and savage old men.

O thicker and faster—(So long!) O crowding too close upon me,

I foresee too much, it means more than I thought.

It appears to me I am dying.

Hasten throat and sound your last. Salute me-salute the days once more. Peal the old cry once more.

Screaming electric, the atmosphere using, At random glancing, each as I notice absorb-

Swiftly on, but a little while alighting, Curious envelop'd messages delivering,

Sparkles hot, seed ethereal down in the dirt dropping.

Myself unknowing, my commission obeying, to question it never daring,

To ages and ages yet the growth of the seed leaving.

To troops out of the war arising, they the tasks I have set promulging,

To women certain whispers of myself bequeathing, their affection me more clearly explaining,

To young men my problems offering-no dallier I—I the muscle of their brains try-

So I pass, a little time vocal, visible, contrary, Afterward a melodious echo, passionately bent for, (death making me really undying)

The best of me then when no longer visible, for toward that I have been incessantly preparing.

What is there more, that I lag and pause and crouch extended with unshut mouth? Is there a single final farewell?

My songs cease, I abandon them, From behind the screen where I hid I advance personally solely to you.

Camerado, this is no book. Who touches this touches a man, (Is it night? are we here together alone?) It is I you hold and who holds you, I spring from the pages into your arms—decease calls me forth.

O how your fingers drowse me, Your breath falls around me like dew, your pulse lulls the tympans of my ears, I feel immerged from head to foot, Delicious, enough.

Enough O deed impromptu and secret, Enough O gliding present—enough O summ'dup past.

Dear friend whoever you are take this kiss. I give it especially to you, do not forget me. I feel like one who has done work for the day to retire awhile.

I receive now again of my many translations, from my avataras 1 ascending, while others doubtless await me.

An unknown sphere more real than I dream'd, more direct, darts awakening ravs about me, So long!

Remember my words, I may again return, I love you. I depart from materials. I am as one disembodied, triumphant, dead.

1860

PIONEERS! O PIONEERS!

Come my tan-faced children, Follow well in order, get your weapons ready. Have you your pistols? have you your sharpedged axes?

Pioneers! O pioneers!

For we cannot tarry here,

We must march my darlings, we must bear the brunt of danger.

We the youthful sinewy races, all the rest on us depend.

Pioneers! O pioneers!

O you youths, Western youths, So impatient, full of action, full of manly pride and friendship.

Plain I see you Western youths, see you tramping with the foremost,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Have the elder races halted? Do they droop and end their lesson, wearied over there beyond the seas?

We take up the task eternal, and the burden and the lesson.

Pioneers! O pioneers!

All the past we leave behind. We debouch upon a newer mightier world, varied world,

Fresh and strong the world we seize, world of labor and the march,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

We detachments steady throwing, Down the edges, through the passes, up the mountains steep,

Conquering, holding, daring, venturing as we go the unknown ways,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

We primeval forests felling.

We the rivers stemming, vexing we and piercing deep the mines within.

We the surface broad surveying, we the virgin soil upheaving.

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Colorado men are we.

From the peaks gigantic, from the great sierras and the high plateaus,

From the mine and from the gully, from the hunting trail we come,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

From Nebraska, from Arkansas,

Central inland race are we. from Missouri, with the continental blood intervein'd,

All the hands of comrades clasping, all the Southern, all the Northern,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

O resistless restless race!

O beloved race in all! O my breast aches with tender love for all!

O I mourn and yet exult. I am rapt with love for all.

Pioneers! O pioneers!

40

Raise the mighty mother mistress,

Waving high the delicate mistress, over all the starry mistress, (bend your heads all)

Raise the fang'd and warlike mistress, stern, impassive, weapon'd mistress,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

See my children, resolute children,

Dy those swarms upon our rear we must never yield or falter,

Ages back in ghostly millions frowning there behind us urging,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

On and on the compact ranks,

With accessions ever waiting, with the places of the dead quickly fill'd,

Through the battle, through defeat, moving yet and never stopping,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

O to die advancing on!

Are there some of us to droop and die? has the hour come?

Then upon the march we fittest die, soon and sure the gap is fill'd,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

<sup>1</sup> previous incarnations

All the pulses of the world,

Falling in they beat for us, with the Western movement beat.

Holding single or together, steady moving to the front, all for us,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Life's involv'd and varied pageants.

All the forms and shows, all the workmen at their work,

All the seamen and the landsmen, all the masters with their slaves, Pioneers! O pioneers!

All the hapless silent lovers,

All the prisoners in the prisons, all the righteous and the wicked.

All the joyous, all the sorrowing, all the living, all the dying.

Pioneers! O pioneers!

I too with my soul and body,

We, a curious trio, picking, wandering on our way,

Through these shores amid the shadows, with the apparitions pressing,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Lo, the darting bowling orb!

Lo, the brother orbs around, all the clustering suns and planets,

All the dazzling days, all the mystic nights with dreams,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

These are of us, they are with us,

All for primal needed work, while the followers there in embryo wait behind,

We today's procession heading, we the route for travel clearing.

80

Pioneers! O pioneers!

O you daughters of the West!

O you young and elder daughters! O you mothers and you wives!

Never must you be divided, in our ranks you move united,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Minstrels latent on the prairies!

(Shrouded bards of other lands, you may rest, you have done your work)

Soon I hear you coming warbling, soon you rise and tramp amid us.

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Not for delectations sweet.

Not the cushion and the slipper, not the peaceful and the studious, 90

Not the riches safe and palling, not for us the tame enjoyment,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Do the feasters gluttonous feast?

Do the corpulent sleepers sleep? have they lock'd and bolted doors?

Still be ours the diet hard, and the blanket on the ground.

Pioneers! O pioneers!

Has the night descended?

Was the road of late so toilsome? did we stop discouraged nodding on our way?

Yet a passing hour I yield you in your tracks to pause oblivious,

Pioneers! O pioneers!

100

Till with sound of trumpet,

Far, far off the daybreak call—hark! how loud and clear I hear it wind,

Swift! to the head of the army!—swift! spring to your places.

Pioneers! O pioneers!

1865

EIGHTEEN SIXTY-ONE 1

Arm'd year-year of the struggle,

No dainty rimes or sentimental love verses for you terrible year.

Not you as some pale poetling seated at a desk lisping cadenzas piano,

But as a strong man erect, clothed in blue clothes, advancing, carrying a rifle on your shoulder.

With well-gristled body and sunburnt face and hands, with a knife in the belt at your side,

As I heard you shouting loud, your sonorous voice ringing across the continent,

Your masculine voice O year, as rising amid the great cities,

Amid the men of Manhattan I saw you as one of the workmen, the dwellers in Manhattan,

Or with large steps crossing the prairies out of Illinois and Indiana,

Rapidly crossing the West with springy gait and descending the Alleghanies, 10

One of the most noble phases of Whitman's life was his work in the hospitals of Washington during the entire Civil War. He so gave of his strength and spirit to the suffering and dying soldiers that they came to look upon him as almost an angel of mercy. See Edith Wharton's striking story, "The Spark." Or down from the great lakes or in Pennsylvania, or on deck along the Ohio river.

Or southward along the Tennessee or Cumberland rivers, or at Chattanooga on the mountain top.

Saw I your gait and saw I your sinewy limbs clothed in blue, bearing weapons, robust year.

Heard your determin'd voice launch'd forth

Year that suddenly sang by the mouths of the round-lipp'd cannon.

I repeat you, hurrying, crashing, sad, distracted year.

1865

CAVALRY CROSSING A FORD

A line in long array where they wind betwixt green islands,

They take a serpentine course, their arms flash in the sun—hark to the musical clank,

Behold the silvery river, in it the splashing horses loitering stop to drink,

Behold the brown-faced men, each group, each person a picture, the negligent rest on the saddles.

Some emerge on the opposite bank, others are just entering the ford—while,

Scarlet and blue and snowy white.

The guidon <sup>1</sup> flags flutter gavly in the wind.

1865

BIVOUAC ON A MOUNTAIN SIDE

I see before me now a traveling army halting, Below a fertile valley spread, with barns and the orchards of summer,

Behind, the terraced sides of a mountain, abrupt in places rising high.

Broken, with rocks, with clinging cedars, with tall shapes dingily seen.

The numerous camp-fires scatter'd near and far, some away up on the mountain,

The shadowy forms of men and horses, loom ing, large-sized, flickering,

And over all the sky—the sky! far, far out of reach, studded, breaking out, the eternal stars.

1865

COME UP FROM THE FIELDS FATHER

Come up from the fields father, here's a letter from our Pete,

And come to the front door mother, here's a letter from thy dear son.

Lo. 'tis autumn.

Lo, where the trees, deeper green, yellower and redder.

Cool and sweeten Ohio's villages with leaves fluttering in the moderate wind.

Where apples ripe in the orchards hang and grapes on the trellis'd vines.

(Smell you the smell of the grapes on the vines?

Smell you the buckwheat where the bees were lately buzzing?)

Above all, lo, the sky so calm, so transparent after the rain, and with wondrous clouds,

Below too, all calm, all vital and beautiful, and the farm prospers well.

Down in the fields all prospers well,

But now from the fields come father, come at the daughter's call,

And come to the entry mother, to the front door come right away.

Fast as she can she hurries, something ominous, her steps trembling.

She does not tarry to smooth her hair nor adjust her cap.

Open the envelope quickly.—

O this is not our son's writing, yet his name is sign'd,

O a strange hand writes for our dear son, O stricken mother's soul!

All swims before her eyes, flashes with black, she catches the main words only.

Sentences broken, gunshot wound in the breast, cavalry skirmish, taken to hospital, 20 At present low, but will soon be better.

Ah now the single figure to me.

Amid all teeming and wealthy Ohio with all its cities and farms;

Sickly white in the face and dull in the head, very faint,

By the jamb of a door leans.

Grieve not so, dear mother, (the just-grown daughter speaks through her sobs,

The little sisters huddle around speechless and dismay'd)

See, dearest mother, the letter says Pete will soon be better.

&lt;sup>1</sup> a pennant-like guide flag used especially by mounted

Alas poor boy, he will never be better, (nor may-be needs to be better, that brave and simple soul.)

While they stand at home at the door he is dead already.

The only son is dead.

But the mother needs to be better,

She with thin form presently drest in black,

By day her meals untouch'd, then at night fitfully sleeping, often waking,

In the midnight waking, weeping, longing with one deep longing,

O that she might withdraw unnoticed, silent from life escape and withdraw,

To follow, to seek, to be with her dear dead son. 1865

A MARCH IN THE RANKS HARD-PREST, AND THE ROAD UNKNOWN <sup>1</sup>

A march in the ranks hard-prest, and the road unknown.

A route through a heavy wood with muffled steps in the darkness,

Our army foil'd with loss severe, and the sullen remnant retreating.

Till after midnight glimmer upon us the lights of a dim-lighted building,

We come to an open space in the woods, and halt by the dim-lighted building,

'Tis a large old church at the crossing roads, now an impromptu hospital,

Entering but for a minute I see a sight beyond all the pictures and poems ever made,

Shadows of deepest, deepest black, just lit by moving candles and lamps,

And by one great pitchy torch stationary with wild red flame and clouds of smoke,

By these, crowds, groups of forms vaguely I see on the floor, some in the pews laid down.

At my feet more distinctly a soldier, a mere lad, in danger of bleeding to death, (he is shot in the abdomen)

I stanch the blood temporarily, (the youngster's face is white as a lily)

Then before I depart I sweep my eyes o'er the scene fain to absorb it all,

Faces, varieties, postures beyond description, most in obscurity, some of them dead, <sup>1</sup> Is Whitman's unflinching realism in his war poetry as shown in this poem and also in "The Wounddresser," due to lack of delicacy or to a fuller and more exact sense of the horrors of war than most poets have had the means of acquiring? Surgeons operating, attendants holding lights, the smell of ether, the odor of blood.

The crowd, O the crowd of the bloody forms, the yard outside also fill'd.

Some on the bare ground, some on planks or stretchers, some in the death-spasm sweating.

An occasional scream or cry, the doctor's shouted orders or calls.

The glisten of the little steel instruments catching the glint of the torches,

These I resume as I chant, I see again the forms, I smell the odor,

Then hear outside the orders given, Fall in, my men, fall in;

But first I bend to the dying lad, his eyes open, a half-smile gives he me,

Then the eyes close, calmly close, and I speed forth to the darkness.

Resuming, marching, ever in darkness marching, on in the ranks,

The unknown road still marching.

1865

A SIGHT IN CAMP IN THE DAYBREAK GRAY AND DIM

A sight in camp in the daybreak gray and dim, As from my tent I emerge so early sleepless,

As slow I walk in the cool fresh air the path near by the hospital tent,

Three forms I see on stretchers lying, brought out there untended lying,

Over each the blanket spread, ample brownish woolen blanket.

Gray and heavy blanket, folding, covering all.

Curious I halt and silent stand,

Then with light fingers I from the face of the nearest the first just lift the blanket;

Who are you elderly man so gaunt and grim, with well-gray'd hair, and flesh all sunken about the eyes?

Who are you my dear comrade?

Then to the second I step—and who are you my child and darling?

Who are you sweet boy with cheeks yet blooming?

Then to the third—a face nor child nor old, very calm, as of beautiful yellow-white ivory;

Young man I think I know you—I think this face is the face of the Christ himself,

Dead and divine and brother of all, and here again he lies.

1865

AS TOILSOME I WANDER'D VIRGINIA'S WOODS

As toilsome I wander'd Virginia's woods,

To the music of rustling leaves kick'd by my feet, (for 'twas autumn').

I mark'd at the foot of a tree the grave of a soldier:

Mortally wounded he and buried on the retreat, (easily all could I understand),

The halt of a mid-day hour, when up! no time to lose—yet this sign left.

On a tablet scrawl'd and nail'd on the tree by the grave.

Bold, cautious, true, and my loving comrade.

Long, long I muse, then on my way go wandering.

Many a changeful season to follow, and many a scene of life.

Yet at times through changeful season and scene, abrupt, alone, or in the crowded street.

Comes before me the unknown soldier's grave, comes the inscription rude in Virginia's woods.

Bold, cautious, true, and my loving comrade.

1865

THE WOUND-DRESSER

1

An old man bending I come among new faces, Years looking backward resuming in answer to children.

Come tell us old man, as from young men and maidens that love me.

(Arous'd and angry, I'd thought to beat the alarum, and urge relentless war,

But soon my fingers fail'd me, my face droop'd and I resign'd myself,

To sit by the wounded and soothe them, or silently watch the dead;)

Years hence of these scenes, of these furious passions, these chances,

Of unsurpass'd heroes, (was one side so brave? the other was equally brave;)

Now be witness again, paint the mightiest armies of earth,

Of those armies so rapid so wondrous what saw you to tell us?

What stays with you latest and deepest? of curious panics,

Of hard-fought engagements or sieges tremendous what deepest remains?

2

O maidens and young men I love and that love me,

What you ask of my days those the strangest and sudden your talking recalls.

Soldier alert I arrive after a long march cover'd with sweat and dust.

In the nick of time I come, plunge in the fight, loudly shout in the rush of successful charge.

Enter the captur'd works—yet lo, like a swiftrunning river they fade.

Pass and are gone, they fade—I dwell not on soldiers' perils or soldiers' joys,

(Both I remember well—many the hardships, few the joys, yet I was content.)

But in silence, in dreams' projections, 20 While the world of gain and appearance and mirth goes on.

So soon what is over forgotten, and waves wash the imprints off the sand.

With hinged knees returning I enter the doors, (while for you up there.

Whoever you are, follow without noise and be of strong heart.)

Bearing the bandages, water and sponge, Straight and swift to my wounded I go,

Where they lie on the ground after the battle brought in,

Where their priceless blood reddens the grass the ground,

Or to the rows of the hospital tent, or under the roof'd hospital,

To the long rows of cots up and down each side
I return.
30

To each and all one after another I draw near, not one do I miss,

An attendant follows holding a tray, he carries a refuse pail,

Soon to be fill'd with clotted rags and blood, emptied, and fill'd again.

I onward go, I stop,

With hinged knees and steady hand to dress wounds,

I am firm with each, the pangs are sharp yet unavoidable,

One turns to me his appealing eyes—poor boy!

I never knew you,

Yet I think I could not refuse this moment to die for you, if that would save you.

On, on I go, (open doors of time! open hospital doors!)

The crush'd head I dress, (poor crazed hand tear not the bandage away.)

The neck of the cavalry-man with the bullet through and through I examine,

Hard the breathing rattles, quite glazed already the eye, yet life struggles hard, (Come sweet death! be persuaded O beautiful death!

In mercy come quickly.)

From the stump of the arm, the amputated hand

I undo the clotted lint, remove the slough, wash off the matter and blood,

Back on his pillow the soldier bends with curv'd neck and side-falling head,

His eyes are closed, his face is pale, he dares not look on the bloody stump.

And has not yet look'd on it.

I dress a wound in the side, deep, deep,
But a day or two more, for see the frame all wasted and sinking,

And the vellow-blue countenance see.

I dress the perforated shoulder, the foot with the bullet-wound,

Cleanse the one with a gnawing and putrid gangrene, so sickening, so offensive,

While the attendant stands behind aside me holding the tray and pail.

I am faithful, I do not give out,

The fractur'd thigh, the knee, the wound in the abdomen.

These and more I dress with impassive hand, (yet deep in my breast a fire, a burning flame).

4

Thus in silence in dreams' projections,

Returning, resuming, I thread my way through the hospitals.

The hurt and wounded I pacify with soothing hand.

I sit by the restless all the dark night, some are so young,

Some suffer so much, I recall the experience sweet and sad.

(Many a soldier's loving arms about this neck have cross'd and rested,

Many a soldier's kiss dwells on these bearded lips).

GIVE ME THE SPLENDID SILENT SUN

1

Give me the splendid silent sun with all his beams full-dazzling.

Give me juicy autumnal fruit ripe and red from the orchard,

Give me a field where the unmow'd grass grows, Give me an arbor, give me the trellis'd grape,

Give me fresh corn and wheat, give me serenemoving animals teaching content.

Give me nights perfectly quiet as on high plateaus west of the Mississippi, and I looking up at the stars,

Give me odorous at sunrise a garden of beautiful flowers where I can walk undisturb'd,

Give me for marriage a sweet-breath'd woman of whom I should never tire,

Give me a perfect child, give me away aside from the noise of the world a rural domestic life, 9

Give me to warble spontaneous songs recluse by myself, for my own ears only,

Give me solitude, give me Nature, give me again O Nature your primal sanities!

These demanding to have them, (tired with ceaseless excitement, and rack'd by the war-strife.)

These to procure incessantly asking, rising in cries from my heart,

While yet incessantly asking still I adhere to my city.

Day upon day and year upon year O city, walking your streets.

Where you hold me enchain'd a certain time refusing to give me up,

Yet giving to make me glutted, enrich'd of soul, you give me forever faces;

(O I see what I sought to escape, confronting, reversing my cries,

I see my own soul trampling down what it ask'd for.)

2

Keep your splendid silent sun,

Keep your woods O Nature, and the quiet places by the woods,

Keep your fields of clover and timothy, and your corn-fields and orchards,

Keep the blossoming buckwheat fields where the Ninth-month bees hum;

Give me faces and streets—give me these phantoms incessant and endless along the trottoirs! <sup>1</sup>

Give me interminable eyes—give me women give me comrades and lovers by the thousand!

Let me see new ones every day—let me hold new ones by the hand every day!

Give me such shows—give me the streets of

Give me Broadway, with the soldiers marching —give me the sound of the trumpets and drums!

(The soldiers in companies or regiments—some starting away, flush'd and reckless,

Some, their time up, returning with thinn'd ranks, young, yet very old, worn, marching, noticing nothing;)

Give me the shores and wharves heavy-fringed with black ships!

O such for me! O an intense life, full to repletion and varied!

The life of the theater, bar-room, huge hotel, for me!

The saloon of the steamer! the crowded excursion for me! the torchlight procession!

The dense brigade bound for the war, with high piled military wagons following;

People, endless, streaming, with strong voices, passions, pageants,

Manhattan streets with their powerful throbs, with beating drums as now,

The endless and noisy chorus, the rustle and clank of muskets, (even the sight of the wounded.)

Manhattan crowds, with their turbulent musical

Manhattan faces and eyes forever for me.

1865

O TAN-FACED PRAIRIE-BOY!

O tan-faced prairie-boy,

Before you came to camp came many a welcome gift,

Praises and presents came and nourishing food, till at last among the recruits,

You came, taciturn, with nothing to give—we but look'd on each other,

When lo! more than all the gifts of the world you gave me.

1865

LOOK DOWN, FAIR MOON

Look down, fair moon, and bathe this scene, Pour softly down night's nimbus floods on faces ghastly, swollen, purple,

On the dead on their backs with arms toss'd wide,

Pour down your unstinted nimbus sacred moon. 1865

RECONCILIATION

Word over all, beautiful as the sky,

Beautiful that war and all its deeds of carnage must in time be utterly lost.

That the hands of the sisters Death and Night incessantly softly wash again, and ever again, this soil'd world:

For my enemy is dead, a man divine as myself is dead.

I look where he lies white-faced and still in the coffin—I draw near.

Bend down and touch lightly with my lips the white face in the coffin.

1865

WEAVE IN, MY HARDY LIFE

Weave in, weave in, my hardy life,

Weave yet a soldier strong and full for great campaigns to come,

Weave in red blood, weave sinews in like ropes, the senses, sight weave in,

Weave lasting sure, weave day and night the weft, the warp, incessant weave, tire not,

(We know not what the use O life, nor know the aim, the end, nor really aught we know,

But know the work, the need goes on and shall go on, the death envelop'd march of peace as well as war goes on,)

For great campaigns of peace the same the wiry threads to weave,

We know not why or what, yet weave, forever weave.

1865

OUT OF THE ROLLING OCEAN THE CROWD

Out of the rolling ocean the crowd came a drop gently to me,

Whispering, I love you, before long I die, I have travel'd a long way merely to look on

For I could not die till I once look'd on you, For I fear'd I might afterward lose you.

you, to touch you,

Now we have met, we have look'd, we are safe, Return in peace to the ocean my love,

I too am part of that ocean my love, we are not so much separated,

Behold the great rondure, the cohesion of all, how perfect!

But as for me, for you, the irresistible sea is to separate us,

As for an hour carrying us diverse, yet cannot carry us diverse forever;

Be not impatient—a little space—know you I salute the air, the ocean and the land.

Every day at sundown for your dear sake my love.

1865

In wafted clouds, in myriads large, or squads of twos or threes or single ones they come, And silently gather round me.

From every point of the compass out of the

TO A CERTAIN CIVILIAN

Did you ask dulcet rimes from me?

Did you seek the civilian's peaceful and languishing rimes?

Did you find what I sang erewhile so hard to follow?

Why I was not singing erewhile for you to follow, to understand—nor am I now: (I have been born of the same as the war was born.

The drum-corps' rattle is ever to me sweet music, I love well the martial dirge,

With slow wail and convulsive throb leading the officer's funeral;)

What to such as you anyhow such a poet as I? therefore leave my works,

And go lull yourself with what you can understand, and with piano tunes,

For I lull nobody, and you will never understand me.

1865

QUICKSAND YEARS

Quicksand years that whirl me I know not whither,

Your schemes, politics, fail, lines give way, substances mock and elude me,

Only the theme I sing, the great and strongpossess'd soul, eludes not,

One's-self must never give way—that is the final substance—that out of all is sure,

Out of politics, triumphs, battles, life, what at last finally remains?

When shows break up what but One's-Self is sure?

1865

ASHES OF SOLDIERS

Ashes of soldiers South or North,

As I muse retrospective murmuring a chant in thought,

The war resumes, again to my sense your

And again the advance of the armies.

Noiseless as mists and vapors, From their graves in the trenches ascending, From cemeteries all through Virginia and Tennessee.

Now sound no note O trumpeters, countless graves.

Not at the head of my cavalry parading on spirited horses.

With sabers drawn and glistening, and carbines by their thighs, (ah my brave horse-

My handsome tan-faced horsemen! what life. what joy and pride,

With all the perils were yours.)

Nor you drummers, neither at reveillé at dawn. Nor the long roll alarming the camp, nor even the muffled beat for a burial,

Nothing from you this time O drummers bearing my warlike drums.

But aside from these and the marts of wealth and the crowded promenade,

Admitting around me comrades close unseen by the rest and voiceless,

The slain elate and alive again, the dust and debris alive,

I chant this chant of my silent soul in the name of all dead soldiers.

Faces so pale with wondrous eyes, very dear, gather closer yet,

Draw close, but speak not.

Phantoms of countless lost.

Invisible to the rest henceforth become my companions,

Follow me ever—desert me not while I live.

Sweet are the blooming cheeks of the livingsweet are the musical voices sounding.

But sweet, ah sweet, are the dead with their silent eyes.

Dearest comrades, all is over and long gone, But love is not over—and what love, O com-

Perfume from battlefields rising, up from the foetor arising.

Perfume therefore my chant, O love, immortal love,

Give me to bathe the memories of all dead soldiers.

Shroud them, embalm them, cover them all over with tender pride.

Perfume all—make all wholesome, Make these ashes to nourish and blossom, O love, solve all, fructify all with the last chemistry.

Give me exhaustless, make me a fountain, That I exhale love from me wherever I go like a moist perennial dew, Fortheashes of all dead soldiers South or North.

PENSIVE ON HER DEAD GAZING

Pensive on her dead gazing I heard the Mother of All.

Desperate on the torn bodies, on the forms covering the battlefields gazing,

(As the last gun ceased, but the scent of the powder-smoke linger'd,)

As she called to her earth with mournful voice while she stalk'd.

Absorb them well O my earth, she cried, I charge you lose not my sons, lose not an atom.

And you streams absorb them well, taking their dear blood.

And you local spots, and you airs that swim above lightly impalpable.

And all you essences of soil and growth, and you my rivers' depths.

And you mountain sides, and the woods where my dear children's blood trickling redden'd.

And you trees down in your roots to bequeath to all future trees, 10

My dead absorb or South or North—my young men's bodies absorb, and their precious precious blood,

Which holding in trust for me faithfully back again give me many a year hence,

In unseen essence and odor of surface and grass, centuries hence.

In blowing airs from the fields back again give me my darlings, give my immortal heroes,

Exhale me them centuries hence, breathe me their breath, let not an atom be lost,

O years and graves! O air and soil! O my dead, an aroma sweet!

Exhale them perennial sweet death, years, centuries hence.

1865

HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY 1

(May 4, 1865)

Hush'd be the camps today,

And soldiers let us drape our war-worn weapons,

<sup>1</sup> This poem and the three following have reference to the death and burial of Abraham Lincoln. His And each with musing soul retire to celebrate, Our dear commander's death

No more for him life's stormy conflicts, Nor victory, nor defeat—no more time's dark events.

Charging like ceaseless clouds across the sky.

But sing poet in our name,
Sing of the love we bore him—because you,
dweller in camps, know it truly.

As they invault the coffin there, 10
Sing—as they close the doors of earth upon him
—one verse,

For the heavy hearts of soldiers.

1865

BEAT! BEAT! DRUMS!

Beat! beat! drums!—blow! bugles! blow! Through the windows—through doors—burst like a ruthless force.

Into the solemn church, and scatter the congregation,

Into the school where the scholar is studying; Leave not the bridegroom quiet—no happiness must he have now with his bride,

Nor the peaceful farmer any peace, plowing his field or gathering his grain,

So fierce you whirr and pound you drums—so shrill you bugles blow.

Beat! beat! drums!—blow! bugles! blow!

Over the traffic of cities—over the rumble of wheels in the streets:

Are beds prepared for sleepers at night in the houses? no sleepers must sleep in those heds

No bargainers' bargains by day—no brokers or speculators—would they continue?

Would the talkers be talking? would the singer attempt to sing?

Would the lawyer rise in the court to state his case before the judge?

Then rattle quicker, heavier drums—you bugles wilder blow.

Beat! beat! drums!—blow! bugles! blow!

Make no parley—stop for no expostulation,

Mind not the timid—mind not the weeper or prayer,

body was taken to his home at Springfield, Illinois, with pauses and sometimes funeral sermons at the principal cities along the route. The entombment took place May 5, 1865.

Mind not the old man beseeching the young man.

Let not the child's voice be heard, nor the mother's entreaties.

Make even the trestles to shake the dead where they lie awaiting the hearses, 20 So strong you thump O terrible drums—so loud vou bugles blow.

1865

WHEN LILACS LAST IN THE DOOR-YARD BLOOM'D

1

When lilacs last in the dooryard bloom'd, And the great star early droop'd in the western sky in the night.

I mourn'd, and yet shall mourn with everreturning spring.

Ever-returning spring, trinity sure to me you bring,

Lilac blooming perennial and drooping star in the west.

And thought of him I love.

2

O powerful western fallen star!

O shades of night—O moody, tearful night!

O great star disappear'd—O the black murk that hides the star!
O cruel hands that hold me powerless—O help-

O cruel hands that hold me powerless—O helpless soul of me!

O harsh surrounding cloud that will not free my soul.

3

In the dooryard fronting an old farmhouse near the white-wash'd palings,

Stands the lilac-bush tall-growing with heartshaped leaves of rich green,

With many a pointed blossom rising delicate, with the perfume strong I love.

With every leaf a miracle—and from this bush in the dooryard.

With delicate-color'd blossoms and heart-shaped leaves of rich green,

A sprig with its flower I break.

4

In the swamp in secluded recesses, A shy and hidden bird is warbling a song.

Solitary the thrush,
The hermit withdrawn to himself, avoiding the settlements,

Sings by himself a song.

Song of the bleeding throat,

Death's outlet song of life, (for well dear brother I know.

If thou wast not granted to sing thou would'st surely die.)

-5

Over the breast of the spring, the land, amid cities.

Amid lanes and through old woods, where lately the violets peep'd from the ground, spotting the gray debris.

Amid the grass in the fields each side of the lanes, passing the endless grass,

Passing the yellow-spear'd wheat, every grain from its shroud in the dark-brown fields uprisen,

Passing the apple-tree blows of white and pink in the orchards,

Carrying a corpse to where it shall rest in the grave.

Night and day journeys a coffin.

6

Coffin that passes through lanes and streets, Through day and night with the great cloud darkening the land,

With the pomp of the inloop'd flags with the cities draped in black,

With the show of the States themselves as of crape-veil'd women standing,

With processions long and winding and the flambeaus of the night,

With the countless torches lit, with the silent sea of faces and the unbared heads,

With the waiting depot, the arriving coffin, and the somber faces,

With dirges through the night, with the thousand voices rising strong and solemn, 40

With all the mournful voices of the dirges pour'd round the coffin,

The dim-lit churches and the shuddering organs—where amid these you journey,

With the tolling tolling bells' perpetual clang, Here, coffin that slowly passes,

I give you my sprig of lilac.

7

(Nor for you, for one alone,

Blossoms and branches green to coffins all I bring,

For fresh as the morning, thus would I chant a song for you O sane and sacred death.

All over bouquets of roses,

O death, I cover you over with roses and early lilies,

But mostly and now the lilac that blooms the first.

Copious I break, I break the sprigs from the

With loaded arms I come, pouring for you, For you and the coffins all of you O death.)

٤

O western orb sailing the heaven.

Now I know what you must have meant as a month since I walk'd.

As I walk'd in silence the transparent shadowy night.

As I saw you had something to tell as you bent to me night after night.

As you droop'd from the sky low down as if to my side, (while the other stars all look'd on.)

As we wander'd together the solemn night, (for something I know not what kept me from sleep.)

As the night advanced, and I saw on the rim of the west how full you were of woe.

As I stood on the rising ground in the breeze in the cool transparent night,

As I watch'd where you pass'd and was lost in the netherward black of the night,

As my soul in its trouble dissatisfied sank, as where you sad orb.

Concluded, dropt in the night, and was gone.

9

Sing on there in the swamp,

O singer bashful and tender, I hear your notes, I hear your call,

I hear, I come presently, I understand you, But a moment I linger, for the lustrous star has detain'd me,

The star my departing comrade holds and detains me.
70

10

O how shall I warble myself for the dead one there I loved?

And how shall I deck my song for the large sweet soul that has gone?

And what shall my perfume be for the grave of him I love?

Sea-winds blown from east and west.

Blown from the Eastern sea and blown from the Western sea, till there on the prairies meeting,

These and with these and the breath of my chant.

I'll perfume the grave of him I love.

11

O what shall I hang on the chamber walls?

And what shall the pictures be that I hang on the walls.

To adorn the burial-house of him I love?

Pictures of growing spring and farms and homes.

With the Fourth-month eve at sundown, and the gray smoke lucid and bright.

With floods of the yellow gold of the gorgeous, indolent, sinking sun, burning, expanding the air,

With the fresh sweet herbage under foot, and the pale green leaves of the trees prolific.

In the distance the flowing glaze, the breast of the river, with a wind-dapple here and there.

With ranging hills on the banks, with many a line against the sky, and shadows,

And the city at hand with dwellings so dense, and stacks of chimneys.

And all the scenes of life and the workshops, and the workmen homeward returning.

12

Lo, body and soul-this land,

My own Manhattan with spires, and the sparkling and hurrying tides, and the ships.

The varied and ample land, the South and the North in the light, Ohio's shores and flashing Missouri, 91

And ever the far-spreading prairies cover'd with grass and corn.

Lo, the most excellent sun so calm and haughty. The violet and purple morn with just-felt breezes.

The gentle soft-born measureless light,

The miracle spreading bathing all, the fulfill'd noon,

The coming eve delicious, the welcome night and the stars.

Over my cities shining all, enveloping man and land.

13

Sing on, sing on you gray-brown bird,

Sing from the swamps, the recesses, pour your chant from the bushes,

Limitless out of the dusk, out of the cedars and pines.

Sing on dearest brother, warble your reedy song, Loud human song, with voice of uttermost woe. O liquid and free and tender!

O wild and loose to my soul—O wondrous singer!

You only I hear—yet the star holds me, (but will soon depart,)

Yet the lilac with mastering odor holds me.

14

Now while I sat in the day and look'd forth, In the close of the day with its light and the fields of spring, and the farmers preparing their crops.

In the large unconscious scenery of my land with its lakes and forests, 110

In the heavenly aerial beauty, (after the perturb'd winds and the storms.)

Under the arching heavens of the afternoon swift passing, and the voices of children and women,

The many-moving sea-tides, and I saw the ships how they sail'd,

And the summer approaching with richness, and the fields all busy with labor.

And the infinite separate houses, how they all went on, each with its meals and minutia of daily usages,

And the streets how their throbbings throbb'd, and the cities pent—lo, then and there,

Falling upon them all and among them all, enveloping me with the rest.

Appear'd the cloud, appear'd the long black trail,

And I knew death, its thought, and the sacred knowledge of death.

Then with the knowledge of death as walking one side of me, 120

And the thought of death close-walking the other side of me,

And I in the middle as with companions, and as holding the hands of companions,

I fled forth to the hiding receiving night that talks not,

Down to the shores of the water, the path by the swamp in the dimness,

To the solemn shadowy cedars and ghostly pines so still.

And the singer so shy to the rest receiv'd me, The gray-brown bird I know receiv'd us comrades three,

And he sang the carol of death, and a verse for him I love.

From deep secluded recesses,
From the fragrant cedars and the ghostly pines so still.

130

Came the carol of the bird.

And the charm of the carol rapt me,

As I held as if by their hands my comrades in the night,

And the voice of my spirit tallied the song of the bird.

Come lovely and soothing death, 1

Undulate round the world, serenely arriving, arriving,

In the day, in the night, to all, to each, Sooner or later delicate death.

Prais'd be the fathomless universe,

For life and joy, and for objects and knowledge curious.

And for love, sweet love—but praise! praise! praise!

For the sure-enwinding arms of cool-enfolding death.

Dark mother always gliding near with soft feet, Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome?

Then I chant it for thee, I glorify thee above all.

I bring thee a song that when thou must indeed come, come unfalteringly.

Approach strong deliveress,

When it is so, when thou hast taken them I joyously sing the dead.

150

Lost in the loving floating ocean of thee, Laved in the flood of thy bliss O death.

From me to thee glad serenades.

Dances for thee I propose saluting thee, adornments and feastings for thee.

And the sights of the open landscape and the high-spread sky are fitting,

And life and the fields, and the huge and thoughtful night.

The night in silence under many a star,

The ocean shore and the husky whispering wave whose voice I know,

And the soul turning to thee O vast and well-veil'd death,

And the body gratefully nestling close to thee.

Compare "O eloquent, just, and mighty Death!
Whom none could advise, thou hast persuaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised; thou hast called together all the far-stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Hic jacet!" Sir Walter Raleigh, The History of the World.

Over the tree-tops I float thee a song, Over the rising and sinking waves, over the myriad fields and the prairies wide,

Over the dense-pack'd cities all and the teeming wharves and ways, 161

I float this carol with joy, with joy to thee O death.

15

To the tally of my soul,

Loud and strong kept up the gray-brown bird.

With pure deliberate notes spreading filling the night.

Loud in the pines and cedars dim,

Clear in the freshness moist and the swampperfume.

And I with my comrades there in the night.

While my sight that was bound in my eyes unclosed.

As to long panoramas of visions. 170

And I saw askant the armies.

I saw as in noiseless dreams hundreds of battleflags.

Borne through the smoke of the battles and pierc'd with missiles I saw them.

And carried hither and you through the smoke, and torn and bloody.

And at last but a few shreds left on the staffs, (and all in silence,)

And the staffs all splinter'd and broken.

I saw battle-corpses, myriads of them,

And the white skeletons of young men, I saw

I saw the debris and debris of all the slain soldiers of the war,

But I saw they were not as was thought,

They themselves were fully at rest, they suffer'd not.

The living remain'd and suffer'd, the mother suffer'd,

And the wife and the child and the musing comrade suffer'd,

And the armies that remain'd suffer'd.

16

Passing the visions, passing the night,

Passing, unloosing the hold of my comrades' hands,

Passing the song of the hermit bird and the tallying song of my soul,

Victorious song, death's outlet song, yet varying ever-altering song, As low and wailing, yet clear the notes, rising and falling, flooding the night.

Sadly sinking and fainting, as warning and warning, and yet again bursting with joy, 190

Covering the earth and filling the spread of the heaven,

As that powerful psalm in the night I heard from recesses.

Passing, I leave thee lilac with heart-shaped leaves.

I leave thee there in the door-yard, blooming, returning with spring.

I cease from my song for thee,

From my gaze on thee in the west, fronting the west, communing with thee.

O comrade lustrous with silver face in the night.

Yet each to keep and all, retrievements out of the night.

The song, the wondrous chant of the graybrown bird.

And the tallying chant, the echo arous'd in my soul.

With the lustrous and drooping star with the countenance full of woe,

With the holders holding my hand nearing the call of the bird,

Comrades mine and I in the midst, and their memory ever to keep, for the dead I loved so well.

For the sweetest, wisest soul of all my days and lands—and this for his dear sake,

Lilac and star and bird twined with the chant of my soul.

There in the fragrant pines and the cedars dusk and dim.

1865

O CAPTAIN! MY CAPTAIN! 1

O Captain! my Captain! our fearful trip is done,

The ship has weather'd every rack, the prize we sought is won,

The port is near, the bells I hear, the people all exulting,

While follow eyes the steady keel, the vessel grim and daring;

But O heart! heart!

O the bleeding drops of red, Where on the deck my Captain lies, Fallen cold and dead.

<sup>1</sup> In this and a few other poems Whitman brings his work more nearly into the conventional poetic form. Does a study of them indicate that Whitman could or could not have written successfully in the prevailing artistic forms? O Captain! my Captain! rise up and hear the bells;

Rise up—for you the flag is flung—for you the bugle trills,

For you bouquets and ribbon'd wreaths—for you the shores a-crowding,

For you they call, the swaying mass, their eager faces turning:

Here Captain! dear father!

This arm beneath your head!

It is some dream that on the deck,

You've fallen cold and dead.

My Captain does not answer, his lips are pale and still,

My father does not feel my arm, he has no pulse nor will,

The ship is anchor'd safe and sound, its voyage closed and done,

From fearful trin the victor ship comes in with

From fearful trip the victor ship comes in with object won;

Exult O shores, and ring O bells!
But I with mournful tread,
Walk the deck my Captain lies,
Fallen cold and dead.

1865-6

AN ARMY CORPS ON THE MARCH

With its cloud of skirmishers in advance,
With now the sound of a single shot snapping like a whip, and now an irregular volley.
The swarming ranks press on and on, the dense brigades press on.

Glittering dimly, toiling under the sun—the dust-cover'd men,

In columns rise and fall to the undulations of the ground,

With artillery interspers'd—the wheels rumble, the horses sweat.

As the army corps advances.

1865-6

ONE'S-SELF I SING 1

One's-self I sing, a simple separate person, Yet utter the word Democratic, the word En-Masse.

Of physiology from top to toe I sing,
Not physiognomy alone nor brain alone is worthy for the Muse, I say the Form complete is worthier far,

The Female equally with the Male I sing.

Of Life immense in passion, pulse, and power. Cheerful, for freest action form'd under the laws divine,

The Modern Man I sing.

1867

DAREST THOU NOW O SOUL

Darest thou now O soul,
Walk out with me toward the unknown region,
Where neither ground is for the feet nor any path to follow?

No map there, nor guide,

Nor voice sounding, nor touch of human hand, Nor face with blooming flesh, nor lips, nor eyes, are in that land.

I know it not O soul, Nor dost thou, all is a blank before us, All waits undream'd of in that region, that inaccessible land.

Till when the ties loosen,

All but the ties eternal, Time and Space,
Nor darkness, gravitation, sense, nor any bounds bounding us.

Then we burst forth, we float,
In Time and Space O soul, prepared for them.
Equal, equipt at last, (O joy! O fruit of all!)
them to fulfil O soul

1870

A NOISELESS PATIENT SPIDER

A noiseless patient spider,

I mark'd where on a little promontory it stood isolated,

Mark'd how to explore the vacant vast surrounding,

It launch'd forth filament, filament, filament, out of itself,

Ever unreeling them, ever tirelessly speeding them

And you O my soul where you stand, Surrounded, detached, in measureless oceans of space,

Ceaselessly musing, venturing, throwing, seeking the spheres to connect them,

Till the bridge you will need be form'd, till the ductile anchor hold.

Till the gossamer thread you fling catch somewhere, O my soul.

1870

&lt;sup>1</sup> This poem Whitman placed at the beginning of his final revised edition of his poems.

THE LAST INVOCATION

At the last, tenderly,

From the walls of the powerful fortress'd house,

From the clasp of the knitted locks, from the keep of the well-closed doors,

Let me be wafted.

Let me glide noiselessly forth;

With the key of softness unlock the locks—with a whisper.

Set ope the doors O soul.

Tenderly—be not impatient, (Strong is your hold O mortal flesh, Strong is your hold O love.)

1870

ETHIOPIA SALUTING THE COLORS '

Who are you dusky woman, so ancient hardly human,

With your woolly-white and turban'd head, and bare bony feet?

Why rising by the roadside here, do you the colors greet?

('Tis while our army lines Carolina's sands and pines.

Forth from thy hovel door thou Ethiopia com'st to me.

As under doughty Sherman I march toward the sea.)

Me master years a hundred since from my parents sunder'd.

A little child, they caught me as the savage beast is caught,

Then hither me across the sea the cruel slaver brought.

No further does she say, but lingering all the day.

Her high-borne turban'd head she wags, and rolls her darkling eye.

And courtesies to the regiments, the guidons moving by.

What is it fateful woman, so blear, hardly human?

Why wag your head with turban bound yellow, red and green?

Are the things so strange and marvelous you see or have seen?

JOY, SHIPMATE, JOY!

Joy, shipmate, joy!
(Pleas'd to my soul at death I cry,)
Our life is closed, our life begins,
The long, long anchorage we leave,
The ship is clear at last, she leaps!
She swiftly courses from the shore,
Iov. shipmate. joy!

1870

THE MYSTIC TRUMPETER

1

Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician,

Hovering unseen in air, vibrates capricious tunes tonight.

I hear thee trumpeter, listening alert I catch thy notes,

Now pouring, whirling like a tempest round me, Now low, subdued, now in the distance lost.

2

Come nearer bodiless one, haply in thee resounds

Some dead composer, haply thy pensive life Was fill'd with aspirations high, unform'd ideals, Waves, oceans musical, chaotically surging. That now ecstatic ghost, close to me bending, thy cornet echoing, pealing, 10

Gives out to no one's ears but mine, but freely gives to mine.

That I may thee translate.

2

Blow trumpeter free and clear, I follow thee, While at thy liquid prelude, glad, serene, The fretting world, the streets, the noisy hours of day withdraw,

A holy calm descends like dew upon me, I walk in cool refreshing night the walks of Paradise.

I scent the grass, the moist air and the roses; Thy song expands my numb'd imbonded spirit, thou freest, launchest me,

Floating and basking upon heaven's lake.

4

Blow again trumpeter! and for my sensuous eyes. 21

Bring the old pageants, show the feudal world What charm thy music works! thou makest pass before me.

1870

Ladies and cavaliers long dead, barons are in their castle halls, the troubadours are singing.

Arm'd knights go forth to redress wrongs, some in quest of the holy Graal; 1

I see the tournament. I see the contestants incased in heavy armor seated on stately champing horses.

I hear the shouts, the sounds of blows and smiting steel:

I see the Crusaders' tumultuous armies—hark, how the cymbals clang.

Lo, where the monks walk in advance, bearing the cross on high.

Blow again trumpeter! and for thy theme, Take now the enclosing theme of all, the solvent and the setting.

Love, that is pulse of all, the sustenance and the pang.

The heart of man and woman all for love, No other theme but love-knitting, enclosing, all-diffusing love.

O how the immortal phantoms crowd around

I see the vast alembic 2 ever working, I see and know the flames that heat the world.

The glow, the blush, the beating hearts of lovers. So blissful happy some, and some so silent, dark, and nigh to death:

Love, that is all the earth to lovers—love, that mocks time and space,

Love, that is day and night—love, that is sun and moon and stars.

Love, that is crimson, sumptuous, sick with perfume.

No other words but words of love, no other thought but love.

6 .

Blow again trumpeter—conjure war's alarums.

Swift to thy spell a shuddering hum like distant thunder rolls.

Lo, where the arm'd men hasten—lo, mid the clouds of dust the glint of bayonets,

I see the grime-faced cannoneers, I mark the rosy flash amid the smoke, I hear the cracking of the guns;

Nor war alone—thy fearful music-song, wild player, brings every sight of fear,

The cup from which it was believed Christ drank at the last supper; legend represented it as having vanished from earth, but as appearing at times to the pure in heart. See note 1, p. 587.
 an old-time chemical vessel used for distillation; hence a change-producing agent

The deeds of ruthless brigands, rapine, murder -I hear the cries for help!

I see ships foundering at sea, I behold on deck and below deck the terrible tableaus.

O trumpeter, methinks I am myself the instrument thou playest.

Thou melt'st my heart, my brain-thou movest, drawest, changest them at will:

And now thy sullen notes send darkness through

Thou takest away all cheering light, all hope, I see the enslaved, the overthrown, the hurt. the opprest of the whole earth.

I feel the measureless shame and humiliation of my race, it becomes all mine,

Mine too the revenges of humanity, the wrongs of ages, baffled feuds and hatreds,

Utter defeat upon me weighs—all lost—the foe victorious.

(Yet 'mid the ruins Pride colossal stands unshaken to the last, Endurance, resolution to the last.)

60 Now trumpeter for thy close, Vouchsafe a higher strain than any yet, Sing to my soul, renew its languishing faith and hope.

Rouse up my slow belief, give me some vision of the future.

Give me for once its prophecy and joy.

O glad, exulting, culminating song! A vigor more than earth's is in thy notes, Marches of victory-man disenthral'd-the conqueror at last,

Hymns to the universal God from universal man-all joy!

A reborn race appears—a perfect world, all joy! Women and men in wisdom innocence and health-all joy!

Riotous laughing bacchanals fill'd with joy! War, sorrow, suffering gone—the rank earth purged—nothing but joy left!

The ocean fill'd with joy—the atmosphere all joy!

Toy! joy! in freedom, worship, love! joy in the ecstasy of life!

Enough to merely be! enough to breathe! Joy! joy! all over joy!

1872

YOUTH, DAY, OLD AGE, AND NIGHT

Youth, large, lusty, loving—youth full of grace. force, fascination,

Do you know that Old Age may come after you with equal grace, force, fascination?

Day full-blown and splendid—day of the immense sun, action, ambition, laughter,

The Night follows close with millions of suns, and sleep and restoring darkness.

TO THE MAN-OF-WAR BIRD 1

Thou who hast slept all night upon the storm, Waking renew'd on thy prodigious pinions, (Burst the wild storm? above it thou ascended'st,

And rested on the sky, thy slave that cradled

Now a blue point, far, far in heaven floating, As to the light emerging here on deck I watch thee.

(Myself a speck, a point on the world's floating vast.)

Far, far at sea,

After the night's fierce drifts have strewn the shore with wrecks.

With re-appearing day as now so happy and serene.

The rosy and elastic dawn, the flashing sun, The limpid spread of air cerulean, Thou also re-appearest.

Thou born to match the gale, (thou art all wings,)

To cope with heaven and earth and sea and hurricane.

Thou ship of air that never furl'st thy sails, Days, even weeks untired and onward, through spaces, realms gyrating,

At dusk that look'st on Senegal, 2 at morn America.

That sport'st amid the lightning-flash and thunder-cloud.

In them, in thy experiences, had'st thou my soul,

What joys! what joys were thine!

1876

ITALIAN MUSIC IN DAKOTA

["The Seventeenth—the finest Regimental Band I ever heard."]

Through the soft evening air enwinding all, Rocks, woods, fort, cannon, pacing sentries, endless wilds,

In dulcet streams, in flutes' and cornets' notes,

Compare with Bryant's "To a Waterfowl," p. 249, and with Shelley's "To a Skylark," noting the difference in the inner spirit of the three authors.

<sup>2</sup> a French colony in western Africa

Electric, pensive, turbulent, artificial,

(Yet strangely fitting even here, meanings unknown before,

Subtler than ever, more harmony, as if born here, related here,

Not to the city's fresco'd rooms, not to the audience of the opera house.

Sounds, echoes, wandering strains, as really here at home.

Sonnambula's innocent love, trios with Norma's anguish.

And thy ecstatic chorus Poliuto); <sup>3</sup> 10 Ray'd in the limpid yellow slanting sundown, Music. Italian music in Dakota.

While Nature, sovereign of this gnarl'd realm, Lurking in hidden barbaric grim recesses, Acknowledging rapport however far remov'd, (As some old root or soil of earth its lastborn flower or fruit.)

Listens well pleas'd.

WITH HUSKY-HAUGHTY LIPS, O SEA!

With husky-haughty lips, O sea!

Where day and night I wend thy surf-beat shore.

Imaging to my sense thy varied strange suggestions.

(I see and plainly list thy talk and conference here),

Thy troops of white-maned racers racing to the goal,

Thy ample, smiling face, dash'd with the sparkling dimples of the sun.

Thy brooding scowl and murk—thy unloos'd hurricanes,

Thy unsubduedness, caprices, wilfulness;

Great as thou art above the rest, thy many tears—a lack from all eternity in thy content,

(Naught but the greatest struggles, wrongs, defeats, could make thee greatest—no less could make thee,)

Thy lonely state—something thou ever seek'st and seek'st, yet never gain'st,

Surely some right withheld—some voice, in huge monotonous rage, of freedom-lover pent.

Some vast heart, like a planet's chain'd and chafing in those breakers,

By lengthen'd swell, and spasm, and panting breath.

And rhythmic rasping of thy sands and waves,

&lt;sup>2</sup> Italian operas by Bellini and by Donizetti, composers of the nineteenth century

And serpent hiss, and savage peals of laughter, And undertones of distant lion roar.

(Sounding, appealing to the sky's deaf earbut now, rapport for once.

A phantom in the night thy confident for once,) The first and last confession of the globe. Outsurging, muttering from thy soul's abysms, The tale of cosmic elemental passion. Thou tellest to a kindred soul.

1884

Old Past let go, and drop i' the sea Till fathomless waters cover thee! For I am living but thou art dead; Thou drawest back, I strive ahead The Day to find.

Thy shells unbind! Night comes behind. I needs must hurry with the wind

And trim me best for sailing! 1867

1867

10

SIDNEY LANIER 1842-1881

Lanier was born in Macon, Georgia; he graduated from Oglethorpe College, taught there for a year, at twenty entered the Confederate army, and served during most of the war. He was taken prisoner and came home with greatly impaired health. Forced by necessity, he took up law, but his passion for literature and music was too strong to be resisted. Though self-taught, he was an accomplished musician, and became well known professionally. After the publication of "Corn," 1875, he was commissioned to write the official ode for the Centennial Exposition, 1876. From 1879 he was a lecturer on phases of English literature at Johns Hopkins University. The last six years of his life were a fever of activity, constantly interrupted and frustrated by illness. A volume of his poems appeared in 1877, The Science of English Verse in 1880, The English Novel in 1883, Shakespeare and his Forerunners in 1902.

Though Lanier has been criticized as an "improvisatore," such an estimate is not only unsympathetic but narrow. His work, though not great in bulk, is strongly American in subject, original, and fertile in invention. Some of it is as rich in music as Swinburne's, and one of its strongest characteristics is a spontaneous enthusiasm rare in American poetry in his time. He is the foremost poet of the South after Poe.

Biography: E. Mims, (AML) 1905. Criticism: Bradford, (AP); same, No. Am. 211:805-17; Pattee; Burton; Chubb; Stedman; Macy; N. Foerster, "Lanier as a Poet of Nature," Nation 108: 981-3.

BARNACLES

Ι

My soul is sailing through the sea, But the Past is heavy and hindereth me. The Past hath crusted cumbrous shells That hold the flesh of cold sea-mells About my soul.

The huge waves wash, the high waves roll, Each barnacle clingeth and worketh dole And hindereth me from sailing!

CORN

Today the woods are trembling through and through

With shimmering forms, that flash before my view.

Then melt in green as dawn-stars melt in blue. The leaves that wave against my cheek caress Like women's hands: the embracing boughs express

A subtlety of mighty tenderness: The copse-depths into little noises start. That sound anon like beatings of a heart. Anon like talk 'twixt lips not far apart. The beech dreams balm, as a dreamer hums a

Through that vague wafture, expirations strong

Throb from young hickories breathing deep and long

With stress and urgence bold of prisoned spring And ecstasy of burgeoning. 1

Now, since the dew-plashed road of morn is dry.

Forth venture odors of more quality And heavenlier giving. Like Jove's locks

Long muscadines 2

Rich-wreathe the spacious foreheads of great

And breathe ambrosial passion from their vines. I pray with mosses, ferns and flowers shy That hide like gentle nuns from human eye To lift adoring perfumes to the sky. I hear faint bridal-sighs of brown and green

Dying to silent hints of kisses keen As far lights fringe into a pleasant sheen. I start at fragmentary whispers, blown

From undertalks of leafy souls unknown, Vague purports sweet, of inarticulate tone.

Dreaming of gods, men, nuns and brides, be-

Old companies of oaks that inward lean

<sup>1</sup> bursting of buds <sup>2</sup> vines of the Malaga grape

` 80

00

100

121

To join their radiant amplitudes of green I slowly move, with ranging looks that pass Up from the matted miracles of grass Into you veined complex of space, Where sky and leafage interlace So close, the heaven of blue is seen Inwoven with a heaven of green.

I wander to the zigzag-cornered fence Where sassafras, intrenched in brambles dense, Contests with stolid vehemence The march of culture, setting limb and thorn As pikes against the army of the corn.

There, while I pause, my fieldward-faring eyes Take harvests, where the stately corn-ranks rise Of inward dignities And large benignities and insights wise, Graces and modest majesties. Thus, without theft, I reap another's field; Thus, without tilth, I house a wondrous yield.

And heap my heart with quintuple crops concealed.

Look, out of line one tall corn-captain stands Advanced beyond the foremost of his bands, And waves his blades upon the very edge And hottest thicket of the battling hedge. Thou lustrous stalk, that ne'er mayst walk nor talk.

Still shalt thou type the poet-soul sublime That leads the vanward of his timid time And sings up cowards with commanding

Soul calm, like thee, yet fain, like thee, to grow By double increment, above, below;

Soul homely, as thou art, yet rich in grace like thee,

Teaching the yeomen selfless chivalry That moves in gentle curves of courtesy; Soul filled like thy long veins with sweetness tense.

By every godlike sense Transmuted from the four wild elements.

Drawn to high plans, Thou lift'st more stature than a mortal man's,

Yet ever piercest downward in the mold

And keepest hold Upon the reverend and steadfast earth That gave thee birth;

Yea, standest smiling in thy future grave,

Serene and brave. With unremitting breath Inhaling life from death,

Thine epitaph writ fair in fruitage eloquent, Thyself thy monument.

As poets should Thou hast built up thy hardihood With universal food,

Drawn in select proportion fair From honest mold and vagabond air: From darkness of the dreadful night,

And joyful light:

From antique ashes, whose departed flame In thee has finer life and longer fame;

From wounds and balms From storms and calms.

From potsherds and dry bones

And ruin-stones.

Into thy vigorous substance thou hast wrought Whate'er the hand of Circumstance hath brought:

Yea, into cool solacing green hast spun White radiance hot from out the sun. So thou dost mutually leaven

Strength of earth with grace of heaven: So thou dost marry new and old

Into a one of higher mold; So thou dost reconcile the hot and cold.

The dark and bright. And many a heart-perplexing opposite:

Akin by blood to high and low, Fitly thou playest out thy poet's part, Richly expending thy much-bruised heart In equal care to nourish lord in hall

Or beast in stall:

Thou took'st from all that thou might'st give

O steadfast dweller on the selfsame spot Where thou wast born, that still repinest not— Type of the home-fond heart, the happy lot!— Deeply thy mild content rebukes the land Whose flimsy homes, built on the shifting

Of trade, forever rise and fall With alternation whimsical,

Enduring scarce a day,

Then swept away By swift engulfments of incalculable tides Whereon capricious Commerce rides.

Look, thou substantial spirit of content! Across this little vale, thy continent,

To where, beyond the moldering mill, Yon old deserted Georgian hill

Bares to the sun his piteous aged crest

And seamy breast, By restless-hearted children left to lie Untended there beneath the heedless sky,

As barbarous folk expose their old to die. Upon that generous-rounding side,

With gullies scarified

Where keen Neglect his lash hath plied,
Dwelt one I knew of old, who played at toil,
And gave to coquette Cotton soul and soil.
Scorning the slow reward of patient grain,
He sowed his heart with hopes of swifter gain,
Then sat him down and waited for the rain.
He sailed in borrowed ships of usury—
A foolish Jason on a treacherous sea,
Seeking the Fleece and finding misery.

Lulled by smooth-rippling loans, in idle

He lay, content that unthrift Circumstance Should plow for him the stony field of Chance.

Yea, gathering crops whose worth no man might

He staked his life on games of Buy-and-Sell, And turned each field into a gambler's hell. Ave. as each year began.

My farmer to the neighboring city ran;
Passed with a mournful anxious face
Into the banker's inner place;

Parleyed, excused, pleaded for longer grace;
Railed at the drought, the worm, the rust, the grass;

Protested ne'er again 'twould come to pass; With many an oh and if and but alas Parried or swallowed searching questions rude, And kissed the dust to soften Dives's 1 mood. At last, small loans by pledges great renewed, He issues smiling from the fatal door, 159 And buys with lavish hand his yearly store Till his small borrowings will yield no more. Aye, as each year declined,

With bitter heart and ever-brooding mind He mourned his fate unkind.

In dust, in rain, with might and main,
He nursed his cotton, cursed his grain,
Fretted for news that made him fret again,
Snatched at each telegram of Future Sale,
And thrilled with Bulls' or Bears' 2 alternate wail—

In hope or fear alike forever pale.

And thus from year to year, through hope

With many a curse and many a secret tear, Striving in vain his cloud of debt to clear, At last

He woke to find his foolish dreaming past,
And all his best-of-life the easy prey
Of squandering scamps and quacks that lined his way

With vile array,

From rascal statesman down to petty knave; Himself, at best, for all his bragging brave, 180

1 "a rich man" (Lat.) See Luke xiv, 19.
 2 Stock exchange terms; the "bulls" benefit by a rise, the "bears" by a fall in the price of stocks.

A gamester's catspaw and a banker's slave.

Then, worn and gray, and sick with deep unrest.

He fled away into the oblivious West, Unmourned, unblest.

Old hill! old hill! thou gashed and hairy Lear <sup>3</sup> Whom the divine Cordelia of the year, E'en pitying Spring, will vainly strive to cheer—King, that no subject man nor beast may own.

Discrowned, undaughtered and alone—
Yet shall the great God turn thy fate,
And bring thee back into thy monarch state
And majesty immaculate.

Lo, through hot waverings of the August morn.

Thou givest from thy vasty sides forlorn Visions of golden treasuries of corn—Ripe largesse lingering for some bolder heart That manfully shall take thy part,

And tend thee,
And defend thee,
With antique sinew and with modern art.

1874 1875

A SONG OF THE FUTURE

Sail fast, sail fast, Ark of my hopes, Ark of my dreams; Sweep lordly o'er the drowned Past, Fly glittering through the sun's strange beams;

Sail fast, sail fast.

Breaths of new buds from off some drying lea
With news about the Future scent the sea:
My brain is beating like the heart of Haste:

My brain is beating like the heart of Haste:
I'll loose me a bird upon this Present waste;
Go. trembling song.

And stay not long; oh, stay not long:
Thou'rt only a gray and sober dove,
But thine eye is faith and thy wing is love.

1875

EVENING SONG

Look off, dear Love, across the sallow sands, And mark you meeting of the sun and sea, How long they kiss in sight of all the lands. Ah! longer, longer, we.

Now in the sea's red vintage melts the sun, As Egypt's pearl dissolved in rosy wine, And Cleopatra night drinks all. <sup>4</sup> 'Tis done, Love, lay thine hand in mine.

See Shakespeare's King Lear.
 Pliny says that Cleopatra in a wager with Antony dissolved in wine and drank a priceless pearl.
 See also Hamlet V, ii, 283.

10

1877

Come forth, sweet stars, and comfort heaven's heart:

Glimmer, ve waves, round else-unlighted

O night! divorce our sun and sky apart Never our lips, our hands.

1876 1877

THE STIRRUP-CUP

Death, thou'rt a cordial old and rare: Look how compounded, with what care! Time got his wrinkles reaping thee Sweet herbs from all antiquity.

David to thy distillage went, Keats, and Gotama 1 excellent. Omar Khayyam, 2 and Chaucer bright, And Shakespeare for a king-delight.

These were to sweeten thee with song: The blood of heroes made thee strong. What heroes! Ah, for shame, for shame! The worthiest died without a name.

Then, Time, let not a drop be spilt: Hand me the cup whene'er thou wilt: 'Tis thy rich stirrup-cup to me; I'll drink it down right smilingly. 1877

FROM THE FLATS

What heartache—ne'er a hill! Inexorable, vapid, vague and chill The drear sand-levels drain my spirit low. With one poor word they tell me all they know; Whereat their stupid tongues, to tease my pain, Do drawl it o'er again and o'er again. They hurt my heart with griefs I cannot name: Always the same, the same.

Nature hath no surprise, No ambuscade of beauty 'gainst mine eyes From brake or lurking dell or deep defile; No humors, frolic forms—this mile, that mile; No rich reserves or happy-valley hopes Beyond the bend of roads, the distant slopes. Her fancy fails, her wild is all run tame: Ever the same, the same.

Oh might I through these tears But glimpse some hill my Georgia high uprears, Where white the quartz and pink the pebble shine,

The hickory heavenward strives, the muscadine 3 Swings o'er the slope, the oak's far-falling shade Darkens the dogwood in the bottom-glade. And down the hollow from a ferny nook

Bright leaps a living brook! 1877

1877

SONG OF THE CHATTAHOOCHEE 4

Out of the hills of Habersham, 5 Down the valleys of Hall, I hurry amain to reach the plain. Run the rapid and leap the fall. Split at the rock and together again, Accept my bed, or narrow or wide, And flee from folly on every side With a lover's pain to attain the plain Far from the hills of Habersham, Far from the valleys of Hall.

10

All down the hills of Habersham. All through the valleys of Hall, The rushes cried Abide, abide, The willful waterweeds held me thrall, The laving laurel turned my tide. The ferns and the fondling grass said Stay, The dewberry dipped for to work delay, And the little reeds sighed Abide, abide, Here in the hills of Habersham. Here in the valleys of Hall.

20

High o'er the hills of Habersham, Veiling the valleys of Hall, The hickory told me manifold Fair tales of shade, the poplar tall Wrought me her shadowy self to hold, The chestnut, the oak, the walnut, the pine. Overleaning, with flickering meaning and sign, Said, Pass not, so cold, these manifold Deep shades of the hills of Habersham, 30 These glades in the valleys of Hall.

And oft in the hills of Habersham, And oft in the valleys of Hall, The white quartz shone, and the smooth brook-

Did bar me of passage with friendly brawl, And many a luminous jewel lone —Crystals clear or a-cloud with mist, Ruby, garnet, and amethyst-Made lures with the lights of streaming stone In the clefts of the hills of Habersham, 40 In the beds of the valleys of Hall.

the family name of Buddha, the founder of Buddhism, who lived in the 6th century a Persian poet of the 11th and 12th centuries

<sup>See note 2, p. 704.
Cf. Tennyson's "The Brook."
Habersham and Hall are counties in Georgia on the upper waters of the Chattahoochee.</sup>

But oh, not the hills of Habersham,
And oh, not the valleys of Hall
Avail: I am fain for to water the plain.
Downward the voices of Duty call—
Downward, to toil and be mixed with the main,
The dry fields burn, and the mills are to turn,
And a myriad flowers mortally yearn,
And the lordly main from beyond the plain

Calls o'er the hills of Habersham,

Calls through the valleys of Hall.

1877

1877

THE MOCKING BIRD

Superb and sole, upon a pluméd spray
That o'er the general leafage boldly grew,
He summ'd the woods in song; or typic drew 1

The watch of hungry hawks, the lone dismay Of languid doves when long their lovers stray, And all birds' passion-plays that sprinkle dew

At morn in brake or bosky avenue.

Whate'er birds did or dreamed, this bird could

Then down he shot, bounced airily along
The sward, twitched-in a grasshopper, made

Midflight, perched, prinked, and to his art again.

Sweet Science, this large riddle read me plain:

How may the death of that dull insect be The life of you trim Shakespeare on the tree?

1877

THE HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS

Swift, through some trap mine eyes have never found,

Dim-panel'd in the painted scene of Sleep, Thou, giant Harlequin of Dreams, dost leap Upon my spirit's stage. Then Sight and Sound, Then Space and Time; then Language, Mete and Bound,

And all familiar Forms that firmly keep Man's reason in the road, change faces, peep Betwixt the legs and mock the daily round.

Yet thou canst more than mock: sometimes my tears

At midnight break through bounden lids—a sign 10

Thou hast a heart: and oft thy little leaven Of dream-taught wisdom works me bettered years.

In one night witch, saint, trickster, fool divine.

I think thou'rt Jester at the Court of Heaven!

1878 1878

THE MARSHES OF GLYNN<sup>2</sup>

Glooms of the live-oaks, beautiful-braided and

With intricate shades of the vines that myriad-

Clamber the forks of the multiform boughs.—

Emerald twilights,— Virginal shy lights,

Wrought of the leaves to allure to the whisper of vows,

When lovers pace timidly down through the green colonnades

Of the dim sweet woods, of the dear dark woods,

Of the heavenly woods and glades,

That run to the radiant marginal sand-beach within

The wide sea-marshes of Glynn;-

Beautiful glooms, soft dusks in the noon-day fire.—

Wildwood privacies, closets of lone desire,

Chamber from chamber parted with wavering arras of leaves,—

Cells for the passionate pleasure of prayer to the soul that grieves,

Pure with a sense of the passing of saints through the wood,

Cool for the dutiful weighing of ill with good;—

O braided dusks of the oak and woven shades of the vine.

While the riotous noon-day sun of the June-day long did shine

Ye held me fast in your heart and I held you fast in mine; 20

But now when the noon is no more, and riot is rest.

And the sun is a-wait at the ponderous gate of the West.

And the slant yellow beam down the wood-aisle doth seem Like a lane into heaven that leads from a dream,—

Ay, now, when my soul all day hath drunken the soul of the oak,

And my heart is at ease from men, and the wearisome sound of the stroke

Of the scythe of time and the trowel of trade is low,

<sup>1</sup> represented in his song

<sup>2</sup> the sea-coast marshes of Glynn County, Georgia

And belief overmasters doubt, and I know that I know.

And my spirit is grown to a lordly great compass within,

That the length and the breadth and the sweep of the marshes of Glynn

Will work me no fear like the fear they have . wrought me of vore

When length was fatigue, and when breadth was but bitterness sore.

And when terror and shrinking and dreary unnamable pain

Drew over me out of the merciless miles of the plain.—

Oh, now, unafraid, I am fain to face The vast sweet visage of space.

To the edge of the wood I am drawn, I am

Where the gray beach glimmering runs, as a belt of the dawn.

For a mete and a mark

40 To the forest-dark:-So:

Affable live-oak leaning low-

Thus—with your favor—soft, with a reverent

(Not lightly touching your person, Lord of the land!)

Bending your beauty aside, with a step I stand On the firm-packed sand,

By a world of marsh that borders a world of Sinuous southward and sinuous northward the shimmering band

Of the sand-beach fastens the fringe of the marsh to the folds of the land.

Inward and outward to northward and southward the beach-lines linger and curl

As a silver-wrought garment that clings to and follows the firm sweet limbs of a girl.

Vanishing, swerving, evermore curving again into sight.

Softly the sand-beach wavers away to a dim gray looping of light.

And what if behind me to westward the wall of the woods stands high?

The world lies east: how ample, the marsh and the sea and the sky!

A league and a league of marsh-grass waisthigh, broad in the blade,

Green, and all of a height, and unflecked with a light or a shade,

Stretch leisurely off, in a pleasant plain, To the terminal blue of the main.

Oh, what is abroad in the marsh and the terminal sea?

Somehow my soul seems suddenly free

From the weighing of fate and the sad discussion of sin.

By the length and the breadth and the sweep of the marshes of Glynn.

Ye marshes, how candid and simple and nothingwithholding and free

Ye publish yourselves to the sky and offer yourselves to the sea!

Tolerant plains, that suffer the sea and the rains and the sun.

Ye spread and span like the catholic 1 man who hath mightily won

God out of knowledge and good out of infinite

And sight out of blindness and purity out of a

As the marsh-hen secretly builds on the watery

Behold I will build me a nest on the greatness of God:

I will fly in the greatness of God as the marshhen flies

In the freedom that fills all the space 'twixt the marsh and the skies:

By so many roots as the marsh-grass sends in the sod

I will heartily lay me a hold on the greatness of God:

Oh, like to the greatness of God is the greatness

The range of the marshes, the liberal marshes of Glvnn.

And the sea lends large, as the marsh: lo, out of his plenty the sea

Pours fast: full soon the time of the flood-tide must be:

Look how the grace of the sea doth go

About and about through the intricate channels that flow

> Here and there. Everywhere,

Till his waters have flooded the uttermost creeks and the low-lying lanes, And the marsh is meshed with a million veins,

That like as with rosy and silvery essences flow In the rose-and-silver evening glow. Farewell, my lord Sun! The creeks overflow: a thousand rivulets run

'Twixt the roots of the sod; the blades of the marsh-grass stir;

<sup>1</sup> liberal, tolerant-minded

Passeth a hurrying sound of wings that westward whirr:

Passeth, and all is still; and the currents cease to run:

And the sea and the marsh are one.

How still the plains of the waters be! The tide is in his ecstasy. The tide is at his highest height:

And it is night.

And now from the Vast of the Lord will the waters of sleep

Roll in on the souls of men,

But who will reveal to our waking ken

The forms that swim and the shapes that creep Under the waters of sleep?

And I would I could know what swimmeth below when the tide comes in

On the length and the breadth of the marvelous marshes of Glynn.

1878

1879?

THE REVENGE OF HAMISH

It was three slim does and a ten-tined 1 buck in the bracken lay;

And all of a sudden the sinister smell of a man.

Awaft on a wind-shift, wavered and ran Down the hill-side, and sifted along through the bracken and passed that way.

Then Nan got a-tremble at nostril; she was the daintiest doe:

In the print of her velvet flank on the velvet fern

She reared, and rounded her ears in turn.

Then the buck leaped up, and his head as a king's to a crown did go

Full high in the breeze, and he stood as if Death had the form of a deer;

And the two slim does long lazily stretching arose,

For their day-dream slowlier came to a close, Till they woke and were still, breath-bound with waiting and wonder and fear.

Then Alan the huntsman sprang over the hillock, the hounds shot by,

The does and the ten-tined buck made a marvelous bound,

The hounds swept after with never a sound, But Alan loud winded his horn in sign that the quarry was nigh.

1 with ten points on the antlers

For at dawn of that day proud Maclean of Lochbuy to the hunt had waxed wild,

And he cursed at old Alan till Alan fared off with the bounds

For to drive him the deer to the lower glengrounds:

"I will kill a red deer," quoth Maclean, "in the sight of the wife and the child."

So gayly he paced with the wife and the child to his chosen stand:

But he hurried tall Hamish the henchman ahead: "Go turn."

Cried Maclean—"if the deer seek to cross to the burn.

Do thou turn them to me: nor fail, lest thy back be red as thy hand!"

Now hard-fortuned Hamish, half blown of his breath with the height of the hill,

Was white in the face when the ten-tined buck and the does

Drew leaping to burn-ward; huskily rose

His shouts, and his nether lip twitched, and his legs were o'er-weak for his will.

So the deer darted lightly by Hamish and bounded away to the burn.

But Maclean never bating his watch tarried waiting below.

Still Hamish hung heavy with fear for to go All the space of an hour; then he went, and his face was greenish and stern.

And his eye sat back in the socket, and shrunken the eyeballs shone,

As withdrawn from a vision of deeds it were shame to see.

"Now, now, grim henchman, what is't with thee?"

Brake Maclean, and his wrath rose red as a beacon the wind hath upblown.

"Three does and a ten-tined buck made out," spoke Hamish, full mild,

"And I ran for to turn, but my breath it was blown, and they passed;

I was weak, for ye called ere I broke me my fast."

Cried Maclean: "Now a ten-tined buck in the sight of the wife and the child 40

I had killed if the gluttonous kern had not wrought me a snail's own wrong!"

Then he sounded, and down came kinsmen and clansmen all:

"Ten blows, for ten tine, on his back let

And reckon no stroke if the blood follow not at the bite of the thong!"

So Hamish made bare, and took him his strokes; at the last he smiled.

"Now I'll to the burn," quoth Maclean, "for it still may be

If a slimmer-paunched henchman will hurry with me

I shall kill me the ten-tined buck for a gift to the wife and the child!"

Then the clansmen departed, by this path and that; and over the hill

Sped Maclean with an outward wrath for an inward shame; 50

And that place of the lashing full quiet became:

And the wife and the child stood sad; and bloody-backed Hamish sat still.

But look! red Hamish has risen; quick about and about turns he.

"There is none betwixt me and the crag-top!" he screams under breath.

Then, livid as Lazarus lately from death, He snatches the child from the mother, and clambers the crag toward the sea.

Now the mother drops breath; she is dumb, and her heart goes dead for a space.

her heart goes dead for a space,
Till the motherhood, mistress of death, shrieks, shrieks through the glen, And that place of the lashing is live with

And Maclean, and the gillie 1 that told him, dash up in a desperate race. 60

Not a breath's time for asking; an eye-glance reveals all the tale untold.

They follow mad Hamish afar up the crag toward the sea,

And the lady cries: "Clansmen, run for a fee!—

Yon castle and lands to the two first hands that shall hook him and hold Fast Hamish back from the brink!"—and ever she flies up the steep,

And the clansmen pant, and they sweat, and they jostle and strain.

But, mother, 'tis vain; but, father, 'tis vain; Stern Hamish stands bold on the brink, and dangles the child o'er the deep. Now a faintness falls on the men that run, and they all stand still.

And the wife prays Hamish as if he were God, on her knees,

Crying: "Hamish! O Hamish! but please, but please

For to spare him!" and Hamish still dangles the child, with a wavering will.

On a sudden he turns; with a sea-hawk scream, and a gibe, and a song, Cries: "So; I will spare ye the child if, in sight of ye all.

Ten blows on Maclean's bare back shall fall, And ye reckon no stroke if the blood follow not at the bite of the thong!"

Then Maclean he set hardly his tooth to his lip that his tooth was red.

Breathed short for a space, said: "Nay, but it never shall be!

Let me hurl off the damnable hound in the sea!"

But the wife: "Can Hamish go fish us the child from the sea, if dead?

Say yea!—Let them lash me, Hamish?"—
"Nay!"—"Husband, the lashing will heal:

But, oh, who will heal me the bonny sweet bairn in his grave?

Could ye cure me my heart with the death of . a knave?

Quick! Love! I will bare thee—so—kneel!"
Then Maclean 'gan slowly to kneel

With never a word, till presently downward he jerked to the earth.

Then the henchman—he that smote Hamish—would tremble and lag;

"Strike, hard!" quoth Hamish, full stern, from the crag;

Then he struck him, and "One!" sang Hamish, and danced with the child in his mirth.

And no man spake beside Hamish; he counted each stroke with a song.

When the last stroke fell, then he moved him a pace down the height,

And he held forth the child in the heartaching sight

Of the mother, and looked all pitiful grave, as repenting a wrong.

And there as the motherly arms stretched out with the thanksgiving prayer—

<sup>1</sup> man-servant

And there as the mother crept up with a fearful swift pace,

Till her finger nigh felt of the bairnie's face-In a flash fierce Hamish turned round and lifted the child in the air.

And sprang with the child in his arms from the horrible height in the sea.

Shrill screeching, "Revenge!" in the windrush; and pallid Maclean.

Age-feeble with anger and impotent pain, Crawled up on the crag, and lay flat, and locked hold of dead roots of a tree-

And gazed hungrily o'er, and the blood from his back drip-dripped in the brine,

And a sea-hawk flung down a skeleton fish as

And the mother stared white on the waste of

And the wind drove a cloud to seaward, and the sun began to shine.

1878 1878

THE CRYSTAL

At midnight, death's and truth's unlocking-time, When far within the spirit's hearing rolls The great soft rumble of the course of things-A bulk of silence in a mask of sound-When darkness clears our vision that by day Is sun-blind, and the soul's a ravening owl For truth and flitteth here and there about Low-lying woody tracts of time, and oft Is minded for to sit upon a bough, Dry-dead and sharp, of some long-stricken tree And muse in that gaunt place-'twas then my heart.

Deep in the meditative dark, cried out: "Ye companies of governor-spirits grave, Bards, and old bringers-down of flaming news From steep-walled heavens, holy malcontents, Sweet seers, and stellar visionaries, all That brood about the skies of poesy, Full bright ye shine, insuperable stars; Yet, if a man look hard upon you, none 20 With total luster blazeth, no, not one But hath some heinous freckle of the flesh Upon his shining cheek, not one but winks His ray, opaqued with intermittent mist Of defect; yea, you masters all must ask Some sweet forgiveness, which we leap to give, We lovers of you, heavenly-glad to meet Your largesse so with love, and interplight Your geniuses with our mortalities.

Thus unto thee, O sweetest Shakespeare sole. A hundred hurts a day I do forgive ('Tis little, but, enchantment! 'tis for thee): Small curious quibble; 1 Juliet's prurient pun 2 In the poor, pale face of Romeo's fancied death: Cold rant of Richard: 3 Henry's fustian roar Which frights away that sleep he invocates; 4 Wronged Valentine's unnatural haste to yield: 5 Too-silly shifts of maids that mask as men In faint disguises that could ne'er disguise-Viola, Julia, Portia, Rosalind: 6 Fatigues most drear, and needless overtax Of speech obscure that had as lief be plain: Last I forgive (with more delight, because 'Tis more to do) the labored-lewd discourse That e'en thy young invention's youngest heir 7 Besmirched the world with.

Father Homer! thee, Thee also I forgive thy sandy wastes Of prose and catalogue, thy drear harangues

That tease the patience of the centuries; Thy sleazy scrap of story-but a rogue's Rape of a light-o'-love-too soiled a patch

To broider with the gods.

Thee, Socrates, Thou dear and very strong one, I forgive Thy year-worn cloak, 8 thine iron stringencies That were but dandy upside-down, thy words Of truth that, mildlier spoke had mainlier 9 wrought.

So. Buddha, beautiful! I pardon thee That all the All thou hadst for needy man Was Nothing, and thy Best of being was But not to be. 10

Worn Dante, I forgive The implacable hates that in thy horrid hells 60

<sup>1</sup> Any cheap play on words; cf. Julius Caesar, I. i, II-36; Hamlet, V, i, I ff. Or, possibly, the allusion is to The Merchant of Venice, with particular reference to the "pound of flesh" upon which rests the main plot.

Romeo and Juliet, III, ii

Richard III, I, I, If.

Let Henry IV, III, I, 5-31

Two Gent'emen of Verona, V, iv, 77-83

in Twelfth Night, Two Gentlemen of Verona, The Merchant of Venice, and As You Like It, respectively Wenus and Adonis 8 Socrates seems to have taken pride in wearing shabby clothing.

In ore effectively
To The highest spiritual state of the Buddhist is generally supposed to be absorption in the all-perfect, even as a drop of water is absorbed by the ocean. Buddha taught that perfection may be reached in this life when the cardinal sins die out in the heart. He did not himself teach the merging of the soul in God, or bliss in death. (See Encyclopacdia Britannica, IV, 744.) 9 more effectively

Or burn or freeze thy fellows, never loosed By death, nor time, nor love. 1

And I forgive

Thee, Milton, those thy comic-dreadful wars Where, armed with gross and inconclusive steel, Immortals smite immortals mortalwise And fill all heaven with folly. 2

Also thee. Brave Aeschylus, thee I forgive, for that Thine eye, by bare bright justice basilisked. 3 Turned not, nor ever learned to look where Stands shining.

So, unto thee, Lucretius mine (For oh! what heart hath loved thee like to this That's now complaining?), freely I forgive Thy logic poor, thine error rich, thine earth Whose graves eat souls and all. 4

Yea, all you hearts Of beauty, and sweet righteous lovers large: Aurelius 5 fine, oft superfine; mild Saint à Kempis, overmild: Epictetus. Whiles low in thought, still with old slavery tinct:

Rapt Behmen, 6 rapt too far; high Swedenborg, O'ertoppling; Langley, that with but a touch Of art hadst sung Piers Plowman to the top 81 Of English songs, whereof 'tis dearest now And most adorable; Caedmon, 7 in the morn A-calling angels with the cow-herd's call That late brought up the cattle; Emerson, Whatever Lanier's opinion, Dante was actuated not by hatied but by a stern sense of the unrelenting consequences of sin.

 Paradise Lost, Bk. VI
 Greek tragedy usually depicted the gods as avenging fates, influenced only by ideas of justice, not mercy. The basilisk, an imaginary monster of the ancients, struck mortals dead with the intensity ancients, struck mortals dead with the intensity of its glance.

<sup>4</sup> Lucretius, a Roman philosophical poet (96°-55 n.c.). author of De Rerum Natura; he did not believe in immortality.

Marcus Aurelius (121-180), Roman Emperor and Stoic philosopher, wrote Meditations. Thomas à Kempis, 1380-1471, was author of De Imitatione Christi. Epictetus, born a slave, was a Greek Stoic philosopher of the first century.

More correctly Jakob Böhme, or Böhm, 1575-1624, a German mystic; Swedenborg was a Swedish mystic, 1688-1772; and William Langland, 1330-1400?, the supposed author of the Vision of Piers the Plowman.

The first English Christian poet, who possibly lived in immortality.

The first English Christian poet, who possibly lived in the 7th century. Both Bede and Alfred, the only early writers mentioning him, say that the care of the cattle was given "for that night" to Caedmon, a secular monk in the monastery. From this fact it has become usual to say that Caedmon. Caedmon, a secular monk in the monastery. From this fact it has become usual to say that Caedmon was a cowherd.

Most wise, that yet, in finding Wisdom, lost Thy Self, sometimes: tense Keats, with angel's

Where men's were better: Tennyson, largest voice

Since Milton, yet some register 8 of wit Wanting; -all, all, I pardon, ere 'tis asked. Your more or less, your little mole that marks You brother and your kinship seals to man.

But Thee, but Thee, O sovereign Seer of

But Thee, O poet's Poet, Wisdom's Tongue, But Thee, O man's best Man, O love's best Love.

O perfect life in perfect labor writ. O all men's Comrade, Servant, King, or Priest.-

What if or vet, what mole, what flaw, what

What least defect or shadow of defect, 100 What rumor tattled by an enemy, Of inference loose, what lack of grace, Even in torture's grasp, or sleep's, or death's-Oh, what amiss may I forgive in Thee, Jesus, good Paragon, thou Crystal Christ?" 1880 1880

A BALLAD OF TREES AND THE MASTER

Into the woods my Master went, 9 Clean forspent, forspent. Into the woods my Master came, Forspent with love and shame. But the olives they were not blind to Him, The little gray leaves were kind to Him: The thorn-tree had a mind to Him When into the woods He came.

Out of the woods my Master went, 10 And he was well content. Out of the woods my Master came, Content with death and shame. When Death and Shame would woo Him last. From under the trees they drew Him last: 'Twas on a tree they slew Him-last When out of the woods He came. 1880 1880

SUNRISE—A HYMN OF THE MARSHES 10

In my sleep I was fain of their fellowship, fain Of the live-oak, the marsh, and the main.

8 compass, range

Matthew xxvi, 36, ff.
This was the last poem completed by Lanier.

The little green leaves would not let me alone in my sleep:

Up-breathed from the marshes, a message of range and of sweep.

Interwoven with waftures of wild sea-liberties, drifting.

Came through the lapped leaves sifting, sifting, Came to the gates of sleep.

Then my thoughts, in the dark of the dungeonkeep

Of the Castle of Captives hid in the City of Sleep.

Upstarted, by twos and by threes assembling:

The gates of sleep fell a-trembling

Like as the lips of a lady that forth falter yes,
Shaken with happiness:

The gates of sleep stood wide.

I have waked, I have come, my beloved! I might not abide:

I have come ere the dawn, O beloved, my liveoaks, to hide

In your gospeling glooms,—to be

As a lover in heaven, the marsh, my marsh and the sea my sea.

Tell me, sweet burly-barked, man-bodied Tree That mine arms in the dark are embracing, dost know 20

From what fount are these tears at thy feet which flow?

They rise not from reason, but deeper inconsequent deeps.

Reason's not one that weeps.

What logic of greeting lies

Betwixt dear over-beautiful trees and the rain of the eyes?

O cunning green leaves, little masters! like as ye gloss

All the dull-tissued dark with your luminous darks that emboss

The vague blackness of night into pattern and plan,

(But would I could know, but would I could know).

With your question embroid'ring the dark of the question of man,—

So, with your silences purfling 1 this silence of man

While his cry to the dead for some knowledge is under the ban,

Under the ban,—

So, ye have wrought me

Designs on the night of our knowledge—yea, ye have taught me,

So.

That haply we know somewhat more than we know.

Ye lispers, whisperers, singers in storms,

Ye consciences murmuring faiths under forms, 40

Ye ministers meet for each passion that grieves.

Friendly, sisterly, sweetheart leaves.

Oh, rain me down from your darks that contain

Wisdoms ye winnow from winds that pain me.—

Sift down tremors of sweet-within-sweet

That advise me of more than they bring,— repeat

Me the woods-smell that swiftly but now brought breath

From the heaven-side bank of the river of death,—

Teach me the terms of silence,—preach me
The passion of patience,—sift me,—impeach me—
50

And there, oh there

As ye hang with your myriad palms upturned in the air.

Pray me a myriad prayer.

My gossip, the owl, is it thou
That out of the leaves of the low-hanging bough,
As I pass to the beach, art stirred?
Dumb woods, have ye uttered a bird?

* * * *

Reverend Marsh, low-couched along the sea, Old chemist, rapt in alchemy,

Distilling silence,—lo,

That which our father-age had died to know—
The menstruum <sup>2</sup> that dissolves all matter—

Hast found it: for this silence, filling now The globéd charity of receiving space, This solves us all: man, matter, doubt, disgrace, Death, love, sin, sanity,

Must in you silence' clear solution lie.

Too clear! That crystal nothing who'll peruse? The blackest night could bring us brighter news. Yet precious qualities of silence haunt 70

Round these vast margins, ministrant. Oh, if thy soul's at latter gasp for space,

With trying to breathe no bigger than thy race Just to be fellow'd, when that thou hast found No man with room, or grace enough of bound

¹ decorating, as the border of a violin may be decorated with inlaid work

<sup>2</sup> solvent

To entertain that New thou tell'st, thou art,—'Tis here, 'tis here thou canst unhand thy heart And breathe it free, and breathe it free, By rangy marsh, in lone sea-liberty.

The tide's at full: the marsh with flooded streams 80

Glimmers, a limpid labyrinth of dreams. Each winding creek in grave entrancement lies A rhapsody of morning-stars. The skies

Shine scant with one forked galaxy,—

The marsh brags ten; looped on his breast they lie.

Oh, what if a sound should be made! Oh, what if a bound should be laid

To this bow-and-string tension of beauty and silence a-spring,—

To the bend of beauty the bow, or the hold of silence the string!

I fear me, I fear me yon dome of diaphanous

Will break as a bubble o'er-blown in a dream,—Yon dome of too tenuous tissues of space and of night.

Overweighted with stars, overfreighted with light.

Oversated with beauty and silence, will seem But a bubble that broke in a dream, If a bound of degree to this grace be laid

Or a sound or a motion made.

But no: it is made: list! somewhere—mystery, where?

In the leaves? in the air?

In my heart? is a motion made:

'Tis a motion of dawn, like a flicker of shade on shade.

In the leaves 'tis palpable; low multitudinous stirring

Upwinds through the woods; the little ones, softly conferring,

Have settled my lord's to be looked for; so; they are still;

But the air and my heart and the earth are a-thrill,—

And look where the wild duck sails round the bend of the river.—

And look where a passionate shiver Expectant is bending the blades

Of the marsh-grass in serial shimmers and shades,—

And invisible wings, fast fleeting, fast fleeting,
Are beating

The dark overhead as my heart beats,—and steady and free

Is the ebb-tide flowing from marsh to sea— (Run home, little streams, With your lapfuls of stars and dreams), And a sailor unseen is hoisting a-peek; For list, down the inshore curve of the creek How merrily flutters the sail.—

And lo, in the East! Will the East unveil?

The East is unveiled, the East hath confessed

A flush: 'tis dead; 'tis alive: 'tis dead, ere the West. 121

Was aware of it: nay, 'tis abiding, 'tis unwithdrawn:

Have a care, sweet Heaven! 'Tis Dawn.

Now a dream of a flame through that dream of a flush is uprolled:

To the zenith ascending, a dome of undazzling gold

Is builded, in shape as a bee-hive, from out of the sea:

The hive is of gold undazzling, but oh, the Bee.

The star-fed Bee, the build-fire Bee,
Of dazzling gold is the great Sun-Bee
That shall flash from the hive-hole over the sea.

Yet now the dew-drop, now the morning gray.

Shall live their little lucid sober day
Ere with the sun their souls exhale away.
Now in each pettiest personal sphere of dew
The summ'd morn shines complete as in the Big dew-drop of all heaven. With these lit shrines

O'er silvered to the farthest sea-confines,
The sacramental marsh one pious plain
Of worship lies. Peace to the ante-reign
Of Mary Morning, blissful mother mild,
Minded of naught but peace, and of a child.

Not slower than Majesty moves, for a mean and a measure

Of motion, not faster than dateless Olympian leisure

Might pace with unblown ample garments from pleasure to pleasure,—

The wave-serrate sea-rim sinks unjarring, unreeling.

Forever revealing, revealing, revealing, Edgewise, bladewise, halfwise, wholewise,—'tis done!

Good-morrow, lord Sun!
With several voice, with ascription 1 one,
The woods and the marsh and the sea and my soul

<sup>1</sup> homage, tribute

Unto thee, whence the glittering stream of all morrows doth roll,

Cry good and past-good, and most heavenly morrow, lord Sun.

O Artisan born in the purple,—Workman Heat. Parter of passionate atoms that travail to meet And be mixed in the death-cold oneness, innermost Guest

At the marriage of elements,—Fellow of publicans.—blest

King in the blouse of flame, that loiterest o'er The idle skies yet laborest fast evermore,—

Thou, in the fine forge-thunder, thou, in the beat

Of the heart of a man, thou Motive,—Laborer Heat:

Yea, Artist, thou, of whose art you sea's all news.

With his inshore greens and manifold mid-sea blues.

Pearl-glint, shell-tint, ancientest perfectest hues Ever shaming the maidens,—lily and rose

Confess thee, and each mild flame that glows In the clarified virginal bosoms of stones that shine.

It is thine, it is thine:

Thou chemist of storms, whether driving the winds a-swirl

Or a-flicker the subtiler essences polar that

In the magnet earth,—yea, thou with a storm for a heart,

Rent with debate, many-spotted with question,

From part oft sundered, yet ever a globéd light. Yet ever the artist, ever more large and bright Than the eye of a man may avail of:—manifold

I must pass from thy face, I must pass from the face of the Sun:

Old Want is awake and agog, every wrinkle a-frown;

The worker must pass to his work in the terrible town:

But I fear not, nay, and I fear not the thing to be done;

I am strong with the strength of my lord the Sun:

How dark, how dark soever the race that must needs be run,

I am lit with the Sun.

Oh, never the mast-high run of the seas Of traffic shall hide thee, Never the hell-colored smoke of the factories Hide thee.

Never the reek of the time's fen-politics Hide thee.

And ever my heart through the night shall with knowledge abide thee,

And ever by day shall my spirit, as one that hath tried thee.

Labor, at leisure, in art,—till yonder beside

My soul shall float, friend Sun, The day being done.

1880

1882

HELEN HUNT JACKSON 1831-1885

Helen Maria Fiske represented both the East and the West of the United States. She took up literature at thirty-five, after the death of her first husband, Captain Hunt, and their children. Her early work included poetry (Verses by H. H., 1870; Sonnets and Lyrics, 1887), and novels of New England life. Later she went to Colorado for her health, married Mr. Jackson, became interested in the wrongs of the Indians, and wrote A Century of Dishonor, 1881. As a result in 1883 she was appointed one of two commissioners to report on the Mission Indians of California. Her desire further to arouse public sympathy for the Indians gave us Ramona, 1884, one of the most popular romances of the period, and of permanent interest as a picture of old Spanish days.

Biography and criticism: T. W. Higginson, Short Studies of American Authors; C. C. Davis and W. A. Alderson, The True Story of Ramona, 1914; D. A. Hufford, The True Ramona, 1900; G. W. James, Through Ramona's Country, 1909; "How Ramona Was Written," Atlan. 86:712-14; T. W. Higginson, Nation 41:150-1, good sketch of life; A. W. Tourgée, "A Study in Civilization," No. Am. 143:246-61.

SPINNING 1

Like a blind spinner in the sun,
I tread my days;
I know that all the threads will run
Appointed ways;
I know each day will bring its task,
And, being blind, no more I ask.

I do not know the use or name Of that I spin:

I only know that some one came, And laid within

My hand the thread, and said, "Since you Are blind, but one thing you can do."

<sup>1</sup> Copyright, 1873, by Little, Brown and Company.

10

20

31

10

20

30

Sometimes the threads so rough and fast And tangled fly,
I know wild storms are sweeping past,
And fear that I
Shall fall; but dare not try to find
A safer place, since I am blind.

I know not why, but I am sure
That tint and place,
In some great fabric to endure
Past time and race
My threads will have; so from the first,
Though blind, I never felt accurst.

I think, perhaps, this trust has sprung
From one short word
Said over me when I was young,—
So young, I heard
It, knowing not that God's name signed
My brow, and sealed me His, though blind.

But whether this be seal or sign
Within, without,
It matters not. The bond divine
I never doubt.
I know He set me here, and still,
And glad, and blind, I wait His will;

But listen, listen, day by day,
To hear their tread
Who bear the finished web away,
And cut the thread,
And bring God's message in the sun,
"Thou poor blind spinner, work is done."

OCTOBER 1

Bending above the spicy woods which blaze, Arch skies so blue they flash, and hold the sun Immeasurably far; the waters run Too slow, so freighted are the river-ways With gold of elms and birches from the maze Of forests. Chestnuts, clicking one by one, Escape from satin burs; her fringes done, The gentian spreads them out in sunny days, And, like late revelers at dawn, the chance Of one sweet, mad, last hour, all things assail, And conquering, flush and spin; while, to enhance

The spell, by sunset door, wrapped in a veil Of red and purple mists, the summer, pale, Steals back alone for one more song and dance.

CORONATION 1

At the king's gate the subtle noon Wove filmy yellow nets of sun;

<sup>1</sup> Copyright, 1873, by Little, Brown and Company.

Into the drowsy snare too soon The guards fell one by one.

Through the king's gate, unquestioned then, A beggar went, and laughed, "This brings Me chance, at last, to see if men Fare better, being kings!"

The king sat bowed beneath his crown, Propping his face with listless hand; Watching the hour-glass sifting down Too slow its shining sand.

"Poor man, what wouldst thou have of me?"
The beggar turned, and, pitying,
Replied, like one in dream, "Of thee,
Nothing. I want the king."

Uprose the king, and from his head Shook off the crown and threw it by. "O man, thou must have known," he said, "A greater king than I."

Through all the gates, unquestioned then, Went king and beggar hand in hand. Whispered the king, "Shall I know when Before his throne I stand?"

The beggar laughed. Free winds in haste Were wiping from the king's hot brow The crimson lines the crown had traced. "This is his presence now."

At the king's gate, the crafty noon Unwove its yellow nets of sun; Out of their sleep in terror soon The guards waked one by one.

"Ho here! Ho there! Has no man seen The king?" The cry ran to and fro; Beggar and king, they laughed, I ween, The laugh that free men know.

On the king's gate the moss grew gray;
The king came not. They called him dead;
And made his eldest son one day
Slave in his father's stead.

EMILY DICKINSON 1830-1886

Though Miss Dickinson was contemporary with Hawthorne, Emerson, Whitman, and Poe at the flowering of their genius, and with one of the most critical periods of American history, she was curiously untouched by outward influences. Her family helped to found Amherst, Massachusetts, where she was born and where she spent practically all her life. She attended the public schools, later going to South Hadley Female Seminary and to Amherst Academy. In 1853 during a visit to Washington and Philadelphia she is said to have formed a violent but hopeless attachment. At any rate from that time on she led a life of absolute seclusion, seeing only a few intimate friends. During her life only one of her poems was published; and that without her knowledge; but since her death three series, beginning with 1890, have appeared.

James Muirhead in America the Land of Contrasts, calls Miss Dickinson an example of the American in literature, and thinks her "full as national a type as Mr. Howells." "The subjects of her poems are few, but the piercing delicacy and depth of vision with which she turned from death and eternity to nature and to love make us feel the presence of that rare thing, genius. Hers is a wonderful instance of the way in which genius can dispense with experience; she sees more by pure intuition than others distill from the serried facts of an eventful life."

The Complete Poems of Emily Dickinson, ed. by Martha D. Bianchi, 1925; Further Poems, 1929. Biography and criticism: Bianchi, The Life and Letters of Emily Dickinson, 1924; G. Bradford, Portraits of American Women; same, Atlan. 124: 216-26; L. F. Abbott, "Emily Dickinson," Outlook 140:211-13; C. K. Trueblood, Dial 80:301-11; C. B. Green, "A Reminiscence of Emily Dickinson," Bookm. 60:291-3; M. Hartley, Dial 65:95-7; M. H. Shackford, "The Poetry of Emily Dickinson," Atlan. 111:93-7; C. Aiken, Dial 76:301-8.

> This is my letter to the world, That never wrote to me,-The simple news that Nature told, With tender majesty.

____

Her message is committed To hands I cannot see; For love of her, sweet countrymen, Tudge tenderly of me!

OUR SHARE OF NIGHT TO BEAR

-0---

Our share of night to bear. Our share of morning, Our blank in bliss to fill, Our blank in scorning.

Here a star, and there a star, Some lose their way. Here a mist, and there a mist, Afterwards-day!

I HAD NO TIME TO HATE

I had no time to hate, because The grave would hinder me. And life was not so ample I Could finish enmity.

Nor had I time to love: but since Some industry must be, The little toil of love, I thought, Was large enough for me.

ALTER? WHEN THE HILLS DO

Alter? When the hills do. Falter? When the sun Question if his glory Be the perfect one.

Surfeit? When the daffodil Doth of the dew: Even as herself, O friend! I will of you!

IN VAIN 1

I cannot live with you, It would be life, And life is over there Rehind the shelf

The sexton keeps the key to. Putting up Our life, his porcelain, Like a cup Discarded of the housewife, Quaint or broken; A newer Sèvres pleases, Old ones crack.

I could not die with you, For one must wait To shut the other's gaze down,-You could not.

And I, could I stand by And see you freeze, Without my right of frost, Death's privilege?

Nor could I rise with you, Because your face Would put out Jesus', That new grace

¹ Cf. Christina Rossetti's sonnet: "Many in aftertimes will say of you—"

10

20

30

. ಕ್ರೆ

20

Glow plain and foreign On my homesick eye, Except that you, than he Shone closer by.

They'd judge us—how?
For you served Heaven, you know,
Or sought to;
I could not.

Because you saturated sight, And I had no more eyes For sordid excellence As Paradise.

And were you lost, I would be, Though my name Rang loudest On the heavenly fame.

And Were you saved, And I condemned to be Where you were not, That self were hell to me.

So we must keep apart, You there, I here, With just the door ajar That oceans are, And prayer, And that pale sustenance, Despair!

RENUNCIATION

There came a day at summer's full Entirely for me; I thought that such were for the saints, Where revelations be.

The sun, as common, went abroad, The flowers, accustomed, blew, As if no soul the solstice passed That maketh all things new.

The time was scarce profaned by speech; The symbol of a word Was needless, as at sacrament The wardrobe of our Lord.

Each was to each the sealed church, Permitted to commune this time, Lest we too awkward show At supper of the Lamb.

The hours slid fast, as hours will, Clutched tight by greedy hands; So faces on two decks look back, Bound to opposing lands.

And so, when all the time had failed, Without external sound, Each bound the other's crucifix, We gave no other bond.

Sufficient troth that we shall rise— Deposed, at length, the grave— To that new marriage, justified Through Calvaries of Love!

A SERVICE OF SONG

Some keep the Sabbath going to church; I keep it staying at home, With a bobolink for a chorister, And an orchard for a dome.

Some keep the Sabbath in surplice; I just wear my wings, And instead of tolling the bell for church, Our little sexton sings.

God preaches,—a noted clergyman,— And the sermon is never long; So instead of getting to heaven at last, I'm going all along!

A DAY

I'll tell you how the sun rose,—A ribbon at a time.
The steeples swam in amethyst,
The news like squirrels ran.

The hills untied their bonnets, The bobolinks begun. Then I said softly to myself, "That must have been the sun!"

But how he set, I know not. There seemed a purple stile Which little yellow boys and girls

Till when they reached the other side, A dominie in gray Put gently up the evening bars, And led the flock away.

Were climbing all the while

AUTUMN

The morns are meeker than they were, The nuts are getting brown; The berry's cheek is plumper, The rose is out of town.

10

10

The maple wears a gayer scarf, The field a scarlet gown. Lest I should be old-fashioned, I'll put a trinket on.

I NEVER SAW A MOOR

I never saw a moor,
I never saw the sea;
Yet know I how the heather looks,
And what a wave must be.

I never spoke with God, Nor visited in heaven; Yet certain am I of the spot As if the chart were given.

I'M NOBODY! WHO ARE YOU?

I'm nobody! who are you? Are you nobody, too? Then there's a pair of us—don't tell! They'd banish us, you know.

How dreary to be somebody! How public, like a frog To tell your name the livelong day To an admiring bog!

WE PLAY AT PASTE

We play at paste,
Till qualified for pearl,
Then drop the paste,
And deem ourself a fool.
The shapes, though, were similar,
And our new hands
Learned gem-tactics
Practising sands.

THE TEST

I can wade grief. Whole pools of it,-I'm used to that. But the least push of joy Breaks up my feet, And I tip—drunken. Let no pebble smile, 'Twas the new liquor,-That was all! Power is only pain, Stranded, through discipline, Till weights will hang. Give balm to giants, And they'll wilt, like men. Give Himmaleh, 1— They'll carry him!

10

1 another spelling of Himalaya

SURGEONS MUST BE VERY CAREFUL

Surgeons must be very careful When they take the knife! Underneath their fine incisions Stirs the culprit,—Life!

THE SHOW

The show is not the show, But they that go.
Menagerie to me
My neighbor be.
Fair play—
Both went to see.

SECRETS

The skies can't keep their secret! They tell it to the hills— The hills just tell the orchards— And they the daffodils!

A bird, by chance, that goes that way Soft overheard the whole. If I should bribe the little bird, Who knows but she would tell?

10

I think I won't, however, It's finer not to know; If summer were an axiom, What sorcery had snow?

So keep your secret, Father! I would not, if I could, Know what the sapphire fellows do, In your new-fashioned world!

THE SEA

An everywhere of silver, With ropes of sand To keep it from effacing The track called land.

SIMPLICITY

How happy is the little stone That rambles in the road alone, And doesn't care about careers, And exigencies never fears; Whose coat of elemental brown A passing universe put on; And independent as the sun, Associates or glows alone, Fulfilling absolute decree In casual simplicity.

10

10

I READ MY SENTENCE STEADILY

I read my sentence steadily, Reviewed it with my eyes, To see that I made no mistake In its extremest clause.—

The date, and manner of the shame; And then the pious form That "God have mercy" on the soul The jury voted him.

I made my soul familiar With her extremity, That at the last it should not be A novel agony,

But she and Death, acquainted, Meet tranquilly as friends, Salute and pass without a hint— And there the matter ends.

WHAT INN IS THIS?

What inn is this <sup>1</sup>
Where for the night
Peculiar traveler comes?
Who is the landlord?
Where the maids?
Behold, what curious rooms!
No ruddy fires on the hearth,
No brimming tankards flow.
Necromancer, landlord,
Who are these below?

FORBIDDEN FRUIT. I

Forbidden fruit a flavor has That lawful orchards mocks; How luscious lies the pea within The pod that Duty locks!

FORBIDDEN FRUIT. II

Heaven is what I cannot reach!
The apple on the tree,
Provided it do hopeless hang,
That "heaven" is, to me.

The color on the cruising cloud,
The interdicted ground
Behind the hill, the house behind,—
There Paradise is found!

A WORD

A word is dead I
When it is said,
Some say.

I say it just Begins to live That day.

1 Cf. Christina Rossetti's "Uphill."

PARTING

My life closed twice before its close; It yet remains to see If Immortality unveil A third event to me.

So huge, so hopeless to conceive,
As these that twice befell.
Parting is all we know of heaven,
And all we need of hell

WHAT SOFT, CHERUBIC CREATURES

What soft, cherubic creatures
These gentlewomen are!
One would as soon assault a plush
Or violate a star.

Such dimity convictions, A horror so refined Of freckled human nature, Of Deity ashamed.—

It's such a common glory, A fisherman's degree! Redemption, brittle lady, Be so, ashamed of thee.

TO MAKE A PRAIRIE

To make a prairie it takes a clover and one bee,— One clover, and a bee, And revery. The revery alone will do If bees are few.

WE NEVER KNOW WE GO

We never know we go,—when we are going We jest and shut the door;
Fate following behind us bolts it,
And we accost no more.

ETERNITY'

On this wondrous sea,
Sailing silently,
Ho! pilot, ho!
Knowest thou the shore
Where no breakers roar?
Where the storm is o'er?

In the silent west
Many sails at rest,
Their anchors fast;
Thither I pilot thee—
Land, ho! Eternity!
Ashore at last!

10

FRANK R STOCKTON 1834-1902

The work of Frank Stockton abounds in a type of humor quite different from that of Mark Twain, though none the less American. Stockton entered literature as a vocation rather late in life. After an ordinary schooling in Philadelphia he supported himself for many years as a wood engraver. His skill brought him into contact with authors whose works he was illustrating and led him at length into journalism, and afterwards, in 1874, to the staff of St. Nicholas. Although he had practiced writing from his youth, his first notable piece of fiction was Rudder Grange, 1879. From this time forward his books appeared frequently, his most popular works being The Casting Away of Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. Aleshine, 1886; Squirrel Inn, 1890; and The Adventures of Captain Horn, 1890. His most notable short story is "The Lady or the Tiger?"

Stockton's humor is kindly, neither boisterous nor cynical. Its mock gravity, full of caprice and whim, forms a distinct contribution to American humor. His characters are typically rather stodgy middle-class people of limited experience, but are strongly and convincingly drawn. Their goodness of heart, fixedness of purpose and lack of humor often lead them into situations of the utmost ab-

Novels and Stories, 23 volumes, 1899-1904.

Biography and criticism: Marian E. Stockton, "A Memorial Sketch" (in A Bicycle of Cathay, 1904). J. H. Morse, "Frank R. Stockton at Home," Critic 32:259-61; E. W. Bowen, Sewanee R. 11:474-8; Outlook 70:1000-1; R. of Rs. 25: 698-9: Ind. 90:28.

THE LADY OR THE TIGER? 1

In the very olden time, there lived a semibarbaric king, whose ideas, though somewhat polished and sharpened by the progressiveness of distant Latin neighbors, were still large, florid, and untrammeled, as became the half of him which was barbaric. He was a man of exuberant fancy, and, withal, of an authority so irresistible that, at his will, he turned his varied fancies into facts. He was greatly given to self-communing, and when he and himself agreed upon anything, the thing was done. When every member of his domestic and political systems moved smoothly in its appointed course, his nature was bland and genial; but whenever there was a little hitch, and some of his orbs got out of their orbits, he was blander and more genial still, for nothing pleased him so much as to make the crooked straight, and crush down uneven places.

Among the borrowed notions by which his barbarism had become semified 2 was that of the public arena, in which, by exhibitions of manly and beastly valor, the minds of his subjects were refined and cultured.

But even here the exuberant and barbaric fancy asserted itself. The arena of the king was built, not to give the people an opportunity of hearing the rhapsodies of dying gladiators, nor to enable them to view the inevitable conclusion of a conflict between religious opinions and hungry jaws, but for purposes far better adapted to widen and develop the mental energies of the people. This vast amphitheater, with its encircling galleries, its mysterious vaults, and its unseen passages, was an agent of poetic justice, in which crime was punished, or virtue rewarded, by the decrees of an impartial and incorruptible chance.

When a subject was accused of a crime of sufficient importance to interest the king, public notice was given that on an appointed day the fate of the accused person would be decided in the king's arena—a structure which well deserved its name; for, although its form and plan were borrowed from afar, its purpose emanated solely from the brain of this man, who, every barleycorn a king, knew no tradition to which he owed more allegiance than pleased his fancy, and who ingrafted on every adopted form of human thought and action the rich growth of his barbaric idealism.

When all the people had assembled in the galleries, and the king, surrounded by his court, sat high up on his throne of royal state on one side of the arena, he gave a signal, a door beneath him opened, and the accused subject stepped out into the amphitheater. Directly opposite him, on the other side of the enclosed space, were two doors, exactly alike and side by side. It was the duty and the privilege of the person on trial to walk directly to these doors and open one of them. He could open either door he pleased. He was subject to no guidance or influence but that of the aforementioned impartial and incorruptible chance. If he opened the one, there came out of it a hungry tiger, the fiercest and most cruel that could be procured, which immediately sprang upon him, and tore him to pieces, as a punishment for his guilt. The moment that the case of the criminal was thus decided, doleful iron bells were clanged, great wails went up from the hired mourners posted on the outer rim of the arena, and the vast audience, with bowed heads and downcast hearts, wended slowly their homeward way, mourning that one so young and fair, or so old and respected, should have merited so dire a fate.

&lt;sup>1</sup> From Novels and Stories of Frank Stockton. Copyright, Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers. By permission.

<sup>2</sup> probably coined from semi, half; reduced by half

But if the accused person opened the other door, there came forth from it a lady, the most suitable to his years and station that his Majesty could select among his fair subjects; and to this lady he was immediately married, as a reward of his innocence. It mattered not that he might already possess a wife and family, or that his affections might be engaged upon an object of his own selection. The king allowed no such subordinate arrangement to interfere with his great scheme of retribution and reward. The exercises, as in the other instance. took place immediately, and in the arena. Another door opened beneath the king, and a priest, followed by a band of choristers, and dancing maidens blowing joyous airs on golden horns and treading epithalamic 1 measure, advanced to where the pair stood side by side, and the wedding was promptly and cheerily Then the gay brass bells rang solemnized. forth their merry peals, the people shouted glad hurrahs, and the innocent man, preceded by children strewing flowers on his path, led his bride to his home.

This was the king's semi-barbaric method of administering justice. Its perfect fairness is obvious. The criminal could not know out of which door would come the lady. He opened either he pleased, without having the slightest idea whether, in the next instant, he was to be devoured or married. On some occasions the tiger came out of one door, and on some out of the other. The decisions of this tribunal were not only fair—they were positively determinate. The accused person was instantly punished if he found himself guilty, and if innocent he was rewarded on the spot, whether he liked it or not. There was no escaping from the judgments of the king's arena.

The institution was a very popular one. When the people gathered together on one of the great trial days, they never knew whether they were to witness a bloody slaughter or a hilarious wedding. This element of uncertainty lent an interest to the occasion which it could not otherwise have attained. Thus the masses were entertained and pleased, and the thinking part of the community could bring no charge of unfairness against this plan; for did not the accused person have the whole matter in his own hands?

The semi-barbaric king had a daughter as blooming as his most florid fancies, and with a soul as fervent and imperious as his own. As is usual in such cases, she was the apple of his eve, and was loved by him above all humanity. Among his courtiers was a young man of that fineness of blood and lowness of station common to the conventional heroes of romance who love roval maidens. This roval maiden was well satisfied with her lover, for he was handsome and brave to a degree unsurpassed in all this kingdom, and she loved him with an ardor that had enough of barbarism in it to make it exceedingly warm and strong. This love affair moved on happily for many months, until, one day, the king happened to discover its existence. He did not hesitate nor waver in regard to his duty in the premises. 2 The youth was immediately cast into prison, and a day was appointed for his trial in the king's arena. This, of course, was an especially important occasion, and his Majesty, as well as all the people, was greatly interested in the workings and development of this trial. Never before had such a case occurred—never before had a subject dared to love the daughter of a king. In after years such things became commonplace enough, but then they were, in no slight degree, novel and startling.

The tiger cages of the kingdom were searched for the most savage and relentless beasts, from which the fiercest monster might be selected for the arena, and the ranks of maiden youth and beauty throughout the land were carefully surveyed by competent judges, in order that the young man might have a fitting bride in case fate did not determine for him a different destiny. Of course, everybody knew that the deed with which the accused was charged had been done. He had loved the princess, and neither he, she, nor any one else thought of denying the fact. But the king would not think of allowing any fact of this kind to interfere with the workings of the tribunal, in which he took such great delight and satisfaction. No matter how the affair turned out, the youth would be disposed of, and the king would take an aesthetic pleasure in watching the course of events which would determine whether or not the young man had done wrong in allowing himself to love the princess.

The appointed day arrived. From far and near the people gathered, and thronged the great galleries of the arena, while crowds, unable to gain admittance, massed themselves against its outside walls. The king and his court were in their places, opposite the twin doors—those fateful portals, so terrible in their similarity!

1 bridal

<sup>2</sup> that is, since this was the fact

All was ready. The signal was given. A door beneath the royal party opened, and the lover of the princess walked into the arena. Tall, beautiful, fair, his appearance was greeted with a low hum of admiration and anxiety. Half the audience had not known so grand a youth had lived among them. No wonder the princess loved him! What a terrible thing for him to be there!

As the youth advanced into the arena, he turned, as the custom was, to bow to the king. But he did not think at all of that royal personage: his eyes were fixed upon the princess. who sat to the right of her father. Had it not been for the moiety of barbarism in her nature, it is probable the lady would not have been there. But her intense and fervid soul would not allow her to be absent on an occasion in which she was so terribly interested. From the moment that the decree had gone forth that her lover should decide his fate in the king's arena, she had thought of nothing, night or day, but this great event and the various subjects connected with it. Possessed of more power, influence, and force of character than any one who had ever before been interested in such a case, she had done what no other person had done-she had possessed herself of the secret of the doors. She knew in which of the two rooms behind those doors, stood the cage of the tiger, with its open front, and in which waited the lady. Through these thick doors, heavily curtained with skins on the inside, it was impossible that any noise or suggestion should come from within to the person who should approach to raise the latch of one of them. But gold, and the power of a woman's will, had brought the secret to the princess.

Not only did she know in which room stood the lady, ready to emerge, all blushing and radiant, should her door be opened, but she knew who the lady was. It was one of the fairest and loveliest of the damsels of the court who had been selected as the reward of the accused youth, should he be proved innocent of the crime of aspiring to one so far above him; and the princess hated her. Often had she seen, or imagined that she had seen, this fair creature throwing glances of admiration upon the person of her lover, and sometimes she thought these glances were perceived and even returned. Now and then she had seen them talking together. It was but for a moment or two, but much can be said in a brief space. It may have been on most unimportant topics, but how could she know that? The girl was lovely, but she had dared to raise her eyes to the loved one of the princess, and, with all the intensity of the savage blood transmitted to her through long lines of wholly barbaric ancestors, she hated the woman who blushed and trembled behind that silent door.

When her lover turned and looked at her. and his eyes met hers as she sat there paler and whiter than any one in the vast ocean of anxious faces about her, he saw, by that power of quick perception which is given to those whose souls are one, that she knew behind which door crouched the tiger, and behind which stood the lady. He had expected her to know it. He understood her nature, and his soul was assured that she would never rest until she had made plain to herself this thing, hidden to all other lookers-on, even to the king. The only hope for the youth in which there was any element of certainty was based upon the success of the princess in discovering this mystery, and the moment he looked upon her, he saw she had succeeded.

Then it was that his quick and anxious glance asked the question, "Which?" It was as plain to her as if he shouted it from where he stood. There was not an instant to be lost. The question was asked in a flash; it must be answered in another.

Her right arm lay on the cushioned parapet before her. She raised her hand and made a slight, quick movement toward the right. No one but her lover saw her. Every eye but his was fixed on the man in the arena.

He turned, and with a firm and rapid step he walked across the empty space. Every heart stopped beating, every breath was held, every eye was fixed immovably upon that man. Without the slightest hesitation, he went to the door on the right, and opened it.

Now the point of the story is this: Did the tiger come out of that door, or did the lady?

The more we reflect upon this question, the harder it is to answer. It involves a study of the human heart which leads us through devious mazes of passion, out of which it is difficult to find our way. Think of it, fair reader, not as if the decision of the question depended upon yourself, but upon that hot-blooded, semi-barbaric princess, her soul at a white heat beneath the combined fires of despair and jealousy. She had lost him, but who should have him?

How often, in her waking hours and in her dreams, had she started in wild horror and covered her face with her hands as she thought of her lover opening the door on the other side of which waited the cruel fangs of the tiger!

But how much oftener had she seen him at the other door! How in her grievous reveries had she gnashed her teeth and torn her hair when she saw his start of rapturous delight as he opened the door of the lady! How her soul had burned in agony when she had seen him rush to meet that woman, with her flushing cheek and sparkling eye of triumph; when she had seen him lead her forth, his whole frame kindled with the joy of recovered life; when she had heard the glad shouts from the multitude, and the wild ringing of the happy bells: when she had seen the priest, with his joyous followers, advance to the couple, and make them man and wife before her very eyes; and when she had seen them walk away together upon their path of flowers, followed by the tremendous shouts of the hilarious multitude. in which her one despairing shriek was lost and drowned?

Would it not be better for him to die at once, and go to wait for her in the blessed regions of semi-barbaric futurity?

And yet, that awful tiger, those shricks, that blood!

Her decision had been indicated in an instant, but it had been made after days and nights of anguished deliberation. known she would be asked, she had decided what she would answer, and, without the slightest hesitation she had moved her hand to the right.

The question of her decision is one not to be lightly considered, and it is not for me to presume to set up myself as the one person able to answer it. So I leave it with all of you: Which came out of the opened door—the lady or the tiger?

1884

MARK TWAIN (SAMUEL LANG-HORNE CLEMENS) 1835-1910

Of the major American writers of the nineteenth century, few were more strikingly American in experiences, material, and attitude, than Mark Twain. He was born in the teeming center of American life, on the Mississippi at Florida, Missouri. He was a local compositor, printer, and editor. He served an apprenticeship as a Mississippi River pilot. Soon after he received his license the Civil War came on. He enlisted in the Confederate forces, but deserted and made his way to Nevada where he became editor of a Virginia City newspaper. From San Francisco, where he was next engaged in newspaper work, he sailed to the Sandwich Islands and upon his return he gave his first public lecture upon his experiences there. This was the beginning of a long career as a lecturer. A tour of Europe and the Levant produced Innocents Abroad, 1870. This book, humorously satirical of some European pretentions, and of some European estimates of Americans, was one of the most popular books of the day.

Mark Twain wrote books of travel, essays, and history; but his treatment of American life centering upon the Mississippi River in Life on the Mississippi, 1883, and of American boyhood in Tom Sawyer, 1876, and Huckleberry Finn, 1884, form his greatest contribution to literature. The two latter books are marked by creative invention; their characters are realistic and natively American, developed with full realization of how an untamed, natural boy would think and act. Other wellknown books of Mark Twain's are Roughing It, 1872; A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court, 1889; Joan of Arc, 1896. His collected works appeared in 25 volumes in 1910. Much of his humorous work is characterized by ridiculous situations and grotesque exaggerations; but it often expresses a forthright common sense that is frequently thought of as characteristically American. His strength lies in his humor and characterizations rather than philosophy and social criticism, and in his backgrounds sketched in a large, dashing manner but essentially true to American life.

Biography: Mark Twain's Letters, 2 vols., 1917; Mark Twain's Autobiography, 2 vols., 1924; Albert B. Paine, Mark Twain: A Biography, 3 vols., 1912; Mary Lawton, A Lifetime with Mark Twain, 1925. Criticism: W. D. Howells, My Mark Twain, 1910; Macy; Carl Van Doren (AN); Trent and Erskine; Phelps (EB); Chubb; C. Van Doren, "Mark Twain and Bernard Shaw," Cent. 109:705-10; (1) Harper 144:273-80, 455-60; 145:310-5; (2) Lit. Digest 85:36-40; 86:38-40; G. Bradford, "Mark Twain," Atlan. 125:462-73 (also in American Portraits); B. Matthews, "Mark Twain and the Art of Writing," Harper 141:635-43; V. W. Brooks, "Mark Twain's Humor," Dial 68:275-91; "Mark Twain's Satire," same, 424-43.

From LIFE ON THE MISSISSIPPI 1

CHAPTER VII

A DARING DEED

When I returned to the pilot-house St. Louis was gone, and I was lost. Here was a piece of river which was all down in my book, but I could make neither head nor tail of it; you understand, it was turned around. I had seen it when coming up-stream, but I had never faced about to see how it looked when it was behind me. My heart broke again, for it was plain that I had got to learn this troublesome river both ways.

&lt;sup>1</sup> From Life on the Mississippi by Mark Twain. Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Harper and Brothers, publishers.

The pilot-house was full of pilots, going down to "look at the river." What is called the "upper river" (the two hundred miles between St. Louis and Cairo, where the Ohio comes in) was low; and the Mississippi changes its channel so constantly that the pilots used to always find it necessary to run down to Cairo to take a fresh look, when their boats were to lie in port a week; that is, when the water was at a low stage. A deal of this "looking at the river" was done by poor fellows who seldom had a berth, and whose only hope of getting one lay in their being always freshly posted and therefore ready to drop into the shoes of some reputable pilot, for a single trip, on account of such a pilot's sudden illness, or some other necessity. And a good many of them constantly ran up and down inspecting the river, not because they ever really hoped to get a berth, but because (they being guests of the boat) it was cheaper to "look at the river" than stay ashore and pay board. time these fellows grew dainty in their tastes. and only infested boats that had an established reputation for setting good tables. All visiting pilots were useful, for they were always ready and willing, winter and summer, day or night, to go out in the yawl and help buoy the channel or assist the boat's pilots in any way they could. They were likewise welcome because all pilots are tireless talkers, when gathered together, and as they talk only about the river they are always understood and are always interesting. Your true pilot cares nothing about anything on earth but the river, and his pride in his occupation surpasses the pride of kings.

We had a fine company of these river inspectors along this trip. There were eight or ten, and there was abundance of room for them in our great pilot-house. Two or three of them wore polished silk hats, elaborate shirt-fronts, diamond breastpins, kid gloves, and patent-leather boots. They were choice in their English and bore themselves with a dignity proper to men of solid means and prodigious reputation as pilots. The others were more or less loosely clad, and wore upon their heads tall felt cones that were suggestive of the days of the Commonwealth. 1

I was a cipher in this august company, and felt subdued, not to say torpid. I was not even of sufficient consequence to assist at the wheel when it was necessary to put the tiller hard down in a hurry: the guest that stood nearest did that when occasion required—and this was pretty much all the time, because of the crookedness of the channel and the scant water. I stood in a corner; and the talk I listened to took the hope all out of me. One visitor said to another:

"Iim, how did you run Plum Point, coming

"It was in the night, there, and I ran it the way one of the boys on the Diana told me; started out about fifty yards above the woodpile on the false point, and held on the cabin under Plum Point till I raised 2 the reefquarter less twain 3-then straightened up for the middle bar till I got well abreast the old one-limbed cottonwood in the bend, then got my stern on the cottonwood, and head on the low place above the point, and came through a-booming-nine and a half." 4

"Pretty square crossing, an't it?"

"Yes, but the upper bar's working down

Another pilot spoke up and said:

"I had better water than that, and ran it lower down; started out from the false pointmark twain 5-raised the second reef abreast the big snag in the bend, and had quarter less twain.

One of the gorgeous ones remarked:

"I don't want to find fault with your leadsmen, but that's a good deal of water for Plum Point, it seems to me."

There was an approving nod all around as this quiet snub dropped on the boaster and "settled" him. And so they went on talk-talktalking. Meantime, the thing that was running in my mind was, "Now, if my ears hear aright, I have not only to get the names of all the towns and islands and bends, and so on, by heart, but I must even get up a warm personal acquaintanceship with every old snag and one-limbed cottonwood and obscure wood-pile that ornaments the banks of this river for twelve hundred miles; and more than that, I must actually know where these things are in the dark, unless these guests are gifted with eyes that can pierce through two miles of solid blackness. I wish the piloting business was in Jericho and I had never thought of it."

2 came within sight of

<sup>2</sup> came within sight or <sup>3</sup> terms used in taking soundings on the Mississippi; here, one quarter of a fathom less than two fathoms deep <sup>4</sup> nine and a half feet <sup>5</sup> With the water as deep as the "2" (twain) mark on the sounding line: the frequently repeated call of the leadsman, "Mark twain!," Clemens adopted as his pseudonym.

<sup>1</sup> the government of England under Cromwell, 1653-58

At dusk Mr. Bixby tapped the big bell three times (the signal to land), and the captain emerged from his drawing-room in the forwardend of the "texas," 1 and looked up inquiringly. Mr. Bixby said:

"We will lay up here all night, captain."
"Very well, sir."

That was all. The boat came to shore and was tied up for the night. It seemed to me a fine thing that the pilot could do as he pleased, without asking so grand a captain's permission. I took my supper and went immediately to bed, discouraged by my day's observations and experiences. My late voyage's note-booking was but a confusion of meaningless names. It had tangled me all up in a knot every time I had looked at it in the daytime. I now hoped for respite in sleep; but no, it reveled all through my head till sunrise again, a frantic and tireless nightmare.

Next morning I felt pretty rusty and low-We went booming along, taking a good many chances, for we were anxious to "get out of the river" (as getting out to Cairo was called) before night should overtake us. But Mr. Bixby's partner, the other pilot, presently grounded the boat, and we lost so much time getting her off that it was plain the darkness would overtake us a good long way above the mouth. This was a great misfortune, especially to certain of our visiting pilots, whose boats would have to wait for their return, no matter how long that might be. It sobered the pilot-house talk a good deal. Coming upstream, pilots did not mind low water or any kind of darkness; nothing stopped them but fog. But down-stream work was different; a boat was too nearly helpless, with a stiff current pushing behind her; so it was not customary to run down-stream at night in low water.

There seemed to be one small hope, however; if we could get through the intricate and dangerous Hat Island crossing before night, we could venture the rest, for we would have plainer sailing and better water. But it would be insanity to attempt Hat Island at night. So there was a deal of looking at watches all the rest of the day, and a constant ciphering upon the speed we were making. Hat Island was the eternal subject; sometimes hope was high and sometimes we were delayed in a bad crossing, and down it went again. For hours all hands lay under the burden of this suppressed excitement; it was even communicated to me, and I got to feeling so solicitous about Hat Island, and under such an awful pressure of responsibility, that I wished I might have five minutes on shore to draw a good, full, relieving breath, and start over again. We were standing no regular watches. Each of our pilots ran such portions of the river as he had run when coming upstream, because of his greater familiarity with it; but both remained in the pilot-house constantly.

An hour before sunset Mr. Bixby took the wheel and Mr. W. stepped aside. For the next thirty minutes every man held his watch in his hand and was restless, silent, and uneasy. At last somebody said, with a doomful sigh:

"Well, yonder's Hat Island—and we can't make it."

All the watches closed with a snap, everybody sighed and muttered something about its being "too bad, too bad—ah, if we could only have got here half an hour sooner!" and the place was thick with the atmosphere of disappointment. Some started to go out, but loitered, hearing no bell-tap to land. The sun dipped behind the horizon, the boat went on. Inquiring looks passed from one guest to another; and one who had his hand on the doorknob and had turned it, waited, then presently took away his hand and let the knob turn back again. We bore steadily down the bend. More looks were exchanged, and nods of surprised admiration-but no words. Insensibly the men drew together behind Mr. Bixbv. as the sky darkened and one or two dim stars came The dead silence and sense of waiting became oppressive. Mr. Bixby pulled the cord, and two deep, mellow notes from the big bell floated off on the night. Then a pause. and one more note was struck. The watchman's voice followed, from the hurricane deck: "Labboard lead, there! Stabboard lead!"

The cries of the leadsmen began to rise out of the distance, and were gruffly repeated by the word-passers on the hurricane-deck.

"M-a-r-k three! M-a-r-k three! Quarterless-three! Half twain! Quarter twain! M-a-r-k twain! Quarter-less——"

Mr. Bixby pulled two bell-ropes and was answered by faint jinglings far below in the engine-room, and our speed slackened. The steam began to whistle through the gauge-cocks. The cries of the leadsmen went on—and it is a weird sound, always, in the night. Every pilot in the lot was watching now, with fixed eyes, and talking under his breath. Nobody was calm and easy but Mr. Bixby. He would put his wheel down and stand on a ¹a structure on the hurricane deck of a steamer containing the officers' cabin and the pilot house spoke, and as the steamer swung into her (to me) utterly invisible marks—for we seemed to be in the midst of a wide and gloomy sea—he would meet and fasten her there. Out of the murmur of half-audible talk, one caught a coherent sentence now and then—such as:

"There; she's over the first reef all right!" After a pause, another subdued voice:

"Her stern's coming down just exactly right, by George!"

"Now she's in the marks; over she goes!"

Somebody else muttered:

"Oh, it was done beautiful-beautiful!"

Now the engines were stopped altogether. and we drifted with the current. Not that I could see the boat drift, for I could not, the stars being all gone by this time. This drifting was the dismalest; it held one's heart still. Presently I discovered a blacker gloom than that which surrounded us. It was the head of the island. We were closing right down upon it. We entered its deeper shadow, and so imminent seemed the peril that I was likely to suffocate: and I had the strongest impulse to do something, anything, to save the vessel. But still Mr. Bixby stood by his wheel, silent, intent as a cat, and all the pilots stood shoulder to shoulder at his back.

"She'll not make it!" somebody whispered. The water grew shoaler and shoaler, by the leadsman's cries, till it was down to:

"Eight-and-a-half! E-i-g-h-t feet! E-i-g-h-t feet! Seven-and-"

Mr. Bixby said warningly through his speaking tube to the engineer:

"Stand by, now!"

"Ay, ay, sir!"

"Seven-and-a-half! Seven feet! Six-and—" We touched bottom! Instantly Mr. Bixby set a lot of bells ringing, shouted through the tube, "Now, let her have it—every ounce you've got!" then to his partner, "Put her hard down! snatch her! snatch her!" The boat rasped and ground her way through the sand, hung upon the apex of disaster a single tremendous instant, and then over she went! And such a shout as went up at Mr. Bixby's back never loosened the roof of a pilot-house before!

There was no more trouble after that. Mr. Bixby was a hero that night; and it was some little time, too, before his exploit ceased to be talked about by river men.

Fully to realize the marvelous precision required in laying the great steamer in her marks in that murky waste of water, one should know that not only must she pick her intricate way through snags and blind reefs, and then shave the head of the island so closely as to brush the overhanging foliage with her stern, but at one place she must pass almost within arm's reach of a sunken and invisible wreck that would snatch the hull timbers from under her if she should strike it, and destroy a quarter of a million dollars' worth of steamboat and cargo in five minutes, and maybe a hundred and fifty human lives into the bargain.

The last remark I heard that night was a compliment to Mr. Bixby, uttered in soliloquy and with unction by one of our guests. He said:

"By the Shadow of Death, but he's a lightning pilot!"

1879, 1883

From THE ADVENTURES OF TOM SAWYER <sup>1</sup>

THE CAT AND THE PAIN-KILLER

One of the reasons why Tom's mind had drifted away from its secret troubles was that it had found a new and weighty matter to interest itself about. Becky Thatcher had stopped coming to school. Tom had struggled with his pride a few days, and tried to "whistle her down the wind," but failed. He began to find himself hanging around her father's house, nights, and feeling very miserable. She was ill. What if she should die! There was distraction in the thought. He no longer took an interest in war, nor even in piracy. The charm of life was gone; there was nothing but dreariness left. He put his hoop away, and his bat; there was no joy in them any more. His aunt was concerned. She began to try all manner of remedies on him. She was one of those people who are infatuated with patent medicines and all new-fangled methods of producing health or mending it. She was an inveterate experimenter in these things. When something fresh in this line came out she was in a fever, right away, to try it; not on herself, for she was never ailing, but on anybody else that came handy. She was a subscriber for all the "Health" periodicals and phrenological frauds; and the solemn ignorance they were inflated with was breath to her nostrils. All the "rot" they contained about ventilation, and how to go to bed, and how to get up, and what to eat, and what to drink, and how much exercise to take, and what frame of mind to keep one's self in, and what sort of clothing to wear, was all gospel to her, and she never observed that her health-journals of the current month customarily upset everything they had recommended the month before. She was as simple-hearted and honest as the day was long. and so she was an easy victim. She gathered together her quack periodicals and her quack medicines, and thus armed with death, went about on her pale horse, 1 metaphorically speaking, with "hell following after." But she never suspected that she was not an angel of healing and the balm of Gilead 2 in disguise, to the suffering neighbors.

&lt;sup>1</sup> From The Adventures of Tom Sawyer by Mark Twain. Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Harper and Brothers, publishers.

The water treatment was new, now, and Tom's low condition was a windfall to her. She had him out at daylight every morning. stood him up in the woodshed and drowned him with a deluge of cold water; then she scrubbed him down with a towel like a file, and so brought him to; then she rolled him up in a wet sheet and put him away under blankets till she sweated his soul clean and "the vellow stains of it came through his pores"-as Tom said.

Yet notwithstanding all this, the poor boy grew more and more melancholy and pale and dejected. She added hot baths, sitz baths, shower baths, and plunges. The boy remained as dismal as a hearse. She began to assist the water with a slim oatmeal diet and blisterplasters. She calculated his capacity as she would a jug's, and filled him up every day with quack cure-alls.

Tom had become indifferent to persecution by This phase filled the old lady's heart with consternation. This indifference must be broken up at any cost. Now she heard of Pain-killer for the first time. She ordered a lot at once. She tasted it and was filled with gratitude. It was simply fire in a liquid form. She dropped the water treatment and everything else, and pinned her faith to Pain-killer. She gave Tom a teaspoonful and watched with the deepest anxiety for the result. Her troubles were instantly at rest, her soul at peace again; for the "indifference" was broken up. The boy could not have shown a wilder, heartier interest if she had built a fire under him.

Tom felt that it was time to wake up; this sort of life might be romantic enough, in his blighted condition; but it was getting to have too little sentiment and too much distracting variety about it. So he thought over various plans for relief, and finally hit upon that of professing to be fond of Pain-killer. He asked for it so often that he became a nuisance, and his aunt ended by telling him to help himself and guit bothering her. If it had been Sid, she would have had no misgivings to allow her delight: but since it was Tom, she watched the bottle clandestinely. She found that the medicine did really diminish, but it did not occur to her that the boy was mending the health of a crack in the sitting-room floor with it.

One day Tom was in the act of dosing the crack when his aunt's vellow cat came along. purring, eving the teaspoon avariciously, and begging for a taste. Tom said:

"Don't ask for it unless you want it. Peter." But Peter signified that he did want it.

"You better make sure."

Peter was sure.

"Now you've asked for it, and I'll give it to you, because there ain't anything mean about me; but if you find you don't like it, you mustn't blame anybody but your own self."

Peter was agreeable. So Tom pried his mouth open and poured down the Pain-killer. Peter sprang a couple of yards in the air, and then delivered a war-whoop and set off round and round the room, banging against furniture, upsetting flower-pots, and making general havoc. Next he rose on his hind feet and pranced around, in a frenzy of enjoyment, with his head over his shoulder and his voice proclaiming his unappeasable happiness. he went tearing around the house again spreading chaos and destruction in his path. Aunt Polly entered in time to see him throw a few double somersets, deliver a final mighty hurrah, and sail through the open window, carrying the rest of the flower-pots with him. The old lady stood petrified with astonishment, peering over her glasses: Tom lay on the floor expiring with laughter.

"Tom, what on earth ails that cat?" "I don't know, aunt," gasped the boy.

"Why. I never see anything like it. What did make him act so?"

"'Deed I don't know, Aunt Polly; cats always act so when they're having a good time."

"They do, do they?" There was something in the tone that made Tom apprehensive.

"Yes'm. That is, I believe they do."

"You do?" "Yes'm."

The old lady was bending down, Tom watching, with interest emphasized by anxiety. Too

Revelation vi, 8
<sup>2</sup> a balsam from which a fragrant ointment is made; the reference is to Jeremiah viii, 22: "Is there no balm in Gilead?"

late he devined her "drift." The handle of the telltale teaspoon was visible under the bedvalance. Aunt Polly took it, held it up. Tom winced, and dropped his eyes. Aunt Polly raised him by the usual handle—his ear—and cracked his head soundly with her thimble.

"Now, sir, what did you want to treat that poor dumb beast so for?"

"I done it out of pity for him—because he hadn't any aunt."

"Hadn't any aunt!-you numbskull. What has that got to do with it?"

"Heaps. Because if he'd 'a' had one she'd 'a' burnt him out herself! She'd 'a' roasted his bowels out of him 'thout any more feeling than if he was a human!"

Aunt Polly felt a sudden pang of remorse. This was putting the thing in a new light; what was cruelty to a cat might be cruelty to a boy, too. She began to soften; she felt sorry. Her eyes watered a little, and she put her hand on Tom's head and said gently:

"I was meaning for the best, Tom. And,

Tom, it did do you good."

Tom looked up in her face with just a perceptible twinkle peeping through his gravity.

"I know you was meaning for the best, auntie, and so was I with Peter. It done him good, too. I never see him get around so since—"

"Oh, go 'long with you, Tom, before you aggravate me again. And you try and see if you can't be a good boy, for once, and you needn't take any more medicine."

Tom reached school ahead of time. It was noticed that this strange thing had been occurring every day lately. And now, as usual of . late, he hung about the gate of the schoolyard instead of playing with his comrades. He was sick, he said, and he looked it. He tried to seem to be looking everywhere but whither he really was looking-down the road. Presently Jeff Thatcher hove in sight, and Tom's face lighted; he gazed a moment, and then turned sorrowfully away. When Jeff arrived, Tom accosted him, and "led up" warily to opportunities for remark about Becky, but the giddy lad never could see the bait. Tom watched and watched, hoping whenever a frisking frock came in sight, and hating the owner of it as soon as he saw she was not the right one. At last frocks ceased to appear, and he dropped hopelessly into the dumps; he entered the empty school-house and sat down to suffer. Then one more frock passed in at the gate, and Tom's heart gave a great bound. The next instant he was out, and "going on" like an Indian; yelling, laughing, chasing boys, jumping over the fence at risk of life and limb, throwing hand-springs, standing on his head—doing all the heroic things he could conceive of, and keeping a furtive eye out, all the while, to see if Beckv Thatcher was noticing. But she seemed to be unconscious of it all: she never looked. Could it be possible that she was not aware that he was there? He carried his exploits to her immediate vicinity; came war-whooping around, snatched a boy's cap, hurled it to the roof of the school-house, broke through a group of boys, tumbling them in every direction, and fell sprawling himself, under Becky's nose, almost upsetting her-and she turned, with her nose in the air, and he heard her say: "Mf! some people think they're mighty smart-always showing off!"

Tom's cheeks burned. He gathered himself up and sneaked off, crushed and crestfallen.

1876

FRANCIS BRET HARTE 1836-1902

Harte was born in Albany, New York, amid cultured surroundings. His father was a student of languages and a teacher, and the lad became well acquainted with good literature in his own home. After his father's death he came with his mother to California, and at the age of eighteen entered upon a life of adventure. He was a placer miner, a school teacher, a store clerk, and an express messenger. In the late '60's he began writing for San Francisco publications, and in 1868 published his most famous tales, including "The Luck of Roaring Camp," in the Overland Monthly, of which he was the first editor. Though little popular in California, where they were thought to reflect upon the moral status of the new community, these stories were eagerly received in the East.

Harte's contributions to American literature were the California background, and such a treatment of the transplanted Easterners and Southerners—combining the color and strong contrasts of romance with a fundamental realism—as to produce characters virtually new in American fiction of high grade. In technique he followed the strict unity developed by Poe. Unfortunately for his own artistic development, he left the West after he had gathered but a handful of its rich materials; and was apparently content to paint for years, with some shifting of figures, scenes from his youthful experiences. He was United States consul at Crefeld, Prussia, and later at Glasgow, and spent the latter part of his life in England.

Biography and criticism: Geoffrey Bret Harte, The Letters of Bret Harte, 1926; H. W. Boynton, Bret Harte, 1903; T. E. Pemberton, Bret Harte, 1903; H. C. Merwin, The Life of Bret Harte, 1911;

Pattee; Trent and Erskine; I. Jones, "The Bret Harte Country," Am. Mercury 7:147-53; J. P. Collins, "Bret Harte's Genius," 19th Cent. 96: 537-43; Liv. Age 323:515-20; H. S. Canby, "The Luck of Bret Harte," Sat. R. Lit. 2:717-8; G. W. James, "Bret Harte," Overland ns 78:10-8 Dec. '21; "Bret Harte and Mark Twain in the 'Seventies," Atlan. 130:341-8; A. D. Robinson, "Footprints on Piety Hill." Bookm. 51:445-8.

THE OUTCASTS OF POKER FLAT 1

As Mr. John Oakhurst, gambler, stepped into the main street of Poker Flat on the morning of the 23rd of November, 1850, he was conscious of a change in its moral atmosphere since the preceding night. Two or three men conversing earnestly together, ceased as he approached, and exchanged significant glances. There was a Sabbath Iull in the air, which, in a settlement unused to Sabbath influences, looked ominous.

Mr. Oakhurst's calm, handsome face betrayed small concern in these indications. Whether he was conscious of any predisposing cause was another question. "I reckon they're after somebody," he reflected; "likely it's me." He returned to his pocket the handkerchief with which he had been whipping away the red dust of Poker Flat from his neat boots, and quietly discharged his mind of any further conjecture.

In point of fact. Poker Flat was "after somebody." It had lately suffered the loss of several thousand dollars, two valuable horses, and a prominent citizen. It was experiencing a spasm of virtuous reaction, quite as lawless and ungovernable as any of the acts that had provoked it. A secret committee had determined to rid the town of all improper persons. This was done permanently in regard of two men who were then hanging from the boughs of a sycamore in the gulch, and temporarily in the banishment of certain other objectionable characters. I regret to say that some of these were ladies. It is but due to the sex, however, to state that their impropriety was professional, and it was only in such easily established standards of evil that Poker Flat ventured to sit in judgment.

Mr. Oakhurst was right in supposing that he was included in this category. A few of the committee had urged hanging him as a possible example, and a sure method of reimbursing themselves from his pockets of the sums he had won from them. "It's agin justice," said Jim Wheeler, "to let this yer young man from Roaring Camp—an entire stranger—carry away our money." But a crude sentiment of equity residing in the breasts of those who had been fortunate enough to win from Mr. Oakhurst overruled this narrower local prejudice.

Mr. Oakhurst received his sentence with philosophic calmness, none the less coolly that he was aware of the hesitation of his judges. He was too much of a gambler not to accept fate. With him life was at best an uncertain game, and he recognized the usual percentage in favor of the dealer.

A body of armed men accompanied the deported wickedness of Poker Flat to the outskirts of the settlement. Besides Mr. Oakhurst, who was known to be a coolly desperate man, and for whose intimidation the armed escort was intended, the expatriated party consisted of a young woman familiarly known as the "Duchess"; another who had won the title of "Mother Shipton"; and "Uncle Billy," a suspected sluice-robber 2 and confirmed drunkard. The cavalcade provoked no comments from the spectators, nor was any word uttered by the escort. Only when the gulch which marked the uttermost limit of Poker Flat was reached, the leader spoke briefly and to the point. The exiles were forbidden to return at the peril of their lives.

As the escort disappeared, their pent-up feelings found vent in a few hysterical tears from the Duchess, some bad language from Mother Shipton, and a Parthian 3 volley of expletives from Uncle Billy. The philosophic Oakhurst alone remained silent. He listened calmly to Mother Shipton's desire to cut somebody's heart out, to the repeated statements of the Duchess that she would die in the road, and to the alarming oaths that seemed to be bumped out of Uncle Billy as he rode forward. With the easy good-humor characteristic of his class, he insisted upon exchanging his own riding horse, "Five Spot," for the sorry mule which the Duchess rode. But even this act did not draw the party into any closer sympathy. The young woman readjusted her somewhat draggled plumes with a feeble, faded coquetry; Mother Shipton eyed the possessor of "Five Spot" with malevolence, and Uncle Billy included the whole party in one sweeping anathema.

The road to Sandy Bar—a camp that, not having as yet experienced the regenerating influences of Poker Flat, consequently seemed to offer some invitation to the emigrants—lay over a steep mountain range. It was distant a day's severe travel. In that advanced season, the party soon passed out of the moist, temperate regions of the foot-hills into the dry, cold, bracing air of the Sierras. The trail was narrow and difficult. At noon the Duchess, rolling out of her saddle upon the ground, declared her intention of going no farther, and the party balted.

&lt;sup>1</sup> By permission of Houghton Mifflin Company, authorized publishers.

&lt;sup>2</sup> one who steals gold from the wooden flumes where gold-bearing gravel is washed

The Parthians were an ancient race noted for fighting on horseback and shooting their arrows behind them as they pretended to flee.

The spot was singularly wild and impressive. A wooded amphitheater, surrounded on three sides by precipitous cliffs of naked granite, sloped gently toward the crest of another precipice that overlooked the valley. It was, undoubtedly, the most suitable spot for a camp, had camping been advisable. But Mr. Oakhurst knew that scarcely half the journey to Sandy Bar was accomplished, and the party were not equipped or provisioned for delay. This fact he pointed out to his companions curtly, with a philosophic commentary on the folly of "throwing up their hand before the game was played out." But they were furnished with liquor, which in this emergency stood them in place of food, fuel, rest, and prescience. In spite of his remonstrances, it was not long before they were more or less under its influence. Uncle Billy passed rapidly from a bellicose state into one of stupor, the Duchess became maudlin, and Mother Shipton snored. Mr. Oakhurst alone remained erect. leaning against a rock, calmly surveying them.

Mr. Oakhurst did not drink. It interfered with a profession which required coolness, impassiveness, and presence of mind, and, in his own language, he "couldn't afford it." As he gazed at his recumbent fellow-exiles, the loneliness begotten of his pariah-trade, his habits of life, his very vices, for the first time seriously oppressed him. He bestirred himself in dusting his black clothes, washing his hands and face, and other acts characteristic of his studiously neat habits, and for a moment forgot his annoyance. The thought of deserting his weaker and more pitiable companions never perhaps occurred to him. Yet he could not help feeling the want of that excitement which, singularly enough, was most conducive to that calm equanimity for which he was notorious. He looked at the gloomy walls that rose a thousand feet sheer above the circling pines around him; at the sky, ominously clouded; at the valley below, already deepening into shadow; and, doing so, suddenly he heard his own name called.

A horseman slowly ascended the trail. In the fresh, open face of the newcomer Mr. Oakhurst recognized Tom Simson, otherwise known as the "Innocent," of Sandy Bar. He had met him some months before over a "little game," and had, with perfect equanimity, won the entire fortune—amounting to some forty dollars—of that guileless youth. After the game was finished, Mr. Oakhurst drew the youthful speculator behind the door and thus addressed him: "Tommy, you're a good little man, but you can't gamble worth a cent. Don't try it over again." He then handed him his money back, pushed him gently from the room, and so made a devoted slave of Tom Simson.

There was a remembrance of this in his bovish and enthusiastic greeting of Mr. Oakhurst. He had started, he said, to go to Poker Flat to seek his fortune. "Alone?" No, not exactly alone; in fact (a giggle), he had run away with Piney Woods. Didn't Mr. Oakhurst remember Piney? She that used to wait on the table at the Temperance House? They had been engaged a long time, but old Jake Woods had objected, and so they had run away, and were going to Poker Flat to be married, and here they were. And they were tired out, and how lucky it was they had found a place to camp, and company. All this the Innocent delivered rapidly, while Piney, a stout, comely damsel of fifteen, emerged from behind the pine-tree where she had been blushing unseen, and rode to the side of her lover.

Mr. Oakhurst seldom troubled himself with sentiment, still less with propriety; but he had a vague idea that the situation was not fortu-He retained, however, his presence of mind sufficiently to kick Uncle Billy, who was about to say something, and Uncle Billy was sober enough to recognize in Mr. Oakhurst's kick a superior power that would not bear trifling. He then endeavored to dissuade Tom Simson from delaying further, but in vain. He even pointed out the fact that there was no provisions, nor means of making a camp. But, unluckily, the Innocent met this objection by assuring the party that he was provided with an extra mule loaded with provisions, and by the discovery of a rude attempt at a log-house near the trail. "Piney can stay with Mrs. Oakhurst," said the Innocent, pointing to the Duchess, "and I can shift for myself."

Nothing but Mr. Oakhurst's admonishing foot saved Uncle Billy from bursting into a roar of laughter. As it was, he felt compelled to retire up the cañon until he could recover his gravity. There he confided the joke to the tall pine-trees, with many slaps of his leg, contortions of his face, and the usual profanity. But when he returned to the party, he found them seated by a fire-for the air had grown strangely chill and the sky overcast—in apparently amicable conversation. Piney was actually talking in an impulsive, girlish fashion to the Duchess, who was listening with an interest and animation she had not shown for many days. The Innocent was holding forth, apparently with equal effect, to Mr. Oakhurst and Mother Shipton, who was actually relaxing into amiability. "Is this yer a d-d picnic?" said Uncle Billy, with inward scorn, as he surveyed the sylvan group, the glancing fire, and the tethered animals in the foreground. Suddenly an idea mingled with the alcoholic fumes that disturbed his brain. It was apparently of a jocular nature, for he felt impelled to slap his leg again and cram his fist into his mouth.

As the shadows crept slowly up the mountain, a slight breeze rocked the tops of the pinetrees, and moaned through their long and gloomy aisles. The ruined cabin, patched and covered with pine-boughs, was set apart for the ladies. As the lovers parted they unaffectedly exchanged a kiss, so honest and sincere that it might have been heard above the swaying pines. The frail Duchess and the malevolent Mother Shipton were probably too stunned to remark upon this last evidence of simplicity, and so turned without a word to the hut. The fire was replenished, the men lay down before the door, and in a few minutes were asleep.

Mr. Oakhurst was a light sleeper. Toward morning he awoke benumbed and cold. As he stirred the dying fire, the wind, which was now blowing strongly, brought to his cheek that which caused the blood to leave it,—snow!

He started to his feet with the intention of awakening the sleepers, for there was no time to lose. But turning to where Uncle Billy had been lying, he found him gone. A suspicion leaped to his brain, and a curse to his lips. He ran to the spot where the mules had been tethered; they were no longer there. The tracks were already rapidly disappearing in the snow.

The momentary excitement brought Mr. Oakhurst back to the fire with his usual calm. He did not waken the sleepers. The Innocent slumbered peacefully, with a smile on his goodhumored, freckled face; the virgin Piney slept beside her frailer sisters as sweetly as though attended by celestial guardians, and Mr. Oakhurst, drawing his blanket over his shoulders, stroked his mustaches and waited for the dawn. It came slowly in a whirling mist of snowflakes, that dazzled and confused the eye. What could be seen of the landscape appeared magically changed. He looked over the valley, and summed up the present and future in two words.—"Snowed in!"

A careful inventory of the provisions, which, fortunately for the party, had been stored within the hut, and so escaped the felonious fingers of Uncle Billy, disclosed the fact that with care and prudence they might last ten "That is." said Mr. Oakhurst, days longer. sotto voce to the Innocent, "if you're willing to board us. If you ain't-and perhaps you'd better not-you can wait till Uncle Billy gets back with provisions." For some occult reason. Mr. Oakhurst could not bring himself to disclose Uncle Billy's rascality, and so offered the hypothesis that he had wandered from the camp and had accidentally stampeded the animals. He dropped a warning to the Duchess and Mother Shipton, who of course knew the facts of their associate's defection. "Thev'll find out the truth about us all when they find out anything," he added, significantly, "and there's no good frightening them now."

Tom Simson not only put all his worldly store at the disposal of Mr. Oakhurst, but seemed to enjoy the prospect of their enforced "We'll have a good camp for a seclusion. week, and then the snow'll melt, and we'll all go back together." The cheerful gayety of the young man and Mr. Oakhurst's calm infected the others. The Innocent, with the aid of pineboughs, extemporized a thatch for the roofless cabin, and the Duchess directed Pinev in the re-arrangement of the interior with a taste and tact that opened the blue eyes of that provincial maiden to their fullest extent. "I reckon now you're used to finer things at Poker Flat," said Piney. The Duchess turned away sharply to conceal something that reddened her cheeks through their professional tint, and Mother Shipton requested Piney not to "chatter." But when Mr. Oakhurst returned from a weary search for the trail, he heard the sound of happy laughter echoed from the rocks. He stopped in some alarm, and his first thoughts naturally reverted to the whiskey, which he had prudently cached. 1 "And yet it don't somehow sound like whiskey," said the gambler. It was not until he caught sight of the blazing fire through the still blinding storm and the group around it that he settled to the conviction that it was "square

Whether Mr. Oakhurst had cached his cards with the whiskey as something debarred the <sup>1</sup> hidden free access of the community, I cannot say. It was certain that, in Mother Shipton's words. he "didn't say cards once" during that evening. Haply the time was beguiled by an accordion. produced somewhat ostentatiously by Tom Simson from his pack. Notwithstanding some difficulties attending the manipulation of this instrument, Piney Woods managed to pluck several reluctant melodies from its keys, to an accompaniment by the Innocent on a pair of bone castanets. 1 But the crowning festivity of the evening was reached in a rude campmeeting hymn, which the lovers, joining hands. sang with great earnestness and vociferation. I fear that a certain defiant tone and Covenanter's 2 swing to its chorus, rather than any devotional quality, caused it speedily to infect the others, who at last joined in the refrain:-

"I'm proud to live in the service of the Lord, And I'm bound to die in His army."

The pines rocked, the storm eddied and whirled above the miserable group, and the flames of their altar leaped heavenward, as if in token of the vow.

At midnight the storm abated, the rolling clouds parted, and the stars glittered keenly above the sleeping camp. Mr. Oakhurst, whose professional habits had enabled him to live on the smallest possible amount of sleep, in dividing the watch with Tom Simson, somehow managed to take upon himself the greater part of that duty. He excused himself to the Innocent by saying that he had "often been a week without sleep." "Doing what?" asked Tom. "Poker!" replied Oakhurst, sententiously; "when a man gets a streak of luck-nigger-luck, —he don't get tired. The luck gives in first. Luck," continued the gambler, reflectively, "is a mighty queer thing. All you know about it for certain is that it's bound to change. And it's finding out when it's going to change that makes you. We've had a streak of bad luck since we left Poker Flat,-you come along, and slap you get into it, too. If you can hold your cards right along, you're all right. For," added the gambler, with cheerful irrelevance,-

"I'm proud to live in the service of the Lord, And I'm bound to die in His army."

The third day came, and the sun, looking through the white-curtained valley, saw the outcasts divide their slowly decreasing store of provisions for the morning meal. It was one of the peculiarities of that mountain climate that small clappers held in the hands

 A Scotch religious-political party of the 17th century; their hymns had very swinging melodies.

its rays diffused a kindly warmth over the wintry landscape, as if in regretful commiseration of the past. But it revealed drift on drift of snow piled high around the hut,—a hopeless, uncharted, trackless sea of white lying below the rocky shores to which the castaways still ching. Through the marvelously clear air the smoke of the pastoral village of Poker Flat rose miles away. Mother Shipton saw it, and from a remote pinnacle of her rocky fastness hurled in that direction a final malediction. It was her last vituperative attempt, and perhaps for that reason was invested with a certain degree of sublimity. It did her good, she privately informed the Duchess. "Just you go out there and cuss, and see." She then set herself to the task of amusing "the child," as she and the Duchess were pleased to call Piney. Piney was no chicken, but it was a soothing and original theory of the pair thus to account for the fact that she didn't swear and wasn't improper.

When night crept up again through the gorges, the reedy notes of the accordion rose and fell in fitful spasms and long-drawn gasps by the flickering camp-fire. But music failed to fill entirely the aching void left by insufficient food, and a new diversion was proposed by Piney, story-telling. Neither Mr. Oakhurst nor his female companions caring to relate their personal experiences, this plan would have failed, too, but for the Innocent. Some months before he had chanced upon a stray copy of Mr. Pope's ingenious translation of the Iliad. He now proposed to narrate the principal incidents of that poem-having thoroughly mastered the argument and fairly forgotten the words—in the current vernacular of Sandy Bar. And so for the rest of that night the Homeric demigods again walked the earth. Trojan bully and wily Greek wrestled in the winds, and the great pines in the canon seemed to bow to the wrath of the son of Peleus. 3 Mr. Oakhurst listened with quiet satisfaction. Most especially was he interested in the fate of "Ash-heels," as the Innocent persisted in denominating the "swift-footed Achilles."

So with small food and much of Homer and the accordion, a week passed over the heads of the outcasts. The sun again forsook them, and again from leaden skies the snowflakes were sifted over the land. Day by day closer around them drew the snowy circle, until at last they looked from their prison over drifted walls of dazzling white, that towered twenty feet above their heads. It became more and more difficult to replenish their fires, even from the fallen trees beside them, now half hidden in the drifts. And yet no one complained. The lovers turned from the dreary prospect and looked into each other's eyes, and were happy. Mr. Oakhurst settled himself coolly to the losing game before him. The Duchess, more cheerful than she had been, assumed the care of Piney. Only Mother Shipton-once the strongest of the party-seemed to sicken and fade. At midnight on the tenth day she called Oakhurst to her side. "I'm going," she said in a voice of querulous weakness, "but don't say anything about it. Don't waken the kids. Take the bundle from under my head and open it." Mr. Oakhurst did so. It contained Mother Shipton's rations for the last week, untouched. "Give 'em to the child," she said, pointing to the sleeping Piney. "You've starved yourself," said the gambler. "That's what they call it," said the woman, querulously, as she lay down again, and, turning her face to the wall, passed quietly away.

<sup>3</sup> Achilles

The accordion and the bones <sup>1</sup> were put aside that day, and Homer was forgotten. When the body of Mother Shipton had been committed to the snow, Mr. Oakhurst took the Innocent aside and showed him a pair of snow-shoes, which he had fashioned from the old pack-saddle. "There's one chance in a hundred to save her yet," he said, pointing to Piney; "but it's there," he added, pointing toward Poker Flat. "If you can reach there in two days, she's safe." "And you?" asked Tom Simson. "I'll stay here," was the curt reply.

The lovers parted with a long embrace. "You are not going, too?" said the Duchess, as she saw Mr. Oakhurst apparently waiting to accompany him. "As far as the cañon," he replied. He turned suddenly and kissed the Duchess, leaving her pallid face aflame and her trembling limbs rigid with amazement.

Night came, but not Mr. Oakhurst. It brought the storm again and the whirling snow. Then the Duchess, feeding the fire, found that some one had quietly piled beside the hut enough fuel to last a few days longer. The tears rose to her eyes, but she hid them from Piney.

The women slept but little. In the morning, looking into each other's faces, they read their fate. Neither spoke; but Piney, accepting the position of the stronger, drew near and placed her arm around the Duchess's waist. They kept this attitude for the rest of the day. That night the storm reached its greatest fury, and, rending asunder the protecting pines, invaded the very hut.

Toward morning they found themselves unable to feed the fire, which gradually died away. As the embers slowly blackened, the Duchess crept closer to Piney, and broke the silence of many hours: "Piney, can you pray?" "No, dear," said Piney, simply. The Duchess, without knowing exactly why, felt relieved, and, putting her head upon Piney's shoulder, spoke no more. And so reclining, the younger and purer pillowing the head of her soiled sister upon her virgin breast, they fell asleep.

The wind lulled as if it feared to waken them. Feathery drifts of snow, shaken from the long pine-boughs, flew like white-winged birds, and settled about them as they slept. The moon through the rifted clouds looked down upon what had been the camp. But all human stain, all trace of earthly travail, was hidden beneath the spotless mantle mercifully flung from above.

They slept all that day and the next, nor did they waken when voices and footsteps broke the silence of the camp. And when pitying fingers brushed the snow from their wan faces, you could scarcely have told, from the equal peace that dwelt upon them, which was she that had sinned. Even the law of Poker Flat recognized this, and turned away, leaving them still locked in each other's arms.

But at the head of the gulch, on one of the largest pine-trees, they found the deuce of clubs pinned to the bark with a bowie-knife. It bore the following, written in pencil, in a firm hand:—

Beneath this tree Lies the body
of
JOHN OAKHURST
Who struck a streak of bad luck
On the 23rd of November, 1850,
and
Handed in his checks
On the 7th of December, 1850.

And pulseless and cold, with a derringer by his side and a bullet in his heart, though still calm as in life, beneath the snow lay he who was at once the strongest and yet the weakest of the outcasts of Poker Flat.

"IIM" 1

Say there! P'r'aps
Some on you chaps
Might know Jim Wild?
Well,—no offense:
Thar ain't no sense
In gittin' riled!

Jim was my chum
Up on the Bar:
That's why I come
Down from up yar,
Lookin' for Jim.
Thank ye, sir! You
Ain't of that crew,—
Blest if you are!

Money? Not much: That ain't my kind; I ain't no such.

Rum? I don't mind, Seein' it's you.

Well, this yer Jim,— Did you know him? Jes' 'bout your size; Same kind of eyes;— Well, that is strange: Why, it's two year Since he came here, Sick, for a change.

Well, here's to us:

Eh?
The h—— you say!
Dead?
That little cuss?

What makes you star',
You over thar?
Can't a man drop
's glass in yer shop
But you must r'ar?
It wouldn't take
D——————————————d much to bre

D——d much to break
You and your bar.

Dead!
Poor—little—Jim!
Why, thar was me,
Jones, and Bob Lee,
Harry and Ben,—
No-account men:
Then to take him!

Well, thar—Good-by—No more, sir—I—

Eh?

What's that you say?
Why, dern it!—sho!—
No? Yes! By Joe!
Sold!

Sold! Why, you limb, You ornery, Derned old Long-legged Tim.

1870

50

10

20

DICKENS IN CAMP 1

[1812-1870]

Above the pines the moon was slowly drifting, The river sang below; The dim Sierras, far beyond, uplifting Their minarets of snow.

The roaring camp-fire, with rude humor, painted The ruddy tints of health

On haggard face and form that drooped and fainted

In the fierce race for wealth;

Till one arose, and from his pack's scant treasure

A hoarded volume drew,

And cards were dropped from hands of listless leisure

To hear the tale anew.

30 And then, while round them shadows gathered faster.

And as the firelight fell, He read aloud the book wherein the Master Had writ of "Little Nell." <sup>2</sup>

Perhaps 'twas boyish fancy,—for the reader Was youngest of them all,—

But, as he read, from clustering pine and cedar A silence seemed to fall; 20

The fir-trees, gathering closer in the shadows, Listened in every spray,

While the whole camp with "Nell" on English meadows

Wandered and lost their way.

And so in mountain solitudes—o'ertaken

As by some spell divine—

Their cares dropped from them like the needles shaken

From out the gusty pine.

&lt;sup>1</sup> By permission of Houghton Mifflin Company, authorized publishers.

<sup>2</sup> in Dickens's Old Curiosity Shop

20

Lost is that camp, and wasted all its fire; 30 And he who wrought that spell? Ah, towering pine and stately Kentish spire. Ye have one tale to tell!

Lost is that camp, but let its fragrant story Blend with the breath that thrills With hop-vine's incense all the pensive glory That fills the Kentish hills.

And on that grave where English oak and holly And laurel wreaths entwine. Deem it not all a too presumptuous folly. This spray of Western pine! July, 1870

IOHN HAY 1838-1905

John Hay is better known as a statesman and diplomat than as a writer. He was born at Salem. Indiana, graduated from Brown University, studied law in Lincoln's office, was assistant private secretary to Lincoln as President, and saw active service in the Civil War. From 1865 to 1870 he was connected with the United States legations at Paris. Vienna, and Madrid. Returning to America, he became one of the most efficient editorial writers of the New York Tribune. Again he was called into government service as Secretary of State and as ambassador to England under McKinley. He wrote Castilian Days, 1871, sketches of Spain, and Poems, 1890. In collaboration with J. G. Nicolay he produced the authoritative Life of Lincoln, 10 volumes, 1890, and Abraham Lincoln; Complete Works, 2 volumes, 1894. Hay's poetry does not rise to great heights; generally it is conventional and is often courtly and tender. Its most distinctive form is that of the dialect ballad, written in the colloquial language of the Middle West.

Biography and criticism: Wm. R. Thayer, Life and Letters of John Hay, 2 vols., 1915; W. D. Howells, Harper 132:310-3; also Dial 59:411-5; Nation 101:570-2; Outlook 111:809-12; Contemp., 109:122-4; No. Am. 203:143-5.

IIM BLUDSO OF THE PRAIRIE BELLE 1

Wall, no! I can't tell whar he lives, Becase he don't live, you see; Leastways, he's got out of the habit Of livin' like you and me. Whar have you been for the last three year That you haven't heard folks tell How Jimmy Bludso passed in his checks The night of the Prairie Belle?

He weren't no saint,—them engineers Is all pretty much alike,—

One wife in Natchez-under-the-Hill And another one here, in Pike: A keerless man in his talk was Iim. And an awkward hand in a row. But he never flunked, and he never lied.-I reckon he never knowed how.

And this was all the religion he had.— To treat his engine well: Never be passed on the river: To mind the pilot's bell: And if ever the Prairie Belle took fire.— A thousand times he swore. He'd hold her nozzle agin the bank Till the last soul got ashore.

All boats has their day on the Mississip, And her day come at last,-The Movastar was a better boat, But the Belle she wouldn't be passed. And so she come tearin' along that night-30 The oldest craft on the line-With a nigger squat on her safety-valve. And her furnace crammed, rosin and pine.

The fire bust out as she clared the bar. And burnt a hole in the night, And quick as a flash she turned, and made For that willer-bank on the right. There was runnin' and cursin', but Jim yelled out, Over all the infernal roar, "I'll hold her nozzle agin the bank 40 Till the last galoot's ashore."

Through the hot, black breath of the burnin' boat Jim Bludso's voice was heard,

And they all had trust in his cussedness, And knowed he would keep his word. And, sure's you're born, they all got off Afore the smokestacks fell.-And Bludso's ghost went up alone In the smoke of the Prairie Belle.

He weren't no saint,—but at jedgment I'd run my chance with Jim, 'Longside of some pious gentlemen That wouldn't shook hands with him. He seen his duty, a dead-sure thing,— And went for it thar and then; And Christ ain't a-going to be too hard On a man that died for men.

50

1871

<sup>1</sup> By permission of Houghton Mifflin Company, authorized publishers.

JOAQUIN MILLER 1841-1913

Miller was born, so he says, in a covered wagon near the Indiana line. His father, who was a wandering pioneer school teacher in Indiana, set out, a few years after his son's birth, on the Oregon trail for the West. Into his four-score years Miller seems to have gathered most of the picturesque experiences of the American occupation of the Pacific coast. He was a miner, an express messenger, a lawyer, an editor, and a county judge. When merely a boy he was a filibuster with Walker in Nicaragua, and when an old man he was a newspaper reporter in the Klondyke rush.

His first success as a poet he gained in London with his Songs of the Sierras, published there in 1871 after he had failed to find an American publisher. In London he became something of a literary lion and was accepted there in his fringed buckskin coat and high boots as a genuinely typical product of the Pacific United States. During his last years his home was in the eucalyptus-clad hills above Oakland, facing the Golden Gate. Miller's best poetry, which is sometimes reminiscent of Whitman, is uneven in quality. It is full of the adventure of the Pacific West, sometimes cheaply romantic, sometimes revealing the rugged beauty of mountains and forests or touching with genuine feeling the realistic tragedy of the frontier; and through it runs a vein of mysticism.

Autobiographical material in introduction to Joaquin Miller's Poems, 6 vols., 1909-1917, and Life Among the Modocs, 1873. Criticism: H. C. Thompson, "A Sierra Poet in the Making," Bookm. 51:553-7; E. S. Mighels, "Justice to Joaquin Miller," Overland ns 84:216-7; G. Sterling, Am. Mercury 7:220-9; P. H. Boynton, New Repub. 10:99-101; H. M. Bland, Craftsman 20:496-504; H. Garland, Sunset 30:765-70; A. J. Waterhouse, Sunset 30:393-6; Dial 54:165-7.

EXODUS FOR OREGON 1

A tale half told and hardly understood;
The talk of bearded men that chanced to meet,
That lean'd on long quaint rifles in the wood,
That look'd in fellow faces, spoke discreet
And low, as half in doubt and in defeat
Of hope; a tale it was of lands of gold
That lay below the sun. Wild-wing'd and fleet
It spread among the swift Missouri's bold Unbridled men, and reach'd to where Ohio roll'd.

Then long chain'd lines of yoked and patient steers;

Then long white trains that pointed to the west,

Beyond the savage west; the hopes and fears Of blunt, untutor'd men, who hardly guess'd Their course; the brave and silent women, dress'd

In homely spun attire, the boys in bands,
The cheery babes that laugh'd at all, and bless'd
The doubting hearts, with laughing lifted hands! . . . .

What exodus for far untraversed lands!

The Plains! The shouting drivers at the wheel:

The crash of leather whips; the crush and roll 20
Of wheels; the groan of yokes and grinding steel And iron chain, and lo! at last the whole Vast line, that reach'd as if to touch the goal,

Began to stretch and stream away and wind Toward the west, as if with one control; Then hope loom'd fair, and home lay far behind:

Before, the boundless plain, and fiercest of their kind.

At first the way lay green and fresh as seas, And far away as any reach of wave; The sunny stream went by in belt of trees; 30 And here and there the tassel'd tawny brave Swept by on horse, look'd back, stretch'd forth and gave

A yell of warn, and then did wheel and rein Awhile, and point away, dark-brow'd and grave Into the far and dim and distant plain With signs and prophecies, and then plunged on again.

Some hills at last began to lift and break;
Some streams began to fail of wood and tide,
The somber plain began betime to take
A hue of weary brown, and wild and wide
It stretch'd its naked breast on every side.
A babe was heard at last to cry for bread
Amid the deserts; cattle low'd and died,
And dying men went by with broken tread,
And left a long black serpent line of wreck and dead.

Strange hunger'd birds, black-wing'd and still as death,

And crown'd of red with hooked beaks, blew low

And close about, till we could touch their breath—

Strange unnamed birds, that seem'd to come and go

50

In circles now, and now direct and slow,

Permission to use this poem granted by the Harr Wagner Publishing Company, publishers of Joaquin Miller's Complete Poems.

Continual, yet never touch the earth; Slim foxes slid and shuttled to and fro At times across the dusty weary dearth Of life, look'd back, then sank like crickets in a hearth.

Then dust arose, a long dim line like smoke From out of riven earth. The wheels went groaning by,

Ten thousand feet in harness and in yoke,
They tore the ways of ashen alkali,
And desert winds blew sudden, swift and dry.
The dust! it sat upon and fill'd the train!

1 seem'd to fret and fill the very sky,
Lo! dust upon the beasts, the tent, the plain,
And dust, alas! on breasts that rose not up again.

They sat in desolation and in dust
By dried-up desert streams; the mother's hands
Hid all her bended face; the cattle thrust
Their tongues and faintly call'd across the lands.
The babes, that knew not what this way through sands

Could mean, did ask if it would end today . . . The panting wolves slid by, red-eyed, in bands To pools beyond. The men look'd far away, 71 And, silent, saw that all a boundless desert lay.

They rose by night; they struggled on and on As thin and still as ghosts; then here and there Beside the dusty way before the dawn, Men silent laid them down in their despair, And died. But woman! Woman, frail as fair! May man have strength to give to you your due:

You falter'd not, nor murmur'd anywhere, You held your babes, held to your course, and you

Bore on through burning hell your double burdens through.

Men stood at last, the decimated few,
Above a land of running streams, and they?
They push'd aside the boughs, and peering through

Beheld afar the cool, refreshing bay; Then some did curse, and some bend hands to

But some look'd back upon the desert, wide And desolate with death, then all the day, They mourned. But one, with nothing left beside

His dog to love, crept down among the ferns and died.

THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH 1836-1907

The Story of a Bad Boy, 1870, so well portrays Aldrich's childhood in his birthplace, Portsmouth. New Hampshire, that no other account of his early years is necessary. It shows the life of an active, fun-loving boy in a small New England city. The death of his father brought an end to the lad's academic training, threw him upon his own resources, but did not prevent his writing. He worked his way upward into journalism and in 1891 followed William Dean Howells as editor of the Atlantic Monthly. Aldrich's work includes short stories ("Marjorie Daw," 1873, being the most notable); novels (Prudence Palfrey, 1874, The Stillwater Tragedy, 1880); and a book of travel, From Ponkapog to Pesth, 1883; and several volumes of verse from 1854 to 1898. Aldrich's skill as a poet lies in expressing the mood of a passing moment, the keenly felt, dramatic situation, often tinged with humor, pathos, or gallantry; at the same time he is held in check by a seriousness that unites him with the poets of New England.

Biography: Ferris Greenslet, The Life of Thomas Bailey Aldrich, 1908; Mrs. T. B. Aldrich, Crowding Memories, rev. by C. N. Rourke, New Repub. 25:175-6. Criticism: More (Shel. 7); Bliss Perry, Park Street Papers, 141-70; C. H. Gratton, "Thomas Bailey Aldrich," Am. Mercury 5:41-5.

GUILIEMUS REX 1

The folk who lived in Shakespeare's day And saw that gentle figure pass By London Bridge, his frequent way— They little knew what man he was.

The pointed beard, the courteous mien, The equal port <sup>2</sup> to high and low, All this they saw or might have seen— But not the light behind the brow!

The doublet's modest gray or brown, The slender sword-hilt's plain device, <sup>10</sup> What sign had these for prince or clown? Few turned, or none, to scan him twice.

Yet 'twas the king of England's kings! The rest with all their pomps and trains Are moldered, half-remembered things— 'Tis he alone that lives and reigns!

1896

EUGENE FIELD 1850-1895

Although he was born in St. Louis, and spent most of his life in the West, Field was brought up in his ancestral New England. He attended Williams College, and then Knox College and the University of Missouri. At the age of twenty-three he found his life-work, journalism, and for many years edited and in the main wrote the "Sharps and Flats" column of the Chicago News. In this column much of his poetry first appeared. A Little Book of Profitable Tales, and A Little Book of Western Verse, 1889, are characteristic of his best poetry. With Trumpet and Drum, 1892, and Love Songs of Childhood, 1894, are comparable in aim with Stevenson's Child's Garden of Verses. Children delight in their merry rhythms: their elders understand and appreciate their whimsy and caprice. Critics have termed Field "the Poet Laureate of childhood." His rimes and songs have entertained children for a generation or two, and it is likely that his verses will soothe babies to sleep for decades to come. Field's prose, consisting mostly of essays, has the same whimsical and endearing characteristics as these that fill his verse.

<sup>1</sup> King William. By permission of Houghton Mifflin Company, authorized publishers.

2 same manner

Biography and criticism: S. Thompson, Eugene Field, 2 vols., 1901; F. Wilson, The Eugene Field I Knew, 1898; also "Eugene Field the Humorist," Cent. 64:446-52; C. H. Dennis, Eugene Field's Creative Years, 1924; A. B. Maurice, "Yorick—with a Dash of Ariel," Bookm. 60:775-8; Chubb; see also Poetry 28:268-74; Bookm. 56:44-8; Scrib. M. 76:157-62; Lit. Digest 75:26-8, Oct. 28, '22,

LITTLE BOY BLUE 1

The little toy dog is covered with dust, But sturdy and staunch he stands; And the little toy soldier is red with rust, And his musket moulds in his hands. Time was when the little toy dog was new And the soldier was passing fair,

Blue Kissed them and put them there.

"Now, don't you go till I come," he said, 10 "And don't you make any noise!" So toddling off to his trundle-bed He dreamt of the pretty toys;

And that was the time when our Little Boy

And as he was dreaming, an angel song Awakened our Little Boy Blue-

Oh, the years are many, the years are long, But the little toy friends are true!

Ay, faithful to Little Boy Blue they stand, Each in the same old place— Awaiting the touch of a little hand,

The smile of a little face; And they wonder, as waiting the long years through,

<sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons.

In the dust of that little chair, What has become of our Little Boy Blue Since he kissed them and out them there. 1894

SEEIN' THINGS 1

I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or worms, or mice,

An' things 'at girls are skeered uv I think are awful nice!

I'm pretty brave, I guess; an' yet I hate to go to bed.

For, when I'm tucked up warm an' snug an' when my prayers are said,

Mother tells me "Happy Dreams!" and takes away the light.

An' leaves me lyin' all alone an' seein' things at night!

Sometimes they're in the corner, sometimes they're by the door.

Sometimes they're all a-standin' in the middle uv the floor;

Sometimes they are a-sittin' down, sometimes they're walkin' round

So softly an' so creepylike they never make a sound!

Sometimes they are as black as ink, an' other times they're white-

But the color ain't no difference when you see things at night!

Once, when I licked a feller 'at had just moved on our street.

An' father sent me up to bed without a bite to eat.

I woke up in the dark an' saw things standin' in a row,

A-lookin' at me cross-eyed an' p'intin' at me-

Oh, my! I wuz so skeered that time I never slep' a mite-

It's almost alluz when I'm bad I see things at night!

Lucky thing I ain't a girl, or I'd be skeered to death!

Bein' I'm a boy, I duck my head an' hold my breath;

An' I am, oh! so sorry I'm a naughty boy, an'

I promise to be better an' I say my prayers again!

Gran'ma tells me that's the only way to make it right

When a feller has been wicked an' sees things at night!

An' so, when other naughty boys would coax me into sin.

I try to skwush the Tempter's voice 'at urges me within:

An' when they's pie for supper, or cakes 'at's big and nice.

I want to-but I do not pass my plate f'r them things twice!

No, ruther let Starvation wipe me slowly out o' sight

Than I should keep a-livin' on an' seein' things at night! 1904

ALWAYS RIGHT<sup>1</sup>

Don't take on so, Hiram, But do what you're told to do; It's fair to suppose that yer mother knows A heap sight more than you. I'll allow that sometimes her way Don't seem the wisest, quite; But the easiest way, When she's had her say, Is to reckon ver mother is right.

Courted her ten long winters, Saw her to singin'-school; When she went down one spell to town, I cried like a durned ol' fool; Got mad at the boys for callin' When I sparked her Sunday night: But she said she knew A thing or two. An' I reckoned yer mother wuz right.

I courted till I wuz aging, And she wuz past her prime,-I'd have died, I guess, if she hadn't said yes When I popped f'r the hundredth time. Said she'd never have took me If I hadn't stuck so tight; Opined that we Could never agree,— And I reckon yer mother wuz right! 1880

EDWARD ROWLAND SILL 1841-1887

Although Sill was born in Windsor, Connecticut, and was a graduate of Yale, he spent almost half his life in California where he went in search of health and where he engaged in various occupations. After a few years he came back to the East to study for the ministry at Harvard, but soon turned to literature and teaching. Again for several years he was in California, professor of English for almost eight years at the State University. Finally he devoted himself entirely to his writing until his death at Cuyahoga, Ohio. His poems, simple in diction, are often didactic in intent, though vigor and originality save them from being conventionally moralistic.

Biography and criticism: W. B. Parker. Edward Rowland Sill. 1915; E. L. Baker, "Edward Rowland Sill, Poet-Teacher," Overland ns 83:154-5; Nation 101:207-8; Dial 58:143-5.

OPPORTUNITY 2

This I beheld, or dreamed it in a dream:-There spread a cloud of dust along a plain; And underneath the cloud, or in it, raged A furious battle, and men velled, and swords Shocked upon swords and shields. A prince's banner

Wavered, then staggered backward, hemmed by foes.

A craven hung along the battle's edge, And thought, "Had I a sword of keener steel-That blue blade that the king's son bears,—but Blunt thing-!" he snapped and flung it from his hand.

And lowering crept away, and left the field. Then came the king's son, wounded, sore bestead.

And weaponless, and saw the broken sword, Hilt-buried in the dry and trodden sand, And ran and snatched it, and with battle-shout Lifted afresh he hewed his enemy down, And saved a great cause that heroic day.

1878-80

1887

THE FOOL'S PRAYER 2

The royal feast was done; the King Sought some new sport to banish care, And to his jester cried: "Sir Fool, Kneel now, and make for us a prayer!"

The jester doffed his cap and bells, And stood the mocking court before; They could not see the bitter smile Behind the painted grin he wore.

He bowed his head, and bent his knee Upon the monarch's silken stool; His pleading voice arose: "O Lord, Be merciful to me, a fool!

"No pity, Lord, could change the heart From red with wrong to white as wool; 10

&lt;sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Copyright. By permission of Houghton Mifflin Company, authorized publishers.

The rod must heal the sin: but. Lord. Be merciful to me, a fool!

"'Tis not by guilt the onward sweep Of truth and right. O Lord, we stay: 'Tis by our follies that so long We hold the earth from heaven away.

"These clumsy feet, still in the mire, Go crushing blossoms without end: These hard, well-meaning hands we thrust Among the heart-strings of a friend.

"The ill-timed truth we might have kept— Who knows how sharp it pierced and stung? The word we had not sense to sav-Who knows how grandly it had rung?

"Our faults no tenderness should ask, The chastening stripes must cleanse them all: But for our blunders—oh, in shame Before the eves of heaven we fall.

"Earth bears no balsam for mistakes: Men crown the knave; and scourge the tool That did his will; but Thou, O Lord, Be merciful to me, a fool!"

The room was hushed: in silence rose The King, and sought his gardens cool, And walked apart, and murmured low, "Be merciful to me, a fool!" 1873-80 1887

JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS 1848-1908

It was through journalism that Harris came into authorship. He was born in Georgia, had a limited common-school education, but was apprenticed when a boy to a rather eccentric country editor and newspaper publisher from whom he received good training in the essentials of journalism. In 1876 he came to the staff of the Atlanta Constitution, and was its editor in 1890. Pressed, in an emergency to fill a column for that paper, he wrote the first of the "Uncle Remus Stories" based upon tales told him when a child by an old negro plantation servant. These tales show the genuine folk imagination of the Negro race, modified, perhaps, by two or three generations in America. They are partly pagan, certainly naïve; they reflect the kindliness, humor, and rich inventiveness of the people from which they sprang. The first that were published were almost verbatim narratives of the old servant; how much of Harris's own invention is found in the later tales is not known. Leading titles among his collections are Nights with Uncle Remus, 1883; Mungo and Other Sketches, 1884;

Balaam and his Master, 1891; Told by Uncle Remus-New Series, 1905.

Biography and criticism: Julia C. Harris, The Life and Letters of Joel Chandler Harris, 1918; Harry A. Toulmin, Social Historians, 1911; H. E. Harman, "Joel Chandler Harris," Bookm. 61: 433-6; E. C. Parsons, "Joel Chandler Harris and Negro Folklore," Dial 66:491-3; see also: Cur. Opinion 65:324-6; Bookm. 48:50-6.

From UNCLE REMUS 1

TV

HOW MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR. FOX

"Uncle Remus." said the little boy one evening, when he had found the old man with little or nothing to do, "did the fox kill and eat the rabbit when he caught him with the Tar-Baby?"2

"Law, honey, ain't I tell you 'bout dat?" replied the old darkey, chuckling slyly. 'clar ter grashus I ought er tole you dat, but old man Nod wuz ridin' on my eyeleds 'twel a leetle mo'n I'd a dis'member'd my own name, en den on to dat here come yo' mammy hollerin' atter you.

"W'at I tell you w'en I fus' begin? I tole vou Brer Rabbit wuz a monstus soon creetur; leas'ways dat's w'at I laid out fer ter tell you. Well, den, honey, don't you go en make no udder calkalashuns, kaze in dem days Brer Rabbit en his fambly wuz at de head er de gang w'en enny racket wuz on han', en dar dey stayed. 'Fo' you begins fer ter wipe yo' eyes 'bout Brer Rabbit, you wait en see whar'bouts Brer Rabbit gwineter fetch up at. But dat's needer yer ner dar.

"W'en Brer Fox fine Brer Rabbit mixt up wid de Tar-Baby, he feel mighty good, en he roll on de groun' en laff. Bimeby he up'n say, sezee:

" 'Well, I speck I got you dis time, Brer Rabbit,' sezee; 'maybe I ain't, but I speck I is. You been runnin' roun' here sassin' atter me a mighty long time, but I speck you done come ter de een' er de row. You bin cuttin' up yo' capers en bouncin' 'roun' in dis neighberhood ontwel you come ter b'leeve yo'se'f de boss er de whole gang. En den youer allers some'rs whar you got no bizness,' sez Brer Fox, sezee. 'Who ax you fer ter come en strike up a 'quaintance wid dish yer Tar-Baby? En who stuck

<sup>1</sup> From Uncle Remus: His Songs and His Sayings by Joel Chandler Harris, by permission of Messrs. D. Appleton and Company, publishers.
 <sup>2</sup> The fox had caught the rabbit by setting up a tar baby in the road, to which the rabbit had stuck when he tried to beat it for refusing to speak.

you up dar whar you iz? Nobody in de roun' worril. You des tuck en jam yo'se'f on dat Tar-Baby widout waitin' fer enny invite,' sez Brer Fox, sezee, 'en dar you is, en dar you'll stay twel I fixes up a bresh-pile and fires her up, kaze I'm gwineter bobbyque you dis day, sho,' sez Brer Fox, sezee.

"Den Brer Rabbit talk mighty 'umble.

"'I don't keer w'at you do wid me, Brer Fox,' sezee, 'so you don't fling me in dat brier-patch. Roas' me, Brer Fox,' sezee, 'but don't fling me in dat brier-patch,' sezee.

"'Hit's so much trouble fer ter kindle a fier,' sez Brer Fox, sezee, 'dat I speck I'll hatter hang you,' sezee.

"'Hang me des ez high as you please, Brer Fox,' sez Brer Rabbit, sezee, 'but do fer de Lord's sake don't fling me in dat brier-patch,' sezee.

"'I ain't got no string,' sez Brer Fox, sezee, 'en now I speck I'll hatter drown you,' sezee.

"'Drown me des ez deep ez you please, Brer Fox,' sez Brer Rabbit, sezee, 'but do don't fling me in dat brier-patch,' sezee.

"'Dey ain't no water nigh,' sez Brer Fox, sezee, 'en now I speck I'll hatter skin you,' sezee.

"'Skin me, Brer Fox,' sez Brer Rabbit, sezee, 'snatch out my eyeballs, t'ar out my years by de roots, en cut off my legs,' sezee, 'but do please, Brer Fox, don't fling me in dat brier-patch,' sezee.

"Co'se Brer Fox wanter hurt Brer Rabbit bad ez he kin, so he cotch 'im by de behime legs en slung 'im right in de middle er de brierpatch. Dar was a considerbul flutter whar Brer Rabbit struck de bushes, en Brer Fox sorter hang 'roun' fer ter see w'at wuz gwineter happen. Bimeby he hear somebody call 'im, en way up de hill he see Brer Rabbit settin' cross-legged on a chinkapin log koamin' de pitch outen his har wid a chip. Den Brer Fox know dat he bin swop off mighty bad. Brer Rabbit wuz bleedzed fer ter fling back some er his sass, en he holler out:

"'Bred en bawn in a brier-patch, Brer Fox bred en bawn in a brier-patch!' en wid dat he skip out des ez lively ez a cricket in de embers."

WHY MR. POSSUM LOVES PEACE

"One night," said Uncle Remus—taking Miss Sally's little boy on his knee, and stroking the child's hair thoughtfully and caressingly—"one night Brer Possum call by fer Brer Coon, 'cordin' ter 'greement, en atter gobblin' up a dish er fried greens en smokin' a seegyar, dey rambled fort' fer ter see how de ballunce er de settlement wuz gittin' 'long. Brer Coon, he wuz one er deze yer natchul pacers, en he racked 'long same ez Mars John's bay pony, en Brer Possum he went in a han'-gallup; en dey got over heap er groun', mon. Brer Possum, he got his belly full er 'simmons, en Brer Coon, he scoop up a 'bunnunce er frogs en tadpoles. Dey amble 'long, dey did, des ez sociable ez a basket er kittens, twel bimeby dey hear Mr. Dog talkin' ter hisse'f way off in de woods.

"'Spozen he runs up on us, Brer Possum, w'at you gwineter do?' sez Brer Coon, sezee. Brer Possum sorter laff 'round de cornders un his mouf.

"'Oh, ef he come, Brer Coon, I'm gwineter stan' by you,' sez Brer Possum. 'W'at you gwineter do?' sezee.

"'Who? me?' sez Brer Coon. 'Ef he run up onter me, I lay I give 'im one twis',' sezee."

"Did the dog come?" asked the little boy.

"Go 'way, honey!" responded the old man, in an impressive tone. "Go way! Mr. Dog. he come en he come a zoonin'. En he ain't wait fer ter say howdy, nudder. He des sail inter de two un um. De ve'y fus pas he make Brer Possum fetch a grin fum year ter year, en keel over like he wuz dead. Den Mr. Dog, he sail inter Brer Coon, en right dar's whar he drap his money purse, kaze Brer Coon wuz cut out fer dat kinder bizness, en he fa'rly wipe up de face er de yeth wid 'im. You better b'leeve dat w'en Mr. Dog got a chance to make hisse'f skase he tuck it, en w'at der wuz lef' un him went skaddlin' thoo de woods like hit wuz shot outen a muskit. En Brer Coon, he sorter lick his cloze inter shape en rack off, en Brer Possum, he lay dar like he wuz dead, twel bimeby he raise up sorter keerful like, en w'en he fine de coas' cle'r he scramble up en scamper off like sumpin was atter 'im."

Here Uncle Remus paused long enough to pick up a live coal of fire in his fingers, transfer it to the palm of his hand, and thence to his clay pipe, which he had been filling—a proceeding that was viewed by the little boy with undisguised admiration. The old man then proceeded:

"Nex' time Brer Possum meet Brer Coon, Brer Coon 'fuse ter 'spon' ter his howdy, en dis make Brer Possum feel mighty bad, seein' ez how dey useter make so many 'scurshuns tergedder.

"'W'at make you hol' yo' head so high, Brer

Coon?' sez Brer Possum, sezee.

"'I ain't runnin' wid cowerds deze days,' sez

Brer Coon. 'W'en I wants vou I'll sen' fer vou.' sezee.

"Den Brer Possum git mighty mad.

"'Who's enny cowerd?' sezee.

"'You is,' sez Brer Coon, 'dat's who. I ain't soshatin' wid dem w'at lies down on de groun' en plays dead w'en dar's a free fight gwine on,'

"Den Brer Possum grin en laugh fit to kill hisse'f.

"'Lor', Brer Coon, you don't speck I done dat kaze I wuz 'feared, duz vou?' sezee. 'W'y I want no mo' 'feared dan vou is dis minnit. W'at wuz dev fer ter be skeered un?' sezee. 'I know'd you'd git away wid Mr. Dog ef I didn't, en I des lay dar watchin' you shake him, waitin' fer ter put in w'en de time come.' sezee.

"Brer Coon tu'n up his nose.

"'Dat's a mighty likely tale,' sezee, 'w'en Mr. Dog ain't mo'n tech you 'fo' you keel over, en lav dar stiff.' sezee.

"'Dat's des w'at I wuz gwineter tell you 'bout,' sez Brer Possum, sezee. 'I want no mo' skeer'd dan you is right now, en' I wuz fixin' fer ter give Mr. Dog a sample er my jaw, sezee, 'but I'm de most ticklish chap w'at you ever laid eyes on, en no sooner did Mr. Dog put his nose down yer 'mong my ribs dan I got ter laughin', en I laughed twel I ain't had no use er my lim's' sezee, 'en it's a mussy unto Mr. Dog dat I wuz ticklish, kaze a little mo' en I'd e't 'im up,' sezee. 'I don't min' fighting', Brer Coon, no mo' dan you duz,' sezee, 'but I declar' ter grashus ef I kin stan' ticklin'. Git me in a row whar dey ain't no ticklin' 'lowed, en I'm your man,' sezee.

"En down ter dis day"-continued Uncle Remus, watching the smoke from his pipe curl upward over the little boy's head-"down ter dis day, Brer Possum's bound ter s'render w'en you tech him in de short ribs, en he'll laugh ef he knows he's gwineter be smashed fer it."

JOHN BURROUGHS 1837-1921

The early training of Burroughs, perhaps the best known American writer upon nature between Thoreau and Beebe, was that of the country home and the country school. He was born at Roxbury, southern New York State, and his father's farm and its surroundings were the lad's first laboratory and museum. After teaching school and working on a newspaper he became a guard, and later a clerk, in the United States Treasury at Washington. All his spare time he used in the out-door study of plants and animals. He spent his later life in his camp-like home, "Slabsides," not far from the Hudson. His best known books are Wake Robin, 1870; Locusts and Wild Honev. 1879: Fresh Fields, 1884; Literary Values, 1902: Time and Change, 1912.

Burrough's particular subject-matter came from rather commonplace facts and experiences; his manner is one of pleasing directness. In his later years he became much interested in literature and philosophy, and produced some literary and philosophical criticism. Notable is his essay upon Whitman, of whom he was a friend and companion.

Autobiographical: My Boyhood, 1922; also Harper 144:137-51; 341-9; 515-24. Biography and criticism: C. Barrus, Our Friend John Burroughs, 1914; H. James, View and Reviews, 1906; R. J. H. De Loach, Rambles with John Burroughs, 1912; D. L. Sharp, The Seer of Slabsides, 1921; C. Barrus, "Whitman and Burroughs as Comrades," Yale R. ns 15:59-81; H. L. West, "John Burroughs," Cent. 102:731-42; S. Hartman, "A Visit to John Burroughs," Cent. 101:619-21; see also N. Foerster, No. Am. 214:177-82; W. M. Lodge, Overland ns 77:50-2, April, '21.

From MY BOYHOOD 1

The old farm must have had at least ten miles of stone walls upon it, many of them built new by Father from stones picked up in the fields, and many of them relaid by him, or rather by his boys and hired men. Father was not skillful at any sort of craft work. He was a good plowman, a good mower and cradler, excellent with a team of oxen drawing rocks, and good at most general farm work, but not an adept at constructing anything. Hiram was the mechanical genius of the family. He was a good wall-layer, and skillful with edged tools. It fell to his lot to make the sleds, the stoneboats, 2 the hav-rigging, the ax helves, the flails, to mend the cradles and rakes, to build the haystacks, and once, I remember, he rebuilt the churning machine. He was slow but he hewed exactly to the line. Before and during my time on the farm Father used to count on building forty or fifty rods of stone wall each year, usually in the spring and early summer. These were the only lines of poetry and prose Father wrote. They are still very legible on the face of the landscape and cannot be easily erased from it. Gathered out of the confusion of nature, built up of fragments of the old Devonian 3 rock and shale, laid with due regard to the wear and tear of time, well-bottomed and well-capped, establishing boundaries and defining possessions, etc., these lines of stone wall afford a good lesson in many things besides wall building. <sup>1</sup> They are good literature and good philosophy. They smack of the soil, they have local color, they are a bit of chaos brought into When you deal with nature only the square deal is worth while. How she searches for the vulnerable points in your structure, the weak places in your foundation, the defective material in your building!

&lt;sup>1</sup> From My Boyhood by John Burroughs, copyright 1922, Doubleday, Page and Company.

<sup>2</sup> flat, runnerless sleds for transporting stones

<sup>3</sup> rocks of the Paleozoic age; named from Devon, Eng-

The farmer's stone wall, when well built, stands about as long as he does. It begins to reel and look decrepit when he begins to do so. But it can be relaid and he cannot. One day I paused by the roadside to speak with an old man who was rebuilding a wall. "I laid this wall fifty years ago," he said. "When it is laid up again I shall not have the job." He had stood up longer than had his wall.

A stone wall is a friend of all the wild creatures. It is a safe line of communication with all parts of the landscape. What do the chipmunks, red squirrels, and weasels do in a country without stone fences? The woodchucks and the coons and foxes also use them.

It was my duty as a farm boy to help pick up the stone and pry up the rocks. I could put the bait 2 under the lever, even if my weight on top of it did not count for much. slow, patient, hulky oxen, how they would kink their tails, hump their backs, and throw their weight into the bows when they felt a heavy rock behind them and Father lifted up his voice and laid on the "gad"! It was a good subject for a picture which, I think, no artist has ever painted. How many rocks we turned out of their beds, where they had slept since the great ice sheet tucked them up there, maybe a hundred thousand years ago-how wounded and torn the meadow or pasture looked, bleeding as it were, in a score of places, when the job was finished! But the further surgery of the plow and harrow, followed by the healing touch of the seasons, soon made all whole again.

The work on the farm in those days varied little from year to year. In winter the care of the cattle, the cutting of the wood, and the thrashing of the oats and rye filled the time. From the age of ten or twelve till we were grown up, we went to school only in winter, doing the chores morning and evening, and engaging in general work every other Saturday, which was a holiday. Often my older brothers would have to leave school by three o'clock to get home to put up the cows in mv father's absence. Those school days, how they come back to me!-the long walk across lots, through snow-choked fields and woods, our narrow path so often obliterated by a fresh fall of snow; the cutting winds, the bitter cold, the snow squeaking beneath our frozen cowhide boots, our trousers' legs often tied down with tow strings to keep the snow from pushing them up above our boot tops; the wide-open white landscape with its faint black lines of stone wall when we had passed the woods and began to dip down into West Settlement Valley; the Smith boys and Bouton boys and Dart boys, afar off, threading the fields on their way to school, their forms etched on the white hillsides, one of the bigger boys, Ria Bouton, who had many chores to do, morning after morning running the whole distance so as not to be late; the red school house in the distance by the roadside with the dark spot in its center made by the open door of the entry way; the creek in the valley, often choked with anchor ice, 3 which our path crossed and into which I one morning slumped, reaching the school house with my clothes freezing upon me and the water gurgling in my boots; the boys and girls there, Jay Gould 4 among them, two thirds of them now dead and the living scattered from the Hudson to the Pacific; the teachers now all dead; the studies, the games, the wrestlings, the baseball-all these things and more pass before me as I recall those longgone days.

2 a fulcrum, as for a crowbar

The first considerable work in spring was sugar-making, always a happy time for me. Usually the last half of March, when rills from the melting snow began to come through the fields, the veins of the sugar maples began to thrill with the spring warmth. There was a general awakening about the farm at this time: the cackling of the hens, the bleating of young lambs and calves, and the wistful lowing of the cows. Earlier in the month the "sap spiles" had been overhauled, resharpened, and new ones made, usually from bass wood. In my time the sap gouge was used instead of the auger and the manner of tapping was crude and wasteful. A slanting gash three or four inches long and a half inch or more deep was cut, and an inch below the lower end of this the gouge was driven in to make the place for the spile, a piece of wood two inches wide, shaped to the ground ice, sometimes formed on the bottom of still or running water

<sup>1</sup> See Frost's "Mending Wall," p. 819.

4 an American financier and millionaire, 1836-1892

gouge, and a foot or more in length. It gave the tree a double and unnecessary wound. The bigger the gash the more the sap, seemed to be the theory, as if the tree was a barrel filled with liquid, whereas a small wound made by a halfinch bit does the work just as well and is far less injurious to the tree.

When there came a bright morning, wind northwest and warm enough to begin to thaw by eight o'clock, the sugar-making utensilspans, kettles, spiles, hogsheads-were loaded upon the sled and taken to the woods, and by ten o'clock the trees began to feel the cruel ax and gouge once more. It usually fell to my part to carry the pans and spiles for one of the tappers, Hiram or Father, and to arrange the pans on a level foundation of sticks or stones. in position. Father often used to haggle the tree a good deal in tapping. "By Fagus," he would say, "how awkward I am!" The rapid tinkle of those first drops of sap in the tin pan. how well I remember it! Probably the note of the first song sparrow or first bluebird, or the spring call of the nuthatch, sounded in unison. Usually only patches of snow lingered here and there in the woods and the earth-stained remnants of old drifts on the sides of the hills and along the stone walls. Those lucid warm March days in the naked maple woods under the blue sky, with the first drops of sap ringing in the pans, had a charm that does not fade from my mind. After the trees were all tapped, two hundred and fifty of them, the big kettles were again set up in the old stone arch, and the hogsheads in which to store the sap placed in position. By four o'clock many of the pans-milk pans from the dairy—would be full, and the gathering with neck yoke and pails began. When I was fourteen or fifteen I took a hand in this part of the work. It used to tax my strength to carry the two twelve-quart pails full through the rough places and up the steep banks in the woods and then lift them up and alternately empty them into the hogsheads without displacing the neck yoke. But I could do Now all this work is done by the aid of a team and a pipe fastened on a sled. Before I was old enough to gather sap it fell to me to go to the barns and put in hay for the cows and help stable them. The next morning the boiling of the sap would begin, with Hiram in charge. The big deep iron kettles were slow evaporators compared with the broad shallow sheet-iron pans now in use. Profundity cannot keep up with shallowness in sugar-making, the more superficial your evaporator, within limits, the more rapid your progress. It took the farmers nearly a hundred years to find this out, or at least to act upon it.

At the end of a couple of days of hard boiling Hiram would "syrup off," having reduced two hundred pails of sap to five or six of syrup. The syruping-off often occurred after dark. When the liquid dropped from a dipper which was dipped into it and, held up in the cool air, formed into stiff thin masses, it had reached the stage of syrup. How we minded our steps over the rough path, in the semi-darkness of the old tin lantern, in carrying those precious pails of syrup to the house, where the final process of "sugaring off" was to be completed by Mother and Jane!

The sap runs came at intervals of several days. Two or three days would usually end one run. A change in the weather to below freezing would stop the flow, and a change to much warmer would check it. The fountains of sap are let loose by frosty sunshine. Frost in the ground, or on it in the shape of snow and the air full of sunshine are the most favorable conditions. A certain chill and crispness, something crystalline, in the air are necessary. A touch of enervating warmth from the south or a frigidity from the north and the trees feel it through their thick bark coats very quickly. Between the temperatures of thirty-five to fifty degrees they get in their best work. After we have had one run ending in rain and warmth, a fresh fall of snow-"sap snow," the farmers call such-will give us another run. Three or four good runs make a long and successful season. My boyhood days in the spring sugar bush were my most enjoyable on the farm. How I came to know each of those two hundred and fifty trees-what a distinct sense of individuality seemed to adhere to most of them, as much so as to each cow in a dairy! I knew at which trees I would be pretty sure to find a full pan and at which ones a less amount. One huge tree always gave a cream-pan full-a double measure—while the others were filling an ordinary pan. This was known as "the old cream-pan tree." Its place has long been vacant; about half the others are still standing, but with the decrepitude of age appearing in their tops, a new generation of maples has taken the place of the vanished veterans.

While tending the kettles there beside the old arch in the bright, warm March or April days, with my brother, or while he had gone to dinner, looking down the long valley and off over the curving backs of the distant mountain ranges, what dreams I used to have, what vague longings, and, I may say, what happy anticipations! I am sure I gathered more than sap and sugar in those youthful days amid the maples. When I visit the old home now I have to walk up to the sugar bush and stand around the old "boiling place," trying to transport myself back into the magic atmosphere of that boyhood time. The man has his dreams, too, but to his eyes the world is not steeped in romance as it is to the eyes of youth:

About this time I heard another new word. We were working on the road, and I with my hoe was working beside an old Ouaker farmer, David Corbin, who used to be a school teacher. A large flat stone was turned over, and beneath it in some orderly arrangement were some smaller stones. "Here are some antiquities." said Mr. Corbin, and my vocabulary received another addition. A new word or a new thing was very apt to make its mark upon my mind. I have told elsewhere what a revelation to me was my first glimpse of one of the warblers, the black-throated blue-black, indicating as it did a world of bird life of which I had never dreamed, the bird life in the inner heart of the woods. My brothers and other boys were with me but they did not see the new bird. The first time I saw the veery, or Wilson's thrush, also stands out in my memory. It alighted in the road before us on the edge of the woods. "A brown thrasher." said Bill Chase. It was not the thrasher but it was a new bird to me and the picture of it is in my mind as if made only yesterday. Natural History was a subject unknown to me in my boyhood, and such a thing as nature study in the schools was of course unheard of. Our natural history we got unconsciously in the sport at noon time, or on our way to and from school or in our Sunday excursions to the streams and woods. learned much about the ways of foxes and woodchucks and coons and skunks and squirrels by hunting them. The partridge, too, and the crows, hawks, and owls, and the song birds of the field and orchard, all enter into the farm boy's life. I early became familiar with the songs and habits of all the common birds, and with field mice, and the frogs, toads, lizards, and snakes. Also with the wild bees and wasps. One season I made a collection of bumblebee honey, studying the habits of five or six different kinds and rifling their nests. I kept my store of bumblebee honey in the attic where I had a small box full of the comb and a large phial filled with the honey. How well I came to know the different dispositions of the various kinds—the small red-vested that made its nest in a hole in the ground: the small blackvested, the large black-vested, the vellownecked, the black-banded, etc., that made their nests in old mice nests in the meadow or in the barn and other places. I used to watch and woo the little piping frogs in the spring marshes when I had driven the cows to pasture at night. till they would sit in my open hand and pipe. I used to creep on my hands and knees through the woods to see the partridge in the act of drumming. 1 I used to watch the mud wasps building their nests in the old attic and noted their complaining cry while in the act of pressing on the mud. I noted the same complaining cry from the bees when working on the flower of the purple-flowering raspberry, what we called "Scotch caps." I tried to trap foxes and soon learned how far the fox's cunning surpassed mine. My first lesson in animal psychology I got from old Nat Higby as he came riding by on horseback one winter day, his huge feet almost meeting under the horse, just as a hound was running a fox across our upper mountain lot. "My boy," he said, "that fox may be running as fast as he can, but if you stood behind that big rock beside his course, and as he came along should jump out and shout 'hello,' he would run faster." That was the winter when in fond imagination I saw a stream of silver dollars coming my way from the red foxes I was planning to deprive of their pelts when they needed them most. I have told elsewhere of my trapping experiences and how completely I failed.

1922

JOHN MUIR 1838-1914

From a childhood in Scotland, the most interesting hours of which included rambles in the fields and by the sea, Muir was transplanted with his parents into the midst of the Wisconsin forest and lake region. There he spent his youth, snatching what time he could from the almost ceaseless toil of a pioneer farm, for studying plants, animals, rocks, and reading such books as fell into his hands. When of age he began to make his way through the University of Wisconsin, supporting himself by manual labor. Soon after leaving the university he traveled afoot to Florida, studying botany and geology as he went, and made his way to California. For many years the formations of the valleys and contours of the Sierras and the life they sustained were the objects of his study. He was especially interested in the work of glaciers, past and present, pursuing his observations of them into Alaska and other regions of active glaciation. On foot and alone, often in great bodily danger, he carried on this exploration, making himself familiar with the forces that molded the mountains. Muir looked upon nature not solely with the critical eye of the scientist, but also with the imagination of a poet. His books interest us through their enthusiasm, their individuality, the spirit of adventure that pervades them; and through the passionate fondness which they reflect for the titanic beauty of the mountains. Muir's chief books are The Mountains of California, 1894, 1911; Stickeen, 1909 (a charming dog story); My First Summer in the Sierras, 1911; The Yosemite, 1912

&lt;sup>1</sup> making a noise with the wings like the beating of a

Biography and criticism: Wm. Fred. Badè, The Life and Letters of John Muir, 2 vols., 1924; The Story of My Boyhood and Youth, 1913; T. Roosevelt, "John Muir: An Appreciation," Outlook 109: 27-8; S. H. Young, "Alaska Days with John Muir," Outlook 110:188-99; 430-42; 723-33; E. Wyatt, "Two Woodsmen," No. Am. 204:433-6; "How John Muir Inspired Roosevelt," Cur. Opinion 78: 337-8; see also: Outlook 139:32-3; Bookm 61: 88-90; Poet Lore 36:45-62.

From THE MOUNTAINS OF CALIFORNIA 1

A WIND-STORM IN THE FORESTS

. . . . There is always something deeply exciting, not only in the sounds of winds in the woods, which exert more or less influence over every mind, but in their varied waterlike flow as manifested by the movements of the trees. especially those of the conifers. By no other trees are they rendered so extensively and impressively visible, not even by the lordly tropic palms or tree-ferns responsive to the gentlest breeze. The waving of a forest of the giant Sequoias is indescribably impressive and sublime, but the pines seem to me the best interpreters of winds. They are mighty waving goldenrods, ever in tune, singing and writing wind-music all their long century lives. Little, however, of this noble tree-waving and treemusic will you see or hear in the strictly alpine portion of the forests. The burly Juniper. whose girth sometimes more than equals its height, is about as rigid as the rocks on which it grows. The slender lash-like sprays of the Dwarf Pine stream out in wavering ripples, but the tallest and slenderest are far too unvielding to wave even in the heaviest gales. They only shake in quick, short vibrations. The Hemlock Spruce, however, and the Mountain Pine, and some of the tallest thickets of the Two-leaved species bow in storms with considerable scope and gracefulness. But it is only in the lower and middle zones that the meeting of winds and woods is to be seen in all its grandeur.

One of the most beautiful and exhibitanting storms I ever enjoyed in the Sierra occurred in December, 1874, when I happened to be exploring one of the tributary valleys of the Yuba River. The sky and the ground and the trees had been thoroughly rain-washed and were dry again. The day was intensely pure, one of those incomparable bits of California winter, warm and balmy and full of white sparkling sunshine, redolent of all the purest influences of the spring, and at the same time enlivened with one of the most bracing wind-storms conceivable. Instead of camping out, as I usually do. I then chanced to be stopping at the house of a friend. But when the storm began to sound, I lost no time in pushing out into the woods to enjoy it. For on such occasions Nature has always something rare to show us, and the danger to life and limb is hardly greater than one would experience crouching deprecatingly beneath a roof.

It was still early morning when I found myself fairly adrift. Delicious sunshine came pouring over the hills, lighting the tops of the pines, and setting free a steam of summery fragrance that contrasted strangely with the wild tones of the storm. The air was mottled with pine-tassels and bright green plumes, that went flashing past in the sunlight like birds pursued. But there was not the slightest dustiness, nothing less pure than leaves, and ripe pollen, and flecks of withered bracken and moss. I heard trees falling for hours at the rate of one every two or three minutes; some uprooted, partly on account of the loose, water-soaked condition of the ground; others broken straight across, where some weakness caused by fire had determined the spot. The gestures of the various trees made a delightful study. Young Sugar Pines, light and feathery as squirrel-tails, were bowing almost to the ground; while the grand old patriarchs, whose massive boles had been tried in a hundred storms, waved solemnly above them, their long, arching branches streaming fluently on the gale, and every needle thrilling and ringing and shedding off keen lances of light like a diamond. The Douglas Spruces, with long sprays drawn out in level tresses, and needles massed in a gray, shimmering glow, presented a most striking appearance, as they stood in bold relief along the hilltops. The madronos in the dells, with their red bark and large glossy leaves tilted every way, reflected the sunshine in throbbing spangles like those one so often sees on the rippled surface of a glacier lake. But the Silver Pines were now the most impressively beautiful of all. Colossal spires 200 feet in height waved like supple goldenrods chanting and bowing low as if in worship, while the whole mass of their long, tremulous foliage was kindled into one continuous blaze of white sun-fire. The force of the gale was such that the most steadfast monarch of them all rocked down to its roots with a motion plainly perceptible when one leaned against it. Nature was holding high festival, and every fiber of the most rigid giants thrilled with glad excitement.

&lt;sup>2</sup> From The Mountains of California by John Muir, by permission of The Century Company, publishers.

I drifted on through the midst of this passionate music and motion, across many a glen. from ridge to ridge; often halting in the lee of a rock for shelter, or to gaze and listen. Even when the grand anthem had swelled to its highest pitch, I could distinctly hear the varying tones of individual tree—Spruce, and Fir, and Pine, and leafless Oak,-and even the infinitely gentle rustle of the withered grasses at my feet. Each was expressing itself in its own way-singing its own song, and making its own peculiar gestures,-manifesting a richness of variety to be found in no other forest I have vet seen. The coniferous woods of Canada. and the Carolinas, and Florida, are made up of trees that resemble one another about as nearly as blades of grass, and grow close together in much the same way. Coniferous trees, in general, seldom possess individual character, such as is manifest among Oaks and Elms. But the California forests are made up of a greater number of distinct species than any other in the world. And in them we find, not only a marked differentiation into special groups, but also a marked individuality in almost every tree, giving rise to storm effects indescribably glorious.

Toward midday, after a long, tingling scramble through copses of hazel and ceanothus, I gained the summit of the highest ridge in the neighborhood; and then it occurred to me that it would be a fine thing to climb one of the trees to obtain a wider outlook and get my ear close to the Aeolian music of its topmost But under the circumstances the choice of a tree was a serious matter. One whose instep was not very strong seemed in danger of being blown down, or of being struck by others in case they should fall; another was branchless to a considerable height above the ground, and at the same time too large to be grasped with arms and legs in climbing; while others were not favorably situated for clear views. After cautiously casting about, I made choice of the tallest of a group of Douglas Spruces that were growing close together like a tuft of grass, no one of which seemed likely to fall unless all the rest fell with it. Though comparatively young, they were about 100 feet high, and their lithe, brushy tops were rocking and swirling in wild ecstasy. Being accustomed to climb trees in making botanical studies, I experienced no difficulty in reaching the top of this one, and never before did I enjoy so noble an exhilaration of motion. The slender tops fairly flapped and swished in the passionate torrent, bending and swirling backward and forward, round and round, tracing indescribable combinations of vertical and horizontal curves, while I clung with muscles firm braced, like a bobolink on a reed.

In its widest sweeps, my tree-top described an arc of from twenty to thirty degrees, but I felt sure of its elastic temper, having seen others of the same species still more severely triedbent almost to the ground indeed, in heavy snows-without breaking a fiber. I was therefore safe, and free to take the wind into my pulses and enjoy the excited forest from my superb outlook. The view from here must be extremely beautiful in any weather. Now my eye roved over the piny hills and dales as over fields of waving grain, and felt the light running in ripples and broad swelling undulations across the valleys from ridge to ridge, as the shining foliage was stirred by corresponding waves of air. Oftentimes these waves of reflected light would break up suddenly into a kind of beaten foam, and again, after chasing one another in regular order, they would seem to bend forward in concentric curves, and disappear on some hillside, like sea-waves on a shelving shore. The quantity of light reflected from the bent needles was so great as to make whole groves appear as if covered with snow. while the black shadows beneath the trees greatly enhanced the effect of the silvery splendor.

Excepting only the shadows there was nothing somber in all this wild sea of pines. On the contrary, notwithstanding this was the winter season, the colors were remarkably beautiful. The shafts of the pine and libocedrus were brown and purple, and most of the foliage was well tinged with yellow; the laurel groves, with the pale undersides of their leaves turned upward, made masses of gray; and then there was many a dash of chocolate color from clumps of manzanita, and jet of vivid crimson from the bark of the madroños, while the ground on the hillsides, appearing here and there through openings between the groves, displayed masses of pale purple and brown.

&lt;sup>1</sup> a Sierran genus of cedar trees

The sounds of the storm corresponded gloriously with this wild exuberance of light and motion. The profound bass of the naked branches and boles booming like waterfalls; the quick, tense vibrations of the pine-needles, now rising to a shrill, whistling hiss, now falling to a silky murmur; the rustling of laurel groves in the dells, and the keen metallic click of leaf on leaf—all this was heard in easy analysis when the attention was calmly bent.

The varied gestures of the multitude were seen to fine advantage, so that one could recognize the different species at a distance of several miles by this means alone, as well as by their forms and colors, and the way they reflected the light. All seemed strong and comfortable, as if really enjoying the storm, while responding to its most enthusiastic greetings. We hear much nowadays concerning the universal struggle for existence, but no struggle in the common meaning of the word was manifest here; no recognition of danger by any tree; no deprecation; but rather an invincible gladness as remote from exultation as from fear.

I kept my lofty perch for hours, frequently closing my eyes to enjoy the music by itself, or to feast quietly on the delicious fragrance that was streaming past. The fragrance of the woods was less marked than that produced during warm rain, when so many balsamic buds and leaves are steeped like tea; but, from the chafing of resiny branches against each other, and the incessant attrition of myriads of needles, the gale was spiced to a very tonic degree. And besides the fragrance from these local sources there were traces of scents brought from afar. For this wind came first from the sea, rubbing against its fresh, briny waves, then distilled through the redwoods, threading rich ferny gulches, and spreading itself in broad undulating currents over many a flower-enameled ridge of the coast mountains, then across the golden plains, up the purple foot-hills, and into these piny woods with the varied incense gathered by the way.

Winds are advertisements of all they touch, however much or little we may be able to read them; telling their wanderings even by their scents alone. Mariners detect the flowery perfume of land-winds far at sea, and sea-winds carry the fragrance of dulse and tangle far inland, where it is quickly recognized, though mingled with the scents of a thousand land-flowers As an illustration of this, I may tell here that I breathed sea-air on the Firth of Forth, in Scotland, while a boy: then was taken to Wisconsin, where I remained nineteen years; then, without in all this time having breathed one breath of the sea, I walked guietly, alone, from the middle of the Mississippi Valley to the Gulf of Mexico, on a botanical excursion, and while in Florida, far from the coast, my attention wholly bent on the splendid tropical vegetation about me. I suddenly recognized a seabreeze, as it came sifting through the palmettos and blooming vine-tangles, which at once awakened and set free a thousand dormant associations, and made me a boy again in Scotland, as if all the intervening years had been annihilated.

Most people like to look at mountain rivers. and bear them in mind; but few care to look at the winds, though far more beautiful and sublime, and though they become at times about as visible as flowing water. When the north winds in winter are making upward sweeps over the curving summits of the High Sierra, the fact is sometimes published with flying snowbanners a mile long. Those portions of the winds thus embodied can scarce be wholly invisible, even to the darkest imagination. And when we look around over an agitated forest, we may see something of the wind that stirs it, by its effects upon the trees. Yonder it descends in a rush of water-like ripples, and sweeps over the bending pines from hill to hill. Nearer, we see detached plumes and leaves, now speeding by on level currents, now whirling in eddies, or, escaping over the edges of the whirls, soaring aloft on grand, upswelling domes of air, or tossing on flame-like crests. Smooth, deep currents, cascades, falls, and swirling eddies, sing around every tree and leaf, and over all the varied topography of the region with telling changes of form, like mountain rivers conforming to the features of their channels.

After tracing the Sierra streams from their fountains to the plains, marking where they bloom white in falls, glide in crystal plumes, surge gray and foam-filled in boulder-choked gorges, and slip through the woods in long, tranquil reaches—after thus learning their language and forms in detail, we may at length hear them chanting all together in one grand anthem, and comprehend them all in clear inner vision, covering the range like lace. But even this spectacle is far less sublime and not a whit more substantial than what we may behold of these storm-streams of air in the mountain woods.

We all travel the milky way together, trees and men; but it never occurred to me until this storm-day, while swinging in the wind, that trees are travelers, in the ordinary sense. They make many journeys, not extensive ones, it is true; but our own little journeys, away and back again, are only little more than tree wavings—many of them not so much.

When the storm began to abate, I dismounted and sauntered down through the calming woods. The storm-tones died away, and, turning toward the east, I beheld the countless hosts of the forests hushed and tranquil, towering above one another on the slopes of the hills like a devout audience. The setting sun filled them with amber light, and seemed to say, while they listened. "My peace I give unto you."

As I gazed on the impressive scene, all the socalled ruin of the storm was forgotten, and never before did these noble woods appear so fresh, so joyous, so immortal.

1894, 1911

THEODORE ROOSEVELT 1858-1919

The ancestry of Roosevelt was Manhattan Dutch with strains of Huguenot and Scotch-Irish blood. He was born in New York City, spent his boyhood on Long Island, and graduated from Harvard, 1880. With persistent physical exercise and two years of cattle ranching in the Northwest he built up a frail constitution and returned home to enter politics. Although "irregular" in respect to party politics he rose in office, filled important posts on commissions of the New York police, and of the National Civil Service, and became assistant Secretary of the United States Navy, 1897. He served in the Spanish-American War as colonel of the "Rough Riders" regiment, was elected Governor of New York, 1898, Vice-President of the United States in 1900; and was President of the United States from the death of McKinley, 1901, until 1908. The remaining ten years of his life were marked by political activity relieved by hunting and scientific expeditions that took him into Africa and South America. President Roosevelt's uncompromising honesty, his zeal for reform and "a square deal," was made effective by a dynamic aggressiveness in speech, writing, and action. He was the most influential American of his day. His literary works consist of history, biography, adventure, and essays on a wide variety of social and didactic topics. Prominent are The Naval Operations of the War . . . . 1812-1815, 1882; Winning of the West, 1889-96; American Ideals, 1897; The Rough Riders, 1899; Big Game Hunting, 1899; African Game Trails, 1910; The Strenuous Life, 1910. His robust personality is expressed in a style of vigorous, enthusiastic narrative when his object is to entertain; or trenchant invective or exhortation when he would arouse the reader to action. To the end he maintained an eager, almost boyish attitude toward life.

Biography and criticism: W. R. Thayer, Theodore Roosevelt, 1919; Bradley Gilman, Roosevelt the Happy Warrior, 1921; J. B. Bishop, Theodore Roosevelt and His Time, 1920; Lord Charnwood, Theodore Roosevelt, 1923; J. Corbin, "Roosevelt in His Writings," Sat. R. Lit. 3:590-1; C. W. Ferguson, "Roosevelt, Man of Letters," Bookm. 64:726-9; "Mr. Roosevelt in Literature," Lit. Digest 60:27-8, Jan. 25, '19.

From RANCH LIFE AND THE HUNTING TRAIL<sup>1</sup>

CHAPTER III.

THE HOME RANCH

· · ·

A ranchman's work is, of course, free from much of the sameness attendant upon that of a mere cowboy. One day he will ride out with his men among the cattle, or after strayed horses; the next he may hunt, so as to keep the ranch in meat; then he can make the tour of his outlying camps; or, again, may join one of the round-ups for a week or two, perhaps keeping with it the entire time it is working. On occasions he will have a good deal of spare time on his hands, which, if he chooses, he can spend in reading or writing. If he cares for books. there will be many a worn volume in the primitive little sitting-room, with its log walls and huge fire-place; but after a hard day's work a man will not read much, but will rock to and fro in the flickering firelight, talking sleepily over his success in the day's chase and the difficulty he has had with the cattle; or else may simply lie stretched at full length on the elkhides and wolf-skins in front of the hearthstone, listening in drowsy silence to the roar and crackle of the blazing logs and to the moaning of the wind outside.

In the sharp fall weather the riding is delicious all day long; but even in the late spring, and all through the summer, we try, if we can, to do our work before the heat of the day, and if going on a long ride, whether to hunt or for other purposes, leave the ranch house by dawn.

The early rides in the spring mornings have a charm all their own, for they are taken when, for the one and only time during the year, the same brown landscape of these high plains turns to a vivid green, as the new grass sprouts and the trees and bushes thrust forth the young leaves; and at dawn, with the dew glittering everywhere, all things show at their best and freshest. The flowers are out and a man may gallop for miles at a stretch with his horse's hoofs sinking at every stride into the carpet of prairie roses, whose short stalks lift the beautiful blossoms but a few inches from the ground. Even in the waste places the cactuses are blooming; and one kind in particular, a dwarfish, globular plant, with its mass of splendid crimson flowers glows against the sides of the gray buttes 1 like a splash of flame.

&lt;sup>1</sup> From Ranch Life and the Hunting Trail by Theodore Roosevelt, by permission of The Century Company, publishers.

The ravines winding about and splitting into a labyrinth of coulées, <sup>2</sup> with chains of rounded hills to separate them, have groves of trees in their bottoms, along the sides of the water courses. In these are found the blacktail deer. and his cousin, the whitetail, too, with his flaunting flag; but in the spring-time, when we are after antelope only, we must go out farther to the flat prairie land on the divide. Here, in places, the level, grassy plains are strewn with mounds and hillocks of red or gray scoria, that stand singly or clustered into little groups, their tops crested, or their sides covered, by queer detached masses of volcanic rock, wrought into strange shapes by the dead forces whose blind, hidden strength long ago called them into being. The road our wagons take. when the water is too high for us to come down the river bottom, stretches far ahead-two dark, straight, parallel furrows which merge into one in the distance. Quaint little horned frogs crawl sluggishly along in the wheel tracks. and the sickle-billed curlews run over the ground or soar above and around the horsemen, uttering their mournful, never-ceasing clamor. The grassland stretches out in the sunlight like a sea, every wind bending the blades into a ripple, and flecking the prairie with shifting patches of a different green from that around, exactly as the touch of light squall or wind-gust will fleck the smooth surface of the ocean. Our Western plains differ widely in detail from those of Asia; yet they always call to mind

On the wide steppe, unharnessing
His wheel'd house at noon.
He tethers his beast down, and makes his meal—
Mares' milk, and bread
Baked on the embers;—all around
The boundless, waving grass-plains stretch. . . .

...; before him, for long miles, Alive with bright green lizards And the springing bustard fowl, The track, a straight black line, Furrows the rich soil; here and there Clusters of lonely mounds Topp'd with rough hewn, Gray, rain-blear'd statues, overpeer The sunny waste.

In the spring mornings the rider on the plains will hear bird songs unknown in the East. The Missouri skylark sings while soaring above the great plateaus so high in the air that it is impossible to see the bird; and this habit of singing while soaring it shares with some sparrow-like birds that are often found in company with it. The white-shouldered lark-bunting, in its livery of black, has rich, full notes, and as it sings on the wing it reminds one of the bobolink; and the sweet-voiced lark-finch also utters its song in the air. These birds, and most of the sparrows of the plains, are characteristic of this region.

But many of our birds, especially those found in the wooded river bottoms, answer to those of the East; only almost each one has some marked point of difference from its Eastern representative. The bluebird out West is very much of a blue bird indeed, for it has no "earth tinge" on its breast at all: while the indigo-bird, on the contrary, has gained the ruddy markings that the other has lost. The flicker has the shafts of its wing and tail quills colored orange instead of yellow. The towhee has lost all title to its name, for its only cry is a mew like that of a cat-bird; while, most wonderful of all, the meadow-lark has found a rich, strong voice, and is one of the sweetest and most incessant singers we have.

Throughout June the thickets and groves about the ranch house are loud with bird music from before dawn till long after sunrise. The thrashers have sung all the night through from among the thorn-bushes if there has been a moon, or even if there has been bright starlight; and before the first glimmer of gray the bell-like, silvery songs of the shy woodland thrushes chime in; while meadow-lark, robin, bluebird, and song sparrow, together with many rarer singers, like the grosbeak, join in swelling the chorus. There are some would-be singers whose intention is better than their execution. Blackbirds of several kinds are plenty round the house and stables, walking about with a knowing air, like so many dwarf crows; and now and then a flock of yellow-heads will mix for a few days with their purple or rusty-colored brethren. The males of these vellowheaded grackles are really handsome, their orange and vellow heads contrasting finely with the black of the rest of their plumage; but their voices are discordant to a degree. When a flock has done feeding it will often light in straggling order among the trees in front of the veranda, and then the males will begin to sing. or rather to utter the most extraordinary collection of broken sounds—creakings, gurglings. hisses, twitters, and every now and then a liquid note or two. It is like an accentuated representation of the noise made by a flock of common blackbirds. At nightfall the poorwills begin to utter their boding call from the wooded ravines back in the hills; not "whippoor-will," as in the East, but with two syllables only. They often come round the ranch house. Late one evening I had been sitting motionless on the veranda, looking out across the water and watching the green and brown of the hill-tops change to purple and umber and then fade off into shadowy gray as the somber darkness deepened. Suddenly a poor-will lit on the floor beside me and stayed some little time: now and then uttering its mournful cries. then ceasing for a few moments as it flitted round after insects, and again returning to the same place to begin anew. The little owls, too, call to each other with tremulous, quavering voices throughout the livelong night, as they sit in the creaking trees that overhang the roof. Now and then we hear the wilder voices of the wilderness, from animals that in the hour of darkness do not fear the neighborhood of man: the covotes wail like dismal ventriloquists, or the silence may be broken by the strident challenge of a lynx, or by the snorting and stamping of a deer that has come to the edge of the open.

<sup>1 (</sup>pronounced bewt) a conspicuously isolated steep hill or small mountain

<sup>2</sup> the beds of deep water courses having steep sides

In the hot noontide hours of midsummer the broad ranch veranda, always in the shade, is almost the only spot where a man can be comfortable; but here he can sit for hours at a time, leaning back in his rocking chair, as he reads or smokes, or with half-closed, dreamy eyes gazes across the shallow, nearly dry riverbed to the wooded bottoms opposite, and to the plateaus lying back of them. Against the sheer white faces of the cliffs, that come down without a break, the dark green tree-tops stand out in bold relief. In the hot, lifeless air all objects that are not near by seem to sway and waver. There are few sounds to break the stillness. From the upper branches of the cottonwood trees overhead whose shimmering tremulous leaves are hardly ever quiet, but if the wind stirs at all, rustle and quiver and sigh all day long, comes every now and then the soft, melancholy cooing of the mourning dove. whose voice always seems far away and expresses more than any other sound in nature the sadness of gentle, hopeless, never-ending grief. The other birds are still: and very few animals move about. Now and then the black shadow of a wheeling vulture falls on the sunscorched ground. The cattle, that have strung down in long files from the hills, lie quietly on the sand-bars, except that some of the bulls keep traveling up and down, bellowing and routing 1 or giving vent to long, surly grumblings as they paw the sand and toss it up with their horns. At times the horses, too, will come down to drink, and to splash and roll in the water.

In making a journey over ground we know. during the hot weather we often prefer to ride by moonlight. The moon shines very brightly through the dry, clear night air, turning the gray buttes into glimmering silver; and the horses travel far more readily and easily than under the glaring noonday sun. The road between my upper and lower ranch houses is about forty miles long, sometimes following the river-bed, and then again branching off inland. crossing the great plateaus and winding through the ravines of the broken country. It is a fivehours' fair ride; and so, in a hot spell, we like to take it during the cool of the night, starting at sunset. After nightfall the face of the country seems to alter marvelously, and the clear moonlight only intensifies the change. The river gleams like running quicksilver, and the moonbeams play over the grassy stretches of the plateaus and glance off the wind-rippled blades as they would from water. The Bad Lands 2 seem to be stranger and wilder than ever, the silvery rays turning the country into a kind of grim fairyland. The grotesque, fantastic outlines of the higher cliffs stand out with startling clearness, while the lower buttes have become formless, misshapen masses, and the deep gorges are in black shadow; in the darkness there will be no sound but the rhythmic echo of the hoof-beats of the horses, and the steady, metallic clank of the steel bridle-chains.

<sup>1</sup> lowing

&lt;sup>2</sup> a rocky, unfertile, gullied region running through the West, called by early French explorers les terres mauvaises

From Chapter XI THE BIG-HORN SHEEP

The day on which I was lucky enough to shoot my largest and finest ram was memorable in more ways than one. The shot was one of the best I ever made,—albeit the element of chance doubtless entered into it far more largely than the element of skill,—and on coming home from the hunt I got quite badly frozen.

The day before we had come back from a week's trip after deer; for we were laying in the winter stock of meat. We had been camped far down the river, and had intended to take two days on the return trip, as the wagon was rather heavily loaded, for we had killed eight The morning we broke camp was so mild that I did not put on my heaviest winter clothing, starting off in the same that I had worn during the past few days' still-hunting among the hills. Before we had been gone an hour, however, the sky grew overcast and the wind began to blow from the north with constantly increasing vigor. The sky grew steadily more gloomy and lowering, the gusts came ever harder and harder, and by noon the winter day had darkened and a furious gale was driving against us. The blasts almost swept me from my saddle and the teamster from his seat, while we were glad to wrap ourselves in our huge fur coats to keep out the growing cold. Soon after midday the wagon suddenly broke down while we were yet in mid-prairie. It was evident that we were on the eve of a furious snow-blizzard, which might last a few hours, or else, perhaps, as many days. We were miles from any shelter that would permit us to light a fire in the face of such a storm; so we left the wagon as it was, hastily unharnessed the team horses, and, with the driver riding one and leading the other, struck off homeward at a steady gallop. Once fairly caught by the blizzard in a country that we only partly knew, it would have been hopeless to do more than to try for some ravine in which to cower till it was over; so we pushed our horses to their utmost pace. Our object was to reach the head coulées of a creek leading down to the river but a few miles from the ranch. Could we get into these before the snow struck us we felt we would be all right, for we could then find our way home, even in pitch-darkness, with the wind in the quarter from which it was coming. So, with the storm on our backs, we rode at full speed through the gathering gloom, across the desolate reaches of

The tough little horses, instead of faltering, went stronger mile by mile. At last the weird rows of hills loomed vaguely up in our front, and we plunged into the deep ravines for which we had been heading just as the whirling white wreaths struck us-not the soft. feathery flakes of a sea-board snow-storm, but fine ice-dust, driven level by the wind, choking us, blinding our eyes, and cutting our face if we turned toward it. The roar of the blizzard drowned our voices when we were but six feet apart; had it not been on our backs we could not have gone a hundred yards, for we could no more face it than we could face a frozen sand-blast. In an instant the strange, wild outlines of the high buttes between which we were riding were shrouded from our sight. We had to grope our way through a kind of shimmering dusk; and when once or twice we were obliged by some impassable cliff or cañon to retrace our steps, it was all that we could do to urge the horses even a few paces against the wind-blown snow-grains which stung like steel filings. But this extreme violence only lasted about four hours. The moon was full, and its beams struggled through scudding clouds and snow-drift, so that we reached the ranch without difficulty, and when we got there the wind had already begun to lull. The snow still fell thick and fast; but before we went to bed this also showed signs of stopping. Accordingly we determined that we would leave the wagon where it was for a day or two, and start early next morning for a range of high hills some ten miles off, much haunted by sheep; for we did not wish to let pass the chance of tracking the game offered by the first good snow of the season.

Next morning we started by starlight. The snow lay several inches deep on the ground; the whole land was a dazzling white. It was very cold. Within the ranch everything was frozen solid in spite of the thick log walls; but the air was so still and clear that we did not realize how low the temperature was. Accordingly, as the fresh horse I had to take was young and wild, I did not attempt to wear my fur coat. I soon felt my mistake. The windless cold ate into my marrow; and when, shortly after the cloudless winter sunrise, we reached our hunting-grounds and picketed out the horses, I was already slightly frost-bitten. But the toil of hunting over the snow-covered crags soon made me warm.

All day we walked and climbed through a white wonderland. On every side the snowy hills, piled one on another, stretched away, chain after chain, as far as sight could reach. The stern and iron-bound land had been changed to a frozen sea of billowy, glittering peaks and ridges. At last, late in the afternoon. three great big-horn suddenly sprang up to our right and crossed the table-land in front of and below us at a strong, stretching gallop. The lengthening sunbeams glinted on their mighty horns; their great supple brown bodies were thrown out in bold relief against the white landscape: as they plowed with long strides through the powdery snow, their hoofs tossed it up in masses of white spray. On the left of the plateau was a ridge, and as they went up this I twice fired at the leading ram, my bullets striking under him. On the summit he stopped and stood for a moment looking back, three hundred and fifty yards off, 1 and my third shot went fairly through his lungs. He ran over the hill as if unharmed, but lay down a couple of hundred yards on, and was dead when we reached him.

It was after nightfall when we got back to the horses, and we rode home by moonlight. To gallop in such weather insures freezing: so the ponies shambled along at a single-foot trot, their dark bodies white with hoar-frost, and the long icicles hanging from their lips. The cold had increased steadily: the spirit thermometer at the ranch showed 26° Fahrenheit below zero. We had worked all day without food or rest, and were very tired. On the ride home I got benumbed before I knew it and froze my face, one foot, and both knees. Even my companion, who had a great-coat, froze his nose and cheeks. Never was a sight more welcome than the gleam of the fire-lit ranch windows to us that night. But the great ram's head was a trophy that paid for all.

1888

HENRY JAMES 1843-1916

Henry James, who was born in New York and died in London, was a cosmopolitan almost from childhood. His father was a well-known theological writer. The two sons, Henry, the novelist, and William, the famous psychologist, were fortunate in receiving a broad education through tutors. They shared in the best intellectual life of Boston and New York, and had the further advantage of long periods of residence and study in Europe. In 1860 Henry began to study law at Harvard, but he soon found literature to be his bent. After a few years he lived chiefly abroad, where he made the acquaintance of many celebrities in European literature and found an atmosphere stimulating to his literary work. He settled at length in England and, sympathizing greatly with the English cause in the World War, became a naturalized British citizen. Shortly before his death, which was hastened by his philanthropic activities, he was given the Order of Merit.

Tames's books belong to two centuries. In their leisurely atmosphere his novels are reminiscent of the mid-Victorian: in their method, that of strict realism.—full of detail and of the analytical development of complex characters—they are of today. The greatest fault in Tames's style is involved sentence structure. Nevertheless, his work is full of wit, and of the wisdom of an incisive critic of society at large. His novels are very numerous; among them are The American, 1877, Daisy Miller, 1879, The Portrait of a Lady, 1881, The Wings of a Dove, 1902, The Ambassadors, 1903, The Golden Bowl. 1904. He also wrote stories, short and long, plays, and critical essays. His characters are typically people of his own social group who have the leisure, the intellect, and the disposition to make of living a fine art. The prefaces to his various novels are of value for their discussion of his own work and methods.

Autobiographical: A Small Boy and Others, 1913; Notes of a Son and Brother, 1914; The Middle Years, 1917; Letters of Henry James, 2 vols., 1920.

Biography: P. Edgar, Henry James, 1927; Rebecca West, Henry James, 1916.

Criticism: Introduction to Collected Novels and Tales, 26 vols., 1907-1917; Macy; Van Doren (AN); Phelps (EN); Follett (SMN), also Atlan. 117:801-11; Brownell; Elton; Sherman; Bradford, E. L. Cary, The Novels of Henry James, 1905; F. M. Ford, Henry James: a Critical Study, 1915; J. W. Beach, The Methods of Henry James, 1918; V. W. Brooks, "Henry James: the First Phase," Dial 74: 433-50; R. Herrick, "A Visit to Henry James," Vale R. ns 12:724-41; W. Randell, "The Art of Mr. Henry James," Fortn. 105:620-32; same, Liv. Age 290:281-90; W. de la Mare, "Henry James," Liv. Age 290:225; J. Conrad, "Henry James: An Appreciation," No. Am. 203:585-91; W. D. Howells, "Mr. Henry James's Later Work," No. Am. 203:572-84; E. Wyatt, "Henry James: an Impression," No. Am. 203: 592-9; T. Bosanquet, "Henry James," Fortn. 107:995-1009; same, Bookm. 45:571-81; same, Liv. Age 294:346-57.

MISS GUNTON OF POUGHKEEPSIE 2

"It's astonishing what you take for granted!"
Lady Champer had exclaimed to her young friend at an early stage; and this might have served as a sign that even then the little plot had begun to thicken. The reflection was uttered at the time the outlook of the charming American girl in whom she found herself so interested was still much in the rough. They had often met, with pleasure to each, during a winter spent in Rome: and Lilv had come to her in London toward the end of May with further news of a situation the dawn of which, in March and April, by the Tiber, the Arno, and the Seine, had considerably engaged her attention. The Prince had followed Miss Gunton to Florence and then with almost equal promptitude to Paris, where it was both clear and comical for Lady Champer that the rigor of his uncertainty as to parental commands and remittances now detained him. This shrewd woman promised herself not a little amusement from her view of the possibilities of the case. Lily was on the whole showing a wonder; therefore the drama would lose nothing from her character, her temper, her tone. She was waiting—this was the truth she had imparted to her clever protectress -to see if her Roman captive would find himself drawn to London. Should he really turn up there she would the next thing start for America, putting him to the test of that wider range and declining to place her confidence till he should have arrived in New York at her heels. If he remained in Paris or returned to Rome she would stay in London and, as she phrased it, have a good time by herself. Did he expect her to go back to Paris for him? Why not in that case just as well go back to Rome at once? The first thing for her, Lily intimated to her London adviser, was to show what, in her position, she expected.

&lt;sup>1</sup> actual pacing, not guesswork [Roosevelt's note]

&lt;sup>2</sup> From The Soft Side by Henry James, by permission of The Macmillan Company, publishers.

Her position meanwhile was one that Lady Champer, try as she would, had as yet succeeded neither in understanding nor in resigning herself not to understand. It was that of being extraordinarily pretty, amazingly free, and perplexingly good, and of presenting these advantages in a positively golden light. How was one to estimate a girl whose nearest approach to a drawback—that is to an incumbrance—appeared to be a grandfather carrying on business in an American city her ladyship had never otherwise heard of, with whom communication was all by cable and on the subject of "drawing"? Expression was on the old man's part moreover as concise as it was expensive, consisting as it inveterately did of but the single word "Draw." Lily drew, on every occasion in life, and it at least could not be said of the pair —when the "family idea," as embodied in America, was exposed to criticism—that they were not in touch. Mr. Gunton had given her further Mrs. Brine, to come out with her, and with this provision and the perpetual pecuniary he plainly figured—to Lily's own mind—as solicitous to the point of anxiety. Mrs. Brine's scheme of relations seemed in truth to be sim-There was a transatlantic "Mr. Brine." of whom she often spoke—and never in any other way; but she wrote for newspapers; she prowled in catacombs, visiting more than once even those of Paris; she haunted hotels; she picked up compatriots; she spoke above all a language that often baffled comprehension. She mattered, however, but little: she was mainly so occupied in having what Lily had likewise independently glanced at-a good time by herself. It was difficult enough indeed to Lady Champer to see the wonderful girl reduced to that, yet she was a little person who kept one somehow in presence of the incalculable. Old measures and familiar rules were of no use at all with her-she had so broken the molds and so mixed the marks. What was commanding was her disparities—the juxtaposition in her of beautiful sunflushed heights and deep dark holes. She had none of the things that the other things implied. She dangled in the air in a manner that made one dizzy: though one took comfort, at the worst, in feeling that one was there to catch her if she fell. Falling, at the same time, appeared scarce one of her properties, and it was positive for Lady Champer at moments that if one held out one's arms one might be, after all, much more likely to be pulled up. That was really a part of the excitement of the acquaintance.

"Well," said this friend and critic on one of the first of the London days, "say he does, on your return to your own country, go after you: how do you read, on that occurrence, the course of events?"

"Why, if he comes after me I'll have him."

"And do you think it so easy to 'have' him?"
Lily appeared, lovely and candid,—and it was an air and a way she often had,—to wonder what she thought. "I don't know that I think it any easier than he seems to think it to have me. I know moreover that, though he wants awfully to see the country, he wouldn't just now come to America unless to marry me; and if I take him at all," she pursued, "I want first to be able to show him to the girls."

"Why 'first'?" Lady Champer asked. "Wouldn't it do as well last?"

"Oh, I should want them to see me in Rome, too," said Lily. "But, dear me, I'm afraid I want a good many things! What I most want of course is that he should show me unmistakably what he wants. Unless he wants me more than anything else in the world, I don't want him. Besides, I hope he doesn't think I'm going to be married anywhere but in my own place."

"I see," said Lady Champer. "It's for your wedding you want the girls. And it's for the girls you want the Prince."

"Well, we're all bound by that promise. And of course you'll come!"

"Ah, my dear child-!" Lady Champer

"You can come with the old Princess. You'll be just the right company for her."

The elder friend considered afresh, with depth, the younger's beauty and serenity. "You are, love, beyond everything!"

The beauty and serenity took on for a moment a graver cast. "Why do you so often say that to me?"

"Because you so often make it the only thing to say. But you'll some day find out why," Lady Champer added with an intention of encouragement.

Lily Gunton, however, was a young person to whom encouragement looked queer; she had grown up without need of it, and it seemed indeed scarce required in her situation. "Do you mean you believe his mother won't come?"

"Over mountains and seas to see you married?—and to be seen also of the girls? If she does, I will. But we had perhaps better," Lady Champer wound up, "not count our chickens before they're hatched." To which, with one of the easy returns of gaiety that were irresistible in her, Lily made answer that neither of the ladies in question struck her quite as chickens.

The Prince at all events presented himself in London with a promptitude that contributed to make the warning gratuitous. Nothing could have exceeded, by this time, Lady Champer's appreciation of her young friend, whose merits "town" at the beginning of June 1 threw into renewed relief; but she had the imagination of greatness, and, though she believed she tactfully kept it to herself, she thought what the young man had thus done a great deal for a Roman prince to do. Take him as he was, with the circumstances—and they were certainly peculiar, and he was charming—it was a far cry for him from Piazza Colonna to Clarges Street. If Lady Champer had the imagination of greatness, which the Prince in all sorts of ways gratified. Miss Gunton of Poughkeepsie-it was vain to pretend the contrary—was not great in any particular save one. She was great when she "drew." It was true that at the beginning of Tune she did draw with unprecedented energy and in a manner that, though Mrs. Brine's remarkable nerve apparently could stand it, fairly made a poor baronet's widow, little as it was her business, hold her breath. It was none of her business at all, yet she talked of it even with the Prince himself-to whom it was indeed a favorite subject and whose greatness, oddly enough, never appeared to shrink in the effect it produced upon him. The line they took together was that of wondering if the scale of Lily's drafts made really most for the presumption that the capital at her disposal was rapidly dwindling, or for that of its being practically infinite. "Many a fellow," the young man smiled, "would marry her to pull her up." He was in any case of the opinion that it was an occasion for deciding—one way or the other -quickly. Well, he did decide—so quickly that, within the week. Lily communicated to her friend that he had offered her his hand, his heart, his fortune, and all his titles, grandeurs, and appurtenances. She had given him his answer, and he was in bliss; though nothing, as vet, was settled but that.

Tall, fair, active, educated, amiable, simple. carrying so naturally his great name and pronouncing so kindly Lilv's small one, the happy youth, if he was one of the most ancient of princes, was one of the most modern of Romans. This second character it was his special aim and pride to cultivate. He would have been pained at feeling himself an hour behind his age; and he had a way-both touching and amusing to some observers—of constantly comparing his watch with the dial of the day's news. It was in fact easy to see that in deciding to ally himself with a young alien of vague origin, whose striking beauty was reinforced only by her presumptive money, he had even put forward a little the fine hands of his timepiece. No one else, however,—not even Lady Champer, and least of all Lily herself,-had quite taken the measure, in this connection, of his merit. The quick decision he had spoken of was really a flying leap. He desired incontestably to rescue Miss Gunton's remainder; but to rescue it he had to take it for granted, and taking it for granted was nothing less thanat whatever angle considered—a risk. He never, naturally, used the word to her, but he distinctly faced a peril. The sense of what he had staked on a vague return gave him, at the height of the London season, bad nights, or rather bad mornings—for he danced with his intended, as a usual thing, till dawn—besides obliging him to take, in the form of long, explanatory, argumentative, and persuasive letters to his mother and sisters, his uncles, aunts, cousins, and preferred confidants, large measures of justification at home. The family sense that is, at the height of the fashionable London "season" from May to July was strong in his huge old house, just as the family array was numerous; he was dutifully conscious of the trust reposed in him, and moved from morning till night, he knew perfectly, as the observed of a phalanx of observers; whereby he the more admired himself for his passion, precipitation, and courage. He had only a probability to go upon, but he was—and by the romantic tradition of his race—so in love that he should surely not be taken in.

His private agitation of course deepened when, to do honor to her engagement and as if she would have been ashamed to do less. Lily "drew" again most gloriously: but he managed to smile beautifully on her asking him if he didn't want her to be splendid, and at his worst hours he went no further than to wish that he might be married on the morrow. Unless it were the next day, or at most the next month, it really at moments seemed best that it should never be at all. On the most favorable viewwith the solidity of the residuum 1 fully assumed-there were still minor questions and dangers. A vast America, arching over his nuptials, bristling with expectant bridesmaids and underlaying their feet with expensive flowers, stared him in the face and prompted him to the reflection that if she dipped so deep into the mere remote overflow her dive into the fount itself would verily be a header. If she drew at such a rate in London how wouldn't she draw at Poughkeepsie? he asked himself, and practically asked Lady Champer; yet bore the strain of the question, without an answer, so nobly that when, with small delay, Poughkeepsie seemed simply to heave with reassurances, he regarded the ground as firm and his tact as rewarded. "And now at last, dearest," he said, "since everything's so satisfactory, you will write?" He put it appealingly, endearingly, yet as if he could scarce doubt.

"Write, love? Why," she replied, "I've done nothing but write! I've written ninety letters." "But not to mamma," he smiled.

"Mamma?"—she stared. "My dear boy, I've not at this time of day to remind you that I've the misfortune to have no mother. I lost mamma, you know, as you lost your father, in childhood. You may be sure," said Lily Gunton, "that I wouldn't otherwise have waited for you to prompt me."

There came into his face a kind of amiable convulsion. "Of course, darling, I remember—your beautiful mother (she must have been beautiful!) whom I should have been so glad to know. I was thinking of my mamma—who'll be so delighted to hear from you." The Prince spoke English in perfection—had lived in it from the cradle and appeared, particularly when alluding to his home and family, to matters familiar and of fact, or to those of dress and sport, of general recreation, to draw such a comfort from it as made the girl think of him as scarce more a foreigner than a pleasant, auburn, slightly awkward, slightly slangy, and extremely well-tailored young Briton would have been. He sounded "mamma" like a rosy English schoolboy; yet just then, for the first time. the things with which he was connected struck her as in a manner strange and far-off. Everything in him, none the less-face and voice and tact, above all his deep desire—labored to bring them near and make them natural. This was intensely the case as he went on: "Such a little letter as you might send would really be awfully jolly."

"My dear child," Lily replied on quick reflection, "I'll write to her with joy the minute I hear from her. Won't she write to me?"

The Prince just visibly flushed. "In a moment if you'll only—"

"Write to her first?"

"Just to pay her a little-no matter how little—your respects."

His attenuation of the degree showed perhaps a sense of a weakness of position; yet it was no perception of this that made the girl immediately say: "Oh, caro, 2 I don't think I can begin. If you feel that she won't—as you evidently do—is it because you've asked her and she has refused?" The next moment, "I see you have!" she exclaimed. His rejoinder to this was to catch her in his arms, to press his cheek to hers, to murmur a flood of tender words in which contradiction, confession, supplication, and remonstrance were oddly confounded; but after he had sufficiently disengaged her to allow her to speak again, his effusion was checked by what came. "Do you really mean you can't induce her?" It renewed itself on the first return of ease; or it, more correctly perhaps, in order to renew itself, took this return—a trifle too soon—for granted. Singular, for the hour, was the quickness with which ease could leave them—so blissfully at one as they were; and, to be brief, it had not come back even when Lily spoke of the matter to Lady Champer. It is true that she waited but little to do so. She then went straight to the point. "What would you do if his mother doesn't write?"

"The old Princess—to you?" Her ladyship had not had time to mount guard in advance over the tone of this, which was doubtless (as she instantly, for that matter, herself became aware) a little too much that of "Have you really expected she would?" What Lily expected found itself therefore not unassisted to come out-and came out indeed to such a tune that with all kindness, but with a melancholy deeper than any she had ever yet in the general connection used, Lady Champer was moved to remark that the situation might have been found more possible had a little more historic sense been brought to it. "You're the dearest thing in the world, and I can't imagine a girl's carrying herself in any way, in a difficult position, better than you do: only I'm bound to say I think you ought to remember that you're entering a very great house, of tremendous antiquity, fairly groaning under the weight of ancient honors, the heads of which-through the tradition of the great part they've played in the world—are accustomed to a great deal of deference. The old Princess, my dear, you see"—her ladyship gathered confidence a little as she went-"is a most prodigious personage."

"Why, Lady Champer, of course she is, and that's just what I like her for!" said Lily Gunton.

"She has never in her whole life made an advance, any more than any one has ever dreamed of expecting it of her. It's a pity that while you were there you didn't see her, for I think it would have helped you to understand. However, as you did see his sisters, the two Duchesses and dear little Donna Claudia, you know how charming they all can be. They only want to be nice, I know, and I dare say that on the smallest opportunity you'll hear from the Duchesses."

The plural had a sound of splendor, but Lily quite kept her head. "What do you call an opportunity? Am I not giving them, by accepting their son and brother, the best—and in fact the only—opportunity they could desire?"

"I like the way, darling," Lady Champer smiled, "you talk about 'accepting'!"

Lily thought of this—she thought of everything. "Well, say it would have been a better one still for them if I had refused him."

Her friend caught her up. "But you haven't."

"Then they must make the most of the occasion as it is." Lily was very sweet, but very lucid. "The Duchesses may write or not, as they like, but I'm afraid the Princess simply must." She hesitated, but after a moment went on. "He oughtn't to be willing moreover that I shouldn't expect to be welcomed."

"He isn't!" Lady Champer blurted out.

Lily jumped at it. "Then he has told you? It's her attitude?"

She had spoken without passion, but her friend was scarce the less frightened. "My poor child, what can he do?"

Lily saw perfectly. "He can make her."

Lady Champer turned it over, but her fears were what was clearest. "And if he doesn't?"

"If he 'doesn't'?" The girl ambiguously echoed it. I mean if he can't."

Well. Lilv. more cheerfully, declined, for the hour, to consider this. He would certainly do for her what was right: so that after all, though she had herself put the question, she disclaimed the idea that an answer was urgent. There was time, she conveyed—which Lady Champer only desired to believe: a faith moreover somewhat shaken in the latter when the Prince entered her room the next day with the information that there was none—none at least to leave everything in the air. Lady Champer had not yet made up her mind as to which of these young persons she liked most to draw into confidence. nor as to whether she most inclined to take the Roman side with the American or the American side with the Roman. But now in truth she was settled; she gave proof of it in the increased lucidity with which she spoke for Lily.

"Wouldn't the Princess depart—a—from her usual attitude for such a great occasion?"

The difficulty was a little that the young man so well understood his mother. "The devil of it is, you see, that it's for Lily herself, so much more, she thinks the occasion great."

Lady Champer mused. "If you hadn't her consent I could understand it. But from the moment she thinks the girl good enough for you to marry-"

"Ah, she doesn't!" the Prince gloomily interposed. "However," he explained, "she accepts her because there are reasons—my own feeling, now so my very life, don't you see? But it isn't quite open arms. All the same, as I tell Lily, the arms would open."

"If she'd make the first step? Hum!" said Lady Champer, not without the note of grim-ness. "She'll be obstinate."

The young man, with a melancholy eye, quite coincided. "She'll be obstinate."

"So that I strongly recommend you to manage it," his friend went on after a pause. "It strikes me that if the Princess can't do it for Lily she might at least do it for you. Any girl you marry becomes thereby somebody."

"Of course—doesn't she? She certainly ought to do it for me. I'm after all the head of the house."

"Well, then, make her!" said Lady Champer a little impatiently.

"I will. Mamma adores me, and I adore her."

"And you adore Lily, and Lily adores you—therefore everybody adores everybody, especially as I adore you both. With so much adoration all round, therefore, things ought to march."

"They shall!" the young man declared with spirit. "I adore you, too—you don't mention that; for you help me immensely. But what do you suppose she'll do if she doesn't?"

The agitation already visible in him ministered a little to vagueness; but his friend after an instant disembroiled it. "What do I suppose Lily will do if your mother remains stiff?" Lady Champer faltered, but she let him have it. "She'll break."

His wondering eyes became strange. "Just for that?"

"You may certainly say it isn't much—when people love as you do."

"Ah, I'm afraid then Lily doesn't!"-and he turned away in his trouble.

She watched him while he moved, not speaking for a minute. "My dear young man, are you afraid of your mamma?"

He faced short about again. "I'm afraid of this—that if she does do it she won't forgive her. She will do it—yes. But Lily will be for her, in consequence, ever after, the person who has made her submit herself. She'll hate her for that—and then she'll hate me for being concerned in it." The Prince presented it all with clearness—almost with charm. "What do you say to that?"

His friend had to think. "Well, only, I fear, that we belong, Lily and I, to a race unaccustomed to counting with such passions. Let her hate!" she, however, a trifle inconsistently wound up.

"But I love her so!"

"Which?" Lady Champer asked it almost ungraciously; in such a tone at any rate that, seated on the sofa with his elbows on his knees, his much-ringed hands nervously locked together and his eyes of distress wide open, he met her with visible surprise. What she met him with is perhaps best noted by the fact that after a minute his hands covered his bent face and she became aware that she had drawn tears. This produced such regret in her that before they parted she did what she could to attenuate and explain—making a great point, at all events, of her rule, with Lily, of putting only his own side of the case. "I insist awfully, you know, on your greatness!"

He jumped up, wincing. "Oh, that's horrid."

"I don't know. Whose fault is it, then, at any rate, if trying to help you may have that side?" This was a question that, with the tangle he had already to unwind, only added a twist; yet she went on as if positively to add another. "Why on earth don't you, all of you, leave them alone?"

"Leave them-?"

"All your Americans."

"Don't you like them then—the women?"

She hesitated. "No. Yes. They're an interest. But they're a nuisance. It's a question, very certainly, if they're worth the trouble they give."

This at least it seemed he could take in. "You mean that one should be quite sure first what they are worth?"

He made her laugh now. "It would appear that you never can be. But also really that you can't keep your hands off."

He fixed the social scene an instant with his heavy eye. "Yes. Doesn't it?"

"However," she pursued as if he again a little irritated her. Lily's position is quite simple."

"Quite. She just loves me."

"I mean simple for herself. She really makes no differences. It's only we—you and I—who make them all."

The Prince wondered. "But she tells me she delights in us; has, that is, such a sense of what we are supposed to 'represent.'"

"Oh, she thinks she has. Americans think they have all sorts of things; but they haven't. That's just it"-Lady Champer was philosophic. "Nothing but their Americanism. If you marry anything, you marry that; and if your mother accepts anything that's what she accepts." Then, though the young man followed the demonstration with an apprehension almost pathetic, she gave him without mercy the whole of it. "Lily's rigidly logical. A girl -as she knows girls-is 'welcomed,' on her engagement, before anything else can happen, by the family of her young man; and the motherless girl, alone in the world, more punctually than any other. His mother—if she's a 'lady' takes it upon herself. Then the girl goes and stays with them. But she does nothing before. Tirez-vous de là." 1

The young man sought on the spot to obey this last injunction, and his effort presently produced a flash. "Oh, if she'll come and stay with us—all would, easily, be well!" The flash went out, however, when Lady Champer returned: "Then let the Princess invite her."

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;Make what you can of that."

Lily a fortnight later simply said to her. from one hour to the other, "I'm going home." and took her breath away by sailing on the morrow with the Bransbys. The tense cord had somehow snapped; the proof was in the fact that the Prince, dashing off to his good friend at this crisis an obscure, an ambiguous note, started the same night for Rome. Ladv Champer, for the time, sat in darkness, but during the summer many things occurred; and one day in the autumn, quite unheralded and with the signs of some of them in his face. the Prince appeared again before her. He was not long in telling her his story, which was simply that he had come to her, all the way from Rome, for news of Lily and to talk of Lily. She was prepared, as it happened, to meet his impatience; yet her preparation was but little older than his arrival and was deficient moreover in an important particular. She was not prepared to knock him down, and she made him talk to gain time. She had, however, to understand, put a primary question: "She never wrote, then?"

"Mamma? Oh, yes—when she at last got frightened at Miss Gunton's having become so silent. She wrote in August; but Lily's own decisive letter—letter to me, I mean—crossed with it. It was too late—that put an end."

"A real end?"

Everything in the young man showed how real. "On the ground of her being willing no longer to keep up, by the stand she had taken, such a relation between mamma and me. But her rupture," he wailed, "keeps it up more than anything else."

"And is it very bad?"

"Awful, I assure you. I've become for my mother a person who has made her make, all for nothing, an unprecedented advance, a humble submission; and she's so disgusted, all round, that it's no longer the same old charming thing for us to be together. It makes it worse for her that I'm still madly in love."

"Well," said Lady Champer after a moment, if you're still madly in love I can only be sorry for you."

"You can do nothing for me?—don't advise me to go over?"

She had to take a longer pause. "You don't at all know then what has happened?—that old Mr. Gunton has died and left her everything?"

All his vacancy and curiosity came out in a wild echo. "Everything?"

"She writes me that it's a great deal of money."

"You've just heard from her, then?"

"This morning. I seem to make out," said Lady Champer, an extraordinary number of dollars."

"Oh, I was sure it was!" the young man

"And she's engaged," his friend went on, "to Mr. Bransby."

He bounded, rising before her. "Mr. Bransby?"

"'Adam P.'—the gentleman with whose mother and sisters she went home. They, she writes, have beautifully welcomed her."

"Dio mio!" 1 The Prince stared; he had flushed with the blow, and the tears had come into his eyes. "And I believed she loved me!"

"I didn't!" said Lady Champer with some

He gazed about; he almost rocked; and unconscious of her words, he appealed, inarticulate and stricken. At last, however, he found his voice. "What on earth then shall I do? I can less than ever go back to mamma!"

She got up for him, and thought for him, pushing a better chair into her circle. "Stay here with me, and I'll ring for tea. Sit there nearer the fire—you're cold."

"Awfully!" he confessed as he sank. "And I believed she loved me," he repeated as he stared at the fire.

"I didn't!" Lady Champer once more declared. This time, visibly, he heard her, and she immediately met his wonder. "No—it was all the rest; your great historic position, the glamour of your name, and your past. Otherwise what she stood out for wouldn't be excusable. But she has the sense of such things, and they were what she loved." So, by the fire, his hostess explained it, while he wondered the more.

"I thought that last summer you told me just the contrary."

It seemed, to do her justice, to strike her. "Did I? Oh, well, how does one know? With Americans one is lost!"

1900

EDITH WHARTON 1862-

Mrs. Wharton is probably the most distinguished among American women novelists. Much in her life and work reminds one of Henry James. In her youth she received every advantage in the way of social surroundings and educational advantages both in this country and Europe; and the atmosphere of most of her novels resembles that of James's, for in all of her books except one, her characters are persons of leisure and refinement whose lives are spent chiefly in society distinguished for its good breeding. In her most distinguished story, Ethan Frome, 1911, she departed from this stratum of society. In it a farmer, his "help," and his wife work out the tragedy of their lives with a relentlessness not equaled by Miss Jewett or Miss Wilkins. Her interest, like that of James's, lies in the analysis of motives. Outstanding among her works, besides Ethan Frome, are The Valley of Decision, 1902; The House of Mirth, 1907; The Age of Innocence, 1920, both of the latter two laid in New York; and The Glimpses of the Moon, 1902

<sup>1</sup> Good Heavens!

Biography and criticism: R. M. Lovett, Edith Wharton, 1925; Phelps (EN); Van Doren (CAN); Cooper; Boynton; Follett (SMN); E. Bjorkman, in Voices of Tomorrow, 1913; H. D. Sedgwick, in The New American Type, 1908; Underwood; C. K. Trueblood, "Edith Wharton," Dial 68:80-91; H. D. Sedgwick, "The Novels of Mrs. Wharton," Atlan. 98:217-28; F. Hackett, "Mrs. Wharton's Art," New Repub. 10:50-2; R. Herrick, "Mrs. Wharton's World," New Repub. 2:40-2; Liv. Age 284:604-16; "Edith Wharton: Two Conflicting Estimates of her Art," Cur. Opinion 58:272.

THE VERDICT 1

I had always thought Jack Gisburn rather a cheap genius—though a good fellow enough—so it was no great surprise to me to hear that, in the height of his glory, he had dropped his painting, married a rich widow, and established himself in a villa on the Riviera. (Though I rather thought it would have been Rome or Florence.)

"The height of his glory"—that was what the women called it. I can hear Mrs. Gideon Thwing—his last Chicago sitter—deploring his unaccountable abdication. "Of course it's going to send the value of my picture 'way up; but I don't think of that, Mr. Rickham—the loss to Arrt is all I think of." The word, on Mrs. Thwing's lips, multiplied its r's as though they were reflected in an endless vista of mirrors. And it was not only the Mrs. Thwings who mourned. Had not the exquisite Hermia Croft, at the last Grafton Gallery show, stopped me before Gisburn's "Moon-dancers" to say, with tears in her eyes: "We shall not look upon its like again"?

Well!—even through the prism of Hermia's tears I felt able to face the fact with equanimity. Poor Jack Gisburn! The women had made him—it was fitting that they should mourn him. Among his own sex fewer regrets were heard, and in his own trade hardly a murmur. Professional jealousy? Perhaps. If it were, the honor of the craft was vindicated by little Claude Nutley, who, in all good faith, brought out in the Burlington <sup>2</sup> a very handsome "obituary" on Jack—one of those showy articles stocked with random technicalities that I have heard (I won't say by whom) compared to Gisburn's painting. And so—his resolve being apparently irrevocable—the discussion gradually died out, and, as Mrs. Thwing had predicted, the price of "Gisburns" went up.

It was not till three years later that, in the course of a few weeks' idling on the Riviera, it suddenly occurred to me to wonder why Gisburn had given up his painting. On reflection, it really was a tempting problem. To accuse his wife would have been too easy—his fair sitters had been denied the solace of saying that Mrs. Gisburn had "dragged him down." For Mrs. Gisburn—as such—had not existed till nearly a year after Jack's resolve had been taken. It might be that he had married her—since he liked his ease—because he didn't want to go on painting; but it would have been hard to prove that he had given up his painting because he had married her.

Of course, if she had not dragged him down, she had equally, as Miss Croft contended, failed to "lift him up"—she had not led him back to the easel. To put the brush into his hand again—what a vocation for a wife! But Mrs. Gisburn appeared to have disdained it—and I felt it might be interesting to find out why.

The desultory life of the Riviera lends itself to such purely academic speculations; and having, on my way to Monte Carlo, caught a glimpse of Jack's balustraded terraces between the pines, I had myself borne thither the next day.

I found the couple at tea beneath their palmtrees; and Mrs. Gisburn's welcome was so genial that, in the ensuing weeks, I claimed it frequently. It was not that my hostess was "interesting": on that point I could have given Miss Croft the fullest reassurance. It was just because she was not interesting—if I may be pardoned the bull—that I found her so. For Jack, all his life, had been surrounded by interesting women; they had fostered his art, it had been reared in the hothouse of their adulation. And it was therefore instructive to note what effect the "deadening atmosphere of mediocrity" (I quote Miss Croft) was having on him.

I have mentioned that Mrs. Gisburn was rich; and it was immediately perceptible that her husband was extracting from this circumstance a delicate but substantial satisfaction.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Copyright, 1908, by Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers.

&lt;sup>2</sup> a magazine devoted to art

It is, as a rule, the people who scorn money who get most out of it; and Tack's elegant disdain of his wife's big balance enabled him, with an appearance of perfect good-breeding, to transmute it into objects of art and luxury. To the latter, I must add, he remained relatively indifferent: but he was buying Renaissance 1 bronzes and eighteenth-century pictures with a discrimination that bespoke the amplest resources

"Money's only excuse is to put beauty into circulation." was one of the axioms he laid down across the Sèvres 2 and silver of an exquisitely appointed luncheon-table, when, on a later day, I had again run over from Monte Carlo: and Mrs. Gisburn, beaming on him, added for my enlightenment: "Jack is so morbidly sensitive to every form of beauty."

Poor Jack! It had always been his fate to have women say such things of him: the fact should be set down in extenuation. What struck me now was that, for the first time, he resented the tone. I had seen him, so often, basking under similar tributes—was it the conjugal note that robbed them of their savor? No —for, oddly enough, it became apparent that he was fond of Mrs. Gisburn-fond enough not to see her absurdity. It was his own absurdity he seemed to be wincing under-his own attitude as an object for garlands and incense.

"My dear, since I've chucked painting people don't say that stuff about me—they say it about Victor Grindle," was his only protest, as he rose from the table and strolled out onto the sunlit terrace.

I glanced after him, struck by his last word. Victor Grindle was, in fact, becoming the man of the moment-as Jack himself, one might put it, had been the man of the hour. The younger artist was said to have formed himself at my friend's feet, and I wondered if a tinge of jealousy underlay the latter's mysterious abdication. But no-for it was not till after that event that the fashionable drawing-rooms had begun to display their "Grindles."

I turned to Mrs. Gisburn, who had lingered to give a lump of sugar to her spaniel in the dining-room.

"Why has he chucked painting?" I asked abruptly.

She raised her eyebrows with a hint of goodhumored surprise.

"Oh, he doesn't have to now, you know; and I want him to enjoy himself," she said quite simply.

I looked about the spacious white-paneled room, with its famille-verte3 vases, repeating the tones of the pale damask curtains, and its eighteenth-century pastels in delicate faded frames.

"Has he chucked his pictures, too? I haven't seen a single one in the house."

A slight look of constraint crossed Mrs. Gisburn's open countenance. "It's his ridiculous modesty, you know. He says they're not fit to have about; he's sent them all away except one-my portrait-and that I have to keep upstairs."

His ridiculous modesty—Tack's modesty about his pictures? My curiosity was growing like the bean-stalk. I said persuasively to my hostess: "I must really see your portrait, you know."

She glanced out almost timorously at the terrace where her husband, lounging in a hooded chair, had lit a cigar and drawn the Russian deer-hound's head between his knees.

"Well, come while he's not looking," she said, with a laugh that tried to hide her nervousness: and I followed her between the marble Emperors of the hall, and up the wide stairs with terra-cotta nymphs poised among flowers at each landing.

In the dimmest corner of her boudoir, amid a profusion of delicate and distinguished obiects, hung one of the familiar oval canvases. in the inevitable garlanded frame. The mere outline of the frame called up all Gisburn's past!

Mrs. Gisburn drew back the window-curtains, moved aside a jardiniere full of pink azaleas. pushed an armchair away, and said: "If you stand here you can just manage to see it. I had it over the mantelpiece, but he wouldn't let it stay."

Yes—I could just manage to see it—the first portrait of Tack's I had ever had to strain my Usually they had the place of eves over! honor-say the central panel in a pale yellow or rose Dubarry 4 drawing-room, or a monumental easel placed so that it took the light through curtains of old Venetian point. The more modest place became the picture better; yet, as my eyes grew accustomed to the halflight, all the characteristic qualities came outall the hesitations disguised as audacities, the trick of prestidigitation by which, with such consummate skill, he managed to divert attention from the real business of the picture to some pretty irrelevance of detail. Mrs. Gisburn, presenting a neutral surface to work onforming, as it were, so inevitably the background to her own picture-had lent herself in an unusual degree to the display of this false virtuosity. 1 The picture was one of Jack's "strongest," as his admirers would have put it -it represented, on his part, a swelling of muscles, a congesting of veins, a balancing, straddling and straining, that reminded one of the circus-clown's ironic efforts to lift a feather. It met, in short, at every point the demand of lovely woman to be painted "strongly" because she was tired of being painted "sweetly"—and vet not to lose an atom of the sweetness.

<sup>4</sup> a delicate pink-crimson color named in honor of Madame du Barry of the court of Louis XV

&lt;sup>1</sup> The Renaissance period produced ornate works of art. <sup>2</sup> porcelain made at Sèvres near Paris

<sup>3</sup> the name given to a type of the 18th century Chinese porcelain in which a vivid green glaze predominates

"It's the last he painted, you know," Mrs. Gisburn said with pardonable pride. "The last but one," she corrected herself—"but the other doesn't count, because he destroyed it."

other doesn't count, because he destroyed it."
"Destroyed it?" I was about to follow up this clue when I heard a footstep and saw Jack himself on the threshold.

As he stood there, his hands in the pockets of his velveteen coat, the thin brown waves of hair pushed back from his white forehead, his lean sunburnt cheeks furrowed by a smile that lifted the tips of a self-confident moustache, I felt to what a degree he had the same quality as his pictures—the quality of looking cleverer than he was.

His wife glanced at him deprecatingly, but his eyes traveled past her to the portrait.

"Mr. Rickham wanted to see it," she began as if excusing herself. He shrugged his shoulders, still smiling.

"Oh, Rickham found me out long ago," he said lightly; then passing his arm through mine: "Come and see the rest of the house."

He showed it to me with a kind of naïve suburban pride: the bathrooms, the speaking-tubes, the dress-closets, the trouser-presses—all the complex simplifications of the millionaire's domestic economy. And whenever my wonder paid the expected tribute he said, throwing out his chest a little: "Yes, I really don't see how people manage to live without that."

Well—it was just the end one might have foreseen for him. Only he was, through it all and in spite of it all—as he had been through, and in spite of, his pictures—so handsome, so charming, so disarming, that one longed to cry out: "Be dissatisfied with your leisure!" as once one had longed to say: "Be dissatisfied with your work!"

But, with the cry on my lips, my diagnosis suffered an unexpected check.

"This is my own lair," he said, leading me into a dark plain room at the end of a florid vista. It was square and brown and leathery: no "effects," no bric-a-brac, none of the air of posing for reproduction in a picture weekly—above all, no least sign of ever having been used as a studio

The fact brought home to me the absolute finality of Jack's break with his old life.

"Don't you ever dabble with paint any more?" I asked, still looking about for a trace of such activity.

"Never," he said briefly.
"Or water-color—or etching?"

His confident eyes grew vague, and his cheeks changed color a little under their handsome sunurn.

"Never think of it, my dear fellow—any more than if I'd never touched a brush."

And his tone told me in a flash that he never thought of anything else.

I moved away, instinctively embarrassed by my unexpected discovery; and as I turned, my eye fell on a small picture above the mantelpiece—the only object breaking the plain oak paneling of the room.

"Oh, by Jove!" I said.

It was a sketch of a donkey—an old tired donkey standing in the rain under a wall.

"By Tove-a Stroud!" I cried.

He was silent; but I felt him close behind me, breathing a little quickly.

"What a wonder! Made with a dozen lines—but on everlasting foundations. You lucky chap, where did you get it?"

He answered slowly: "Mrs. Stroud gave it to me."

. "Ah—I didn't know you even knew the Strouds. He was such a hermit."

"I didn't—till after . . . She sent for me to paint him when he was dead."

"When he was dead? You?"

I must have let a little too much amazement escape through my surprise, for he answered with a deprecating laugh: "Yes—she's an awful simpleton, you know, Mrs. Stroud. Her only idea was to have him done by a fashionable painter—ah, poor Stroud! She thought it the surest way of proclaiming his greatness—of forcing it on a purblind public. And at the moment I was the fashionable painter.

"Ah, poor Stroud—as you say. Was that his history?"

"That was his history. She believed in him, gloried in him—or thought she did. But she couldn't bear not to have all the drawing-rooms with her. She couldn't bear the fact that. on varnishing 1 days, one could always get near enough to see his pictures. Poor woman! she's just a fragment groping for other fragments. Stroud is the only whole I ever knew."

<sup>1</sup> skill of a master in any art

"You ever knew? But you just said-" Gisburn had a curious smile in his eves.

"Oh, I knew him, and he knew me-only it happened after he was dead."

I dropped my voice instinctively. "When she sent for you?"

"Yes—quite insensible to the irony. She wanted him vindicated-and by me!"

He laughed again, and threw back his head to look up at the sketch of the donkey. "There were days when I couldn't look at that thingcouldn't face it. But I forced myself to put it here; and now it's cured me—cured me. That's the reason why I don't dabble any more, my dear Rickham: or rather Stroud himself is the reason."

For the first time my idle curiosity about my companion turned into a serious desire to understand him better.

"I wish you'd tell me how it happened," I said.

He stood looking up at the sketch, and twirling between his fingers a cigarette he had forgotten to light. Suddenly he turned toward

"I'd rather like to tell you-because I've alwavs suspected you of loathing my work."

I made a deprecating gesture, which he negatived with a good-humored shrug.

"Oh, I didn't care a straw when I believed in myself-and now it's an added tie between us!"

He laughed slightly, without bitterness, and pushed one of the deep arm-chairs forward. "There: make yourself comfortable-and here are the cigars you like."

He placed them at my elbow and continued to wander up and down the room, stopping now and then beneath the picture.

"How it happened? I can tell you in five minutes-and it didn't take much longer to happen. . . . I can remember now how surprised and pleased I was when I got Mrs. Stroud's note. Of course, deep down, I had always felt there was no one like him-only I had gone with the stream, echoed the usual platitudes about him, till I half got to think he was a failure, one of the kind that are left behind. By Jove, and he was left behindbecause he had come to stay! The rest of us had to let ourselves be swept along or go under. but he was high above the current-on everlasting foundations, as you say,

"Well, I went off to the house in my most egregious mood-rather moved, Lord forgive me at the pathos of poor Stroud's career of failure being crowned by the glory of my painting him! Of course I meant to do the picture for nothing-I told Mrs. Stroud so when she began to stammer something about her poverty.

I remember getting off a prodigious phrase about the honor being mine-oh, I was princely, my dear Rickham! I was posing to myself like one of my own sitters.

"Then I was taken up and left alone with him. I had sent all my traps in advance, and I had only to set up the easel and get to work. He had been dead but twenty-four hours, and he died suddenly, of heart disease, so there had been no preliminary work of destruction-his face was clear and untouched. I had met him once or twice, years before, and thought him insignificant and dingy. Now I saw that he was

"I was glad at first, with a merely aesthetic satisfaction: glad to have my hand on such a 'subject.' Then his strange life-likeness began to affect me queerly—as I blocked the head in I felt as if he were watching me do it. The sensation was followed by the thought: if he were watching me, what would he say to my way of working? My strokes began to go a little wild—I felt nervous and uncertain.

"Once, when I looked up, I seemed to see a smile behind his close grayish beard—as if he had the secret, and were amusing himself by holding it back from me. That exasperated me still more. The secret? Why, I had a secret worth twenty of his! I dashed at the canvas furiously, and tried some of my bravura 2 tricks! But they failed me, they crumbled. I saw he wasn't watching the showy bits-I couldn't distract his attention; he just kept his eyes on the hard passages between. Those were the ones I had always shirked, or covered up with some lying paint. And how he saw through my lies!

"I looked up again, and caught sight of that sketch of the donkey hanging on the wall near his bed. His wife told me afterward it was the last thing he had done—just a note taken with a shaking hand, when he was down in Devonshire recovering from a previous heart attack. Just a note! But it tells his whole the day previous to the opening of an exhibition of paintings when the artists varnish or retouch their pictures, and critics are admitted history. There are years of patient scornful persistence in every line. A man who had swum with the current could never have learned that mighty up-stream stroke....

<sup>2</sup> showy

"I turned back to my work, and went on groping and muddling; then I looked at the donkey again. I saw that when Stroud laid in the first stroke he knew just what the end would be. He had possessed his subject, absorbed it, recreated it. When had I done that with any of my things? They hadn't been born of me—I had just adopted them....

"Hang it. Rickham, with that face watching me I couldn't do another stroke. The plain truth was, I didn't know where to put it— $\hat{I}$  had never known. Only, with my sitters and my public, a showy splash of color covered up the fact—I just threw the paint into their eyes. . . . Well, paint was one medium those dead eves could see through—see straight to the tottering foundations underneath. Don't you know how. in talking a foreign language, even fluently, one says half the time, not what one wants to, but what one can? Well-that was the way I painted; and as he lay there and watched me the thing they called my 'technique' collapsed like a house of cards. He didn't sneer; you understand, poor Stroud—he just lay there quietly watching, and on his lips, through the gray beard, I seemed to hear the question: 'Are you sure you know where you're coming out?'

"If I could have painted that face, with that question on it, I should have done a great thing. The next greatest thing was to see that I couldn't—and that grace was given me. But, oh, at that minute, Rickham, was there anything on earth I wouldn't have given to have Stroud alive before me, and to hear him say: 'It's not too late—I'll show you how'?

"It was too late-it would have been, even if he'd been alive. I packed up my traps and went down and told Mrs. Stroud. Of course I didn't tell her that—it would have been Greek to her. I simply said I couldn't paint him, that I was too moved. She rather liked the idea—she's so romantic! It was that that made her give me the donkey. But she was terribly upset at not getting the portraitshe did so want him 'done' by some one showy! At first I was afraid she wouldn't let me offand at my wits' end I suggested Grindle. Yes, it was I who started Grindle: I told Mrs. Stroud he was the 'coming' man, and she told somebody else, and so it got to be true. . . And he painted Stroud without wincing; and she hung the picture among her husband's things. . . ."

He flung himself down in the arm-chair near mine, laid back his head, and clasping his arms beneath it, looked up at the picture above the chimney-piece.

"I like to fancy that Stroud himself would have given it to me, if he'd been able to say what he thought that day."

And, in answer to a question I put half-mechanically—"Begin again?" he flashed out. "When the one thing that brings me anywhere near him is that I knew enough to leave off?"

He stood up and laid his hand on my shoulder with a laugh. "Only the irony of it is that I am still painting—since Grindle's doing it for me! The Strouds stand alone, and happen once—but there's no exterminating our kind of art"

1908

MARY E. WILKINS FREEMAN 1862-

New England of the countryside in the sixth and seventh generations from the original planting, a region of small farms of decreasing fertility, and of gossiping villages; New England in decline, with its decaying families, unceasing toil, fixed habits, and all but conventionalized morality-this is the field of Mrs. Freeman. Family tradition and youthful experience bore their part in fitting Mrs. Freeman for her work, for, like Hawthorne, she had as one of her ancestors a member of the Salem witchcraft court and her youth was spent in Massachusetts and Vermont. She was educated at Mt. Holyoke Seminary. She became secretary to William Dean Howells, and early in her twenties was a contributor to St. Nicholas and The Youth's Companion. A Humble Romance and Other Stories, 1887, brought her prominently into notice, and A New England Nun, 1891, still further raised her reputa-

Although the sentiment of Mrs. Freeman's stories is sometimes romantic, her method is that of realism. Her characters are generally humble people bent with labor and sometimes distorted in spirit by the weight of a hidden burden often stubbornly self-imposed. They represent the stagnant waters of the vital tide of Puritanism that swept on into deeper channels.

Criticism: C. M. Thompson, "Miss Wilkins: an Idealist in Masquerade," Atlan. 83:665-75; M. Moss, "Some Representative American Storytellers: Mary E. Wilkins," Bookm. 24:20-9, both very helpful articles.

IN BUTTERFLY TIME 1

"Seems to me the butterflies is dretful thick this season, Becca."

<sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Harper and Brothers, publishers.

"Yes, they do seem to be consider'ble thick, mother."

"I never see 'em so thick. Thar's hull swarms on 'em; lots of them common yaller ones, an' leetle rusty red ones; an' thar's some of them big spotted ones, ain't thar? Near's I kin see through my specs, thar's one now a-settin' on that head of clover."

"Yes, there is one, mother."

"Thar's lots of grasshoppers too. The grasshoppers air a-risin' up around my feet, an' the butterflies air flyin' up in my face out of the flowers. Law, hev we got to the bars a'ready? I hadn't no idee on 't. Bee keerful about lettin' on 'em down. Becca."

The younger of the two old women let down the bars which separated the blooming field which they had been traversing from the road, and they passed through.

"S'pose you'd better put 'em up agin, Becca, though thar ain't any need on 't, as I see. Thar ain't nothin' in the field to git out but the butterflies an' the grasshoppers, an' they'll git out if they want to, whether or no. Let me take holt."

"There ain't any need of it, mother."

"Yes, I will, too, Becca Wheat. I'm jest as strong in my arms as ever I was. You ain't no call to think I ain't."

"I don't think so, mother; I know you're real strong."

"I allers was pretty strong to lift—stronger'n vou."

The bars up, the two women kept on down the road. It was bordered by stone walls and flowering bushes. Ahead, just as far as they could see, was one white house. They were going there to a woman's prayer-meeting.

The older of the two kept a little ahead of the younger, trotting weakly through the short, dusty grass. Her small, old head in a black straw bonnet bobbed in time to every step; her sharp, yellow little face peeped out of the bonnet, alert and half aggressive. She wore a short black shawl tightly drawn over her narrow, wiry back, and held her hands folded primly in front over the two ends.

The other woman, her daughter, pacing dreamily behind, was taller and slenderer. Her face was pale and full, but slightly wrinkled, with a sweet, wide mouth. The pleasant expression about it was so decided that it was almost a smile. Her dress was slightly younger, a hat instead of a bonnet, and no shawl over her black calico afternoon dress.

As they drew nearer to the house the old woman peered anxiously ahead through her spectacles.

"See any one thar, Becca?"

"I should think two women jest went in. I couldn't tell who they was."

"You'd orter wear your spectacles, Becca; your eyesight ain't so good as mine was at your age. She's got her front room open for the meetin'. I kin see the curtains flappin'."

Quite a strong soft wind was blowing. As they went up the front walk between the phlox bushes with their purplish-pink heads, the green curtains with a flowery border swung out of the windows of Mrs. Thomas's best room, the one on the right of the front door.

The door stood open, and a mildly curious face or two showed through the windows.

"Thar's old Mis' Wheat an' Becca," said some one in a whisper to Mrs. Thomas, and she came to the door.

There was a solemn composure on her large, comfortable face. "Good afternoon, Mis' Wheat," said she; "good afternoon, Becca. Walk in."

They walked in with staid demeanour, and took their seats. The chairs were set close to the walls around the room. There were nine or ten women there with good, grave faces. One old woman sat close to the mantel-shelf, and Mrs. Wheat took a vacant chair beside her.

"How d'ye do, Mis' Dill?" whispered she, reaching out her little skinny hand.

The other shook it stiffly. She was as small as Mrs. Wheat, but her little face was round, and her chin had a square decision in its cut, instead of a sharp one. She had a clean, nicely-folded white handkerchief in her lap, and she wiped her spectacles carefully with it and looked through them at Mrs. Wheat before replying.

"I'm enjoyin' pretty good health jest now, thankee, Mis' Wheat," whispered she.

Mrs. Wheat's eyes snapped. "You do seem to be lookin' pretty middlin' for one of your age," said she.

Mrs. Dill gave a stony look at her.

The meeting began then. The good woman read in the Bible and prayed, one after another, the others silent on their knees beside her. Their husbands and sons in the hay-fields, the children in the district school, the too light-minded though innocent village girls, the minister wrestling with his dull sermon faithfully in his shabby study, the whole world, were remembered in their homely petitions. The south wind sang in at the windows; a pine-tree around the corner of the house soughed; the locusts cried shrilly over in the blossoming fields; and their timid prayers went up.

Old Mrs. Wheat, in her corner, on her knees, listened with an outward show of reverence, but she was inwardly torn with jealousy. She was the last one called upon to take part; even old Mrs. Dill was preferred before her. But she had her revenge; when she did get her chance to speak, long and weary was the time she kept her devout sisters on their aching knees.

She had been storing up a good deal to say while the others were praying, and now she said it. For church and town and commonwealth, for missions at home and abroad, her shrill cry went up. Lastly she prayed, with emphatic quavers, for old Mrs. Dill. "O Lord," pleaded she, "remember, we pray thee, this aged handmaiden at my side. May she long enjoy what blessin's are left to her in her age and decrepitood. Sanctify her trials unto her, an' enable her to look away from the feebleness an' want of strength which is now her lot on this airth, to that better country where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary air at rest."

When the prayer was ended, Mrs. Dill rose softly from her knees and sat down. Her face was absolutely immovable as she met Mrs. Wheat's glance when the meeting dispersed.

The two old ladies were left alone in the best room for a little while. Mrs. Thomas, who was Mrs. Dill's daughter, wanted to see Becca about something, so she called her out into the sitting-room.

"You an' Mis' Wheat can visit a little while, while Becca an' I are out here," said she.

Mrs. Dill looked at her daughter when she said this, as if inclined to decline the proposal. Then an expression of stubborn fortitude came over her face, and she settled herself solidly in her chair.

The two looked primly at each other when they were left alone.

"How is Mis' Thomas?" said Mrs. Wheat; "and how is Adoniram?"

"They air both well, thank ye."

"I s'pose Adoniram is to work?"

"Hayin'."

"I thought I ketched a glimpse of him in the field over thar when I come in. Adoniram grows old, don't he?"

"I don't know."

"I sot lookin' at him in meetin' last Sabbath, an' thinkin' how dretfully he was altered. I hope he'll be spared to you as long as you live, Mis' Dill. It' consider'ble better on your account that he hain't never got married, ain't it?"

Mrs. Dill reddened, and stiffened her chin a little. "Thar's a good many folks don't git married, Mis' Wheat, men an' women too, sometimes."

"Becca could 'a got married dozens of times, if she'd wanted to, Mis' Dill."

"I s'pose so."

"See here, Mis' Dill, s'pose we come to the p'int. You're allers kinder flingin' at me, an' I know well enough what it means. You've allers blamed me 'cause you thought I come betwixt my Becca an' your Adoniram, an' I didn't as I knows on."

"Oh, no: course you didn't."

"I s'pose you don't believe it, Mis' Dill?"

"No; I ain't forgot how Adoniram come home from your house, jest about this time o' year, a matter o' forty year ago."

"I don't know what you mean."

Mrs. Dill sat up straight in her chair, and talked with slow emphasis. Her eyes never winked.

"Test about this time in the afternoon, an' this time o' year, 'bout forty year ago, Adoniram come home from your house. They'd got the hay in the day before, so he had a leetle restin' spell, an' he went right over thar. I knowed where he'd gone well enough, though he made up an arrant after a rake to Deacon White's. I knowed he'd stop to Becca's before he got home. She'd been off visitin', an' he hadn't seen her for a week. She'd jest got home that mornin'. Well, Adoniram went, an' he come home. I was a-goin' through the front entry when he come in through the settin'room. He was jest as pale as death. I asked him what the matter was, an' he wouldn't say nothin'. The door stood open in here, an' he come in an' dropped into a cheer by the table. an' put his head down on it. I coaxed an' coaxed, an' finally I got it out of him. He'd been over to Becca's, an' you'd treated him so he couldn't ever go agin. He said you didn't like him, an' that was the end on't. Becca couldn't go agin her mother's wishes, an' he wasn't ever goin' to ask her to. Adoniram had jest joined the church that spring, an' he'd jest as soon cut his hand off as to lead Becca to disobev her parents. He's allers had a strong feelin' that marriages made that way wa'n't blessed. I've heerd him say so a good many times. So-"

"I'd like to know what I ever did to mistreat Adoniram, Mis' Dill."

"He never told me the hull perticklars. Thar was somethin' 'bout a butterfly."

"Lor', I remember, 'Twa'n't nothin'- nothin' at all. Young folks air so silly! I remember jest as well as ef 'twas visterday. Adoniram an' Becca was out in the vard in front of the house. Becca had it all laid out in flowerbeds jest as it is now, an' thar was swarms of butterflies round 'em. They was out thar in the yard, an' I was in the settin'-room winder. They was kinder foolin', an' all of a sudden Adoniram he begun chasin' a butterfly. It was one of them great blue-spotted ones. He caught it mighty spry, an' was a givin' it to Becca. when I said somethin' out o' the winder. don't jest know what it was. I thought 'twas dretful silly for him to waste his time ketchin' butterflies, an' Becca had some sewin' I wanted her to do. I s'pose 'twas somethin' 'bout that."

"You didn't think Adoniram was good enough for Becca; that was the hull on't."

"That wa'n't it, Mis' Dill. I don't see how you come to think such a thing."

"You'd jest set your heart on havin' her git that rich Arms feller; you know you had. But she didn't; she didn't git anybody."

Mrs. Dill's thin voice quavered and shook, and her little bony form trembled all over, but the spirit within her manifested itself bravely through shakes and quavers.

"You air misjudgin' of me, Mis' Dill, an' you ain't showin' a Christian spirit. You'll be sorry for it when you come to think it over. You'll see 'twas all jest the way I said 'twas, an' I didn't mean nothin'. Let alone anything else, it's awful cruel to ketch butterflies; you know that, Mis' Dill."

"You've done a crueller thing than ketchin' butterflies, Martha Wheat."

"Well, Mis' Dill, we'd better not talk 'bout this any longer. 'Tain't jest becomin' after the meetin' we've jest had to git to disputin'. Than's Becca."

Going home along the green-bordered road and across the flowery field, Rebecca Wheat noticed that something seemed to have disturbed her mother. The nervous old woman fretted and fidgeted. In the middle of the field she stopped short, and almost danced up and down with feeble, childish wrath.

"Why, what is the matter, mother?"

"Them pesky butterflies!" ejaculated her mother, waving her trembling hands. "I'd like to poison their honey for 'em."

"Let me go on ahead, mother; then they won't bother you so much. I kin kinder brush them away."

"Well, you may, ef you're a mind ter. Say. Becca—speakin' of butterflies brings it to mind. You never thought I was ter blame 'bout sepa-ratin' you an' Adoniram Dill, did you?"

The old daughter looked pleasantly into her old mother's face. "I didn't blame anybody, mother. I didn't think you used to like Adoniram very well: but it's all over now."

"You didn't take it to heart much, did you,

Becca?"

"Not enough to hurt me any, I guess. Do you mind the butterflies so much with me ahead?"

"No, I guess I don't. I've kinder been thinkin' on't over lately, an' ef I was kinder sharp 'bout that butterfly business, an' hinderin' you an' Adoniram's makin' a match on't, I ain't above sayin' I might hev been a leetle more keerful. Adoniram's turned out pretty well. Mis' Higgins told me yisterday that he'd jest bought that ten-acre lot of Deacon White's. I guess he must hev been layin' up money. Well, Becca, I dessay you air better off than you would be ef you'd been married. It's pretty resky."

Rebecca, plodding before her mother, looked ahead at the familiar landscape, with that expression of strong, pleasant patience which the years seemed to have brought out in relief on her face, like the chasing on silver. It made her more attractive than she had been in her youth, for she had never been pretty.

She and her mother reached the comfortable house, with three great elms in front of it, where they lived, two hours before sunset.

About an hour later Adoniram Dill also went home from his labor across the fields. He was a tall, muscular old man, with a strong-featured, beardless face. He was so straight and agile that he looked, the width of a field away, like a young man. When he came nearer, one saw his iron-gray hair, the deep seams, and the old brown tint of his face, with a start of surprise.

Supper was not quite ready, so after he had washed his face and hands at the kitchen sink he went into the sitting-room, and sat down in a calico-covered rocking-chair with a newspaper. His mother looked in presently, and saw him there.

She stood in the entry-door and beckoned him solemnly. "Come into the parlor a minute," she whispered; "I've got somethin' I want to tell you, an' the children will be racin' in here."

Adoniram rose and followed her in obedi-

ently.

She shut the parlor door and looked round at him. "Adoniram, what do you think? Mis' Wheat was over to the meetin' this arternoon, an' she an' me hed a little talk arter the others was gone, an' she brought up that old affair of you an' Becca agin."

"There ain't any use bringin' it up, mother."

"She says she didn't mean a thing when she talked to you so about that butterfly business. She jest thought you hadn't orter be wastin' your time doin' sech cruel things as ketchin' butterflies, an' she wanted Becca to come in an' do some sewin'. That's what she said. I let her know I didn't believe a word on't. I told her right to her face that she thought you wa'n't good enough for Becca, an' she wanted her to hev that rich Arms feller."

"Seems to me I'd have let it all gone, mother."

"I war'n't goin' to let it all go, Adoniram. I'm slow-spoken, an' I don't often speak, but once in a while I've got to. She's the most aggervatin'—I don't know what you would hev done with her ef you hed merried Becca. You'd hed to hev her arter Mr. Wheat died. She 'ain't never liked me. She tried to be dretful nice to me to-day, 'cause she'd got an axe to grind; but she'd got so much spite in her she couldn't help it showin' out a leetle. Why she kerried it into the prayer-meetin', she did, Adoniram. She prayed for me, 'cause I was so old an' broken down, an' she's three years older'n me. I think it's awful to show out that way in a prayer-meetin'."

"P'rhaps she didn't mean anything."

"Yes, she did. I knew just what she meant by the hull on't, Adoniram Dill. She's got kinder sick livin' thar alone with Becca, without any man to split up kindlin'-wood an' bring in water, an' she's tryin' to git you back agin. She jest the same as said she hedn't no objections to it. I guess she thinks you've been doin' pretty well, too. She thinks it would be a mighty nice thing now to hev you step in thar with your money an' wait on 'em. I see through her."

"P'rhaps it ain't so, mother."

"Yes, 'tis. Adoniram Dill, you don't mean to say you'd hev any idee of marryin' Becca Wheat, arter you've been treated as you hev?"

"You 'ain't heard me say any such thing,

mother."

"I thought you looked kinder queer. You wouldn't, would you, Adoniram?"

"Not if it didn't seem for—the best. I don't—know."

All of a sudden Adoniram Dill sat down beside the little parlor table and leaned his head on it as he had forty years ago.

"What's the matter?" his mother asked, with a scared start, looking at him with awed eyes.

It was almost like a coming back of the dead, this rising of her son's youth from its snowy and grassy grave in her sight. "O Adoniram, you poor boy, you ain't felt jest the same way about her all these years? It's awful. I hadn't any idee on't."

"Never mind, mother. Jane's callin' us to supper: you go right along, an' I'll come in a minute."

"Thar an't any need of your havin' any more frettin' about it, anyhow, Adoniram. Her mother's willin' an' I 'ain't a doubt but Becca is. I've seen her look kinder downhearted sometimes; for all she's so good and uncomplainin', I guess she's been worried as well as some other folks. You jest slick up arter supper, an' go right over an' ask her. Thar ain't no reason at all why you shouldn't. You ain't nuther of you so very old, not more'n sixty. An' I don't know as Mis' Wheat'll be so very bad to git along with. I dessay she's meant all right."

Adoniram said nothing. He rose with an effort, and went out to supper with his mother, who kept gazing at him with loving, questioning eves.

"Ain't you goin'?" she whispered when they were in the sitting-room again.

"I guess not to-night, mother."

"Well, mebbe 'tis jest as well to wait till tomorrer. I don't want Mis' Wheat to think you was in too much of a rush."

After his mother had gone to bed, and out of doors the summer night was complete with all its stars, he sat down alone on the front doorstep, and thought. He felt like a wanderer returned to some beautiful, dear country, the true home of his heart, which he had thought to never see again. To-night the golden gates of youth swung open with sweet music for Adoniram Dill, with his gray locks and his hard, seamed face, and he entered in, never knowing he was any different.

The steadiness with which he had kept to his ideas of duty for the last forty years gave his happiness, now that the long strain was over, an almost unearthly, holy character. It was truly the reward of virtue. The faithful old man who had taken what he considered to be the right course for himself and the woman he loved, without question or appeal to that mandate of obedience which he read so literally, was capable at sixty of being as freely happy as a child.

The sordid motives which had possibly actuated Becca's mother to withdraw her opposition at last did not fret him at all. He was far above it. That hard, shrill voice which had rung out of that sitting-room window for him for the last forty years was still. The voice had truly said cruel things, more cruel than its owner would own to now. The poor, honest young man had gone away that day with the full and settled understanding that his sweetheart's mother was bitterly opposed to him, and that must be the end of it all. He never dreamed of such a thing as urging her to marry him without her mother's consent.

So he had never been since in that front yard, full of roses and pinks and butterflies.

He and Rebecca had met in the village society like kindly acquaintances for all these years.

Adoniram, looking across the little country church Sunday after Sunday as the years went on, might have seen the woman growing old who should have grown old by his side, with bitter regret, and Rebecca, with patient sadness, have marked his entrance among all the congregation: but no one had known.

The day after the meeting Adoniram had to drive over to the store on business. On his way back he passed a house where an aged sister of Mrs. Wheat's lived, and saw, with a start, the latter's thin face at a window. "I wonder if Becca's home?" said he. Then he drove on quicker, with a gathering resolution.

About four o'clock he was going across lots through the field toward the Wheats'. He had on his Sunday coat. When about half-way across he saw a woman's figure approaching. Soon he saw it was Rebecca. He stood in the narrow footpath, between the tall clover and daisies and herd's-grass which came up to his knees. and waited.

She greeted him, when she reached him, in her usual good, placid way. "How do you do, Mr. Dill?"

"I was comin' to see you, Becca."

She looked at him, and the calm lines in her face changed a little. "I'll go back. I was going after mother, that was all; but she won't be in any hurry."

"No, there ain't any need of your goin' back. I can say what I wanted to jest as well here, an' then you can keep right on after your mother. Becca, supposin' 'twas forty year ago, an' you an' me was here, an' your mother was willin'; what would you say ef I asked you to marry me?"

Great tears stood in her eyes. "Oh Adoniram, it wouldn't be fair!"

"Don't you think your mother would be willin'?"

"I don't think she's so set agin it as she was, but 'twouldn't be fair. I'm sixty year old, Adoniram."

"So 'm I, Becca."

She shook her head. "No, Adoniram, it ain't any use. It might have been different once. Now, after all this time, when I'm old an' broken down, an' the fault of all the trouble on my side of the house, I ain't goin' to be so mean as to let you marry me. It ain't fair."

Adoniram gave one step forward, and caught his old sweetheart in his arms. "I've been waitin' for you forty year, Becca, an' there ain't nothin' more comin' betwixt us. Don't you say anything more about its not bein' fair."

"You know mother'll hev to live with us."
"I'll try an' make her jest as happy as I can."

The clover and the grasses rustled in the wind, and the butterflies came flying around the old man and his old sweetheart standing there. It would have made no difference to them if they had been waiting in their little chrysalis coffins a hundred years or so, they were butterflies now. There were yellow ones and little rusty red ones, and now and then a gorgeous large one with blue spots on his black wings. Seeing one of these made Adoniram remember something swiftly.

"Want me to ketch a butterfly for you, Becca?"

"I've got one now you caught forty year ago."
1887

HAMLIN GARLAND 1860-

The country west of the Mississippi and north of the Missouri Mr. Garland may well claim as his own by right of having made it known through his realistic fiction. He was born in Wisconsin of parents whose lives were spent in the endless toil of pioneer farmers, always on the move westward in search of richer farm-sites. He was graduated from the Cedar Valley Seminary in Iowa, farmed and taught school, and until middle life was generally upon the frontier of the mountain and prairie states, and in Canada and the Klondyke. He was a social reformer and propagandist, a newspaper reporter and writer of special articles; throughout the wanderings that these occupations required, he was gathering material for his stories and novels.

Realism is Garland's method; what romance there is, is born of the frontier background, part of the dogged struggle for daily bread. His realism, untouched by bitterness or pessimism, is as wholesome as is Howells'. Prominent among Mr. Garland's works are Main-Traveled Roads, 1890-1898; Rose of Dutcher's Coolly, 1895-1898; The Captain of the Gray-Horse Troop, 1902; A Son of the Middle Border, 1917, and A Daughter of the Middle Border, 1921, both autobiographical, reminiscent, and descriptive of life in the northern prairie states when they were being settled; The Trail Makers, 1926.

Criticism: Chubb; "Limitations of Authorship in America," Bookm. 59:257-62; "Pioneers and City Dwellers," Bookm. 58:369-72; C. Van Doren, "Contemporary American Novelists: XI. Hamlin Garland," Nation 113:596-7; "The Evolution of a Literary Radical," Cur. Opinion 72:389-91; W. D. Howells, "Mr. Garland's Books," No. Am. 196: 523-8.

From A SON OF THE MIDDLE BORDER <sup>1</sup>

HOME FROM THE WAR

All of this universe known to me in the year 1864 was bounded by the wooded hills of a little Wisconsin coulee, <sup>2</sup> and its center was the cottage in which my mother was living alone—my father was in the war. As I project myself back into that mystical age, half-lights cover most of the valley. The road before our doorstone begins and ends in vague obscurity—and Granma Green's house at the fork of the trail stands on the very edge of the world in a sinister region peopled with bears and other menacing creatures. Beyond this point all is darkness and terror.

It is Sunday afternoon and my mother and her three children, Frank, Harriet, and I (all in our best dresses) are visiting the Widow Green, our nearest neighbor, a plump, jolly woman whom we greatly love. The house swarms with stalwart men and buxom women and we are all sitting around the table heaped with the remains of a harvest feast. The women are "telling fortunes" by means of tea-grounds. Mrs. Green is the seeress. After shaking the cup with the grounds at the bottom, she turns it bottom side up in a saucer. Then whirling it three times to the right and three times to the left, she lifts it and silently studies the position of the leaves which cling to the sides of the cup, what time we all wait in breathless suspense for her first word.

"A soldier is coming to you!" she says to my mother. "See," and she points into the cup. We all crowd near, and I perceive a leaf with a stem sticking up from its body like a bayonet over a man's shoulder. "He is almost home," the widow goes on. Then with a sudden dramatic turn she waves her hand toward the road. "Heavens and earth!" she cries. "There's Richard now!"

² valley

We all turn and look toward the road, and there, indeed, is a soldier with a musket on his back, wearily plodding his way up the low hill just north of the gate. He is too far away for mother to call, and besides I think she must have been a little uncertain, for he did not so much as turn his head toward the house. Trembling with excitement she hurries little Frank into his wagon and telling Hattie to bring me, sets off up the road as fast as she can draw the baby's cart. It all seems a dream to me and I move dumbly, almost stupidly like one in a mist.

We did not overtake the soldier, that is evident, for my next vision is that of a blue-coated figure leaning upon the fence, studying with intent gaze our empty cottage. I cannot, even now, precisely divine why he stood thus, sadly contemplating his silent home—but so it was. His knapsack lay at his feet, his musket was propped against a post on whose top a cat was dreaming, unmindful of the warrior and his folded hands.

He did not hear us until we were close upon him, and even after he turned, my mother hesitated, so thin, so hollow-eyed, so changed was he. "Richard, is that you?" she quaveringly asked.

His worn face lighted up. His arms rose. "Yes, Belle! Here I am." he answered.

Nevertheless though he took my mother in his arms, I could not relate him to the father I had heard so much about. To me he was only a strange man with big eyes and care-worn face. I did not recognize in him anything I had ever known, but my sister, who was two years older than I, went to his bosom of her own motion. She knew him, whilst I submitted to his caresses rather for the reason that my mother urged me forward than because of any affection I felt for him. Frank, however, would not even permit a kiss. The gaunt and grizzled stranger terrified him.

"Come here, my little man," my father said.

"My little man!" Across the space of half-acentury I can still hear the sad reproach in his voice. "Won't you come and see your poor old father when he comes home from the war?"

"My little man!" How significant that phrase seems to me now! The war had in very truth come between this patriot and his sons. I had forgotten him—the baby had never known him.

Frank crept beneath the rail fence and stood there, well out of reach, like a cautious kitten warily surveying an alien dog. At last the soldier stooped and drawing from his knapsack a big red apple, held it toward the staring babe, confidently calling, "Now, I guess he'll come to his poor old pap home from the war."

&lt;sup>1</sup> From A Son of the Middle Border by Hamlin Garland, by permission of The Macmillan Company, publishers.

The mother apologized. "He doesn't know you, Dick. How could he? He was only nine months old when you went away. He'll go to you by and by."

The babe crept slowly toward the shining lure. My father caught him despite his kicking, and hugged him close. "Now I've got you." he exulted.

Then we all went into the little front room and the soldier laid off his heavy army shoes. My mother brought a pillow to put under his head, and so at last he stretched out on the floor the better to rest his tired, aching bones, and there I joined him.

"Oh, Belle!" he said, in tones of utter content. "This is what I've dreamed about a million times."

Frank and I grew each moment more friendly and soon began to tumble over him while mother hastened to cook something for him to eat. He asked for "hot biscuits and honey and plenty of coffee."

That was a mystic hour—and yet how little I can recover of it! The afternoon glides into evening while the soldier talks, and at last we all go out to the barn to watch mother milk the cow. I hear him ask about the crops, the neighbors.—The sunlight passes. Mother leads the way back to the house. My father follows carrying little Frank in his arms.

He is a "strange man" no longer. Each moment his voice sinks deeper into my remembrance. He is my father—that I feel ringing through the dim halls of my consciousness. Harriet clings to his hand in perfect knowledge and confidence. We eat our bread and milk, the trundle-bed is pulled out, we children clamber in, and I go to sleep to the music of his resonant voice recounting the story of the battles he had seen, and the marches he had made.

The emergence of an individual consciousness from the void is, after all, the most amazing fact of human life and I should like to spend much of this first chapter in groping about in the luminous shadow of my infant world because, deeply considered, childish impressions are the fundamentals upon which an author's fictional out-put is based; but to linger might weary my reader at the outset, although I count myself most fortunate in the fact that my boyhood was spent in the midst of a charming landscape and during a certain beroic era of western settlement.

The men and women of that far time loom large in my thinking for they possessed not only the spirit of adventurers but the courage of warriors. Aside from the natural distortion of a boy's imagination I am quite sure that the pioneers of 1860 still retained something broad and fine in their action, something a boy might honorably imitate.

My father who had bought his farm "on time," just before the war, could not enlist among the first volunteers, though he was deeply moved to do so, till his land was paid for—but at last in 1863 on the very day that he made the last payment on the mortgage, he put his name down on the roll and went back to his wife, a soldier.

I have heard my mother say that this was one of the darkest moments of her life and if you think about it you will understand the reason why. My sister was only five years old, I was three and Frank was a babe in the cradle. Broken-hearted at the thought of the long separation and scared by visions of battle my mother begged the soldier not to go; but he was of the stern stuff which makes patriots—and besides his name was already on the roll, therefore he went away to join Grant's army at "What sacrifice! What folly!" Vicksburg. said his pacifist neighbors—"to leave your wife and children for an idea, a mere sentiment; to put your life in peril for a striped silken rag." But he went. For thirteen dollars a month he marched and fought while his plow rusted in the shed and his cattle called to him from their stalls.

My conscious memory holds nothing of my mother's agony of waiting, nothing of the dark days when the baby was ill and the doctor far away—but into my sub-conscious ear her voice sank, and the words Grant, Lincoln, Sherman, "furlough," "mustered out," ring like bells, deep-toned and vibrant. I shared dimly in every emotional utterance of the neighbors who came to call and a large part of what I am is due to the impressions of these deeply passionate and poetic years.

Dim pictures come to me. I see my mother at the spinning wheel, I help her to fill the candle molds. I hold in my hands the queer carding combs with their crinkly teeth, but my first definite connected recollection is the scene of my father's return at the close of the war.

I was not quite five years old, and the events of that day are so commingled with later impressions,—experiences which came long after—that I cannot be quite sure which are true and which imagined, but the picture as a whole is very vivid and very complete.

Thus it happened that my first impressions of life were martial, and my training military, for my father brought back from his two years' campaigning under Sherman and Thomas the temper and the habit of a soldier.

He became naturally the dominant figure in my horizon, and his scheme of discipline impressed itself almost at once upon his children.

I suspect that we had fallen into rather free and easy habits under mother's government, for she was too jolly, too tender-hearted, to engender fear in us even when she threatened us with a switch or a shingle. We soon learned, however, that the soldier's promise of punishment was swift and precise in its fulfillment. We seldom presumed a second time on his forgetfulness or tolerance. We knew he loved us, for he often took us to his knees of an evening and told us stories of marches and battles, or chanted war-songs for us, but the moments of his tenderness were few and his fondling did not prevent him from almost instant use of the rod if he thought either of us needed it.

His own boyhood had been both hard and short. Born of farmer folk in Oxford County. Maine, his early life had been spent on the soil in and about Lock's Mills with small chance of schooling. Later, as a teamster, and finally as a shipping clerk for Amos Lawrence, 1 he had enjoyed three mightily improving years in Boston. He loved to tell of his life there, and it is indicative of his character to say that he dwelt with special joy and pride on the actors and orators he had heard. He could describe some of the great scenes and repeat a few of the heroic lines of Shakespeare, and the roll of his deep voice as he declaimed, "Now is the winter of our discontent made glorious summer by this son of York," 2 thrilled us-filled us with desire of something far off and wonderful. But best of all we loved to hear him tell of "Logan at Peach Tree Creek," and "Kilpatrick on the Granny White Turnpike."

He was a vivid and concise story-teller and his words brought to us (sometimes all too clearly). the tragic happenings of the battle-fields of Atlanta and Nashville. To him Grant, Lincoln, Sherman, and Sheridan were among the noblest men of the world, and he would not tolerate any criticism of them.

<sup>1</sup> a Boston merchant and philanthropist, 1786-1852 <sup>2</sup> Richard III, I, 1, i Next to his stories of the war I think we loved best to have him picture "the pineries" of Wisconsin, for during his first years in the State he had been both lumberman and raftsman, and his memory held delightful tales of wolves and bears and Indians.

He often imitated the howls and growls and actions of the wild animals with startling realism, and his river narratives were full of unforgettable phrases like "the Jinny Bull Falls," "Old Moosinee" and "running the rapids."

In addition to his military character, Dick Garland also carried with him the odor of the pine forest and exhibited the skill and training of a forester, for in those early days even at the time when I began to remember the neighborhood talk, nearly every young man who could get away from the farm or the village went north, in November, into the pine woods which covered the entire upper part of the State, and my father, who had been a raftsman and timber cruiser 3 and pilot ever since his coming west, was deeply skilled with axe and steering oars. The lumberman's life at that time was rough but not vicious, for the men were nearly all of native American stock, and my father was none the worse for his winters in camp.

His field of action as lumberman was for several years in and around Big Bull Falls (as it was then called), near the present town of Wausau, and during that time he had charge of a crew of loggers in winter and in summer piloted rafts of lumber down to Dubuque and other points where saw mills were located. He was called at this time, "Yankee Dick, the Pilot."

As a result of all these experiences in the woods, he was almost as much woodsman as soldier in his talk, and the heroic life he had led made him very wonderful in my eyes. According to his account (and I have no reason to doubt it) he had been exceedingly expert in running a raft and could ride a canoe like a Chippewa. I remember hearing him very forcefully remark, "God forgot to make the man I could not follow."

He was deft with an axe, keen of perception, sure of hand and foot, and entirely capable of holding his own with any man of his weight. Amid much drinking he remained temperate, and strange to say never used tobacco in any form. While not a large man he was nearly six feet in height, deep-chested and sinewy, and of dauntless courage. The quality which defended him from attack was the spirit which flamed from his eagle-gray eyes. Terrifying eyes they were, at times, as I had many occasions to note.

&lt;sup>8</sup> a woodsman who explores forests for tracts of valuable timber and reports to lumber companies

As he gathered us all around his knee at night before the fire, he loved to tell us of riding the whirlpools of Big Bull Falls, or of how he lived for weeks on a raft with the water up to his knees (sleeping at night in his wet working clothes), sustained by the blood of youth and the spirit of adventure. His endurance even after his return from the war, was marvelous, although he walked a little bent and with a peculiar measured swinging stride—the stride of Sherman's veterans.

As I was born in the first smoke of the great conflict, so all of my early memories of Green's coulee are permeated with the haze of the passing war-cloud. My soldier dad had taught me the manual of arms, and for a year Harriet and I carried broom-sticks, flourished lath sabers, and hammered on dishpans in imitation of officers and drummers. Canteens made excellent water-bottles for the men in the harvest fields, and the long blue overcoats which the soldiers brought back with them from the South lent many a vivid spot of color to that far-off landscape.

All the children of our valley inhaled with every breath this mingled air of romance and sorrow, history and song, and through those epic days runs a deep-laid consciousness of maternal pain. My mother's side of those long months of waiting was never fully delineated, for she was natively reticent and shy of expression. But piece by piece I drew from her the tale of her long vigil, and obtained some hint of the bitter anguish of her suspense after each great battle.

1917

O. HENRY (WILLIAM SYDNEY PORTER) 1852-1919

O. Henry, after a rather meager schooling, began life as a pharmacist and drug clerk in the town of Greensboro, North Carolina, his birthplace; threatened with consumption he went to the West where he worked on a cattle ranch; in Texas he was a newspaper reporter and journalist, and became a teller in a small bank. In this last position he was charged with embezzlement, a crime of which he was probably innocent. He fled to Honduras, but returned to serve a term in a Federal penitentiary. Especially through this time spent in an Ohio prison where, as pharmacist, he was brought into contact with men from all grades of society, he gained rich material for his stories. His work is therefore singular in the variety of characters and situations it includes. A leading characteristic of his stories is cleverness in the handling of plot which brings a sudden and wholly unexpected ending. He is most at home in those aspects of life in which whim, chance, and caprice play a part, rather than in those aspects that are deeply and typically significant.

Biography: C. A. Smith, Biography of O. Henry, 1916; also World's Work 33:54-64. Criticism: Cooper; Stephen Leacock, "The Amazing Genius of O. Henry" in Essays and Literary Studies, 1916; A. S. J. Adcock, "O. Henry," Liv. Age 291: 482-8; for further interesting details see Bookm. 43: 569-70; 44:229-36; 50:474-6; 52:536-8; 56:152-7. 61:436-7; Cur. Opinion 72:529-31; Lit. Digest 72. 35-6. Mar. 25: '22.

THE HIDING OF BLACK BILL 1

A lank, strong, red-faced man with a Wellington beak and small, fiery eyes tempered by flaxen lashes, sat on the station platform at Los Pinos swinging his legs to and fro. At his side sat another man, fat, melancholy, and seedy, who seemed to be his friend. They had the appearance of men to whom life had appeared as a reversible coat—seamy on both sides.

"Ain't seen you in about four years, Ham," said the seedy man. "Why way you been travelling?"

"Texas," said the red-faced man. "It was too cold in Alaska for me. And I found it warm in Texas. I'll tell you about one hot spell I went through there.

"One morning I steps off the International at a water-tank and lets it go on without me. 'Twas a ranch country, and fuller of spite-houses than New York City. Only out there they build 'em twenty miles away so you can't smell what they've got for dinner, instead of running 'em up two inches from their neighbors' windows.

"There wasn't any roads in sight, so I footed it 'cross country. The grass was shoe-top deep, and the mesquite timber looked just like a peach orchard. It was so much like a gentleman's private estate that every minute you expected a kennelful of bulldogs to run out and bite you. But I must have walked twenty miles before I came in sight of a ranch-house. It was a little one, about as big as an elevated railroad station.

<sup>1</sup> From Options by O. Henry, copyright 1909 by Doubleday, Page and Company; and reprinted by permission of Doubleday, Doran and Company, Inc., publishers. "There was a little man in a white shirt and brown overalls and a pink handkerchief around his neck rolling cigarettes under a tree in front of the door.

"'Greetings,' says I. 'Any refreshment, welcome, emoluments, or even work for a comparative stranger?'

"'Oh, come in,' says he, in a refined tone. 'Sit down on that stool, please. I didn't hear your horse coming.'

"'He isn't near enough yet,' says I. 'I walked. I don't want to be a burden, but I wonder if you have three or four gallons of water handy.'

"'You do look pretty dusty,' says he; 'but our bathing arrangements-'

"'It's a drink I want,' says I. 'Never mind the dust that's on the outside.'

"He gets me a dipper of water out of a red iar hanging up, and then goes on:

"'Do you want work?"

"'For a time,' says I. 'This is a rather quiet section of the country, isn't it?'

"'It is,' says he. 'Sometimes—so I have been told—one sees no human being pass for weeks at a time. I've been here only a month. I bought the ranch from an old settler who wanted to move farther west.'

"'It suits me,' says I. 'Quiet and retirement are good for a man sometimes. And I need a job. I can tend bar, salt mines, 1 lecture, float stock, do a little middle-weight slugging, and play the piano.'

"'Can you herd sheep?' asks the little ranchman.

"'Can you mean have I heard sheep?' says I. "'Can you herd 'em—take charge of a flock of 'em?' says he.

"'Oh,' says I, 'now I understand. You mean chase 'em around and bark at 'em like collie dogs. Well, I might,' says I. 'I've never exactly done any sheep-herding, but I've often seen 'em from car windows masticating daisies, and they don't look dangerous.'

"'I'm short a herder,' says the ranchman. 'You never can depend on the Mexicans. I've only got two flocks. You may take out my bunch of muttons—there are only eight hundred of 'em—in the morning, if you like. The pay is twelve dollars a month and your rations furnished. You camp in a tent on the prairie with your sheep. You do your own cooking, but wood and water are brought to your camp. It's an easy job.'

"'I'm on,' says I. 'I'll take the job even if place rich ore in worthless mines in order to deceive a buyer

I have to garland my brow and hold on to a crook and wear a loose effect and play on a pipe like the shepherds do in pictures.'

"So the next morning the little ranchman helps me drive the flock of muttons from the corral to about two miles out and let 'em graze on a little hillside on the prairie. He gives me a lot of instructions about not letting bunches of them stray off from the herd, and driving 'em down to a water-hole to drink at noon.

"'I'll bring out your tent and camping outfit and rations in the buckboard before night,' says

he

"'Fine,' says I. 'And don't forget the rations. Nor the camping outfit. And be sure to bring the tent. Your name's Zollicoffer, ain't it?'

"'My name,' says he, 'is Henry Ogden.'

"'All right, Mr. Ogden,' says I. 'Mine is

Mr. Percival Saint Clair.'

"I herded sheep for five days on the Rancho Chiquito; and then the wool entered my soul. That getting next to Nature certainly got next to me. I was lonesomer than Crusoe's goat. I've seen a lot of persons more entertaining as companions than those sheep were. I'd drive 'em to the corral and pen 'em every evening, and then cook my corn-bread and mutton and coffee, and lie down in a tent the size of a tablecloth, and listen to the coyotes and whippoor-wills singing around the camp.

"The fifth evening, after I had corralled my costly but uncongenial muttons, I walked over to the ranch-house and stepped in the door.

"'Mr. Ogden,' says I, 'you and me have got to get sociable. Sheep are all very well to dot the landscape and furnish eight-dollar cotton suitings for man, but for table-talk and fireside companions they rank along with five-o'clock teazers. If you've got a deck of cards, or a parcheesi outfit, or a game of authors, get 'em out, and let's get on a mental basis. I've got to do something in an intellectual line, if it's only to knock somebody's brains out.'

"This Henry Ogden was a peculiar kind of ranchman. He wore finger-rings and a big gold watch and careful neckties. And his face was calm, and his nose-spectacles was kept very shiny. I saw once, in Muscogee, an outlaw hung for murdering six men, who was a dead ringer for him. But I knew a preacher in Arkansas that you would have taken to be his brother. I didn't care much for him either way; what I wanted was some fellowship and communion with holy saints or lost sinners—anything sheepless would do.

"'Well, Saint Clair,' says he, laying down the book he was reading, 'I guess it must be pretty O. HENRY lonesome for you at first. And I don't deny that it's monotonous for me. Are you sure you corralled your sheep so they won't stray out?"

"'They're shut up as tight as the jury of a millionaire murderer,' says I. 'And I'll be back with them long before they'll need their trained nurse.'

"So Ogden digs up a deck of cards, and we play casino. After five days and nights of my sheep-camp it was like a toot on Broadway. When I caught big casino I felt as excited as if I had made a million in Trinity. And when H. O. loosened up a little and told the story about the lady in the Pullman car I laughed for five minutes.

"That showed what a comparative thing life is. A man may see so much that he'd be bored to turn his head to look at a $3,000,000 fire or Joe Weber or the Adriatic Sea. But let him herd sheep for a spell, and you'll see him splitting his ribs laughing at 'Curfew Shall Not Ring To-night,' or really enjoying himself playing cards with ladies.

"By-and-by Ogden gets out a decanter of Bourbon, and then there is a total eclipse of sheep.

"'Do you remember reading in the papers, about a month ago,' says he, 'about a train hold-up on the M. K. & T.? The express agent was shot through the shoulder and about $15,000 in currency taken. And it's said that only one man did the job.'

"Seems to me I do,' says I. 'But such things happen so often they don't linger long in the human Texas mind. Did they overtake, overhaul, seize, or lay hands upon the de-spoiler?'

"'He escaped,' says Ogden. 'And I was just reading in a paper to-day that the officers have tracked him down into this part of the country. It seems the bills the robber got were all the first issue of currency to the Second National Bank of Espinosa City. And so they've followed the trail where they've been spent, and it leads this way.'

"Ogden pours out some more Bourbon, and shoves me the bottle.

"'I imagine,' says I, after ingurgitating another modicum of the royal booze, 'that it wouldn't be at all a disingenuous idea for a train-robber to run down into this part of the country to hide for a spell. A sheep-ranch, now,' says I, 'would be the finest kind of a place. Who'd ever expect to find such a desperate character among these song-birds and muttons and wild flowers? And, by the way,' says I, kind of looking H. Ogden over, 'was there any description mentioned of this singlehanded terror? Was his lineaments or height and thickness or teeth fillings or style of habiliments set forth in print?'

"'Why, no,' says Ogden; 'they say nobody got a good sight of him because he wore a mask. But they know it was a train-robber called Black Bill, because he always works alone and because he dropped a handkerchief in the express-car that had his name on it.'

"'All right,' says I. 'I approve of Black Bill's retreat to the sheep-ranges. I guess they won't find him.'

"'There's one thousand dollars reward for his capture,' says Ogden.

"'I don't need that kind of money,' says I, looking Mr. Sheepman straight in the eye. The twelve dollars a month you pay me is enough. I need a rest, and I can save up until I get enough to pay my fare to Texarkana, where my widowed mother lives. If Black Bill,' I goes on, looking significantly at Ogden, 'was to have come down this way—say, a month ago—and bought a little sheep-ranch and—"

"'Stop,' says Ogden, getting out of his chair and looking pretty vicious. Do you mean to insinuate—

"'Nothing,' says I; 'no insinuations. I'm stating a hypodermical case. I say, if Black Bill had come down here and bought a sheep-ranch and hired me to Little-Boy-Blue 'em and treated me square and friendly, as you've done, he'd never have anything to fear from me. A man is a man, regardless of any complications he may have with sheep or railroad trains. Now you know where I stand.'

"Ogden looks black as camp-coffee for nine seconds, and then he laughs, amused.

"'You'll do, Saint Clair,' says he. 'If I was Black Bill I wouldn't be afraid to trust you. Let's have a game or two of seven-up to-night. That is, if you don't mind playing with a trainrobber.'

"'I've told you,' says I, 'my oral sentiments, and there's no strings to 'em.'

"While I was shuffling after the first hand, I asks Ogden, as if the idea was a kind of a casualty, where he was from.

"'Oh,' says he, 'from the Mississippi Valley.'
"'That's a nice little place,' says I. 'I've often stopped over there. But didn't you find the sheets a little damp and the food poor?
Now, I hail,' says I, 'from the Pacific Slope.

Ever put up there?'

"'Too draughty,' says Ogden. 'But if you're ever in the Middle West just mention my name, and you'll get foot-warmers and dripped coffee.'

"'Well,' says I, 'I wasn't exactly fishing for your private telephone number and the middle name of your aunt that carried off the Cumberland Presbyterian minister. It don't matter. I just want you to know you are safe in the hands of your shepherd. Now don't play hearts on spades, and don't get nervous.'

"'Still harping,' says Ogden, laughing again. 'Don't you suppose that if I was Black Bill and thought you suspected me, I'd put a Winchester bullet into you and stop my nervousness if I had anv?'

"'Not any,' says I. 'A man who's got the nerve to hold up a train single-handed wouldn't do a trick like that. I've knocked about enough to know that them are the kind of men who put a value on a friend. Not that I can claim being a friend of yours, Mr. Ogden,' says I, 'being only your sheep-herder; but under more expeditious circumstances we might have been.'

"'Forget the sheep temporarily, I beg,' says

Ogden, 'and cut for deal.'

"About four days afterward, while my muttons was mooning on the water-hole and I deep in the interstices of making a pot of coffee, up rides softly on the grass a mysterious person in the garb of the being he wished to represent. He was dressed somewhere between a Kansas City detective, Buffalo Bill, and the town dog-catcher of Baton Rouge. His chin and eye wasn't molded on fighting lines, so I knew he was only a scout.

"'Herdin' sheep?' he asks me.

"'Well,' says I, 'to a man of your evident gumptional endowments, I wouldn't have the nerve to state that I am engaged in decorating old bronzes or oiling bicycle sprockets.'

"'You don't talk or look like a sheep-herder to me,' says he.

"'But you talk like what you look like to me,' says I.

"And then he asks me who I was working for, and I shows him Rancho Chiquito, two miles away, in the shadow of a low hill, and he tells me he's a deputy sheriff.

"'There's a train-robber called Black Bill supposed to be somewhere in these parts,' says the scout. 'He's been traced as far as San Antonio, and may be farther. Have you seen or heard of any strangers around here during the past month?'

"I have not,' says I, 'except a report of one over at the Mexican quarters of Loomis' ranch, on the Frio.'

"'What do you know about him?' asks the deputy.

"' 'He's three days old,' says I.

"'What kind of a looking man is the man you work for?' he asks. 'Does old George Ramey own this place yet? He's run sheep here for the last ten years, but never had no success.'

"'The old man has sold out and gone West,' I tells him. 'Another sheep-fancier bought him out about a month ago.'

"'What kind of a looking man is he?' asks the deputy again.

"'Oh,' says I, a big, fat kind of a Dutchman with long whiskers and blue specs. I don't think he knows a sheep from a ground-squirrel. I guess old George soaked him pretty well on the deal,' says I.

"After indulging himself in a lot more noncommunicative information and two thirds of my dinner, the deputy rides away.

"That night I mentions the matter to Ogden.
"'They're drawing the tendrils of the octopus around Black Bill,' says I. And then I told him about the deputy sheriff, and how I'd described him to the deputy, and what the deputy said about the matter.

"'Oh, well,' says Ogden, 'let's don't borrow any of Black Bill's troubles. We've a few of our own. Get the Bourbon out of the cupboard and we'll drink to his health—unless,' says he, with his little cackling laugh, 'you're prejudiced against train-robbers.'

"'I'll drink,' says I, 'to any man who's a friend to a friend. And I believe that Black Bill,' I goes on, 'would be that. So here's to Black Bill, and may he have good luck.'

"And both of us drank.

"About two weeks later comes shearing-time. The sheep had to be driven up to the ranch, and a lot of frowzy-headed Mexicans would snip the fur off of them with back-action scissors. So the afternoon before the barbers were to come I hustled my under-done muttons over the hill, across the dell, down by the winding brook, and up to the ranch-house, where I penned 'em in a corral and bade 'em my nightly adieus.

"I went from there to the ranch-house. I find H. Ogden, Esquire, lying asleep on his little cot bed. I guess he had been overcome by anti-insomnia or diswakefulness or some of the diseases peculiar to the sheep business. His mouth and vest were open, and he breathed like a second-hand bicycle pump. I looked at him and gave vent to just a few musings. 'Imperial Caesar,' says I, 'asleep in such a way, might shut his mouth and keep the wind away.'

"A man asleep is certainly a sight to make angels weep. What good is all his brain, muscle, backing, nerve, influence, and family connections? He's at the mercy of his enemies. and more so of his friends. And he's about as beautiful as a cab-horse leaning against the Metropolitan Opera House at 12:30 A.M. dreaming of the plains of Arabia. Now, a woman asleep you regard as different. No matter how she looks, you know it's better for all hands for her to be that way.

"Well. I took a drink of Bourbon and one for Ogden, and started in to be comfortable while he was taking his nap. He had some books on his table on indigenous subjects, such as Japan and drainage and physical culture-and some tobacco, which seemed more to the point.

"After I'd smoked a few, and listened to the sartorial breathing of H. O., I happened to look out the window toward the shearing-pens. where there was a kind of a road coming up from a kind of road across a kind of creek farther away.

"I saw five men riding up to the house. All of 'em carried guns across their saddles, and among 'em was the deputy that had talked to me at my camp.

"They rode up careful, in open formation, with their guns ready. I set apart with my eve the one I opinionated to be the boss muckraker of this law-and-order cavalry.

"'Good-evening, gents,' says I. 'Won't you

'light and tie your horses?'

"The boss rides up close, and swings his gun over till the opening in it seems to cover my whole front elevation.

"'Don't you move your hands none,' says he, 'till you and me indulge in a adequate amount of necessary conversation.'

"'I will not,' says I. 'I am no deaf-mute, and therefore will not have to disobey your injunctions in replying.'

"'We are on the lookout,' says he, 'for Black Bill, the man that held up the Katy for $15,000 in May. We are searching the ranches and everybody on 'em. What is your name, and what do you do on this ranch?'

"'Captain,' says I, 'Percival Saint Clair is my occupation, and my name is sheep-herder. I've got my flock of veals-no, muttons-penned here to-night. The searchers are coming tomorrow to give them a hair-cut-with baa-a-rum, I suppose.'

"'Where's the boss of this ranch?' the captain of the gang asks me.

"'Wait just a minute, cap'n,' says I. 'Wasn't there a kind of a reward offered for the capture of this desperate character you have referred to in your preamble?'

"'There's a thousand dollars reward offered,' says the captain, 'but it's for his capture and conviction. There don't seem to be no provision made for an informer?

"'It looks like it might rain in a day or so,' says I, in a tired way, looking up at the ceru-lean blue sky.

"'If you know anything about the locality, disposition, or secretiveness of this here Black Bill.' says he, in a severe dialect, 'you are amiable to the law in not reporting it.'

"'I heard a fence-rider say,' says I, in a desultory kind of voice, 'that a Mexican told a cowboy named Take over at Pidgin's store on the Nueces that he heard that Black Bill had been seen in Matamoras by a sheepman's cousin two weeks ago.'

"'Tell you what I'll do, Tight Mouth,' says the captain, after looking me over for bargains. 'If you put us on so we can scoop Black Bill, I'll pay you a hundred dollars out of my ownout of our own—pockets. That's liberal,' says he. 'You ain't entitled to anything. Now. what do vou sav?'

"'Cash down now?' I ask.

"The captain has a sort of discussion with his helpmates, and they all produce the contents of their pockets for analysis. Out of the general results they figured up $102.30 in cash and $31 worth of plug tobacco.

"'Come nearer, capitan meeo,' says I, 'and listen.' He so did.

"'I am mighty poor and low down in the world,' says I. 'I am working for twelve dollars a month trying to keep a lot of animals together whose only thought seems to be to get asunder. Although,' says I, 'I regard myself as some better than the State of South Dakota, it's a come-down to a man who has heretofore regarded sheep only in the form of chops. I'm pretty far reduced in the world on account of foiled ambitions and rum and a kind of cocktail they make along the P.R.R. all the way from Scranton to Cincinnati-dry gin, French vermouth, one squeeze of a lime, and a good dash of orange If you're ever up that way, don't fail to let one try you. And, again,' says I, 'I have never yet went back on a friend. I've stayed by 'em when they had plenty, and when adversity's overtaken me I've never forsook 'em.

"'But,' I goes on, 'this is not exactly the case of a friend. Twelve dollars a month is only bowing-acquaintance money. And I do not consider brown beans and corn-bread the food of friendship. I am a poor man,' says I,

'and I have a widowed mother in Texarkana. You will find Black Bill, says I, 'lying asleep in this house on a cot in the room to your right. He's the man you want, as I know from his words and conversation. He was in a way a friend,' I explains, 'and if I was the man I once was the entire product of the mines of Gondola would not have tempted me to betray him. But,' says I, 'every week half of the beans was wormy, and not nigh enough wood in camp.

"'Better go in careful, gentlemen,' says I. 'He seems impatient at times, and when you think of his late professional pursuits one would look for abrupt actions if he was come upon sudden.'

"So the whole posse unmounts and ties their horses, and unlimbers their ammunition and equipments, and tiptoes into the house. And I follows, like Delilah when she set the Philip Steins on to Samson.

"The leader of the posse shakes Ogden and wakes him up. And then he jumps up, and two more of the reward-hunters grab him. Ogden was mighty tough with all his slimness, and he gives 'em as neat a single-footed tussle against odds as I ever see.

"'What does this mean?' he says, after they had him down.

"You're scooped in, Mr. Black Bill,' says the captain. 'That's all.'

"''It's an outrage,' says H. Ogden, madder yet

"'It was,' says the peace-and-good-will man. 'The Katy wasn't bothering you, and there's a law against monkeying with express packages.'

"And he sits on H. Ogden's stomach and goes through his pockets symptomatically and careful

"'I'll make you perspire for this,' says Ogden, perspiring some himself. 'I can prove who I am.'

"'So can I,' says the captain, as he draws from H. Ogden's inside coat-pocket a handful of new bills of the Second National Bank of Espinosa City. 'Your regular engraved Tuesdays-and-Fridays visiting card wouldn't have a louder voice in proclaiming your indemnity than this here currency. You can get up now and prepare to go with us and expatriate your sins.'

"H. Ogden gets up and fixes his necktie. He says no more after they have taken the money off of him.

"'A well-greased idea,' says the sheriff captain, admiring, 'to slip down here and buy a little sheep-ranch where the hand of man is seldom heard. It was the slickest hide-out I ever see,' says the captain.

"So one of the men goes to the shearing-pen and hunts up the other herder, a Mexican they call John Sallies, and he saddles Ogden's horse, and the sheriffs all ride up close around him with their guns in hand, ready to take their prisoner to town.

"Before starting, Ogden puts the ranch in John Sallies' hands and gives him orders about the shearing and where to graze the sheep, just as if he intended to be back in a few days. And a couple of hours afterward one Percival Saint Clair, an ex-sheep-herder of the Rancho Chiquito, might have been seen, with a hundred and nine dollars—wages and blood money—in his pocket, riding south on another horse belonging to said ranch."

The red-faced man paused and listened. The whistle of a coming freight-train sounded far away among the low hills.

The fat, seedy man at his side sniffed, and shook his frowzy head slowly and disparagingly.

"What is it, Snipy?" asked the other. "Got the blues again?"

"No, I ain't," said the seedy one, sniffing again. "But I don't like your talk. You and me have been friends, off and on, for fifteen year; and I never yet knew or heard of you giving anybody up to the law—not no one. And here was a man whose saleratus you had et and at whose table you had played games of cards—if casino can be so called. And yet you inform him to the law and take money for it. It never was like you, I say."

"This H. Ogden," resumed the red-faced man, "through a lawyer, proved himself free by alibis and other legal terminalities, as I so heard afterward. He never suffered no harm. He did me favors, and I hated to hand him over."

"How about the bills they found in his pocket?" asked the seedy man.

"I put 'em there," said the red-faced man, "while he was asleep, when I saw the posse riding up. I was Black Bill. Look out, Snipy, here she comes! We'll board her on the bumpers when she takes water."

1920

FINLEY PETER DUNNE (Mr. Dooley) 1867-

The satire of Mr. Dunne, good-humored, witty, and showing a penetrating estimate of passing events, grew out of the author's direct contact with men and public affairs in his newspaper work. Mr. Dunne was born in Chicago, was educated there in the public schools, at eighteen became a newspaper reporter, and advanced through all grades of journalism. Most of his essays appeared in newspapers. through which they reached a vast number of readers. In the character of Mr. Dooley, supposed to be a Chicago saloon-keeper, Mr. Dunne expressed in Irish-American dialect his views on well-known men and events, and on social and political problems of the moment. Mr. Dooley's shrewd observations based upon his own hard life, his conversation with his customers, and a little reading, are a mixture of good-natured wit and common sense. Keen as are his unexpected thrusts, they show a nature much more inclined to kindliness than to cynicism.

Mr. Dunne's essays are collected in Mr. Doolev in Peace and War, 1898; Mr. Dooley in the Hearts of his Countrymen, 1898; Mr. Dooley's Philosophy, 1900, and Mr. Dooley Says, 1910.

Criticism: "People in the Foreground," Cur. Lit. 38:29; F. G. Clark, Bookm. 12:321-3; W. D. Howells, No. Am. 176:743-6.

From MR. DOOLEY SAYS 1

GLORY

"Hogan has been in here this afthernoon, an' I've heerd more scandal talked thin I iver thought was in the wurrld."

"Hogan had betther keep quiet," said Mr. Hennessy. "If he goes circulatin' anny stories about me I'll-"

"Ye needn't worry," said Mr. Doolev. "We didn't condiscend to talk about annywan iv ve'er infeeryor station. If ye want to be the subjick iv our scand'lous discoorse ye'd betther go out an' make a repytation. No, sir, our talk was entirely about th' gr-reat an' illusthrees an' it ran all th' way fr'm Julius Cayzar to Ulysses

"Dear, oh dear, but they were th' bad lot. Thank th' Lord nobody knows about me. Thank th' Lord I had th' good sinse to retire fr'm pollyticks whin me repytation had spread as far as Halsted Sthreet. If I'd let it go a block farther I'd've been sorry f'r it th' rest iv me life an' some years afther me death.

"I wanted to be famous in thim days, whin I was young an' foolish. 'Twas th' dhream iv me life to have people say as I wint by: 'There goes Dooley, th' gr-reatest statesman iv his age,' an' have thim name babies, sthreets, schools, canal boats, an' five-cent seegars afther me, an' whin I died to have it put in th' books that 'at this critical peeryod in th' history of America there was need iv a man who combined strenth iv charackter with love iv counthry. Such a man was found in Martin Dooley, a prom'nent retail liquor dealer in Ar-rchev Road.'

"That's what I wanted, an' I'm glad I didn't get me wish. If I had, 'tis little attintion to me charackter that th' books iv what Hogan calls bi-ography wud pay, but a good deal to me debts. Though they mintioned th' fact that I resked death f'r me adopted fatherland, they'd make th' more intherestin' story about the time I almost met it be fallin' down stairs while runnin' away fr'm a polisman. F'r wan page they'd print about me love iv counthry, they'd print fifty about me love iv dhrink.

"Th' things thim gr-reat men done wud give thim a place in Byrnes's book. If Julius Caysar was alive to-day he'd be doin' a lock-step down in Joliet. He was a corner loafer in his youth an' a robber in his old age. He busted into churches, fooled ar-round with other men's wives, curled his hair with a poker an' smelled iv perfumery like a Saturday night car. An' his wife was a suspicyious charackter an' he turned her away.

"Napolyon Bonypart, impror iv the Fr-rinch, was far too gay aven f'r thim friv'lous people. an' had fits. His first wife was no betther than she shud be, an' his second wife didn't care f'r him. Willum Shakespeare is well known as an author of plays that no wan can play, but he was betther known as a two-handed dhrinker, a bad actor, an' a thief. His wife was a common scold an' led him th' life he desarved.

"They niver leave th' ladies out iv these stories iv th' gr-reat. A woman that marries a janius has a fine chance iv her false hair becomin' more immortal thin his gr-reatest deed. It don't make anny diff'rence if all she knew about her marital hero was that he was a consistent feeder, a sleepy husband, an' indulgent to his childher an' sometimes to himsilf, an' that she had to darn his socks. Nearly all th' gr-reat men had something th' matther with their wives. I always thought Mrs. Washington, who was th' wife iv the father iv our counthry, though childless hersilf, was about right. She looks good in th' pitchers, with a shawl ar-round her neck an' a frilled night-cap on her head. But Hogan says she had a tongue sharper thin George's soord, she insulted all his frinds, an' she was much older thin him. As f'r George, he was a case. I wish th' counthry had got itsilf a diff'rent father. A gr-reat moral rellijous counthry like this desarves a betther parent.

"They were all alike. I think iv Bobby Burns as a man that wrote good songs, aven if they were in a bar'brous accint, but Hogan thinks iv him as havin' a load all th' time an' bein' th' scandal iv his parish. I remimber Andhrew Jackson as th' man that licked th' British at Noo Orleans be throwin' cotton bales at thim, but Hogan remimbers him as a man that cudden't spell an' had a wife who smoked a corncob pipe. I remimber Abraham Lincoln f'r freein' the slaves, but Hogan remimbers how he used to cut loose yarns that made th' bartinder shake th' stove harder thin it needed. I remimber Grant f'r what he done ar-round Shiloh whin he was young, but Hogan remimbers him f'r what he done arr-round New York whin he was old.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons.

"An' so it goes. Whin a lad with nawthin' else to do starts out to write a bi-ography about a gr-reat man, he don't go to th' war departmint or th' public library. No, sir, he begins to search th' bureau dhrawers, old pigeon-holes, th' records iv th' polis coort, an' th' recollections iv th' hired girl. He likes letters betther thin annything else. He don't care much f'r th' kind beginnin': 'Dear wife, I'm settin' in front iv th' camp fire wearin' th' flannel chest protector ye made me, an' dhreamin' iv ye,' but if he can find wan beginnin': 'Little Bright Eyes: Th' old woman has gone to th' counthry,' he's th' happiest bi-ographer ye cud see in a month's thravel.

"Hogan had wan iv thim books in here th' other day. 'Twas written by a frind, so ye can see it wasn't prejudiced wan way or another. 'At this time,' says the book, 'an ivint happened that was destined to change th' whole coorse iv our hero's life. Wan day, while in a sthreet car, where he lay dozin' fr'm dhrink, he awoke to see a beautiful woman thryin' to find a nickel in a powder puff. Th' brutal conductor towered over her, an' it was more thin th' Gin'ral cud bear. Risin' to his feet, with an oath, he pulled th' rope iv th' fare register an' fell off th' car.

"'Th' incident made a deep impression on th' Gin'ral. I have no doubt he often thought iv his beautiful Madonna iv th' throlly, although he niver said so. But wan night as he staggered out iv th' dinin'-room at th' German Ambassadure's, who shud he run acrost but th' fair vision iv th' surface line. She curtsied low an' picked him up, an' there began a frindship so full iv sorrow an' happiness to both iv thim. He seldom mintioned her, but wan night he was heard to mutter: 'Her face is like wan iv Rembrand's saints.' A few historyans contind that what he said was: 'Her face looks like a remnant sale,' but I cannot believe this.

"'They exchanged brilliant letters f'r manny years, in fact ontil th' enchanthress was locked up in an insane asylum. I have not been able to find anny iv his letters, but her's fell into th' hands iv wan iv his faithful servants, who presarved an' published thim. (Love an' Letters iv Gin'ral Dhreadnaught an' Alfaretta Agonized; Stolen, Collected an' Edited be James Snooper.') . . . Next year was min'rable f'r his gloryous victhry at Punkheim, all th' more wondherful because at th' time our hero was sufferin' fr'm deleeryyum thremens.

"'It shows th' fortitude iv th' Gin'ral an' that he was as gr-reat a liar as I have indicated in th' precedin' pages, that with th' cheers iv his soiers ringin' in his ears, he cud still write home to his wife: 'Ol' girl-I can't find annything fit to dhrink down here. Can't ye sind me some cider fr'm th' farm.' . . . In 1865 he was accused iv embezzlemint, but th' charges niver reached his ears or th' public's ontil eight years afther his death.... In '67 his foster brother, that he had neglected in Kansas City, slipped on his ballroom flure an' broke his leg. . . . In '70 his wife died afther torturin' him f'r fifty years. They were a singularly badly mated couple, with a fam'ly iv fourteen childher, but he did not live long to enjoy his happiness. F'r some reason he niver left his house, but passed away within a month, one of th' gr-reatest men th' cinchry has projooced. For further details iv th' wrong things he done see th' notes at th' end iv th' volume.

"It seems to me, Hinnissy, that this here thing called bi-ography is a kind iv an offset f'r histhry. Histhry lies on wan side, an' bi-ography comes along an' makes it rowl over an' lie on th' other side. Th' historyan says, go up; th' bi-ographer says, come down among us. I don't believe avether iv thim.

"I was talkin' with Father Kelly about it afther Hogan wint out. 'Were they all so bad, thim men that I've been brought up to think so gloryous?' says I. 'They were men.' says Father Kelly. 'Ye mustn't believe all ye hear about thim, no matther who says it,' says he. 'It's a thrait iv human nature to pull down th' gr-reat an strong. Th' hero sthruts through histhry with his chin up in th' air, his scipter in his hand an' his crown on his head. But behind him dances a boot-black imitatin' his walk an' makin' faces at him. Fame invites a man out iv his house to be crowned f'r his gloryous deeds, an' sarves him with a warrant f'r batin' his wife. 'Tis not in th' nature iv things that it shudden't be so. We'd all perish iv humilyation if th' gr-reat men iv th' wurruld didn't have nachral low-down thraits. If they don't happen to possess thim, we make some up f'r thim. We allow no man to tower over us. Wan way or another we level th' wurruld to our own height. If we can't reach th' hero's head we cut off his legs. It always makes me feel aisier about mesilr whin I r-read how bad Julius Cayzar was. An' it stimulates compytition. If gr-reatness an' goodness were hand in hand 'tis small chance anny iv us wud have iv seein' our pitchers in th' pa-apers.'

"An' so it is that the battles ye win, th' pitchers ye paint, th' people ye free, th' childher that disgrace ye, th' false step iv ye'er youth, all go thundherin' down to immortality together. An afther all, isn't it a good thing? Th' only bi-ography I care about is th' one Mullian th' stone-cutter will chop out f'r me.

Th' only bi-ography I care about is th' one Mulligan th' stone-cutter will chop out f'r me. I like Mulligan's style, f'r he's no flatthrer, an' he has wan model iv bi-ography that he uses f'r old an' young, rich an' poor. He merely writes something to th' gin'ral effect that th' deceased was a wondher, an' lets it go at that."

"Which wud ye rather be, famous or rich?"

asked Mr. Hennessey.

"I'd like to be famous," said Mr. Dooley, "an' have money enough to buy off all threatenin' bi-ographers."

1910

OWEN WISTER 1860-

Owen Wister, despite his ability to interpret the Western mind, is no more of the West than of the East. In him two hundred years of Pennsylvania ancestry and three scholastic degrees at Harvard are pitted against numberless journeys through the desert states, whose romance drew him to them again and again. He has been an editor, a musician, a critic; he is a member of the American Academy of Arts and Letters, as well as of similar European learned societies. His life has been full and active but always dominated by his literary impulse. Red Men and White, in 1896, called attention to Mr. Wister as a short-story writer; The Virginian, 1902, of which the author says, "It pictures an era and personifies a type," and Lady Baltimore, 1906, his highest artistic success, have made him well known as a novelist. The romance in his work is firmly based in realism, for, like other chroniclers of the West, he has felt the desire to interpret truly the picturesque life of the plains and the mountains. He has grown increasingly able to mirror the inner life of the types with which he has come into contact, particularly the Indians. In Lin McLean, 1898, he cast a novel into the form of a series of short stories, thus interpreting "the nomadic West by a nomadic artform." Occasionally he depicts scenes from the romantic Spanish occupation of the Pacific coast. His work is clean and sure, and always full of life.

Criticism: H. W. Boynton, "A Word on 'The Genteel Critic,'" Dial 59:303-6; Bookm. 27: 458-

66.

PADRE IGNACIO<sup>1</sup>

т

At Santa Ysabel del Mar the season was at one of those moments when the air rests quiet over land and sea. The old breezes were gone; the new ones were not yet risen. The flowers in the mission garden opened wide; no wind came by day or night to shake the loose petals from their stems. Along the basking, silent, manycolored shore gathered and lingered the crisp odors of the mountains. The dust hung golden and motionless long after the rider was behind the hill, and the Pacific lay like a floor of sapphire, whereon to walk beyond the setting sun into the East. One white sail shone there. Instead of an hour, it had been from dawn till afternoon in sight between the short headlands; and the Padre had hoped that it might be the ship his homesick heart awaited. But it had slowly passed. From an arch in his garden cloisters he was now watching the last of it. Presently it was gone, and the great ocean lay empty. The Padre put his glasses in his lap. For a while he read in his breviary, but soon forgot it again. He looked at the flowers and sunny ridges, then at the huge blue triangle of sea which the opening of the hills let into sight. "Paradise," he murmured, "need not hold more beauty and peace. But I think I would exchange all my remaining years of this for one sight again of Paris or Seville. May God forgive me such a thought!"

Across the unstirred fragrance of oleanders the bell for vespers began to ring. Its tones passed over the Padre as he watched the sea in his garden. They reached his parishioners in their adobe dwellings near by. The gentle circles of sound floated outward upon the smooth, immense silence-over the vines and pear-trees; down the avenues of the olives; into the planted fields, whence women and children began to return; then out of the lap of the valley along the yellow uplands, where the men that rode among the cattle paused, looking down like birds at the map of their home. Then the sound widened, faint, unbroken, until it met Temptation in the guise of a youth, riding toward the Padre from the South, and cheered the steps of Temptation's jaded horse.

"For a day, one single day of Paris!" repeated the Padre, gazing through his cloisters at the empty sea.

Once in the year, the mother-world remembered him. Once in the year, from Spain, tokens and home-tidings came to him, sent by certain beloved friends of his youth. A barkentine brought him these messages. Whenever thus the mother-world remembered him, it was like the touch of a warm hand, a dear and tender caress: a distant life, by him long left behind, seemed to be drawing the exile homeward from these alien shores. As the time for his letters and packets drew near, the eyes of Padre Ignacio would be often fixed wistfully upon the harbor, watching for the barkentine. Sometimes, as to-day, he mistook other sails for hers, but hers he mistook never. That Pacific Ocean, which, for all its hues and jeweled mists, he could not learn to love, had, since long before his day, been furrowed by the keels of Spain. Traders, and adventurers, the men of God had passed along this coast, planting their colonies and cloisters; but it was not his ocean. In the year that we, a thin strip of patriots away over on the Atlantic edge of the continent, declared ourselves an independent nation, a Spanish ship, in the name of Saint Francis, was unloading the centuries of her own civilization at the Golden Gate. San Diego had come earlier. Then, slowly, as mission after mission was built along the soft coast wilderness, new ports were established—at Santa Barbara, and by Point San Luis for San Luis Obispo, which lav inland a little way up the gorge where it opened among the hills. Thus the world reached these missions by water; while on land, through the mountains, a road led to them, and also to many more that were too distant behind the hills for ships to serve—a rough road, long and lonely, punctuated with church towers and gardens. For the Fathers gradually so stationed their settlements that the traveler might each morning ride out from one mission and by evening of a day's fair journey ride into the next. A lonely, rough, dangerous road, but lovely, too, with a name like music-El Camino Real. 1 Like music also were the names of the missions—San Juan Capistrano, San Luis Rey de Francis, San Miguel, Santa Ynez-their very list is a song.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of Harper and Brothers, publishers.

So there, by-and-by, was our continent, with the locomotive whistling from Savannah to Boston along its eastern edge, and on the western the scattered chimes of Spain, ringing among the unpeopled mountains. Thus grew the two sorts of civilization—not equally. We know what has happened since. To-day the locomotive is whistling also from The Golden Gate to San Diego: but still the old missionroad goes through the mountains, and along it the footsteps of vanished Spain are marked with roses, and broken cloisters, and the crucifix.

But this was 1855. Only the barkentine brought to Padre Ignacio the signs from the world that he once had known and loved so dearly. As for the new world making a rude noise to the northward, he trusted that it might keep away from Santa Ysabel, and he waited for the vessel that was overdue with its package containing his single worldly luxury.

As the little, ancient bronze bell continued swinging in the tower, its plaintive call reached something in the Padre's memory. Softly, absently, he began to sing. He took up the slow strain not quite correctly, and dropped it, and took it up again, always in cadence with the hell:

At length he heard himself, and, glancing at the belfry, smiled a little. "It is a pretty tune." he said, "and it always made me sorry for poor Fra Diavolo. 2 Auber himself confessed to me that he had made it sad and put the hermitage bell to go with it, because he too was grieved at having to kill his villain, and wanted him, if possible, to die in a religious frame of mind. And Auber touched glasses with me and said how well I remember it!—'Is it the good Lord, or is it merely the devil, that makes me always have a weakness for rascals?' I told him it was the devil. I was not a priest then. I could not be so sure with my answer now." And then Padre Ignacio repeated Auber's remark in French: "'Est-ce le bon Dieu, ou est-ce bien le diable, qui veut toujours que j'aime les coquins?' I don't know! I don't know! I wonder if Auber has composed anything lately? I wonder who is singing 'Zerlina' now?"

He cast a farewell look at the ocean, and took his steps between the monastic herbs, the jasmines and the oleanders to the sacristy. "At least," he said, "if we cannot carry with us into exile the friends and the places we have loved, music will go whither we go, even to an end of the world such as this.—Felipe!" he called to his organist. "Can they sing the music I taught them for the Dixit Dominus 1 to-night?"

&lt;sup>1</sup> the King's Highway, the original road from San Diego northward connecting all the coast missions of Spanish California

 &lt;sup>2</sup> a character in Fra Diavolo, an opera by Auber, a French composer, 1782-1871
 <sup>3</sup> the leading soprano rôle in Fra Diavolo

"Yes, father, surely."

"Then we will have that. And, Felipe—"
The Padre crossed the chancel to the small, shabby organ. "Rise, my child, and listen. Here is something you can learn. Why, see now if you cannot learn it from a single hearing."

The swarthy boy of sixteen stood watching his master's fingers, delicate and white, as they played. Thus, of his own accord, he had begun to watch them when a child of six; and the Padre had taken the wild, half-scared, spellbound creature and made a musician of him.

"There, Felipe!" he said now. "Can you do it? Slower, and more softly, muchacho mio. <sup>2</sup> It is about the death of a man, and it should go with our bell."

The boy listened. "Then the father has played it a tone too low," said he, "for our bell rings the note of sol, or something very near it, as the father must surely know." He placed the melody in the right key—an easy thing for him; and the Padre was delighted.

"Ah, my Felipe," he exclaimed, "what could you and I not do if we had a better organ! Only a little better! See! above this row of keys would be a second row, and many more stops. Then we would make such music as has never yet been heard in California. But my people are so poor and so few! And some day I shall have passed from them, and it will be too late."

"Perhaps," ventured Felipe, "the Americanos—"

"They care nothing for us, Felipe. They are not of our religion—or of any religion, from what I can hear. Don't forget my Dixit Dominus."

The Padre retired once more to the sacristy, while the horse that brought Temptation came over the hill.

The hour of service drew near; and as the Padre waited he once again stepped out for a look at the ocean; but the blue triangle of water lay like a picture in its frame of land, bare as the sky. "I think, from the color, though," said he, "that a little more wind must have begun out there."

The bell rang a last short summons to prayer. Along the road from the south a young rider, leading a pack-animal, ambled into the mission and dismounted. Church was not so much in his thoughts as food and, after due digestion, a bed; but the doors stood open, and, as everybody was passing within them, more variety was to be gained by joining this company than by waiting outside alone until they should return from their devotions. So he seated himself in a corner near the entrance, and after a brief, jaunty glance at the sunburned, shaggy congregation, made himself as comfortable as might be. He had not seen a face worth keeping his eyes open for. The simple choir and simple fold, gathered for even-song, paid him no attention—a rough American bound for the mines was but an object of aversion to them.

The Padre, of course, had been instantly aware of the stranger's presence. To be aware of unaccustomed presences is the sixth sense with vicars of every creed and heresy; and if the parish is lonely and the worshipers few and seldom varying, a newcomer will gleam out like a new book to be read. And a trained priest learns to read keenly the faces of those who assemble to worship under his guidance. But American vagrants, with no thoughts save of gold-digging, and an overweening illiterate jargon for speech, had long ceased to interest this priest, even in his starvation for company and talk from the outside world; and therefore after the intoning he sat with his homesick thoughts unchanged, to draw both pain and enjoyment from the music that he had set to the Dixit Dominus. He listened to the tender chorus that opens William Tell; 3 and, as the Latin psalm proceeded, pictures of the past rose between him and the altar. One after another came these strains he had taken from operas famous in their day, until at length the Padre was murmuring to some music seldom long out of his heart—not the Latin verse which the choir sang, but the original French words:

> "Ah, voilà mon envie, Voilà mon seul désir: Rendez moi ca patrie, Ou laissez moi mourir."

Which may be rendered:

"But one wish I implore,
One wish is all my cry:
Give back my native land once more,
Give back, or let me die."

Then it happened that his eye fell again upon the stranger near the door, and he straightway forgot his Dixit Dominus. The face of the an opera by Rossini, an Italian composer, 1792-1868 young man was no longer hidden by the slouching position he had at first taken. "I only noticed his clothes at first," thought the Padre. Restlessness was plain upon the handsome brow. and violence was in the mouth; but Padre Ignacio liked the eyes. "He is not saying any prayers," he surmised, presently. "I doubt if he has said any for a long while. And he knows my music. He is of educated people. He cannot be American. And now-yes, he has taken —I think it must be a flower, from his pocket. I shall have him to dine with me." And vespers ended with rosy clouds of eagerness drifting across the Padre's brain.

&lt;sup>1</sup> an antiphon (Psalm 110) used in several liturgies at vespers and set to different musical arrangements <sup>2</sup> my lad

TT

But the stranger made his own beginning. As the priest came from the church, the rebellious young figure was waiting. "Your organist tells me," he said impetuously, "that it is you who—"

"May I ask with whom I have the great pleasure of speaking?" said the Padre, putting formality to the front and his pleasure out of sight.

The stranger's face reddened beneath its sunbeaten bronze, and he became aware of the Padre's pale features, molded by refinement and the world. "I beg your lenience," said he, with a graceful and confident utterance, as of equal to equal. "My name is Gaston Villeré, and it was time I should be reminded of my

The Padre's hand waved a polite negative.

"Indeed, yes, Padre. But your music has amazed me. If you carried such associations as-Ah! the days and the nights!"-he broke "To come down a California mountain and find Paris at the bottom! The Huguenots, 1 Rossini, Hérold <sup>2</sup>—I was waiting for *Il Trova*tore."3

"Is that something new?" inquired the Padre, eagerly.

The young man gave an exclamation. "The whole world is ringing with it!" he cried.

"But Santa Ysabel del Mar is a long way from the whole world," murmured Padre Ignacio.

"Indeed, it would not appear to be so," returned young Gaston. "I think the Comédie Française 4 must be round the corner."

A thrill went through the priest at the theater's name. "And have you been long in America?" he asked.

"Why, always-except two years of foreign travel after college."

"An American!" exclaimed the surprised Padre, with perhaps a tone of disappointment in his voice. "But no Americans who are yet come this way have been-have been"-he veiled the too-blunt expression of this thought -"have been familiar with The Huguenots," he finished, making a slight bow.

Villeré took his under-meaning. from New Orleans," he returned. "And in New Orleans there live many of us who can recognize a-who can recognize good music wherever we hear it." And he made a slight how in his turn.

The Padre laughed outright with pleasure and laid his hand upon the young man's arm. "You have no intention of going away tomorrow, I trust?"

"With your leave," answered Gaston, "I will have such an intention no longer."

It was with the air and gait of mutual understanding that the two now walked on together toward the Padre's door. The guest was twenty-five, the host sixty.

"And have you been in America long?" inquired Gaston.

"Twenty years."

"And at Santa Ysabel how long?"

"Twenty years."

"I should have thought," said Gaston, looking lightly at the desert and unpeopled mountains, "that now and again you might have wished to travel."

"Were I your age," murmured Padre Ignacio, "it might be so."

The evening had now ripened to the long after-glow of sunset. The sea was the purple of grapes, and wine-colored hues flowed among the high shoulders of the mountains.

"I have seen a sight like this," said Gaston,

"between Granada and Malaga."

"So you know Spain!" said the Padre.

Often he had thought of this resemblance. but never till now met any one to share his thought. The courtly proprietor of San Fernando and the other patriarchal rancheros with whom he occasionally exchanged visits across the wilderness knew hospitality and inherited gentle manners, sending to Europe for silks and laces to give their daughters; but their eyes had not looked upon Granada, and their ears had never listened to William Tell.

"It is quite singular," pursued Gaston, "how one nook in the world will suddenly remind you of another nook that may be thousands of miles away. One morning, behind the Quai Voltaire. 1 an old, vellow house with rusty balconies made me almost homesick for New Orleans."

&lt;sup>1</sup> an opera by Meyerbeer, a German composer, 1791-1864 <sup>2</sup> a French composer, 1791-1833 <sup>3</sup> an opera by Verdi, an Italian composer, 1813-1901 <sup>4</sup> the official name of the Théâtre Française

"The Quai Voltaire!" said the Padre.

"I heard Rachel 2 in Valerie 3 that night." the young man went on. "Did you know that she could sing, too? She sang several verses by an astonishing little Jew violin-cellist that is come up over there."

The Padre gazed down at his blithe guest. "To see somebody, somebody, once again, is very pleasant to a hermit!"

"It cannot be more pleasant than arriving at an oasis," returned Gaston.

They had delayed on the threshold to look at the beauty of the evening, and now the priest watched his parishioners come and go. "How can one make companions-" he began; then, checking himself, he said: "Their souls are as sacred and immortal as mine, and God helps me to help them. But in this world it is not immortal souls that we choose for companions; it is kindred tastes, intelligences, and -and so I and my books are growing old together, you see," he added, more lightly. "You will find my volumes as behind the times as myself."

He had fallen into talk more intimate than he wished; and while the guest was uttering something polite about the nobility of missionary work, he placed him in an easy-chair and sought aguardiente 4 for his immediate refreshment. Since the year's beginning there had been no guest for him to bring into his rooms, or to sit beside him in the high seats at table, set apart for the gente fina. 5

Such another library was not then in California; and though Gaston Villeré, in leaving Harvard College, had shut Horace and Sophocles for ever at the earliest instant possible under academic requirements, he knew the Greek and Latin names that he now saw as well as he knew those of Shakespeare, Dante, Molière, and Cervantes. These were here also; but it could not be precisely said of them, either, that they made a part of the young man's daily reading. As he surveyed the Padre's august shelves, it was with a touch of the histrionic Southern gravity which his Northern education had not wholly schooled out of him that he said:

"I fear I am no scholar, sir. But I know and his vivacity returned to him. Leaving his chair, he began enthusiastically to examine the tall piles that filled one side of the room. The volumes lay piled and scattered everywhere. making a pleasant disorder; and, as perfume what writers every gentleman ought to respect."

The polished Padre bowed gravely to this com-music that the young man felt again at ease.

It was when his eyes caught sight of the comes from a flower, memories of singers and chandeliers rose bright from the printed names. Norma, 6 Tancredi, 7 Don Pasquale, 8 La Vestale, 9 dim lights in the fashions of to-day, sparkled upon the exploring Gaston, conjuring the radiant halls of Europe before him. "The Barber of Seville!" 10 he presently ex-ville."

But Seville's name brought over the Padre a new rush of home thoughts. "Is not Andalusia beautiful?" he said. "Did you see it in April, when the flowers come?"

claimed. "And I happened to hear it in Se-

"Yes," said Gaston, among the music.

was at Cordova then."

"Ah. Cordova!" murmured the Padre.

"Semiramide!" 11 exclaimed Gaston, lighting upon that opera. "That was a week! I should like to live it over, every day and night of it!"

"Did you reach Malaga from Marseilles or Gibraltar?" asked the Padre, wistfully.

"From Marseilles. Down from Paris through the Rhone Valley, you know."

"Then you saw Provence! And did you go, perhaps, from Avignon to Nismes by the Pont du Gard? 12 There is a place I have made here -a little, little place-with olive-trees. And now they have grown, and it looks something like that country, if you stand in a particular position. I will take you there to-morrow. I think you will understand what I mean."

"Another resemblance!" said the volatile and happy Gaston. "We both seem to have an eye But, believe me, Padre, I could never stay here planting olives. I should go back and see the original ones-and then I'd hasten on to Paris." And, with a volume of Meyerbeer open in his hand, Gaston hummed: "'Robert, Robert, toi que j'aime.' 13 Why, Padre, I think that your library contains none

<sup>1</sup> a street on the bank of the Seine bordering the Latin

quarter
<sup>2</sup> Elisa Rachel, a French tragédienne, 1821-1858
<sup>3</sup> probably Feltre's opera
<sup>4</sup> a strong spirituous liquor
<sup>5</sup> those of higher social rank

&lt;sup>6</sup> an opera by Bellini, an Italian composer, 1801-1835 <sup>7</sup> an opera by Rossini <sup>8</sup> an opera by Donizetti, an Italian composer, 1797-1848 <sup>9</sup> an opera by Spontini, an Italian composer, 1774-1851

o a comic opera by Rossini an opera by Rossini all places in southern France, with a climate like that of the California coast 18 "Robert, Robert, thee whom I love" from Meyerbeer's Robert the Devil of the masses and all of the operas in the world!"

"I will make you a little confession," said Padre Ignacio, "and then you shall give me a little absolution."

"For a penance," said Gaston; "you must play over some of these things to me."

"I suppose I could not permit myself this luxury," began the Padre, pointing to his operas, "and teach these to my choir, if the people had any worldly associations with the music. But I have reasoned that the music cannot do them harm—"

The ringing of a bell here interrupted him. "In fifteen minutes," he said, "our poor meal will be ready for you." The good Padre was not quite sincere when he spoke of a "poor meal." While getting the aguardiente for his guest he had given orders, and he knew how well such orders would be carried out. He lived alone, and generally supped simply enough, but not even the ample table at San Fernando could surpass his own on occasions. And this was for him indeed an occasion!

"Your half-breeds will think I am one of themselves," said Gaston, showing his dusty clothes. "I am not fit to be seated with you." But he did not mean this any more than his host had meant his remark about the food. In his pack, which an Indian had brought from his horse, he carried some garments of civilization. And presently, after fresh water and not a little painstaking with brush and scarf, there came back to the Padre a young guest whose elegance and bearing and ease of the great world were to the exiled priest as sweet as was his traveled conversation.

They repaired to the hall and took their seats at the head of the long table. For the Spanish centuries of stately custom lived at Santa Ysabel del Mar, inviolate, feudal, remote.

They were the only persons of quality present; and between themselves and the gente de razon¹ a space intervened. Behind the Padre's chair stood an Indian to wait upon him, and another stood behind the chair of Gaston Villeré. Each of these servants wore one single white garment, and offered the many dishes to the gente fina and refilled their glasses. At the lower end of the table a general attendant waited upon mesclados—the half-breeds. There was meat with spices, and roasted quail, with various cakes and other preparations of grain; also the brown fresh olives and grapes, with several sorts of figs and plums, and preserved fruits, and white and red wine—the

There at one end of this feast sat the wild. pastoral, gaudy company, speaking little over their food; and there at the other the pale Padre, questioning his visitor about Rachel. The mere name of a street could bring memories crowding to his lips; and when his guest told him of a new play he was ready with old quotations from the same author. Alfred de Vigny they spoke of, and Victor Hugo, whom the Padre disliked. Long after the dulce, or sweet dish. when it was the custom for the vaqueros and the rest of the retainers to rise and leave the gente fina to themselves, the host sat on in the empty hall, fondly talking to his guest of his bygone Paris and fondly learning of the later Paris that the guest had seen. And thus the two lingered, exchanging their enthusiasms, while the candles waned, and the longhaired Indians stood silent behind the chairs.

"But we must go to my piano," the host exclaimed. For at length they had come to a lusty difference of opinion. The Padre, with ears critically deaf, and with smiling, unconvinced eyes, was shaking his head, while young Gaston sang Trovatore at him, and beat upon the table with a fork.

"Come and convert me, then," said Padre Ignacio, and he led the way. "Donizetti I have always admitted. There, at least, is refinement. If the world has taken to this Verdi, with his street-band music-But there, now! Sit down and convert me. Only don't crush my poor little Erard 2 with Verdi's hoofs. I brought it when I came. It is behind the times, too. And. oh, my dear boy, our organ is still worse. So old, so old! To get a proper one I would sacrifice even this piano of mine in a moment—only the tinkling thing is not worth a sou to anybody except its master. But there! Are you quite comfortable?" And having seen to his guest's needs, and placed spirits and cigars and an ashtray within his reach, the Padre sat himself comfortably in his chair to hear and expose the false doctrine of Il Trovatore.

By midnight all of the opera that Gaston could recall had been played and sung twice. The convert sat in his chair no longer, but stood singing by the piano. The potent swing and flow of rhythms, the torrid, copious inspiration of the South, mastered him. "Verdi has grown," he cried. "Verdi is become a giant." And he swayed to the beat of the melodies, and white fifty years old. Beneath the quiet shining of candles, fresh-cut flowers leaned from vessels of old Mexican and Spanish make.

<sup>1</sup> here, those of lower station

&lt;sup>2</sup> Just before 1800 the elder Erard began piano making in Paris.

waved an enthusiastic arm. He demanded every note. Why did not Gaston remember it all? But if the barkentine would arrive and bring the whole music, then they would have it right! And he made Gaston teach him what words he knew. "'Non ti scordar,' he sang—"'non ti scordar di mi.' 1 That is genius. But one sees how the world moves when one is out of it. 'A nostri monti ritorneremo'; 2 home to our mountains. Ah, yes, there is genius again." And the exile sighed and his spirit voyaged to distant places, while Gaston continued brilliantly with the music of the final scene.

Then the host remembered his guest. "I am ashamed of my selfishness," he said. "It is already to-morrow."

"I have sat later in less good company," answered the pleasant Gaston. "And I shall sleep all the sounder for making a convert."

"You have dispensed roadside alms," said the Padre, smiling. "And that should win excellent dreams."

Thus, with courtesies more elaborate than the world has time for at the present day, they bade each other good-night and parted, bearing their late candles along the quiet halls of the mission. To young Gaston in his bed easy sleep came without waiting, and no dreams at all. Outside his open window was the quiet, serene darkness, where the stars shone clear, and tranquil perfumes hung in the cloisters. But while the guest lay sleeping all night in unchanged position like a child, up and down between the oleanders went Padre Ignacio, walking until dawn. Temptation indeed had come over the hill and entered the cloisters.

TTT

Day showed the ocean's surface no longer glassy, but lying like a mirror breathed upon: and there between the short headlands came a sail, gray and plain against the flat water. The priest watched through his glasses, and saw the gradual sun grow strong upon the canvas of the barkentine. The message from his world was at hand, yet to-day he scarcely cared so Sitting in his garden yesterday, he much. could never have imagined such a change. But his heart did not hail the barkentine as usual. Books, music, pale paper, and print—this was all that was coming to him, and some of its savor had gone; for the siren voice of Life had been speaking with him face to face, and in his spirit, deep down, the love of the world was restlessly answering it. Young Gaston showed more eagerness than the Padre over this arrival of the vessel that might be bringing Trovatore in the nick of time. Now he would have the chance, before he took his leave, to help rehearse the new music with the choir. He would be a missionary, too: a perfectly new experience.

"And you still forgive Verdi the sins of his youth?" he said to his host. "I wonder if you could forgive mine?"

"Verdi has left his behind him," retorted the

"But I am only twenty-five!" exclaimed Gaston, pathetically.

"Ah, don't go away soon!" pleaded the exile. It was the first unconcealed complaint that had escaped him, and he felt instant shame.

But Gaston was too much elated with the enjoyment of each new day to comprehend the Padre's soul. The shafts of another's pain might hardly pierce the bright armor of his gaiety. He mistook the priest's entreaty, for anxiety about his own happy spirit.

"Stay here under your care?" he asked. "It would do me no good, Padre. Temptation sticks closer to me than a brother!" and he gave that laugh of his which had disarmed severer judges than his host. "By next week I should have introduced some sin or other into your beautiful Garden of Ignorance here. It will be much safer for your flock if I go and join the other serpents at San Francisco."

Soon after breakfast the Padre had his two mules saddled, and he and his guest set forth down the hills together to the shore. And, beneath the spell and confidence of pleasant, slow riding and the loveliness of everything, the young man talked freely of himself.

"And seriously," said he, "if I missed nothing else at Santa Ysabel, I should long for—how shall I say it?—for insecurity, for danger, and of all kinds—not merely danger to the body. Within these walls, beneath these sacred bells, you live too safe for a man like me."

"Too safe!" These echoed words upon the lips of the pale Padre were a whisper too light, too deep, for Gaston's heedless ear.

"Why," the young man pursued in a spirit that was but half levity, "though I yield often to temptation, at times I have resisted it, and here I should miss the very chance to resist. Your garden could never be Eden for me, because temptation is absent from it."

"Absent!" Still lighter, still deeper, was this whisper that the Padre breathed.

&quot;Forget me not," from Il Trovatore
"Home to our mountains, Oh, let us return," from Il Trovatore

"I must find life!" exclaimed Gaston. "And my fortune at the mines, I hope. I am not a bad fellow, Father. You can easily guess all the things I do. I have never, to my knowledge, harmed any one. I didn't even try to kill my adversary in an affair of honor. I gave him a mere flesh-wound, and by this time he must be quite recovered. He was my friend. But as he came between me—"

Gaston stopped, and the Padre, looking keenly at him, saw the violence that he had noticed in church pass like a flame over the young man's handsome face.

"There's nothing dishonorable," said Gaston, answering the priest's look. And then, because this look made him not quite at his ease: "Perhaps a priest might feel obliged to say it was dishonorable. She and her father were—a man owes no fidelity before he is—but you might say that had been dishonorable."

"I have not said so, my son."

"I did what every gentleman would do," insisted Gaston.

"And that is often wrong!" said the Padre, gently and gravely. "But I'm not your confessor."

"No," said Gaston, looking down. "And it is all over. It will not begin again. Since leaving New Orleans I have traveled an innocent journey straight to you. And when I make my fortune I shall be in a position to return and—"

"Claim the pressed flower?" suggested the Padre. He did not smile.

"Ah, you remember how those things are!" said Gaston; and he laughed and blushed.

"Yes," said the Padre, looking at the anchored barkentine, "I remember how those things are."

For a while the vessel and its cargo and the landed men and various business and conversations occupied them. But the freight for the mission once seen to, there was not much else to detain them.

The barkentine was only a coaster like many others which had begun to fill the sea a little more of late years, and presently host and guest were riding homeward. Side by side they rode, companions to the eye, but wide apart in mood; within the turbulent young figure of Gaston dwelt a spirit that could not be more at ease, while revolt was steadily kindling beneath the schooled and placid mask of the Padre.

Yet still the strangeness of his situation in such a remote, resourceless place came back as a marvel into the young man's lively mind.

Twenty years in prison, he thought, and hardly aware of it! And he glanced at the silent priest. A man so evidently fond of music, of theaters, of the world, to whom pressed flowers had meant something once—and now contented to bleach upon these wastes! Not even desirous of a brief holiday, but finding an old organ and some old operas enough recreation! "It is his age, I suppose," thought Gaston. And then the notion of himself when he should be sixty occurred to him, and he spoke.

"Do you know, I do not believe," said he, "that I should ever reach such contentment as vours."

"Perhaps you will," said Padre Ignacio, in a low voice.

"Never!" declared the youth. "It comes only to the few, I am sure."

"Yes. Only to the few," murmured the Padre.

"I am certain that it must be a great possession," Gaston continued; "and yet—and yet—dear me! life is a splendid thing!"

"There are several ways to live it," said the Padre.

"Only one for me!" cried Gaston. "Action. men, women, things-to be there, to be known, to play a part, to sit in the front seats: to have people tell one another, 'There goes Gaston Villeré, and to deserve one's prominence. Why, if I were Padre of Santa Ysabel del Mar for twenty years—no! for one year—do you know what I should have done? Some day it would have been too much for me. I should have left these savages to a pastor nearer their own level. and I should have ridden down this cañon upon my mule, and stepped on board the barkentine, and gone back to my proper sphere. You will understand, sir, that I am far from venturing to make any personal comment. I am only thinking what a world of difference lies between natures that can feel as alike as we do upon so many subjects. Why, not since leaving New Orleans have I met any one with whom I could talk, except of the weather and the brute interests common to us all. That such a one as you should be here is like a dream."

"But it is not a dream," said the Padre.

"And, sir—pardon me if I do say this—are you not wasted at Santa Ysabel del Mar? I have seen the priests at the other missions. They are—the sort of good men that I expected. But are you needed to save such souls as these?"

"There is no aristocracy of souls," said the Padre, again whispering.

"But the body and the mind!" cried Gaston. "My God, are they nothing? Do you think that they are given to us for nothing but a trap? You cannot teach such a doctrine with your library there. And how about all the cultivated men and women away from whose quickening society the brightest of us grow numb? You have held out. But will it be for long? Are you never to save any souls of your own kind? Are not twenty years of mesclados enough? No, no!" finished young Gaston, hot with his unforeseen eloquence; "I should ride down some morning and take the barkentine."

Padre Ignacio was silent for a space.

"I have not offended you?" asked the young man.

"No. Anything but that. You are surprised that I should—choose—to stay here. Perhaps you may have wondered how I came to be here at all?"

"I had not intended any impertinent-"

"Oh no. Put such an idea out of your head, my son. You may remember that I was going to make you a confession about my operas. Let us sit down in this shade."

So they picketed the mules near the stream and sat down.

ΤV

"You have seen," began Padre Ignacio, "what sort of a man I-was once. Indeed, it seems very strange to myself that you should have been here not twenty-four hours yet, and know so much of me. For there has come no one else at all"-the Padre paused a moment and mastered the unsteadiness that he had felt approaching in his voice—"there has been no one else to whom I have talked so freely. In my early days I had no thought of being a priest. My parents destined me for a diplomatic career. There was plenty of money and—and all the rest of it; for by inheritance came to me the acquaintance of many people whose names you would be likely to have heard of. Cities, people of fashion, artists—the whole of it was my element and my choice; and by-and-by I married, not only where it was desirable, but where I loved. Then for the first time Death laid his staff upon my enchantment, and I understood many things that had been only words to me hitherto. To have been a husband for a year, and a father for a moment, and in that moment to lose all—this unblinded me. Looking back, it seemed to me that I had never done anything except for myself all my days. I left the world. In due time I became a priest and lived in my own country. But my worldly experience and my secular education had given to my opinions a turn too liberal for the place where my work was laid. I was soon advised concerning this by those in authority over me. And since they could not change me and I could not change them, yet wished to work and to teach, the New World was suggested and I volunteered to give the rest of my life to missions. It was soon found that some one was needed here, and for this little place I sailed. and to these humble people I have dedicated my service. They are pastoral creatures of the Their vineyard and cattle days are apt to be like the sun and storm around themstrong alike in their evil and in their good. All their years they live as children—children with men's passions given to them like deadly weapons, unable to measure the harm their impulses may bring. Hence, even in their crimes, their hearts will generally open soon to the one great key of love, while civilization makes locks which that key cannot always fit at the first turn. And coming to know this," said Padre Ignacio, fixing his eyes steadily upon Gaston, "vou will understand how great a privilege it is to help such people, and how the sense of something accomplished—under God—should bring Contentment with Renunciation."

"Yes," said Gaston Villeré. Then, thinking of himself, "I can understand it in a man like you."

"Do not speak of me at all!" exclaimed the Padre, almost passionately. "But pray Heaven that you may find the thing yourself some day —Contentment with Renunciation—and never let it go."

"Amen!" said Gaston, strangely moved.

"That is the whole of my story," the priest continued, with no more of the recent stress in his voice. "And now I have talked to you about myself quite enough. But you must have my confession." He had now resumed entirely his half-playful tone. "I was just a little mistaken, you see-too self-reliant, perhapswhen I supposed, in my first missionary ardor, that I could get on without any remembrance of the world at all. I found that I could not. And so I have taught the old operas to my choir—such parts of them as are within our compass and suitable for worship. And certain of my friends still alive at home are good enough to remember this taste of mine and to send me each year some of the new music that I should never hear of otherwise. Then we study these things also. And although our organ is a miserable affair, Felipe manages very cleverly to make it do. And while the voices are singing these operas, especially the old ones, what harm is there if sometimes the priest is thinking of something else? So there's my confession! And now, whether Trovatore is come or not, I shall not allow you to leave us until you have taught all you know of it to Felipe."

The new opera, however, had duly arrived. And as he turned its pages Padre Ignacio was quick to seize at once upon the music that could be taken into his church. Some of it was ready fitted. By that afternoon Felipe and his choir could have rendered "Ah! se l'error t'ingombra" without slip or falter.

Those were strange rehearsals of Il Trovatore upon this California shore. For the Padre looked to Gaston to say when they went too fast or too slow, and to correct their emphasis. And since it was hot, the little Érard piano was carried each day out into the mission garden. There, in the cloisters among the jessamine, the orange blossoms, the oleanders, in the presence of the round yellow hills and the blue triangle of sea, the Miserere 2 was slowly learned. The Mexicans and Indians gathered, swarthy and black-haired, around the tinkling instrument that Felipe played; and presiding over them were young Gaston and the pale Padre, walking up and down the paths, beating time or singing now one part and now another. And so it was that the wild cattle on the uplands would hear Trovatore hummed by a passing vaquero, while the same melody was filling the streets of the far-off world.

For three days Gaston Villeré remained at Santa Ysabel del Mar; and though not a word of restlessness came from him, his host could read San Francisco and the gold-mines in his countenance. No, the young man could not have stayed here for twenty years! And the Padre forbore urging his guest to extend his visit.

"But the world is small," the guest declared at parting. "Some day it will not be able to spare you any longer. And then we are sure to meet. But you shall hear from me soon, at any rate."

Again, as upon the first evening, the two exchanged a few courtesies, more graceful and particular than we, who have not time, and fight no duels, find worth a man's while at the present day. For duels are gone, which is a very good thing, and with them a certain careful politeness, which is a pity; but that is the way in the eternal profit and loss. So young

""Ah! when the shades of night"

Gaston rode northward out of the mission, back to the world and his fortune; and the Padre stood watching the dust after the rider had passed from sight. Then he went into his room with a drawn face. But appearances at least had been kept up to the end; the youth would never know of the elder man's unrest.

٦/

Temptation had arrived with Gaston, but was destined to make a longer stay at Santa Ysabel del Mar. Yet it was perhaps a week before the priest knew this guest was come to abide with him. The guest could be discreet, could withdraw, was not at first importunate.

Sail away on the barkentine? A wild notion, to be sure! although fit enough to enter the brain of such a young scapegrace. The Padre shook his head and smiled affectionately when he thought of Gaston Villeré. The youth's handsome, reckless countenance would shine out, smiling, in his memory, and he repeated Auber's old remark, "Is it the good Lord, or is it merely the devil, that always makes me have a weakness for rascals?"

Sail away on the barkentine! Imagine taking leave of the people here—of Felipe! In what words should he tell the boy to go on industriously with his music? No, this was not imaginable! The mere parting alone would make it for ever impossible to think of such a thing. "And then," he said to himself each new morning, when he looked out at the ocean, "I have given to them my life. One does not take back a gift."

Pictures of his departure began to shine and melt in his drifting fancy. He saw himself explaining to Felipe that now his presence was wanted elsewhere; that there would come a successor to take care of Santa Ysabel—a younger man, more useful, and able to visit sick people at a distance. "For I am old now. I should not be long here in any case." He stopped and pressed his hands together; he had caught his Temptation in the very act. Now he sat staring at his Temptation's face, close to him, while there in the triangle two ships went sailing by.

One morning Felipe told him that the barkentine was here on its return voyage south. "Indeed?" said the Padre, coldy. "The things are ready to go, I think." For the vessel called for mail and certain boxes that the mission sent away. Felipe left the room in wonder at the Padre's manner. But the priest was laughing secretly to see how little it was to him where the barkentine was, or whether it should be the 51st Psalm set to music and forming part of the Holy Week services of the Roman Catholic Church coming or going. But in the afternoon, at his piano, he found himself saying, "Other ships call here, at any rate." And then for the first time he prayed to be delivered from his thoughts. Yet presently he left his seat and looked out of the window for a sight of the barkentine: but it was gone.

The season of the wine-making passed, and the preserving of all the fruits that the mission fields grew. Lotions and medicines were distilled from garden herbs. Perfume was manufactured from the petals of flowers and certain spices, and presents of it despatched to San Fernando and Ventura, and to friends at other places; for the Padre had a special receipt. As the time ran on, two or three visitors passed a night with him; and presently there was a word at various missions that Padre Ignacio had begun to show his years. At Santa Ysabel del Mar they whispered, "The Padre is not well." Yet he rode a great deal over the hills by himself, and down the cañon very often, stopping where he had sat with Gaston, to sit alone and look up and down, now at the hills above, and now at the ocean below. Among his parishioners he had certain troubles to soothe, certain wounds to heal; a home from which he was able to drive jealousy; a girl whom he bade her lover set right. But all said. "The Padre is unwell." And Felipe told them that the music seemed nothing to him any more; he never asked for his Dixit Dominus nowadays. Then for a short time he was really in bed, feverish with the two voices that spoke to him without ceasing. "You have given your life," said one voice. "And, therefore," said the other, "have earned the right to go home and die." "You are winning better rewards in the service of God," said the first voice. "God can be better served in other places," answered the second. As he lay listening he saw Seville again, and the trees of Aranhal, where he had been born. The wind was blowing through them, and in their branches he could hear the nightingales. "Empty! Empty!" he said, aloud. And he lay for two days and nights hearing the wind and the nightingales in the far trees of Aranhal. But Felipe, watching, only heard the Padre crying through the hours, "Empty! Empty!"

Then the wind in the trees died down, and the Padre could get out of bed, and soon be in the garden. But the voices within him still talked all the while as he sat watching the sails when they passed between the headlands. Their words, falling for ever the same way, beat his spirit sore, like blows upon flesh already bruised. If he could only change what they said, he would rest.

"Has the Padre any mail for Santa Barbara?" asked Felipe. "The ship bound southward should be here tomorrow."

"I will attend to it," said the priest, not moving. And Felipe stole away.

At Felipe's words the voices had stopped as a clock finishes striking. Silence, strained like expectation, filled the Padre's soul. But in place of the voices came old sights of home again, the waving trees at Aranhal; then it would be Rachel for a moment, declaiming tragedy while a houseful of faces that he knew by name watched her: and through all the panorama rang the pleasant laugh of Gaston. For a while in the evening the Padre sat at his Érard playing Trovatore. Later, in his sleepless bed he lay, saying now and then: "To die at home! Surely I may be granted at least this." And he listened for the inner voices. But they were not speaking any more, and the black hole of silence grew more dreadful to him than their arguments. Then the dawn came in at his window, and he lay watching its grav grow warm into color, until suddenly he sprang from his bed and looked at the sea. Blue it lay, sapphire-hued and dancing with points of gold, lovely and luring as a charm; and over its triangle the south-bound ship was approaching. People were on board who in a few weeks would be sailing the Atlantic, while he would stand here looking out of this same window. "Merciful God!" he cried, sinking on his knees. "Heavenly Father. Thou seest this evil in my heart! Thou knowest that my weak hand cannot pluck it out! My strength is breaking, and still Thou makest my burden heavier than I can bear." He stopped, breathless and trembling. The same visions were flitting across his closed eyes; the same silence gaped like a dry crater in his soul. "There is no help in earth or heaven," he said, very quietly; and he dressed himself.

VI

It was still so early that few of the Indians were stirring, and one of these saddled the Padre's mule. Felipe was not yet awake, and for a moment it came in the priest's mind to open the boy's door softly, look at him once more, and come away. But this he did not, nor even take a farewell glance at the church and organ. He bade nothing farewell, but, turning his back upon his room and his garden, rode down the canon.

The vessel lay at anchor, and some one had landed from her and was talking with other men on the shore. Seeing the priest slowly coming, this stranger approached to meet him.

"You are connected with the mission here?"

he inquired.

"I—am."

"Perhaps it is with you that Gaston Villeré stopped?"

"The young man from New Orleans? Yes.

I am Padre Ignacio.

"Then you'll save me a journey. I promised him to deliver these into your own hands."

The stranger gave them to him.

"A bag of gold-dust," he explained, "and a letter. I wrote it at his dictation while he was dving. He lived hardly an hour afterward."

The stranger bowed his head at the stricken cry which his news elicited from the priest, who, after a few moments' vain effort to speak, opened the letter and read:

My dear Friend,-It is through no man's fault but mine that I have come to this. I have had plenty of luck, and lately have been counting the days until I should return home. But last night heavy news from New Orleans reached me, and I tore the pressed flower to pieces. Under the first smart and humiliation of broken faith I was rendered desperate, and picked a needless quarrel. Thank God, it is I who have the punishment. My dear friend, as I lie here, leaving a world that no man ever loved more, I have come to understand you. For you and your mission have been much in my thoughts. It is strange how good can be done, not at the time when it is intended, but afterward: and you have done this good to me. I say over your words, "Contentment with Renunciation," and believe that at this last hour I have gained something like what you would wish me to feel. For I do not think that I desire it otherwise now. My life would never have been of service, I am afraid. You are the last person in this world who has spoken serious words to me, and I want you to know that now at length I value the peace of Santa Ysabel as I could never have done but for seeing your wisdom and goodness. You spoke of a new organ for your church. Take the gold-dust that will reach you with this, and do what you will with it. Let me at least in dying have helped some one. And since there is no aristocracy in souls—you said that to me; do you remember?—perhaps you will say a mass for this departing soul of mine. I only wish, since my body must go under ground in a strange country, that it might have been at Santa Ysabel del Mar, where your feet would often pass.

"'At Santa Ysabel del Mar, where your feet would often pass.'" The priest repeated this final sentence aloud, without being aware of it.

"Those are the last words he ever spoke," said the stranger, "except bidding me good-by."

"You know him well, then?"

"No; not until after he was hurt. I'm the man he quarreled with."

The priest looked at the ship that would sail onward this afternoon.

Then a smile of great beauty passed over his face, and he addressed the stranger. "I thank you. You will never know what you have done for me."

"It is nothing," answered the stranger, awkwardly. "He told me you set great store on a new organ."

Padre Ignacio turned away from the ship and rode back through the gorge. When he had reached the shady place where once he had sat with Gaston Villeré, he dismounted and again sat there, alone by the stream, for many hours. Long rides and outings had been lately so much his custom that no one thought twice of his absence; and when he returned to the mission in the afternoon, the Indian took his mule, and he went to his seat in the garden. But it was with another look that he watched the sea; and presently the sail moved across the blue triangle, and soon it had rounded the headland.

With it departed Temptation for ever.

Gaston's first coming was in the Padre's mind; and, as the vespers bell began to ring in the cloistered silence, a fragment of Auber's plaintive tune passed like a sigh across his memory:

For the repose of Gaston's young, worldloving spirit, they sang all that he had taught them of Il Trovatore.

After this day, Felipe and all those who knew and loved the Padre best, saw serenity had returned to his features; but for some reason they began to watch those features with more care.

"Still," they said, "he is not old." And as the months went by they would repeat: "We shall have him yet for many years." Thus the season rolled round, bringing the time for the expected messages from the world. Padre Ignacio was wont to sit in his garden, waiting for the ship, as of old.

"As of old," they said, cheerfully, who saw him. But Renunciation with Contentment they could not see; it was deep down in his silent and thankful heart.

One day Felipe went to call him from his garden seat, wondering why the ringing of the bell had not brought him to vespers. Breviary in lap, and hands folded upon it, the Padre sat among his flowers, looking at the sea. Out there amid the sapphire-blue, tranquil and white, gleamed the sails of the barkentine. It had brought him a new message, not from this world; and Padre Ignacio was slowly borne in from the garden, while the mission-bell tolled for the passing of a human soul.

1900

WILLIAM VAUGHAN MOODY 1869-1910

Although Moody was born in Indiana and spent the greater part of his active life in the Middle West, there is little in his poetry that reflects the spirit of that region. He attended a preparatory academy on the Hudson, was graduated from Harvard, and spent the brief remainder of his career as a teacher of English literature at Harvard and the University of Chicago. His vacations he usually spent on extended walking and bicycling tours in Europe, and he made one journey by wagon through Arizona. A notable career in American literature was cut short by his early death.

Moody's work reflects inner experience and culture more than contact with outer life; or, when based upon actual experience, it shows that fusion of fact with invention and reflection that constitutes the permanent in literature. There is a force in the sweep of his imagination that belongs to the great poets. His poetry is notable for its seriousness, its concern with the eternal and unsolvable questions of life and destiny, and also for its recognition of the graver social problems of today; for he feels that science has forced upon man a new assessment of himself. His lyrics are noteworthy for their manly sincerity, their strength, their tenderness, and their fineness of form. In seriousness, Moody stands with the New England poets of the nineteenth century, but goes beyond them in the variety and the breadth of his interests. He is, in fact, a transition poet, true to the past in form and in high purpose, but questioning, forwardlooking. In addition to his poems, Moody produced plays, the most successful being The Great Divide, 1906.

Criticism: Boynton, American Poetry; K. W. Baker, "A Poet of the Lean Years," Forum 68: 843-50; W. Chislett, Jr., "William Vaughan Moody and William Blake," Dial 59:142; H. Hagedorn, "William Vaughan Moody," Ind. 74:314-6; C. M. Lewis, "William Vaughan Moody," Yale R. ns 2:688-703; May Sinclair, "Three American Poets of Today," Atlan. 98:325-35.

Biography and criticism: E. H. Lewis, William Vaughan Moody, 1914; D. G. Mason, ed. Some

Letters of William Vaughan Moody, 1913.

THE MENAGERIE 1

Thank God my brain is not inclined to cut Such capers every day! I'm just about Mellow, but then—There goes the tent-flap shut.

Rain's in the wind. I thought so: every snout Was twitching when the keeper turned me out.

That screaming parrot makes my blood run cold.

Gabriel's trump! the big bull elephant Squeals "Rain!" to the parched herd. The monkeys scold.

And jabber that it's rain water they want.
(It makes me sick to see a monkey pant.)

I'll foot it home, to try and make believe I'm sober. After this I stick to beer, And drop the circus when the sane folks leave. A man's a fool to look at things too near: They look back, and begin to cut up queer.

Beasts do, at any rate; especially Wild devils caged. They have the coolest way
Of being something else than what you see;
You pass a sleek young zebra nosing hay,
A nylghau looking bored and distingué,— 20

And think you've seen a donkey and a bird.

Not on your life! Just glance back, if you dare.

The zebra chews, the nylghau hasn't stirred;

But something's happened, Heaven knows what or where

To freeze your scalp and pompadour your hair.

I'm not precisely an aeolian lute Hung in the wandering winds of sentiment, But drown me if the ugliest, meanest brute Grunting and fretting in that sultry tent Didn't just floor me with embarrassment!

'Twas like a thunder-clap from out the clear,— One minute they were circus beasts, some grand,

Some ugly, some amusing, and some queer; Rival attractions to the hobo band, The flying jenny, and the peanut stand.

Copyright. By permission of Houghton Mifflin Company, authorized publishers. Next minute they were old hearth-mates of mine!

Lost people, eyeing me with such a stare!
Patient, satiric, devilish, divine;
A gaze of hopeless envy, squalid care,
Hatred, and thwarted love, and dim despair.

Within my blood my ancient kindred spoke,— Grotesque and monstrous voices, heard afar Down ocean waves when behemoth awoke, Or through fern forests roared the plesiosaur Locked with the giant-bat in ghastly war.

And suddenly, as in a flash of light, I saw great Nature working out her plan; Through all her shapes from mastodon to mite Forever groping, testing, passing on To find at last the shape and soul of Man.

Till in the fullness of accomplished time, Comes brother Forepaugh, <sup>1</sup> upon business bent, Tracks her through frozen and through torrid clime,

And shows us, neatly labeled in a tent, The stages of her huge experiment;

Blabbing aloud her shy and reticent hours;
Dragging to light her blinking, slothful moods;
Publishing fretful seasons when her powers
Worked wild and sullen in her solitudes,
Or when her mordant laughter shook the woods.

Here, round about me, were her vagrant births; Sick dreams she had, fierce projects she essaved:

Her qualms, her fiery prides, her crazy mirths; The troublings of her spirit as she strayed. Cringed, gloated, mocked, was lordly, was afraid,

On that long road she went to seek mankind; Here were the darkling coverts that she beat To find the Hider she was sent to find; Here the distracted footprints of her feet Whereby her soul's Desire she came to greet. <sup>70</sup>

But why should they, her botch-work, turn about

And stare disdain at me, her finished job? Why was the place one vast suspended shout Of laughter? Why did all the daylight throb With soundless guffaw and dumb-stricken sob?

Helpless I stood among those awful cages; The beasts were walking loose, and I was bagged! I, I, last product of the toiling ages, Goal of heroic feet that never lagged,— A little man in trousers, slightly jagged.

Deliver me from such another jury! The Judgment-day will be a picnic to't. Their satire was more dreadful than their fury, And worst of all was just a kind of brute Disgust, and giving up, and sinking mute.

Survival of the fittest, adaptation,
And all their other evolution terms,
Seem to omit one small consideration,
To wit, that tumblebugs and angle-worms
Have souls: there's soul in everything that squirms.

And souls are restless, plagued, impatient things.

All dream and unaccountable desire; Crawling, but pestered with the thought of wings:

Spreading through every inch of earth's old mire,

Mystical hanker after something higher.

Wishes are horses, as I understand.
I guess a wistful polyp that has strokes
Of feeling faint to gallivant on land
Will come to be a scandal to his folks;
Legs he will sprout, in spite of threats and jokes.

And at the core of every life that crawls, Or runs or flies or swims or vegetates— Churning the mammoth's heart-blood, in the galls

Of shark and tiger planting gorgeous hates, Lighting the love of eagles for their mates;

Yes, in the dim brain of the jellied fish
That is and is not living—moved and stirred
From the beginning a mysterious wish,
A vision, a command, a fatal Word:
The name of Man was uttered, and they heard.

Upward along the aeons of old war They sought him: wing and shank-bone, claw and bill

Were fashioned and rejected; wide and far They roamed the twilight jungles of their will; But still they sought him, and desired him still.

Man they desired, but mind you, Perfect Man, The radiant and the loving, yet to be! I hardly wonder, when they came to scan

<sup>1</sup> a famous circus owner

The upshot of their strenuosity,
They gazed with fixed emotions upon me. 1

Well, my advice to you is, Face the creatures, Or spot them sideways with your weather eye, Just to keep tab on their expansive features; It isn't pleasant when you're stepping high To catch a giraffe smiling on the sly.

If nature made you graceful, don't get gay Back-to before a hippopotamus; If meek and godly, find some place to play Besides right where three mad hyenas fuss: You may hear language that we won't discuss

If you're a sweet thing in a flower-bed hat, Or her best fellow with your tie tucked in, Don't squander love's bright springtime girding at

An old chimpanzee with an Irish chin: There may be hidden meaning in his grin.

GOOD FRIDAY NIGHT 1

At last the bird that sang so long In twilight circles, hushed his song: Above the ancient square The stars came here and there.

Good Friday night! Some hearts were bowed, But some amid the waiting crowd Because of too much youth Felt not that mystic ruth;

And of these hearts my heart was one: Nor when beneath the arch of stone With dirge and candle flame The cross of passion came,

Did my glad spirit feel reproof, Though on the awful tree aloof, Unspiritual, dead, Drooped the ensanguined Head.

To one who stood where myrtles made A little space of deeper shade (As if I could half descry, A stranger, even as I),

I said, "These youths who bear along The symbols of their Savior's wrong, The spear, the garment torn, The flaggel, 2 and the thorn,—

2 scourge

"Why do they make this mummery? Would not a brave man gladly die For a much smaller thing Than to be Christ and King?"

He answered nothing, and I turned. Throned in its hundred candles burned The jeweled eidolon <sup>3</sup> Of her who bore the Son.

The crowd was prostrate; still, I felt No shame until the stranger knelt; Then not to kneel, almost Seemed like a vulgar boast.

I knelt. The doll-face, waxen white, Flowered out a living dimness; bright Dawned the dear mortal grace Of my own mother's face.

When we were risen up, the street Was vacant; all the air hung sweet With lemon-flowers; and soon The sky would hold the moon.

More silently than new-found friends To whom much silence makes amends For the much babble vain While yet their lives were twain,

We walked along the odorous hill.
The light was little yet; his will
I could not see to trace
Upon his form or face.

So when aloft the gold moon broke,

I cried, heart-stung. As one who woke
He turned unto my cries
The anguish of his eyes.

"Friend! Master!" I cried falteringly, "Thou seest the thing they make of thee. Oh, by the light divine My mother shares with thine,

"I beg that I may lay my head Upon thy shoulder and be fed With thoughts of brotherhood!" So through the odorous wood,

More silently than friends new-found We walked. At first meadow bound His figure ashen-stoled Sank in the moon's broad gold. 1897

3 image

20

30

40

50

60

&lt;sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of Houghton Mifflin Company, authorized publishers.

(WILLIAM) BLISS CARMAN 1861-1929

Though born in Fredericton, New Brunswick, Carman ranks as an American poet by his descent from old Connecticut stock and by his residence in the United States since 1889. He was educated at the University of New Brunswick, at the University of Edinburgh, and at Harvard. He studied law, practiced engineering, taught school, edited The Independent and Chap Book. He produced a number of volumes of verse with a wide range of subjects. The first, Low Tide at Grand Pré, 1893, was inspired by the very picturesque "Evangeline" country; three volumes of Songs from Vagabondia, 1894, 1896, 1900, in which he collaborated with Richard Hovey, contain some of his best poems, songs of the "open road." Typically, Carman's material lies away from the beaten track of poetry followed when he began to write, and his style has the carefree swing of outdoor song; his verse is robust, full-throated, cheering. He is some-times thought of with Moody as a transitional poet. He is free from the conventions of the nineteenth century, and free also from the iconoclastic, pessimistic attitude taken at times by poets of the twentieth century.

Biography and criticism: Odell Shepard, Bliss Carman, 1924; Rittenhouse; Untermeyer; R. H. Hathaway, "Bliss Carman: An Appreciation," Canad. M. 56:521-36; R. Duffy, "When They Were Twenty-One," Bookm. 38:521-4, recollections of Carman and Hovey.

A VAGABOND SONG 1

There is something in the autumn that is native to my blood—
Touch of manner, hint of mood;
And my heart is like a rhyme,
With the yellow and the purple and the crimson keeping time.

The scarlet of the maples can shake me like a cry
Of bugles going by.
And my lonely spirit thrills
To see the frosty asters like a smoke upon the hills.

There is something in October sets the gypsy blood astir;
We must rise and follow her,
When from every hill of flame
She calls and calls each vagabond by name.

MOMENT MUSICALE 1

The round moon hangs above the rim Of silent and blue-shadowed trees, And all the earth is vague and dim
In its blue veil of mysteries.

On such a night one must believe
The Golden Age returns again
With lyric beauty, to retrieve
The world from dreariness and pain.

And down the wooded aisles, behold
What dancers through the dusk appear!
Piping their rapture as of old,
They bring immortal freedom near.

A moment on the brink of night
They tread their transport in the dew,
And to the rhythm of their delight,
Behold, all things are made anew!

THE IOYS OF THE ROAD 1

Now the joys of the road are chiefly these: A crimson touch on the hard-wood trees;

A vagrant's morning wide and blue, In early fall, when the wind walks, too;

A shadowy highway cool and brown Alluring up and enticing down

From rippled water to dappled swamp, From purple glory to scarlet pomp;

The outward eye, the quiet will, And the striding heart from hill to hill;

The tempter apple over the fence; The cobweb bloom on the yellow quince;

The palish asters along the wood,—A lyric touch of the solitude;

An open hand, an easy shoe, And a hope to make the day go through,—

Another to sleep with, and a third To wake me up at the voice of a bird;

The resonant far-listening morn, And the hoarse whisper of the corn;

The crickets mourning their comrades lost, In the night's retreat from the gathering frost;

(Or is it their slogan, plaintive and shrill, As they beat on their corselets, valiant still?)

<sup>2</sup> Copyright. Used by permission of Messrs. Dodd, Mead and Company, Inc.

10

20

30

70

A hunger fit for the kings of the sea, And a loaf of bread for Dickon 1 and me:

A thirst like that of the Thirsty Sword, And a jug of cider on the board;

An idle noon, a bubbling spring, The sea in the pine-tops murmuring.

A scrap of gossip at the ferry; A comrade neither glum nor merry.

Asking nothing, revealing naught, But minting his words from a fund of thought,

A keeper of silence eloquent, Needy, yet royally well-content,

Of the mettled breed, yet abhorring strife, And full of the mellow juice of life,

A taster of wine, with an eye for a maid, Never too bold, and never afraid,

Never heart-whole, never heart-sick, (These are the things I worship in Dick),

No fidget and no reformer, just A calm observer of ought and must,

A lover of books, but a reader of man, No cynic and no charlatan,

Who never defers and never demands, But, smiling, takes the world in his hands,—

Seeing it good as when God first saw And gave it the weight of his will for law.

And O the joy that is never won, But follows and follows the journeying sun,

By marsh and tide, by meadow and stream, A will-o'-the-wind, a light-o'-dream,

Delusion afar, delight anear, From morrow to morrow, from year to year,

A jack-o'-lantern, a fairy fire, A dare, a bliss, and a desire!

The racy smell of the forest loam, When the stealthy, sad-heart leaves go home; <sup>60</sup>

(O leaves, O leaves, I am one with you,
Of the mould and the sun and the wind and the dew!)

The broad gold wake of the afternoon; The silent fleck of the cold new moon:

The sound of the hollow sea's release From stormy tumult to starry peace.

With only another league to wend; And two brown arms at the journey's end!

These are the joys of the open road— For him who travels without a load.

RICHARD HOVEY 1864-1900

Though Hovey was born at Normal, Illinois, and much of the spirit of the West appears in his poems, he spent the greater part of his life in the East. He lived for a while in Washington, D.C.; after graduating from Dartmouth, he attended the General Theological Seminary in New York City. and became lay assistant in the Church of St. Mary the Virgin. Shortly after, however, he took literature as his life work, and was journalist, dramatist, and lecturer in English literature at Barnard College. For several years he lived abroad, becoming familiar with the work of modern French poets and translating some of the work of the Belgian poet, Maeterlinck. Hovey is best known for Songs from Vagabondia, 1894, 1896, 1900, in which he collaborated with Bliss Carman. Unless the authors had designated which of the poems belonged to each, it would have been difficult to separate the work of the two in these books. The poems are carefree and buoyant, reflecting the joy of the spirit in a wholesome, robust contact with nature along the open road. In the work of Hovey there is something of Whitman, combined with a seriousness of emotion and an artistic purpose that promised much. Hovey planned a long series of poems on the Arthurian theme, entitled Launcelot and Guenevere: a Poem in Dramas, 1907, but finished only five of the nine planned.

Criticism: Rittenhouse; Boynton, American Poetry; B. Carman, "How Hovey Wrote Barney McGee," Bookm. 42:561-3; A. von Ende, "The Ethical Message of Richard Hovey's Poem in Dramas," Poet Lore 20:69-76; C. H. Page, "Richard Hovey's Taliesin—A Poet's Poem," Bookm. 11: 125-31.

THE SEA GYPSY 2

I am fevered with the sunset, I am fretful with the bay, For the wander-thirst is on me And my soul is in Cathay.

There's a schooner in the offing, With her topsails shot with fire,

<sup>1</sup> probably Richard Hovey

&lt;sup>2</sup> Used by permission of Dodd, Mead and Company, Inc.

And my heart has gone aboard her For the Islands of Desire.

I must forth again tomorrow!
With the sunset I must be Hull down on the trail of rapture
In the wonder of the sea.

1896

10

10

20

30

THE WANDER-LOVERS 1

Down the world with Marna! That's the life for me! Wandering with the wandering wind, Vagabond and unconfined! Roving with the roving rain Its unboundaried domain! Kith and kin of wander-kind, Children of the sea!

Petrels of the sea-drift! Swallows of the lea! Arabs of the whole wide girth Of the wind-encircled earth! In all climes we pitch our tents, Cronies of the elements, With the secret lords of birth Intimate and free.

All the seaboard knows us From Fundy to the Keys; <sup>2</sup> Every bend and every creek Of abundant Chesapeake; Ardise hills and Newport coves And the far-off orange groves, Where Floridian oceans break, Tropic tiger seas.

Down the world with Marna, Tarrying there and here! Just as much at home in Spain As in Tangier or Touraine! Shakespeare's Avon knows us well, And the crags of Neufchâtel; And the ancient Nile is fain Of our coming near.

Down the world with Marna, Daughter of the air! Marna of the subtle grace, And the vision in her face! Moving in the measures trod By the angels before God! With her sky-blue eyes amaze And her sea-blue hair!

Marna with the trees' life
In her veins a-stir!
Marna of the aspen heart
Where the sudden quivers start!
Quick-responsive, subtle, wild!
Artless as an artless child,
Spite of all her reach of art!
Oh, to roam with her!

Marna with the wind's will, Daughter of the sea! Marna of the quick disdain, Starting at the dream of stain! At a smile with love aglow, At a frown a statued woe, Standing pinnacled in pain Till a kiss sets free!

Down the world with Marna,
Daughter of the fire!
Marna of the deathless hope,
Still alert to win new scope
Where the wings of life may spread
For a flight unhazarded!
Dreaming of the speech to cope
With the heart's desire!

Marna of the far quest After the divine! Striving ever for some goal Past the blunder-god's control! Dreaming of potential years When no day shall dawn in fears! That's the Marna of my soul, Wander-bride of mine!

1893

EDWIN MARKHAM 1852-

Edwin Markham, born amidst the pioneer life of Oregon, came with his widowed mother to California where he spent his youth upon a hill ranch in the central part of the state. By plowing for neighbors he earned money to buy books, and Byron and Tennyson became the models for his youthful attempts at poetry. To give him school advantages, his mother moved to San Tosé where at the State Normal School he fitted himself for teaching. He followed this occupation successfully. and became principal of the high school at Oakland. The immediate success of "The Man with the Hoe," published in a San Francisco newspaper, opened to him a literary career, and since 1899 he has lived in the vicinity of New York City. His poem "Lincoln, the Man of the People" was chosen to be read at the dedication of the Lincoln Memorial at Washington. Mr. Markham's volumes of poetry include The Shoes of Happiness, and Other Poems, 1915; and Gates of Paradise, 1920. "The Man with the Hoe" grew out of Markham's experiences with toilers and was the work of many years of patient composition and revision. Whether or not it interprets exactly Millet's conception of the toiler, it is remarkable for its blunt presentation of the tragedy that binds millions of workers in hopeless poverty, and for its appeal to the generoushearted to provide a way of escape from such a life.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Used by permission of Dodd, Mead and Company, Inc. <sup>2</sup> islands off the coast of Florida

Criticism: Wilkinson (NV); Stedman; Untermeyer; A. L. Morrison, "A Fresh Air School of Pioneer Days," Overland ns 83:167; B. Millard, "Edwin Markham and his Golden Shower," Bookm. 41:397-9; "The Launching of a Famous Poem," Bookm. 27:267-72; "When They Were Twenty-One," Bookm. 37:300-1; H. M. Bland, "Edwin Markham: The Boy, The Man, His Art," Overland ns 66:333-40.

THE MAN WITH THE HOE 1

Written After Seeing the Painting by Millet

God made man in His own image, in the image of God made He him.—Genesis.

Bowed by the weight of centuries he leans
Upon his hoe and gazes on the ground,
The emptiness of ages in his face,
And on his back the burden of the world.
Who made him dead to rapture and despair,
A thing that grieves not and that never hopes,
Stolid and stunned, a brother to the ox?
Who loosened and let down this brutal jaw?
Whose was the hand that slanted back this brow?

Whose breath blew out the light within this brain?

Is this the Thing the Lord God made and gave
To have dominion over sea and land;
To trace the stars and search the heavens for power;

To feel the passion of Eternity?

Is this the dream He dreamed who shaped the

And markt their ways upon the ancient deep?

Down all the caverns of Hell to their last gulf

There is no shape more terrible than this—

More tongued with censure of the world's blind

greed—

More filled with signs and portents for the soul—

More packt with danger to the universe.

What gulfs between him and the seraphim! Slave of the wheel of labor, what to him Are Plato and the swing of Pleiades?

What the long reaches of the peaks of song, The rift of dawn, the reddening of the rose? Thru this dread shape the suffering ages look; Time's tragedy is in that aching stoop; Thru this dread shape humanity betrayed, Plundered, profaned and disinherited, Cries protest to the Powers behind the world, A protest that is also prophecy.

O masters, lords and rulers in all lands, Is this the handiwork you give to God, This monstrous thing distorted and soulquencht?

How will you ever straighten up this shape; Touch it again with immortality; Give back the upward looking and the light; Rebuild in it the music and the dream; Make right the immemorial infamies, Perfidious wrongs, immedicable woes?

O masters, lords and rulers in all lands, How will the future reckon with this Man? How answer his brute question in that hour When whirlwinds of rebellion shake all shores? How will it be with kingdoms and with kings— With those who shaped him to the thing he is— When this dumb Terror shall rise to judge the

After the silence of the centuries?

1898

1899

LINCOLN, THE MAN OF THE PEOPLE 1

When the Norn <sup>2</sup> Mother saw the Whirlwind Hour

Greatening and darkening as it hurried on, She left the Heaven of Heroes and came down To make a man to meet the mortal need. She took the tried clay of the common road—Clay warm yet with the genial heat of Earth, Dasht through it all a strain of prophecy; Tempered the heap with thrill of human tears; Then mixt a laughter with the serious stuff. Into the shape she breathed a flame to light That tender, tragic, ever-changing face; And laid on him a sense of the Mystic Powers, Moving—all husht—behind the mortal vail. Here was a man to hold against the world, A man to match the mountains and the sea.

The color of the ground was in him, the red earth;

The smack and tang of elemental things; The rectitude and patience of the cliff; The good-will of the rain that loves all leaves;

Copyright. From Collected Poems by Edwin Markham in preparation for 1930.

<sup>2</sup> one of the Scandinavian demi-goddesses presiding over the fates of men and gods

The friendly welcome of the wayside well;
The courage of the bird that dares the sea;
The gladness of the wind that shakes the corn;
The pity of the snow that hides all scars;
The secrecy of streams that make their way
Under the mountain to the rifted rock;
The tolerance and equity of light
That gives as freely to the shrinking flower
As to the great oak flaring to the wind—
To the grave's low hill as to the Matterhorn
That shoulders out the sky. Sprung from the West.

He drank the valorous youth of a new world. The strength of virgin forests braced his mind, The hush of spacious prairies stilled his soul, His words were oaks in acorns; and his thoughts Were roots that firmly gript the granite truth.

Up from log cabin to the Capitol,
One fire was on his spirit, one resolve—
To send the keen ax to the root of wrong,
Clearing a free way for the feet of God,
The eyes of conscience testing every stroke,
To make his deed the measure of a man.
He built the rail-pile as he built the State, Pouring his splendid strength through every blow;

The grip that swung the ax in Illinois Was on the pen that set a people free.

So came the Captain with the mighty heart; And when the judgment thunders split the house.

Wrenching the rafters from their ancient rest, He held the ridgepole up, and spikt again
The rafters of the Home. He held his place—
Held the long purpose like a growing tree—
51
Held on through blame and faltered not at praise.

And when he fell in whirlwind, he went down As when a lordly cedar, green with boughs, Goes down with a great shout upon the hills, And leaves a lonesome place against the sky. 1900

GEORGE STERLING 1869-1926

Although Sterling was born at Sag Harbor, New York, and was educated in the East, he ranks as a western poet, having moved about 1895 to California where he produced his poetry and where he died. Sterling was indifferent to criticism and to financial success; he refused to follow the new vogue in poetry, and belongs with the poets of the nineteenth century rather than with those of his own productive years. His work, contained in several slim volumes, includes The Testimony of the Suns, 1903, A Wine of Wizardry, 1908, The House of Orchids, 1911, and Beyond the Breakers, 1914. A note of seriousness runs through his work, a sense of the relentlessness of time, of the futility of all that man has done when measured against the background of the ages. Even his nature lyrics and his legends of the sea often express man's yearning for some spiritual height that it is impossible for him to reach.

Criticism: Untermeyer; H. M. Bland, "Sterling, the Poet of Seas and Stars," Overland ns 66:474-8; H. Monroe, "The Poetry of George Sterling," Poetry 7:307-13; M. Austin, "George Sterling at Carmel," Am. Mercury 11:65-72; H. Monroe, "Two Poets Say Farewell," Poetry 29:208-13; see also Overland ns 85, March, for appreciation and tributes.

THE BLACK VULTURE 1

Aloof within the day's enormous dome,
He holds unshared the silence of the sky.
Far down his bleak, relentless eyes descry
The eagle's empire and the falcon's home—
Far down, the galleons of sunset roam;

His hazards on the sea of morning lie; Serene, he hears the broken tempest sigh Where cold sierras gleam like scattered foam.

And least of all he holds the human swarm—Unwitting now that envious men prepare
To make their dream and its fulfilment one,
When, poised above the caldrons of the storm,
Their hearts, contemptuous of death, shall dare

His roads between the thunder and the sun.

THE LAST DAYS 1

The russet leaves of the sycamore
Lie at last on the valley floor—
By the autumn wind swept to and fro
Like ghosts in a tale of long ago.
Skallow and clear the Carmel <sup>2</sup> glides
Where the willows droop on its vine-walled sides.

The bracken-rust is red on the hill;
The pines stand brooding, somber and still;
Gray are the cliffs, and the waters gray,
Where the seagulls dip to the sea-born spray.
Sad November, lady of rain,
Sends the goose-wedge over again.

Wilder now, for the verdure's birth, Falls the sunlight over the earth; Kildees call from the fields where now

<sup>2</sup> a stream of central California

&lt;sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of A. M. Robertson, publisher.

10

20

The banding blackbirds follow the plow; Rustling poplar and brittle weed Whisper low to the river-reed.

Days departing linger and sigh: Stars come soon to the quiet sky; Buried voices, intimate, strange, Cry to body and soul of Change; Beauty, eternal fugitive, Seeks the home that we cannot give.

THE MASTER MARINER 1

My grandsire sailed three years from home, And slew unmoved the sounding whale: Here on a windless beach I roam And watch far out the hardy sail.

The lions of the surf <sup>2</sup> that cry
Upon this lion-colored shore
On reefs of midnight met his eye:
He knew their fangs as I their roar.

My grandsire sailed uncharted seas, And toll of all their leagues he took: I scan the shallow bays at ease, And tell their colors in a book.

The anchor-chains his music made
And wind in shrouds and running-gear:
The thrush at dawn beguiles my glade,
And once, 'tis said, I woke to hear.

My grandsire in his ample fist
The long harpoon upheld to men:
Behold obedient to my wrist
A gray gull's-feather for my pen!

Upon my grandsire's leathern cheek
Five zones their bitter bronze had set:
Some day their hazards I will seek,
I promise me at times. Not yet.

I think my grandsire now would turn A mild but speculative eye On me, my pen and its concern, Then gaze again to sea—and sigh.

LOUISE IMOGEN GUINEY 1861-1920

Miss Guiney was born at Roxbury, Massachusetts, of mingled Irish, Scotch, and French ancestry, and was educated at private schools in Providence. After the death of her father, a general in the Union Army, she was for several years postmistress at Auburndale, Massachusetts, and then cataloguer in the Boston Public Library. From 1901 she lived in England, and is buried at Oxford.

From the age of twenty-three, literary editorship, the writing of essays and poetry, and a voluminous and vivacious correspondence filled Miss Guiney's life. She spent much time in investigating obscure men and events in past epochs of history and literature, especially the period of the seventeenth century; she rejoiced in bringing to light the story of some lost cause, or of some person who fell in gallant battle for an ideal. Her verse is spontaneous, full of courage; her vigorous imagination sometimes expresses itself with Celtic tenderness, sometimes with martial strength. Notable among her books are The White Sail and Other Poems, 1887, A Roadside Harp, 1893, which she thought her "best book," and Patrins, 1897, a collection of essays.

Biography and criticism: E. M. Tenison, Louise Imogen Guiney: Her Life and Works, 1923; Rittenhouse; Edmund L. Pearson, "An American Poet," Outlook 136:68-9; A. Brown, "An American Poet," No. Am. 213:502-17; "Louise Imogen Guiney," ed. by M. Earls, Bookm. 55:163-9, 591-6; World 121:596-603; "Letters of Louise Imogen Guiney: a Comment and Some Letters," Cath. 56:705-9.

THE WILD RIDE 3

I hear in my heart, I hear in its ominous pulses All day, on the road, the hoofs of invisible horses.

All night, from their stalls, the importunate pawing and neighing.

Let cowards and laggards fall back! but alert to the saddle

Weatherworn and abreast, go men of our galloping legion.

With a stirrup-cup each to the lily of women that loves him.

The trail is through dolor and dread, over crags and morasses:

There are shapes by the way, there are things that appal or entice us:

What odds? We are Knights of the Grail, we are vowed to the riding.

Thought's self is a vanishing wing, and joy is a cobweb,

And friendship a flower in the dust, and glory a sunbeam:

Not here is our prize, nor, alas! after these our pursuing.

<sup>a</sup> This poem, says Alice Brown, "first beat out its galloping measure in a dream." Copyright. By permission of Houghton Mifflin Company, authorized publishers.

<sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of A. M. Robertson, pub-

<sup>2</sup> sea lions of the Pacific coast

A dipping of plumes, a tear, a shake of the bridle.

A passing salute to this world and her pitiful heauty:

We hurry with never a word in the track of our fathers.

I hear in my heart, I hear in its ominous pulses, All day on the road, the hoofs of invisible horses.

All night, from their stalls, the importunate pawing and neighing.

We spur to a land of no name, outracing the storm-wind:

We leap to the infinite dark like sparks from the anvil.

Thou leadest, O God! All's well with Thv troopers that follow.

THEODOSIA GARRISON FAULKS 1874-

Mrs. Faulks has lived all her life in New Jersey, where she was born, educated, and now resides. She contributes both prose and poetry to magazines, and has published three volumes of verse: Joy o' Life and Other Poems, 1909; Earth Cry and Other Poems, 1910; The Dreamers, 1917. The appeal of Mrs. Faulks's verse lies in its honesty and optimism, and the fresh, concrete images through which she expresses emotion. Both in manner and form her work may naturally be grouped with that of the nineteenth century. Bookm. 16:16; 47:398.

STAINS 1

The three ghosts on the lonesome road Spake each to one another, "Whence came that stain about your mouth No lifted hand may cover?" "From eating of forbidden fruit, Brother, my brother."

The three ghosts on the sunless road Spake each to one another, "Whence came that red burn on your foot No dust nor ash may cover?" "I stamped a neighbor's hearth-flame out, Brother, my brother."

10

The three ghosts on the windless road Spake each to one another, "Whence came that blood upon your hand No other hand may cover?"

m Scribner's magazine, copyright, 1904, by Charles Scribner's Sons; also from The Joy of Life, copyright, 1909, by Mitchell Kennerley, publisher.

"From breaking of a woman's heart. Brother, my brother."

"Yet on the earth clean men we walked, Glutton and Thief and Lover: White flesh and fair it hid our stains That no man might discover." "Naked the soul goes up to God.

Brother, my brother."

APRIL 2

Something tapped at my window-pane, Someone called me without my door. Someone laughed like the tinkle o' rain. The robin echoed it o'er and o'er.

I threw the door and the window wide; Sun and the touch of the breeze and then-"Ah, were you expecting me, dear?" she cried, And here was April come back again.

THE DREAMERS 3

The gypsies passed her little gate-She stopped her wheel to see.-A brown-faced pair who walked the road, Free as the wind is free; And suddenly her tidy room A prison seemed to be.

Her shining plates against the walls. Her sunlit, sanded floor, The brass-bound wedding chest that held Her linen's snowy store. The very wheel whose humming died,-Seemed only chains she bore.

She watched the foot-free gypsies pass; She never knew or guessed The wistful dream that drew them close— The longing in each breast Some day to know a home like hers, Wherein their hearts might rest.

HENRY VAN DYKE 1852-

Henry van Dyke, besides following for years his profession as a clergyman, has been a professor of English literature at Princeton and was for four years Minister of the United States to Holland and Luxemburg. He was born at Germantown, Pennsylvania, was graduated from Princeton, and has received honorary degrees from many universities,

<sup>2</sup> From The Joy of Life, copyright, 1909, by Mitchell Kennerley, publisher.
<sup>3</sup> From The Dreamer and Other Poems by Theodosia Garrison, copyright, 1917, by George H. Doran Company and reprinted by special permission of the publishers, Doubleday, Doran and Company,

20

10

American and European. The range of his literary interests is wide; he has been a literary editor, a critic, and a writer of poems, stories, and essays upon a variety of subjects—nature, religion, travel. Among his books are Little Rivers, 1895, Fisherman's Luck, 1899, The Blue Flower, 1902, Music and Other Poems, 1904, Le Génie de L'Amérique, 1909. His works were collected in 1920. Among his more recent books are Camp-Fires and Guide Posts, 1921, Half-Told Tales, 1925. Doctor van Dyke's poetry is simple and luminous, serious but devoid of labored didacticism, and reflects a courageous and optimistic view of life.

H. W. Mabie, "Henry van Dyke," Cent. 67: 579-81; sketch, Cur. Lit. 28:282; Nation 104:54-5; H. W. Mabie, "Personal Portraits," Bookm. 38:20.

THE THREE BEST THINGS 1 WORK

Let me but do my work from day to day,
In field or forest, at the desk or loom,
In roaring market-place or tranquil room;
Let me but find it in my heart to say,
When vagrant wishes beckon me astray,
"This is my work; my blessing, not my doom;
"Of all who live, I am the one by whom
"This work can best be done in the right way."

Then shall I see it not too great, nor small,

To suit my spirit and to prove my powers;

Then shall I cheerful greet the labouring hours,

And cheerful turn, when the long shadows fall At eventide, to play and love and rest, Because I know for me my work is best. April, 1902

LIFE

Let me but live my life from year to year,
With forward face and unreluctant soul;
Not hurrying to, nor turning from, the goal;
Not mourning for the things that disappear
In the dim past, nor holding back in fear
From what the future veils; but with a whole
And happy heart, that pays its toll
To Youth and Age, and travels on with cheer.

So let the way wind up the hill or down,
O'er rough and smooth, the journey will be joy:

Still seeking what I sought when but a boy, New friendship, high adventure, and a crown, My heart will keep the courage of the quest, And hope the road's last turn will be the best. May, 1892

LOVE

Let me but love my love without disguise,
Nor wear a mask of fashion old or new,
Not wait to speak till I can hear a clue,
Nor play a part to shine in others' eyes,
Nor bow my knees to what my heart denies;
But what I am, to that let me be true,
And let me worship where my love is due,
And so through love and worship let me rise.

For love is but the heart's immortal thirst
To be completely known and all forgiven,
Even as sinful souls that enter Heaven:
So take me, dear, and understand my worst,
And freely pardon it, because confessed,
And let me find in loving thee, my best.

May, 1902

LIZETTE WOODWORTH REESE

Miss Reese was born in Baltimore County, Maryland, and has spent her life in or near the city of Baltimore, where for many years she has been a teacher of English in the Western High School. Even the titles of her volumes are suggestive of delicacy and quietude, and a spirit that finds more than a passing refreshment in nature: A Branch of May, 1887; A Handful of Lavender, 1891; A Quiet Road, 1896; A Wayside Lute, 1909; Spicewood, 1920; Wild Cherry, 1923. Always her work has been notable for individuality and independence, firmness and directness of diction, and excellence of finish. Miss Reese seems to have been unmoved by current fashions in verse, for from the first her poetry anticipated in qualities of exactness and clarity the style of Sara Teasdale and Edna St. Vincent Millay; and at the same time in its joyousness or seriousness, seems to have much in common with the untrammeled spirit of the Elizabethans.

Criticism: Rittenhouse; Untermeyer; Mrs. L. H. Wrenshall in Library of Southern Literature, Vol.

TEARS 2

When I consider Life and its few years—
A wisp of fog betwixt us and the sun;
A call to battle, and the battle done
Ere the last echo dies within our ears;
A rose choked in the grass; an hour of fears;
The gusts that past a darkening shore do beat;
The burst of music down an unlistening street—
I wonder at the idleness of tears.
Ye old, old dead, and ye of yesternight,
Chieftains, and bards, and keepers of the sheep,

&lt;sup>1</sup> Copyright, 1920, by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers.

&lt;sup>2</sup> From the Selected Poems of Lizette Woodworth Reese, copyright, 1926, George H. Doran, publisher.

10

20

By every cup of sorrow that you had, Loose me from tears, and make me see aright How each hath back what once he stayed to ween:

Homer his sight, David his little lad!

OLD SAUL <sup>1</sup>

I cannot think of any word
To make it plain to you,
How white a thing the hawthorn bush
That delicately blew

Within a crook of Tinges Lane; Each May Day there it stood; And lit a flame of loveliness For the small neighborhood.

So fragile-white a thing it was,
I cannot make it plain;
Or the sweet fumbling of the bees,
Like the break in a rain.

Old Saul lived near. And this his life:—
To cobble for his bread;
To mourn a tall son lost at sea;
A daughter worse than dead.

And so, in place of all his lack,
He set the hawthorn tree;
Made it his wealth, his mirth, his god,
His Zion to touch and see.

Born English he. Down Tinges Lane His lad's years came and went;

<sup>1</sup> From the Selected Poems of Lizette Woodworth Reese, copyright, 1926, George H. Doran, publisher.

He saw out there behind his thorn, A hundred thorns of Kent.

At lovers slipping through the dusk
He shook a lover's head;
Grudged them each flower. It was too white
For any but the dead.

Once on a blurred, wet, silver day
He said to two or three:
"Folks, when I go, pluck yonder bloom
That I may take with me."

But it was winter when he went,
The road wind-drenched and torn;
They laid upon his coffin lid
A wreath made all of thorn.

THE LARK 2

(SALISBURY, ENGLAND)

A close, gray sky, And poplars gray and high, The country-side along; The steeple bold Across the acres old— And then a song!

Oh, far, far, far, As any spire or star, Beyond the cloistered wall! Oh, high, high, high, A heart-throb in the sky— Then not at all.

1909

10

30

&lt;sup>2</sup> From A Wayside Lute, copyright, 1909, by Thomas B. Mosher, publisher.

By Permission of Keystone View Company
EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON

THE EARLY TWENTIETH CENTURY

TN THE three centuries of American literature, great changes have taken place in its outlook and form. The first American immigrants left the England of Shakespeare with an attitude toward the world that was characteristic of the Elizabethans. During the three hundred years since, English literature has gone through change after change—puritanism, pseudo-classicism, romanticism. Victorianism. For two of these three centuries American literature, as literature, was virtually stagnant or dormant, and its development has taken place in a little more than a century. In that hundred and thirty years American literature has gone through cycles of change; imitation of foreign, especially English, literature; a growth into national individuality; and finally a development parallel with that of the world-current of thought and expression. The future can scarcely bring any marked impairment in our hardwon national distinctiveness. The Anglo-Saxon stream of blood has had too many additions from Celt, Italian, German, and Slav ever to re-emerge as a solely determining element; what American literature is and will be depends not so much upon blood and tradition as upon American democracy and social conditions. Nevertheless we have unavoidably approached the general European trend of thought since 1900. The Spanish-American War made us a world power; the Great War forced us into many new contacts; the break-down of the effects of distance due to airplanes, radio, and the wireless telegraph, while apparently only a physical break-down, marks an inevitable trend toward a worldwide commingling of ideas.

These years have tended also to reinforce the break with the old that science began. Forms long-cherished have been cast aside; free verse, with its abandonment of regular meter—the change, to use American names of the last thirty years, from Moody to Amy Lowell—indicates this departure from the past. And though free verse is already on the decline, its eager search for newness is deeply significant. We face "a brave new world." The nineteenth century broke new ground in half a hundred directions. In all these directions the twentieth century is going forward, uncertainly and capriciously it may be, but always intensely. It is yet far too early to pass on the permanent value of what is today being written. But this may confidently be said: its alert sincerity has high value for us; in its experimental complexity lies a seed of life.

STEPHEN CRANE 1870-1900

Stephen Crane attained distinction at the age of twenty-five through his novel The Red Badge of Courage, written before he had seen war. This is a realistic narrative of experiences in the Civil War, with all the interest centered upon a young country-bred soldier through whom one sees the whole drama of battle. Crane broke so sharply away from current literary conventions that H. G. Wells pronounced him "one of the most brilliant, most significant and most distinctly American of all English writers." He was an Imagist before Imagism was known. Crane's poetry, like his prose, is founded upon the use of exact, simple words, and a vigorous, homely phrasing of ideas. Since all his work is forward-looking in its style, it belongs to the twentieth century.

Crane's life was unfortunately shortened by early hardships and lack of recognition. His first novel, Maggie, a Girl of the Streets, 1891, was almost wholly neglected until The Red Badge of Courage appeared. His birthplace was Newark, New Jersey; he took up journalism at sixteen, and he was educated at Lafayette College and Syracuse University. During the Greco-Turkish and the Spanish-American wars he was correspondent for the New York Journal. In Cuba his health broke down; he settled in England, but was soon taken to Germany, where he died. In his short career he produced a variety of work: novels, historical essays, special articles, and poetry. Among his significant works are The Black Riders, 1895, and War Is Kind. 1899.

Biography and criticism: T. Beer, Stephen Crane, 1924; E. Garnett, Friday Nights, ser. 1, 1922; Van Doren (AN); Mrs. Joseph Conrad, "Recollections of Stephen Crane," Bookm. 63:134-7; F. Dell, "Stephen Crane and the Genius Myth," Nation 119:637-8; see also H. Wickham, Am. Mercury 7:291-7; J. Conrad, Bookm. 50:529-31; E. Wyatt, New Repub. 4:148-50; Poetry 14: 148-52; Cur. Opinion 76:39-40; 68:537-8; 62: 202-3.

I EXPLAIN 1

I explain the silvered passing of a ship at night, The sweep of each sad lost wave, The dwindling boom of the steel thing's striving, The little cry of a man to a man, A shadow falling across the grayer night, And the sinking of the small star;

Then the waste, the far waste of waters, And the soft lashing of black waves For long and in loneliness.

Remember, thou, O ship of love, Thou leavest a far waste of waters, And the soft lashing of black waves For long and in loneliness.

THE BLACK RIDERS 1

Black riders came from the sea.
There was clang and clang of spear and shield,
And clash and clash of hoof and heel,
Wild shouts and the wave of hair
In the rush upon the wind:
Thus the ride of sin.

THE BLADES OF GRASS 1

In Heaven, Some little blades of grass Stood before God. "What did you do?" Then all save one of the little blades Began eagerly to relate The merits of their lives. This one staved a small way behind, Ashamed 10 Presently, God said. "And what did you do?" The little blade answered. "Oh, my Lord. Memory is bitter to me. For, if I did good deeds, I know not of them." Then God, in all his splendor, Arose from his throne. "Oh, best little blade of grass!" he said.

A NEWSPAPER 1

A newspaper is a collection of half-injustices Which, bawled by boys from mile to mile, Spreads its curious opinion
To a million merciful and sneering men, While families cuddle the joys of the fireside When spurred by tale of dire love agony.
A newspaper is a court
Where everyone is kindly and unfairly tried By a squalor of honest men.

A newspaper is a market
Where wisdom sells its freedom
And melons are crowned by the crowd.
A newspaper is a game
Where his error scores the player victory
While another's skill wins death.
A newspaper is a symbol;
It is fetless life's chronicle,
A collection of loud tales
Concentrating eternal stupidities,
That in remote ages lived unhaltered,
Roaming through a fenceless world.

Reprinted from The Works of Stephen Crane by permission of and special arrangement with Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., authorized publishers.

THE PEAKS 1

In the night
Gray, heavy clouds muffled the valleys,
And the peaks looked toward God alone.

"O Master, that movest the wind with a finger,
Humble, idle, futile peaks are we.
Grant that we may run swiftly across the world

To huddle in worship at Thy feet."

In the morning
A noise of men at work came the clear blue miles,
And the little black cities were apparent.

"O Master, that knowest the meaning of raindrops,
Humble, idle, futile peaks are we.

Give voice to us, we pray, O Lord,
That we may sing Thy goodness to the sun."

In the evening
The far valleys were sprinkled with tiny lights.
"O Master,

Thou that knowest the value of kings and birds,

Thou hast made us humble, idle, futile peaks.

Thou only needest eternal patience; We bow to 'Thy wisdom, O Lord— Humble, idle, futile peaks."

In the night Gray, heavy clouds muffled the valleys, And the peaks looked toward God alone.

A SLANT OF SUN 1

A slant of sun on dull brown walls, A forgotten sky of bashful blue.

Toward God a mighty hymn,
A song of collisions and cries,
Rumbling wheels, hoof-beats, bells,
Welcomes, farewells, love-calls, final moans,
Voices of joy, idiocy, warning, despair,
The unknown appeals of brutes,
The chanting of flowers,
The screams of cut trees,
The senseless babble of hens and wise men—
A cluttered incoherency that says at the stars:
"O God, save us!"

Reprinted from The Works of Stephen Crane by permission of and special arrangement with Alfred Knopf, Inc., authorized publishers.

AMY LOW.ELL 1874-1925

Miss Lowell was born in Brookline, Massachusetts, and died there. She was a member of the family from which James Russell Lowell sprang, and of her brothers one was the astronomer, Percival Lowell, and another is president of Harvard University. She was educated at private schools. She took literature for her vocation and worked at it deliberately and conscientiously. Her first book of poems, A Dome of Many-Colored Glass, 1912, appeared only after she had spent ten painstaking years in developing her style. Sword Blades and Poppy Seed appeared in 1914; Men. Women. and Ghosts in 1916; What's O'clock, just after her death. Miss Lowell also produced Can Grande's Castle, "polyphonic prose," 2 1918; and in criticism Six French Poets, 1915, and Tendencies in Modern American Poetry, 1917. Her most scholarly work is her biographical and critical study, John Keats,

Part of Miss Lowell's verse is in usual metrical and stanzaic form, but her most characteristic pattern is "free verse," without regular stanzas, meter, or rime. More important than the form of her verse was her theory of what poetry should be. In her mind poetry should be "hard and clear, never blurred nor indefinite"; concentration should be its "very essence." To this end words should "render particulars exactly and not deal in vague generalities, however magnificent and sonorous"; they should be "exact, not nearly-exact," not "merely decorative." She does not insist upon the necessity of free verse, but upon liberty to use it. The group of poets who showed these tendencies were known as Imagists. Among the Imagists Miss Lowell has included the American poets "H.D." (Hilda Doolittle), John Gould Fletcher, and herself, and an equal number of contemporary English poets. Whatever may be thought of her theories concerning poetry, Miss Lowell has had a decidedly constructive influence in the work of the younger generation of writers, and her own poetry is remarkable for its strength and for its penetrating views of life and of nature.

Biography and criticism: C. Wood, Amy Lowell; R. Hunt and R. H. Snow, Amy Lowell, 1921; Phelps (EP); also Bookm. 47:255-60; Untermeyer; Boynton; Wilkinson (NV); E. S. Sergeant, "Amy Lowell," New Repub. 44:322-6; A. MacLeish, "Amy Lowell and the Art of Poetry," No. Am. 221: 508-21; H. Monroe, "Memories of Amy Lowell," Poetry 26:208-14; H. B. Kizer, "Amy Lowell, a Personality," No. Am. 207:736-47; W. A. Bradley, "Four American Poets," Dial 61:528-30; W. M. Patterson, "New Verse and New Prose," No. Am. 207:257-67; C. Aiken, "The Technique of Polyphonic Prose," Dial 65:346-8.

2" "Polyphonic' means 'many-voiced' and the form is so called because it makes use of all the 'voices' of poetry, viz.: meter, vers libre [free verse], assonance, alliteration, rime, and return." [Amy Lowell, Tendencies in Modern American Poetry, p. 321.]

MEETING-HOUSE HILL 1

I must be mad, or very tired, When the curve of a blue bay beyond a railroad track Is shrill and sweet to me like the sudden springing of a tune. And the sight of a white church above thin trees in a city square Amazes my eyes as though it were the Parthenon. Close, reticent, superbly final, With the pillars of its portico refined to a cautious elegance. It dominates the weak trees, And the shot of its spire 10 Is cool, and candid, Rising into an unresisting sky. Strange meeting-house Pausing a moment upon a squalid hill-top. I watch the spire sweeping the sky. I am dizzy with the movement of the sky. I might be watching a mast With its rovals set full Straining before a two-reef breeze. I might be sighting a tea-clipper, 2 Tacking into the blue bay. Just back from Canton With her hold full of green and blue porcelain, And a Chinese coolie leaning over the rail Gazing at the white spire

1025

PATTERNS 1

I walk down the garden paths, And all the daffodils Are blowing, and the bright blue squills. I walk down the patterned garden-paths In my stiff, brocaded gown. With my powdered hair and jeweled fan, I too am a rare Pattern. As I wander down The garden paths.

With dull, sea-spent eyes.

My dress is richly figured. And the train Makes a pink and silver stain On the gravel, and the thrift 3 Of the borders. Just a plate of current fashion, Tripping by in high-heeled, ribboned shoes. Not a softness anywhere about me,

3 a plant

Copyright. By permission of Houghton Mifflin Company, authorized publishers.
fast salling vessel carrying tea

Only whalebone and brocade. And I sink on a seat in the shade Of a lime tree. For my passion Wars against the stiff brocade. The daffodils and squills Flutter in the breeze As they please. And I ween: For the lime tree is in blossom And one small flower has dropped upon my

And the plashing of waterdrops In the marble fountain 30 Comes down the garden-paths. The dripping never stops. Underneath my stiffened gown Is the softness of a woman bathing in a marble basin. A basin in the midst of hedges grown So thick, she cannot see her lover hiding. But she guesses he is near, And the sliding of the water Seems the stroking of a dear Hand upon her. What is Summer in a fine brocaded gown! I should like to see it lying in a heap upon the ground. All the pink and silver crumpled up on the ground.

I would be the pink and silver as I ran along the paths.

And he would stumble after, Bewildered by my laughter.

I should see the sun flashing from his swordhilt

And the buckles on his shoes.

I would choose

To lead him in a maze along the patterned paths,

A bright and laughing maze for my heavybooted lover.

Till he caught me in the shade,

And the buttons of his waistcoat bruised my body as he clasped me,

Aching, melting, unafraid.

With the shadows of the leaves and the sun-

And the plopping of the waterdrops, All about us in the open afternoon— I am very like to swoon With the weight of this brocade, For the sun sifts through the shade.

Underneath the fallen blossom In my bosom,

60

20

Is a letter I have hid.

It was brought to me this morning by a rider from the Duke.

"Madam, we regret to inform you that Lord Hartwell

Died in action Thursday se'nnight."
As I read it in the white, morning sunlight,

The letters squirmed like snakes.

"Any answer, Madam," said my footman.

"No," I told him.

"See that the messenger takes some refreshment."

No, no answer."

And I walked into the garden,

Up and down the patterned paths,

In my stiff, correct brocade.

The blue and yellow flowers stood up proudly in the sun.

Each one.

I stood upright too.

Held rigid to the pattern

By the stiffness of my gown.

Up and down I walked,

Up and down.

In a month he would have been my husband.

In a month, here, underneath this lime,
We would have broke the pattern;
He for me, and I for him,
He as Colonel, I as Lady,
On this shady seat.
He had a whim
That sunlight carried blessing.
And I answered, "It shall be as you have said."

90
Now he is dead.

In Summer and in Winter I shall walk Up and down

The patterned garden-paths In my stiff, brocaded gown.

The squills and daffodils

Will give place to pillared roses, and to asters, and to snow.

I shall go

Up and down, In my gown.

100

Gorgeously arrayed,

Boned and stayed. And the softness of my body will be guarded from embrace

By each button, hook, and lace.

For the man who should loose me is dead, Fighting with the Duke in Flanders,

In a pattern called a war.

Christ! What are patterns for?

JOHN GOULD FLETCHER 1886-

Amy Lowell assigns Mr. Fletcher a place of importance in modern American poetry as one of the first definitely to adopt free verse, and also to produce some noteworthy poems in "polyphonic prose." He was born at Little Rock, Arkansas, of good pioneer stock. In the course of his education at Phillips Academy, Andover, and at Harvard, he gained a thorough familiarity with languages and literature, and on graduating he determined to be a writer. After extensive travel he settled in England and, in 1912, moved by the Post-Impressionist Exhibition in London, he became one of the leaders of the Imagists. Mr. Fletcher's gift lies in the ability to phrase definite impressions in sensuous, startling words. Breakers and Granite, 1921, aims to put part of the American scene into brilliant pictures. Preludes and Symphonies, 1922, contains two earlier works, Irradiations and Goblins and Pagodas, the latter showing the influence of oriental poetry.

Biography and criticism: Lowell; Wilkinson (NV); Untermeyer; C. Aiken, "Possessor and Possessed," Dial 66:189-91; Poetry 7:44-7; 9:43-7; 13:340-1; 19:155-7; for a discussion of Imagism see New Repub. 3:75; 154; 204.

DOWN THE MISSISSIPPI 1

Ι

EMBARKATION

Dull masses of dense green, The forests range their somber platforms; Between them silently, like a spirit, The river finds its own mysterious path.

Loosely the river sways out, backward, forward, Always fretting the outer side; Shunning the invisible focus of each crescent, Seeking to spread into shining loops over fields.

Like an enormous serpent, dilating, uncoiling, Displaying a broad scaly back of earth-smeared gold:

Swaying out sinuously between the dull motionless forests.

As molten metal might glide down the lip of a vase of dark bronze;

It goes, while the steamboat drifting out upon it.

Seems now to be floating not only outwards but upwards;

In the flight of a petal detached and gradually moving skyward

Above the pink explosion of the calyx of the dawn.

<sup>1</sup> From Breakers and Granite by John Gould Fletcher, by permission of The Macmillan Company, publishers.

1915

TT

HEAT

As if the sun had trodden down the sky. Until no more it holds living air, but only humid vapor.

Heat pressing upon earth with irresistible languor.

Turns all the solid forest into half-liquid smudge.

The heavy clouds like cargo-boats strain slowly against its current;

And the flickering of the haze is like the thunder of ten thousand paddles

Against the heavy wall of the horizon, pale blue and utterly windless,

Whereon the sun hangs motionless, a brassy disk of flame

TTT

FULL MOON

Flinging its arc of silver bubbles, quickly shifts the moon

From side to side of us as we go down its path; I sit on the deck at midnight and watch it slipping and sliding,

Under my tilted chair, like a thin film of spilt water.

It is weaving a river of light to take the place of this river:

A river where we shall drift all night, then come to rest in its shallows;

And then I shall wake from my drowsiness and look down from some dim tree-top

Over white lakes of cotton, like moon-fields on every.side.

IV

THE MOON'S ORCHESTRA

When the moon lights up Its dull red camp-fire through the trees; And floats out, like a white balloon, Into the blue cup of the night, borne by a casual breeze:

The moon-orchestra then begins to stir.

Jiggle of fiddles commence their crazy dance in the darkness.

Crickets churr

Against the stark reiteration of the rusty flutes which frogs

10

Puff at from rotted logs

In the swamp.

And then the moon begins her dance of frozen pomp

Over the lightly quivering floor of the flat and mournful river.

Her white feet lightly twist and swirl.

She is a mad girl

In an old unlit ball-room

Whose walls, half-guessed-at through the gloom. Are hung with the rusty crape of stark black cy-

Which show, through gaps and tatters, red stains half hidden away.

THE STEVEDORES

Frieze of warm bronze that glides with cat-like movements

Over the gangplank poised and vet awaiting. The sinewy thudding rhythm of forty shuffling

Falling like muffled drum beats on the stillness. Oh, roll the cotton down,

Roll, roll the cotton down,

From the further side of Jordan,

Oh roll the cotton down!

And the river waits.

The river listens,

Chuckling little banjo-notes that break with a flop on the stillness;

And by the low dark shed that holds the heavy freights.

Two lonely cypress trees stand up and point with stiffened fingers

Far southward where a single chimney stands out aloof in the sky.

NIGHT LANDING

After the whistle's roar has bellowed and shud-

Shaking the sleeping town and the somnolent

The deep-toned floating of the pilot's bell Suddenly warns the engines.

They stop like heart-beats that abruptly stop, The shore glides to us, in a wide low curve.

And then—supreme revelation of the river— The tackle is loosed—the long gangplank swings outwards-

And poised at the end of it, half naked beneath the searchlight,

A blue-black negro with gleaming teeth waits for his chance to leap.

VΠ

THE SILENCE

There is a silence I carry about with me always:

A silence perpetual, for it is self-created; A silence of heat, of water, of unchecked fruit-

Through which each year the heavy harvests bloom, and burst and fall.

Deep, matted green silence of my South. Often within the push and the scorn of great cities.

I have seen that mile-wide waste of water swaying out to you,

And on its current glimmering, I am going to

There is a silence I have achieved; I have walked beyond its threshold;

I know it is without horizons, boundless, fathomless, perfect.

And some day maybe, far away,

I shall curl up in it at last and sleep an endless sleep.

1015

THE WRECK 1

Amid the immense broad brownness of the

Where water, wind, and solitude join hands; From a sunken pool, the blackened side Of a buried ship sticks out at low tide. The soaked and rotting curve of prow Points seaward, and the old sea now Growls still as harsh and hungrily As when this derelict rode the sea. Men in some century to come May go a-grubbing in dry land And find some bolts of iron; a hand May hold them and a mouth be dumb.

1924

JOHN G. NEIHARDT 1881-

Mr. Neihardt has spent his life mostly in the region that he celebrates in his poems, the valley of the Missouri and its tributaries. During his youth while at the Nebraska Normal College, and later, he interested himself in stories and records of the exploration and pioneer life of this region, especially during the nineteenth century. He lived with the Indians to find out their ways; he searched early newspapers, diaries, personal records, the accounts of trading companies, and legal archives that would help him reconstruct the early days; and he learned the stories of such survivors of the pioneer life as he could find. His narratives, therefore, are as far as possible the record of actual events and

Mr. Neihardt's work rises above local interest because he finds in these events the ending of the great westward movement of the Indo-Aryan race, in progress since the dawn of history, and the last chapters of its ruthless dealings with races that have stood across its path. He carries on the story of this conflict between our own civilization and that of Stone-Age nomads from the point where Cooper leaves it in The Prairie. He has a keen realization of the epic features of the struggle and sees in it the last phase of a spirit of adventure that has swept on across more than two continents and an intervening ocean to the lands beside the Pacific. Its heroes he finds filled with the same impetus that urged on Ulysses. He tells their story in iambic measures of open couplets, well adapted to the poetry of adventure. This form, together with the style, reminds us of the heroic poetry of classic times: we measure the heroism of the adventures he relates by the spirit we find in ancient literature.

The outstanding work of Mr. Neihardt is found in The Song of Hugh Glass, 1915; The Song of Three Friends, 1919; and The Song of the Indian Wars, 1925. His poems were collected in 1926.

Biography and criticism: J. T. House, John G. Neihardt: Man and Poet, 1920; Phelps (EP), and Rookm. 47:395; H. Monroe, "What of Mr. Nei-hardt?" Poetry 30:99-104; "The Poet Laureate of Nebraska," Lit. Digest 69:31, May 14, '21; see also Bookm. 49:496-9; Poetry 7:264-9; 17:94-8; "Old River Captain Rich in Experience," Am. Mercury

From THE SONG OF THE INDIAN WARS<sup>2</sup>

From the sowing of the dragon 3

At last the four year storm of fratricide Had ceased at Appomattox, and the tide

2"The Song of the Indian Wars is a part of the Epic Cycle of the West. . . My purpose in writing this cycle is to preserve the great race-mood of courage that was developed west of the Missouri River in the 19th century. The period . . . is beyond question the great American period, beginning in 1822 and ending in 1890. . . In 1822 the first Ashley-Henry band ascended the Missouri and, after Lewis and Clark, the most important explorers of the West were Ashley-Henry men. . . . The year 1890 marked the end of Indian resistance on the Plains. . . The Song of the Indian Wars deals with the last great fight for the bison pastures of the Plains between the westering white men and the prairie tribes—the struggle for the right of way between the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean." [Neihardt's note]

From The Song of the Indian Wars by John G. Neihardt, by permission of The Macmillan Company, publishers.

a reference to the old myth of Cadmus, who slew a decrea and sowed its teeth, from which sprang up

<sup>a</sup> a reference to the old myth of Cadmus, who slew a dragon and sowed its teeth, from which sprang up armed men who fought together till only five were left

&lt;sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of Houghton Mifflin Company, authorized publishers.

Of war-bit myriads, like a turning sea's, Recoiled upon the deep realities That yield no foam to any squall of change.

Now many a hearth of home had gotten strange To eyes that knew sky-painting flares of war. So much that once repaid the striving for No longer mattered. Yonder road that ran At hazard once beyond the ways of Man 10 By haunted vale and space-enchanted hill. Had never dreamed of aught but Jones's Mill-A dull pedestrian! The spring, where erst The peering plowboy sensed a larger thirst. Had shoaled from awe, so long the man had drunk

At deeper floods. How yonder field had shrunk That billowed once mysteriously far To where the cow-lot nursed the evening star And neighbored with the drowsing moon and sun!

For O what winds of wrath had boomed and Across what vaster fields of moaning grain-Rich seedlings, nurtured by a ghastly rain To woeful harvest!

So the world went small. But 'mid the wreck of things remembered tall An epidemic rumor murmured now. Men leaned upon the handles of the plow To hear and dream; and through the harrowsmoke

The weird voice muttered and the vision broke Of distant, princely acres unpossessed.

Again the bugles of the Race blew west That once the Tigris and Euphrates heard. In unsuspected deeps of being stirred The ancient and compelling Aryan 1 urge. A homing of the homeless, surge on surge, The valley roads ran wagons, and the hills Through lane and by-way fed with trickling rills

The man-stream mighty with a mystic thaw. All summer now the Mississippi saw What long ago the Hellespont 2 beheld. The shrewd, prophetic eyes that peered of eld Across the Danube, visioned naked plains Beyond the bleak Missouri, clad with grains. Jeweled with orchard, grove and greening garth 3-

Serene abundance centered in a hearth To nurture lusty children.

On they swirled. The driving breed, the takers of the world, The makers and the bringers of the law.

50 Now up along the bottoms of the Kaw 4 The drifting reek of wheel and hoof arose. The kiotes talked about it and the crows Along the lone Republican; 5 and still The bison saw it on the Smoky Hill And Solomon: while yonder on the Platte Ten thousand wagons scarred the sandy flat. Between the green grass season and the brown.

A name sufficed to make the camp a town. A whim unmade. In spaces wide as air. 60 And late as empty, now the virile share 6 Ouickened the virgin meadow-lands of God: And lo, begotten of the selfsame sod. The house and harvest!

So the Cadmian breed. 7 The wedders of the vision and the deed. Went forth to sow the dragon-seed again.

But there were those—and they were also

Who saw the end of sacred things and dear In all this wild beginning; saw with fear 70 Ancestral pastures gutted by the plow, The bison harried ceaselessly, and how They dwindled moon by moon; with pious

Beheld the holy places of their dead The mock of aliens.

Sioux, Arapahoe. Cheyenne, Comanche, Kiowa, and Crow In many a council pondered what befell The prairie world. Along the Musselshell, The Tongue, the Niobrara, all they said 80 Upon the Platte, the Arkansaw, the Red Was echoed word by peril-laden word. Along Popo Agie 8 and the Horn they heard The clank of hammers and the clang of rails Where hordes of white men conjured iron trails Now crawling past the Loup Fork and the Blue. By desert-roaming Cimarron they knew, And where La Poudre heads the tale was known. How, snoring up beyond the Yellowstone, The medicine-canoes breathed flame and steam And, like weird monsters of an evil dream, Spewed foes—a multitudinary spawn!

Were all the teeming regions of the dawn Unpeopled now? What devastating need Had set so many faces pale with greed Against the sunset? Not as men who seek

Kansas River

Kansas River

A river in Nebraska; all the rivers mentioned in this passage lie in the vast region between Kansas and Canada, and almost all are tributary to <sup>8</sup> pronounced po-po-ā'ghee

the parent race of all Indo-European peoples the Dardanelles

&lt;sup>6</sup> plowshare <sup>7</sup> See note 3, page 813.

Some meed of kindness, suppliant and meek, These hungry myriads came. They did but look

And whatsoever pleased them, that they took. Their faded eyes were icv, lacking ruth. And all their tongues were forked to split the truth

That word and deed might take diverging ways. Bewildered in the dusk of ancient days The Red Men groped; and howsoever loud The hopeful hotheads boasted in the crowd. The wise one heard prophetic whisperings Through aching hushes; felt the end of things Inexorably shaping. What should be Already was to them. And who can flee His shadow or his doom? Though cowards

The wind-wild thunder-horses, Doom shall ride The arrows of the lightning and prevail. Ere long whole tribes must take the spirit trail As once they traveled to the bison hunt. Then let it be with many wounds—in front— And many scalps, to show their ghostly kin How well they fought the fight they could not

To perish facing what they could not kill.

So down upon the Platte and Smoky Hill Swept war; and all their valleys were afraid. The workers where the trails were being laid To speed the iron horses, now must get Their daily wage in blood as well as sweat With gun and shovel. Often staring plains Beheld at daybreak gutted wagon-trains Set foursquare to the whirling night-attack, With neither hoof nor hand to bring them back To Omaha or Westport. Every week The rolling coaches bound for Cherry Creek Were scarred in running battle. Every day Some ox-rig, creeping California way-That paradise of every hope fulfilled— Was plundered and the homesick driver killed, Forlornly fighting for his little brood. And often was the prairie solitude Aware by night of burning ricks and roofs, Stampeding cattle and the fleeing hoofs Of wild marauders.

1925 1924

EDGAR LEE MASTERS 1869-

Mr. Masters was born in Kansas. After graduating from Knox College in Illinois he entered upon the study of law and was called to the bar. He began his literary work as early as 1898, and has since produced books of drama, poetry, and essays. The appearance of his Spoon River Anthology, 1915, brought him at once into prominence. The theme was original, and treated in a manner entirely new. In its attitude, mood, and form it represents a revolt against nineteenth century conventions. The dead, lying in the graveyard of Spoon River, Illinois, tell the story of their lives with startling frankness, and speak the truth that was hidden or told only in whispers while they lived. In these poems the constantly recurring themes are the urge of passion and the ironv of fate that have tossed human beings hither and yon; they stress the difference between reputations and actualities. Frequently characters are made to explain each other; hidden motives and emotions come to light when the reverse side of the picture is shown. The social value of such poetry is its arresting and stimulating quality when it is set over against a view of life that has become sentimentally dishonest. The form of the poems, vigorous free verse, is well fitted to the subject-matter.

Mr. Masters' later work includes Songs and Satires and The Great Valley, 1916; Toward the Gulf. 1918; and The New Spoon River Anthology. 1924.

Criticism: Lowell; Boynton, Some Contemporary Americans; Untermeyer; Phelps (EP); also Bookm. 47:262-6; W. A. Bradley, "Four American Poets," Dial 61:528-30; "Frost and Masters," Poetry 9:202-7; H. Monroe, "Edgar Lee Masters," Poetry 24:204-10; "What is Great Poetry," Poetry 26:349-51; Bookm. 55:514; see also: Forum 55: 109-23; Bookm. 41:355-7, 432-3.

ANNE RUTLEDGE 1

Out of me unworthy and unknown The vibrations of deathless music: "With malice toward none, with charity for all."

Out of me the forgiveness of millions toward millions.

And the beneficent face of a nation Shining with justice and truth.

I am Anne Rutledge who sleep beneath these weeds.

Beloved in life of Abraham Lincoln, Wedded to him, not through union, 10 But through separation. Bloom forever, O Republic, From the dust of my bosom!

1914, 1915

HENRY ZOLL, THE MILLER 2

Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days?

How it breeds wriggling life,

And seethes and crackles with poisonous froth, Then lies as still as a snake gone blind?

From Spoon River Anthology by Edgar Lee Masters, by permission of The Macmillan Company, publishers.
 Copyright. From New Spoon River Anthology, by kind permission of the author.

1924

20

And how can the mill pond know itself When its water has caked to scum and worms? And how can it know the world or the sky When it has no mirror with which to see them? But the river above the bend is wise: 10 Its waters are swift and cold and clear, Always changing and always fresh, And full of ripples and swirls and waves, That image a thousand stars by night, And a thousand phases of sun and clouds. By a changing movie of forest and hills! And down in its healthful depths the pickerel Chase each other like silver shadows: And the swift game fish swim up the stream. Well, this is the soul of a man, my friend: You brood at first, then froth with regret, Then cake with hatred, and sink to dullness; Or else you struggle and keep on the move. Forget and solve and learn and emerge, Full of sparkle and stars. And down in your depths there's flashing laugh-Swimming against the current!

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN HAZARD 1

You built the new Court House, Spoon River, You laid one stone upon another-But what made them stay? Was it the mortar

You put in arches, and groined ceilings— What held them up? Was it the material. Or the placing of material obedient to laws? Who made those laws, who compelled you, Even if you wanted neither air nor light, Not to make vacuums of rooms, lest they collapse?

What do I mean, I who preach Americanism? I am hinting at Americanism, laws, constitutions.

Can you make laws and constitutions the way you want to.

Against soul gravitations, arches without keys? Rooms without air?

Or must you make them according to the laws of the soul?

What is The Law, the constitution, or the law of the soul?

What is Americanism? I tell you: It is to be an Athenian, an Atlantian: 2 Free, joyous, harmonious, balanced, Simple, just tolerant, wise,

<sup>1</sup>Copyright. From New Spoon River Anthology, by Peaceful, loving beauty, Unprejudiced, seeking to learn, Devoted to nature and to the happiness that comes from these.

And a maker of new gods in the image of perfected hope.

And adoration!

1024

HENRY COGDAL 1

Bring from the Big Creek a huge boulder, Put it at the head of me. And bolt upon it a tablet of bronze With these words: Here was buried the body of Henry Cogdal, A private who fell in the war for Wisdom. And Beauty and Truth. He strove to be a guide to the creative spirit. And to uphold the singers and tellers of stories. Who keep the vision of a nation Upon the clear realities of life. At the height of his power and work He lost his place and means of support Through a rich manufacturer who bought the newspaper,

And began to popularize it, And to lower its criticisms To the level of advertisers and optimists:— There will come a time when crimes against culture

Will be punished the same as murder!

1924

THE CLIPPER SHIPS 3

New Bedford and Nantucket launched the traders and the whalers.

Launched the clipper ships whose wake followed Hawkins, followed Drake: 4

Gave the ratlines and the brailers 5 to such sea hardened sailors

As had seen Hang Kow, Whampao, and Borneo, Rio de Janeiro, and all the Canton trade. Wherever there was barter that repaid any raid.

So anciently were schooners and brigs for these harpooners

When Sutter's 6 roused the cutters and Dana 7 sailed the seas,

When just to peddle notions was enough to sail the oceans.

And Emerson took a journey to Ferney 8 and was happy, kind permission of the author.

<sup>2</sup> a native of Atlantis, a mythical island pictured by Sir Francis Bacon as the home of an ideal civili-

&lt;sup>a</sup> Copyright. By kind permission of the author.

<sup>e</sup> famous Elizabethan sailors and explorers

<sup>s</sup> ropes for hauling up sails in furling

<sup>e</sup> Sutter's Fort, California, where gold was discovered

<sup>r</sup> See p. 612.

<sup>s</sup> in France; the home of Voltaire, French dramatist, philosopher, man of letters, 1694-1778

Nor missed the twenty knotters, nor the talk of globe trotters.

Nor the swimming pools, nor lifts, nor the state-room's ease.

But of all clipper builders whose shipmanship bewilders.

Over Jackson, over Briggs, over Hall was McKay.

Taking oak and southern pine he made harmony of line.

With no lack of hackmatack, 'mid the maul and hammer claque;

And with copper and with Taunton, and with truss and with stay

Did he build the Flying Cloud with its figure head so proud

Of an angel with a trumpet blowing to the sea exultant

Happiness for the wind's speed along the sea's way.

There was Sovereign of the Seas long of keel which could heel,

And shoot the waves which sought her with her sails and ropes tauter;

Which could righten like a racer, and leap forward like a pacer

With a stout heart and better start between the towering water.

There were Red Jacket, Stag Hound, swift ships and both renowned.

Trim as shiny mackerel, and sharpened like a pike.

And Lightning bound for Liverpool whose gunwales passed the funnels,

Swifter than an eagle and as agile as a shrike.

But of all the clippers McKay builded in that wonder day,

None so great was or symbolic as the clipper Great Republic;

With her fifty feet of beam, and her strength and shapely length,

With her square masts and her spanker-masts and gaff-topsails,

And her acres of white canvas—how her pennants streamed the gales;

How they towed her from the slip 1 starting on her maiden trip;

But how fire ran up her ropes; how to ashes went her hopes;

How they scuttled her and diminished her proportions when re-finished;

How Australia never knew all the canvas that she flew.

There was Portsmouth, there was Salem, there was Marblehead and Boston;

And Canton wharves and India wharves, and docks on the rocks.

And there you'd sit a-smoking while the sailors were a-ioking;

And there you'd see the clipper ships by the rolling waters tossed on.

Dropping in from every shore, St. Petersburg and Singapore:

And never a roof to hide them like these sheds hide the piers.

New York enjoys no better luck than Omaha or Keokuk.

We never see a steamer dock, or see her when she clears.

1928

EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON 1869-

Although Mr. Robinson is no longer a constant resident of New England, his mind is of the serious cast that we often associate with New England; and the locality and people of his birthplace, Gardiner, Maine, have inspired some of his most characteristic poems. His earlier poems, especially, reflect a New England that is like Frost's in its insistence upon secluded, out-of-the-way characters and scenes. Unlike Frost's, Robinson's New England poetry is in shadow; a questioning, though gentle irony pervades it, a searching for the deeper values and the higher pleasures of life with no certainty that they have been or can be found; often the tragic note is dominant, not generally harrowing, but thought-compelling.

Mr. Robinson's field is large, ranging from simple incidents to Arthurian legend. His verse is "conventional" in form; its foremost characteristics are severity and simplicity of diction, and a chasteness and quietness that produce clear and exact effects. His verse is close-knit; a swift ending, which at first seems almost artificial, is found inevitably to result from the thought or material of the poem. Notable among Mr. Robinson's books of poems are The Children of the Night, 1897, The Man Against the Sky, 1916, Merlin, 1917, Tristram, 1927. His poems were collected in 1921. In his later romances especially, the verbal simplicity is striking, for whole passages are prevailingly monosyllabic; yet the tales retain all the charm and atmosphere of romance.

Biography and criticism: B. R. Redman, Edwin Arlington Robinson, 1926; M. Van Doren, Edwin Arlington Robinson, 1927; The Poetry of Edwin Arlington Robinson, Phelps (EP); Boynton, Some Contemporary Americans; Untermeyer; Wilkinson (NV); Lowell; also Dial 72:130-42; Y. Winters, "A Cool Master," Poetry 19:278-82; Y. Winters, "A Cool Master," Poetry 19:278-88; Fortn. 117:649-60; Yale R. ns 11:467-76; "An Appreciation of the Poetry of Edwin Arlington

<sup>1</sup> herthing-place

Robinson," Scrib. M. 66:763-4; S. Roth, "Edwin Arlington Robinson," Bookm. 50:507-11; L. Mac-Veagh, "Edwin Arlington Robinson," New Repub. 2:267-8.

REUBEN BRIGHT 1

Because he was a butcher and thereby Did earn an honest living (and did right). I would not have you think that Reuben Bright Was any more a brute than you or I: For when they told him that his wife must die, He stared at them, and shook with grief and

And cried like a great baby half that night, And made the women cry to see him cry.

And after she was dead, and he had paid 10 The singers and the sexton and the rest. He packed a lot of things that she had made Most mournfully away in an old chest Of hers, and put some chopped-up cedar boughs In with them, and tore down the slaughterhouse.

1890-1897

THE HOUSE ON THE HILL<sup>1</sup>

They are all gone away, The House is shut and still, There is nothing more to say.

Through broken walls and gray The winds blow bleak and shrill: They are all gone away.

Nor is there one today To speak them good or ill: There is nothing more to say.

Why is it then we stray Around the sunken sill? They are all gone away.

And our poor fancy-play For them is wasted skill: There is nothing more to say.

There is ruin and decay In the House on the Hill: They are all gone away, There is nothing more to say.

1890-1897

10

MINIVER CHEEVY 1

Miniver Cheevy, child of scorn, Grew lean while he assailed the seasons;

<sup>1</sup> Copyright. Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers.

He went that he was ever born. And he had reasons

Miniver loved the days of old When swords were bright and steeds were prancing:

The vision of a warrior bold Would set him dancing.

Miniver sighed for what was not, And dreamed, and rested from his labors: 10 He dreamed of Thebes and Camelot, 2 And Priam's neighbors. 3

Miniver mourned the ripe renown That made so many a name so fragrant: He mourned Romance, now on the town, And Art. a vagrant.

Miniver loved the Medici. 4 Albeit he had never seen one: He would have sinned incessantly Could he have been one.

20

Miniver cursed the commonplace And eyed a khaki suit with loathing; He missed the medieval grace Of iron clothing.

Miniver scorned the gold he sought, But sore annoyed was he without it: Miniver thought, and thought, and thought, And thought about it.

Miniver Cheevy, born too late, Scratched his head and kept on thinking; 30 Miniver coughed and called it fate, And kept on drinking.

1910

STAFFORD'S CABIN 5

Once there was a cabin here, and once there was a man:

And something happened here before my memory began.

Time has made the two of them the fuel of

And all we have of them is now a legend and a

Thebes, an ancient Egyptian city; Camelot, the residence of King Arthur, in Wales
 Priam was king of Troy when it was destroyed.
 noble Florentine family powerful during the Italian Renaissance, and notable for their patronage of their transportant their transportant.

art, their tyranny, and their crimes

From Collected Poems of Edwin Arlington Robinson, by permission of The Macmillan Company, publishers.

All I have to say is what an old man said to me, And that would seem to be as much as there will ever be.

"Fifty years ago it was we found it where it sat."—

And forty years ago it was old Archibald said

"An apple tree that's yet alive saw something, I suppose.

Of what it was that happened there, and what no mortal knows.

Some one on the mountain heard far off a master shriek.

And then there was a light that showed the way for men to seek.

"We found it in the morning with an iron bar behind,

And there were chains around it; but no search could ever find.

Either in the ashes that were left, or anywhere, A sign to tell of who or what had been with Stafford there.

"Stafford was a likely man with ideas of his

Though I could never like the kind that likes to live alone:

And when you met, you found his eyes were always on your shoes,

As if they did the talking when he asked you for the news.

"That's all, my son. Were I to talk for half a hundred years

I'd never clear away from there the cloud that never clears.

We buried what was left of it,—the bar, too, and the chains;

And only for the apple tree there's nothing that remains."

Forty years ago it was I heard the old man say, "That's all, my son."—And here again I find the place today,

Deserted and told only by the tree that knows the most.

And overgrown with golden-rod as if there were no ghost.

1916

ROBERT FROST 1875-

Although he was born in San Francisco, circumstances took Mr. Frost to his ancestral New England before his boyhood was past, and with New England his life and work are essentially connected. He was for a while at Harvard, and shortly afterwards spent some time in England where he came into contact with some of the vigorous poets of the day. There his first books of poems, A Boy's Will, 1913, and North of Boston, 1914, were published, and at once made him favorably known. Since returning to this country he has passed much of his life upon farms in New Hampshire and Vermont, with some intervals spent in teaching at Amherst; he has published Mountain Interval, 1916, New Hampshire, 1923. At the University of Michigan he has spent two years as an informal adviser to students of literary inclination and ambition.

With few exceptions, Mr. Frost's work is the product of New England in scene, characters, and sentiment. It reflects the present spirit of the less frequented localities now occupied by the less fortunate descendants of the old families, and by newcomers of foreign blood. It is the comedy or more often the tragedy of the hill country and the remote valleys that is notable in his books, the tragedy of lives distorted or sometimes ennobled by the blind following of the beaten path. However grim and gnarled his characters may be, Frost himself is an optimist; life, to him, is exceedingly worth living.

Criticism: Lowell; Untermeyer; Boynton, Some Contemporary Americans; Wilkinson (NV); Phelps (EP); Garnett; H. Monroe, "Robert Frost," Poetry 25:146-53; E. S. Sergeant, "Robert Frost, a Good Greek out of New England," New Repub. 44: 144-8; C. Van Doren, "The Soil of the Puritans," Cent. 105:629-36; G. R. Elliott, "The Neighborliness of Robert Frost," Nation 109:713-5; E. Garnett, "A New American Poet," Atlan. 116:214-21; S. Baxter, "New England's New Poet," R. of Rs. 51:432-4; P. Colum, "The Poetry of Robert Frost," New Repub. 9:219 ff.; S. H. Cox, "The Sincerity of Robert Frost," New Repub. 12:109-11.

MENDING WALL 1

Something there is that doesn't love a wall,
That sends the frozen-ground-swell under it,
And spills the upper boulders in the sun;
And makes gaps even two can pass abreast.
The work of hunters is another thing:
I have come after them and made repair
Where they have left not one stone on a stone,
But they would have the rabbit out of hiding,
To please the yelping dogs. The gaps I mean,
No one has seen them made or heard them made.

But at spring mending-time we find them there. I let my neighbor know beyond the hill; And on a day we meet to walk the line And set the wall between us once again. We keep the wall between us as we go. To each the boulders that have fallen to each. And some are loaves and some so nearly balls

Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Henry Holt and Company, publishers. We have to use a spell to make them balance: "Stay where you are until our backs are turned!"

We wear our fingers rough with handling them.
Oh, just another kind of outdoor game,
One on a side. It comes to little more:
There where it is we do not need the wall:
He is all pine and I am apple-orchard.
My apple trees will never get across
And eat the cones under his pines, I tell him.
He only says, "Good fences make good neighbors."

Spring is the mischief in me, and I wonder If I could put a notion in his head:

"Why do they make good neighbors? Isn't it Where there are cows? But here there are no

Before I built a wall I'd ask to know
What I was walling in or walling out,
And to whom I was like to give offence.
Something there is that doesn't love a wall,
That wants it down." I could say "Elves" to

But it's not elves exactly, and I'd rather
He said it for himself. I see him there
Bringing a stone grasped firmly by the top
In each hand, like an old-stone savage armed.
He moves in darkness as it seems to me,
Not of woods only and the shade of trees.
He will not go behind his father's saying,
And he likes having thought of it so well
He says again, "Good fences make good neighbors."

1912 1914

THE DEATH OF THE HIRED MAN 1

Mary sat musing on the lamp-flame at the table Waiting for Warren. When she heard his step, She ran on tip-toe down the darkened passage To meet him in the doorway with the news And put him on his guard. "Silas is back." She pushed him outward with her through the

And shut it after her. "Be kind," she said. She took the market things from Warren's arms

And set them on the porch, then drew him down

To sit beside her on the wooden steps.

"When was I ever anything but kind to him? But I'll not have the fellow back," he said. "I told him so last haying, didn't I? 'If he left then,' I said, 'that ended it.' What good is he? Who else will harbor him

At his age for the little he can do?
What help he is there's no depending on.
Off he goes always when I need him most.
'He thinks he ought to earn a little pay,
Enough at least to buy tobacco with,
So he won't have to beg and be beholden.'
'All right,' I say, 'I can't afford to pay Any fixed wages, though I wish I could.'
'Someone else can.' 'Then someone else will have to.'

I shouldn't mind his bettering himself
If that was what it was. You can be certain,
When he begins like that, there's someone at

Trying to coax him off with pocket-money,— In haying time, when any help is scarce. In winter he comes back to us. I'm done." <sup>30</sup>

"Sh! not so loud: he'll hear you," Mary said.

"I want him to: he'll have to soon or late."

"He's worn out. He's asleep beside the stove. When I came up from Rowe's I found him here, Huddled against the barn-door fast asleep, A miserable sight, and frightening, too—You needn't smile—I didn't recognize him—I wasn't looking for him—and he's changed. Wait till you see."

"Where did you say he'd been?" 40

"He didn't say. I dragged him to the house, And gave him tea and tried to make him smoke. I tried to make him talk about his travels. Nothing would do: he just kept nodding off."

"What did he say? Did he say anything?"

"But little."

"Anything? Mary, confess He said he'd come to ditch the meadow for me."

"Warren!"

"But did he? I just want to know." 50

"Of course he did. What would you have him say?

Surely you wouldn't begrudge the poor old man Some humble way to save his self-respect. He added, if you really care to know, He meant to clear the upper pasture, too. That sounds like something you have heard before?

Warren, I wish you could have heard the way He jumbled everything. I stopped to look &lt;sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Henry Holt and Company, publishers.

Two or three times—he made me feel so queer—

To see if he was talking in his sleep.

He ran on Harold Wilson—you remember—
The boy you had in haying four years since.
He's finished school, and teaching in his college.
Silas declares you'll have to get him back.
He says they two will make a team for work:
Between them they will lay this farm as smooth!

The way he mixed that in with other things. He thinks young Wilson a likely lad, though

On education—you know how they fought All through July under the blazing sun, Silas up on the cart to build the load, Harold along beside to pitch it on."

"Yes, I took care to keep well out of earshot."

"Well, those days trouble Silas like a dream. You wouldn't think they would. How some things linger!

Harold's young college boy's assurance piqued him.

After so many years he still keeps finding Good arguments he sees he might have used. I sympathize. I know just how it feels To think of the right thing to say too late. So Harold's associated in his mind with Latin. He asked me what I thought of Harold's saying He studied Latin like the violin Because he liked it—that an argument! He said he couldn't make the boy believe He could find water with a hazel prong—Which showed how much good school had ever done him.

He wanted to go over that. But most of all He thinks if he could have another chance To teach him how to build a load of hay—" 90

"I know, that's Silas' one accomplishment. He bundles every forkful in its place, And tags and numbers it for future reference, So he can find and easily dislodge it In the unloading. Silas does that well. He takes it out in bunches like big birds' nests. You never see him standing on the hay He's trying to lift, straining to lift himself."

"He thinks if he could teach him that, he'd be Some good perhaps to someone in the world. He hates to see a boy the fool of books.

Poor Silas, so concerned for other folk, And nothing to look backward to with pride, And nothing to look forward to with hope, So now and never any different."

Part of a moon was falling down the west, Dragging the whole sky with it to the hills. Its light poured softly in her lap. She saw And spread her apron to it. She put out her

Among the harp-like morning-glory strings,
Taut with the dew from garden bed to eaves,
As if she played unheard the tenderness

111
That wrought on him beside her in the night.
"Warren," she said, "he has come home to die;
You needn't be afraid he'll leave you this time."

"Home," he mocked gently.

"Yes, what else but home? It all depends on what you mean by home. Of course he's nothing to us, any more Than was the hound that came a stranger to us Out of the woods, worn out upon the trail."

"Home is the place where, when you have to go there,
They have to take you in."

"I should have called it Something you somehow haven't to deserve."

Warren leaned out and took a step or two, Picked up a little stick, and brought it back And broke it in his hand and tossed it by. "Silas has better claim on us you think Than on his brother? Thirteen little miles As the road winds would bring him to his door. Silas has walked that far no doubt today. 181 Why didn't he go there? His brother's rich, A somebody—director in the bank."

"He never told us that."

"We know it though."

"I think his brother ought to help, of course.

I'll see to that if there is need. He ought of right

To take him in, and might be willing to— He may be better than appearances. But have some pity on Silas. Do you think If he'd had any pride in claiming kin 141 Or anything he looked for from his brother, He'd keep so still about him all this time?"

"I wonder what's between them."

"I can tell you. Silas is what he is—we wouldn't mind him—But just the kind that kinsfolk can't abide. He never did a thing so very bad. He don't know why he isn't quite as good

1915

As anyone. He won't be made ashamed 150 To please his brother, worthless though he is."

"I can't think Si ever hurt anyone."

"No, but he hurt my heart the way he lay
And rolled his old head on that sharp-edged chair-back.

He wouldn't let me put him on the lounge.
You must go in and see what you can do.
I made the bed up for him there tonight.
You'll be surprised at him—how much he's broken.

His working days are done; I'm sure of it."

"I'd not be in a hurry to say that."

"I haven't been. Go, look, see for yourself. But, Warren, please remember how it is: He's come to help you ditch the meadow. He has a plan. You mustn't laugh at him. He may not speak of it, and then he may. I'll sit and see if that small sailing cloud Will hit or miss the moon."

It hit the moon.

Then there were three there, making a dim row,

The moon, the little silver cloud, and she.

170

Warren returned—too soon, it seemed to her, Slipped to her side, caught up her hand and waited.

"Warren," she questioned.

1905

"Dead," was all he answered.

STORM FEAR 1

When the wind works against us in the dark, And pelts with snow
The lower chamber window on the east,
And whispers with a sort of stifled bark,
The beast,
"Come out!"—
It costs no inward struggle not to go,
Ah, no!
I count our strength,
Two and a child,
Those of us not asleep subdued to mark
How the cold creeps as the fire dies at length,
How drifts are piled,
Dooryard and road ungraded,

Till even the comforting barn grows far away; And my heart owns a doubt Whether 'tis in us to arise with day And save ourselves unaided.

NOT TO KEEP 1

They sent him back to her. The letter came Saying. . . . And she could have him. And before

She could be sure there was no hidden ill
Under the formal writing, he was in her sight,
Living. They gave him back to her alive—
How else? They are not known to send the

And not disfigured visibly. His face? His hands? She had to look, to ask, "What is it, dear?" And she had given all 9 And still she had all—they had—they the lucky! Wasn't she glad now? Everything seemed won, And all the rest for them permissible ease. She had to ask, "What was it, dear?"

"Enough,
Yet not enough. A bullet through and through,
High in the breast. Nothing but what good care
And medicine and rest, and you a week,
Can cure me of to go again." The same
Grim giving to do over for them both.
She dared no more than ask him with her eyes
How was it with him for a second trial.
And with his eyes he asked her not to ask.
They had given him back to her, but not to keep.

CARL SANDBURG 1878-

1917

Galesburg, Illinois, was the birthplace and early home of Carl Sandburg, whose ancestors were Swedish immigrants. After a boyhood spent in the public schools, and a youth that included many experiences as an itinerant laborer on farms and railroads from Illinois to Colorado, and service in the Spanish-American War, Sandburg came back to Galesburg and worked his way through Lombard College. For several years more he engaged in various occupations, chiefly salesmanship, advertising, and newspaper work, and at length found a place on the staff of the Chicago Daily News. His poetry is found mainly in Chicago Poems, 1916; Cornhuskers, 1916; Smoke and Steel, 1920; and Slabs of the Sunburned West, 1923. His Abraham Lincoln, the Prairie Years, 1926, is one of the most popular lives of the president.

The first impression of Sandburg's poetry is its likeness to Whitman's; the two are strongly similar in manner, subject matter, and in general outlook upon society. Democracy with the laborer as the central figure is a theme common to both, though Sandburg glorifies the ego less than Whitman. Sandburg's technique is his own; he chooses his words carefully for their individual, naked strength. The result is compression and sharp emphasis upon fact.

Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Henry Holt and Company, publishers.

Criticism: R. West, Preface to Sandburg's Selected Poems, 1926; Lowell; Phelps (EP); Sherman, Americans; Untermeyer; also Dial 65:263-4; C. and M. Van Doren, American and British Literature; also Cent. 106:786-92; Boynton; H. Monroe, "Carl Sandburg," Poetry 24:320-6; S. Anderson, Bookm. 54:360-1; P. Rosenfeld, Bookm. 53:389-96; W. Yust, Bookm. 52:385-90; E. Carnevali, "Our Great Carl Sandburg," Poetry 17:266-72.

CLEAN CURTAINS 1

New neighbors came to the corner house at Congress and Green Streets.

The look of their clean white curtains was the same as the rim of a nun's bonnet.

One way was an oyster pail factory, one way they made candy, one way paper boxes, strawboard cartons.

The warehouse trucks shook the dust of the ways loose and the wheels whirled dust—there was dust of hoof and wagon wheel and rubber tire—dust of police and fire wagons—dust of the winds that circled at midnight and noon listening to no prayers.

"O mother, I know the heart of you," I sang passing the rim of a nun's bonnet—O white curtains—and people clean as the prayers of Jesus here in the faded ramshackle at Congress and Green.

Dust and the thundering trucks won—the barrages of the street wheels and the lawless wind took their way—was it five weeks or six the little mother, the new neighbors, battled and then took away the white prayers in the windows?

A.E.F. 1

There will be a rusty gun on the wall, sweetheart.

The rifle grooves curling with flakes of rust. A spider will make a silver string nest in the darkest, warmest corner of it.

The trigger and the range-finder, they too will be rusty.

<sup>1</sup> From Smoke and Steel by Carl Sandburg, copyright, 1920, by Harcourt, Brace and Company, Inc. And no hands will polish the gun, and it will hang on the wall.

Forefingers and thumbs will point absently and casually toward it.

It will be spoken about among half-forgotten, wished-to-be-forgotten things.

They will tell the spider: Go on, you're doing good work.

CHICAGO<sup>2</sup>

Hog Butcher for the World,
Tool Maker, Stacker of Wheat,
Player with Railroads and the Nation's Freight Handler;
Stormy, husky, brawling,
City of the Big Shoulders:

They tell me you are wicked, and I believe them; for I have seen your painted women under the gas lamps luring the farm boys.

And they tell me you are crooked, and I answer: Yes, it is true I have seen the gunman kill and go free to kill again.

And they tell me you are brutal, and my reply is: On the faces of women and children I have seen the marks of wanton hunger.

And having answered so I turn once more to those who sneer at this my city, and I give them back the sneer and say to them:

Come and show me another city with lifted head singing so proud to be alive and coarse and strong and cunning.

Flinging magnetic curses amid the toil of piling job on job, here is a tall bold slugger set vivid against the little soft cities;

Fierce as a dog with tongue lapping for action, cunning as a savage pitted against the wilderness.

> Bareheaded, Shoveling, Wrecking, Planning,

Building, breaking, rebuilding, Under the smoke, dust all over his mouth, laughing with white teeth, Under the terrible burden of destiny laughing as a young man laughs,

Laughing even as an ignorant fighter laughs who has never lost a battle,

Bragging and laughing that under his wrist is the pulse, and under his ribs the heart of the people,

<sup>2</sup> Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Henry Holt and Company, publishers. Laughing!

Laughing the stormy, husky, brawling laughter of Youth, half-naked, sweating, proud to be Hog Butcher, Tool Maker, Stacker of Wheat, Player with Railroads and Freight Handler to the Nation.

1016

GRASS 1

Pile the bodies high at Austerlitz and Water-

Shovel them under and let me work-I am the grass: I cover all.

And pile them high at Gettysburg And pile them high at Ypres and Verdun. 3 Shovel them under and let me work. Two years, ten years, and passengers ask the conductor:

> What place is this? Where are we now?

I am the grass. Let me work.

LOST 1

Desolate and lone All night long on the lake Where fog trails and mist creeps, The whistle of a boat Calls and cries unendingly. Like some lost child In tears and trouble Hunting the harbor's breast And the harbor's eyes.

FOG 1

The fog comes on little cat feet.

It sits looking over harbor and city on silent haunches and then moves on.

LAUGHING CORN 1

There was a high majestic fooling Day before yesterday in the yellow corn. And day after tomorrow in the vellow corn There will be high majestic fooling.

The ears ripen in late summer And come on with a conquering laughter. Come on with a high and conquering laughter.

The long-tailed blackbirds are hoarse. One of the smaller blackbirds chitters on a stalk And a spot of red is on its shoulder And I never heard its name in my life.

Some of the ears are bursting. A white juice works inside. Cornsilk creeps in the end and dangles in the wind

Always-I never knew it any other way-The wind and the corn talk things over together. And the rain and the corn and the sun and the Talk things over together.

Over the road is the farmhouse. The siding is white and a green blind is slung

It will not be fixed till the corn is husked. The farmer and his wife talk things over together.

NICHOLAS VACHEL LINDSAY 1879-

Mr. Lindsay stands out among living American poets for his highly individual theories of the part poetry might play in the lives of the masses, and of the methods he uses to bring his poetry before the public. After receiving a high school and college education in Springfield, Illinois, his birthplace, he studied art in Chicago and New York City, and for two years was a Young Men's Christian Association lecturer and settlement worker. He then spent five years tramping through parts of the Mississippi Valley preaching his "gospel of beauty," the underlying idea of which was the enriching and beautifying of the life of the small community. He worked his way by reciting, chanting, and distributing his own rimes and verses. (See Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty, 1914.) His chief books of poetry are General William Booth Enters into Heaven, 1913, The Congo and Other Poems, 1914, The Chinese Nightingale, 1917, Going to the Sun, 1923, Collected Poems, 1925. Like Whitman and Sandburg he attempts to voice modern, democratic America. He differs from them in the great importance he attaches to rhythm. He attempts to reproduce circus music, the primitive tom-tom, and even "jazz." In so doing he catches the popular ear, deaf to the subtler melodies of poetry, and now and then he reaches effects of unusual beauty.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Henry Holt and Company, publishers.

Famous battlefields of the Napoleonic wars; Napoleon, victor at Austerlitz, 1805, was defeated at Waterloo, 1815.

2 famous battlefields of the World War

Criticism: Untermeyer; Phelps (EP); also Bookm. 47:125-34; J. B. Rittenhouse, "Contemporary Poetry," Bookm. 46:575-7; E. L. Masters, "Vachel Lindsay," Bookm. 64: 156-60; C. Van Doren, "Salvation with Jazz," Cent. 105:951-6; F. Dell, "Two American Poets: A Study in Possibilities," Nation 118:439-40; H. S. Gorman, "Vachel Lindsay: Evangelist of Poetry," No. Am. 219: 123-8; G. Frank, "The Rodin of American Poetry." Cent. 102:638-40.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN WALKS AT MIDNIGHT 1

(In Springfield, Illinois)

It is portentous, and a thing of state That here at midnight, in our little town, A mourning figure walks, and will not rest. Near the old court-house pacing up and down.

Or by his homestead, or in shadowed yards He lingers where his children used to play. Or through the market, on the well-worn stones He stalks until the dawn-stars burn away.

A bronzed, lank man! His suit of ancient black. A famous high top-hat and plain worn shawl 10 Make him the quaint great figure that men love. The prairie-lawyer, master of us all.

He cannot sleep upon his hillside now. He is among us:—as in times before! And we who toss and lie awake for long Breathe deep, and start, to see him pass the

His head is bowed. He thinks on men and kings.

Yea, when the sick world cries, how can he

Too many peasants fight, they know not why, Too many homesteads in black terror weep. 20

The sins of all the war-lords burn his heart. He sees the dreadnaughts scouring every main. He carries on his shawl-wrapped shoulders now The bitterness, the folly and the pain.

He cannot rest until a spirit-dawn Shall come;—the shining hope of Europe free: The league of sober folk, the Workers' Earth, Bringing long peace to Cornland, Alp, and Sea.

It breaks his heart that kings must murder still, That all his hours of travail here for men

Seem vet in vain. And who will bring white peace

That he may sleep upon his hill again?

1925

THESE ARE THE YOUNG 2

Dedicated to the Reverend Charles Pease. Minister of the Unitarian Society. Spokane, Washington

"What new mob disturbs the days? Who are these, with intrusive ways. Who speak with an alien tongue? Who are these Olympian-white Butterflies of flame. High upon Sun Mountain. Invading now, every fountain. Obeying their own captains And to no men tame: Whispering so low We cannot hear at all, Yet calling: 'Brother,' 'Sister' Through the sun-mountain wall? Who are these Olympian-white Butterflies of flame. Full of a holy grace?

The Answer

"This is a separate race, Speaking an alien tongue-These are the young!"

Tell me their spiritual name."

20

10

TT

"Tell me of the Olympian-white Aspen trees of flame. And of the Olympian-white Mariposa lilies, Climbing great Sun Mountain, Invading now, every fountain, Tell me their spiritual name."

The Answer

"This is a chosen people, This is a separate race Speaking an alien tongue-These are the young!"

30

TTT

"Tell me of the Olympian-white Basket-flowers of flame, The marching-plumes of flame,

&lt;sup>1</sup> From Collected Poems by Vachel Lindsay, by permission of The Macmillan Company, publishers.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Copyright. By permission of Messrs. D. Appleton and Company, New York, publishers.

Climbing great Sun Mountain,
Invading now, every fountain,
While our hearts grow greater
And our climbing songs are sung;
While the days grow later,
While the sun still lingers,
Or great storm bells are rung,
And the lightning splits the hills,
And now, the falling fountain fills.
Tell me of these high-plumed tribes
Of Indian basket-flowers
That march up the Sun Mountain glacier,
Through the holy hours,
What is their spiritual name?"

The Answer

"This is a separate race, Speaking an alien tongue— These are the young!"

τv

"Who are these boys and girls on horseback Who go by next day, The horses loaded for camping, No guides to lead the way? Girls Olympian white Or painted to the eyes. Innocently wicked. Innocently wise; Innocently impudent. Innocently gav-Boys who are Young America. Scholars, lean and white, Or athletes red and gay, Proud young man America, Well on its way, Girls most bewitching, Boys most untamed, Hotly praised and preached at; hotly, very hotly blamed. Who are these? What is their aim? What is now their game? What is their spiritual name?"

The Answer

"This is a chosen people, This is a separate race, Speaking an alien tongue— These are the darlings of my heart, These are the young."

THE ANGEL SONS 1

1026

We will have angels and men for sons, For I have gone out to you

<sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of Messrs. D. Appleton and Company, New York, publishers. Wearing the wings of desire, In the rain, in the storm, in the dew.

Till half of their glory is dead.

Strong men, stronger than any we see,
Strong angels, stronger than any we see,
Singing of love round the poppy bed,
For they have soft eyes, and they weary of waiting
For our souls to reach the ultimate mating,
Weary of waiting, worn with waiting,

My soul has gone out on their poppy song, Wearing such wings of desire That our angel sons will have strength to the uttermost,

Beauty and dreaming power to the uttermost,
Veins filled with snow and uttermost fire,
Snow from the top of the Great Sun Mountain,
Fire from these flowers of desire!

They will rule our sons who are merely men, Enforcing our will on the earth again, <sup>20</sup> Beginning, beginning at Great Sun Mountain, They will make over the land, They will make over the age, Granite each angel house, Crimson each written page.

They will rule our sons who are merely men, Earth sons with this elder brother start!
Born from beneath your earthly heart!
Born from your lily side,
Strong, with the sternest eyes,
They will conquer the land and its pride.

Dear girl, when these wild years die,
When other lovers go by,
Playing Sun Mountain games,
With faith that their love will also save,
Their pride of love from destruction's breath,
Their sun-born stock from uttermost death,
And their earth-born stock from uttermost death.

These lovers will say our names, And, climbing Sun Mountain high, Will stop where our bodies lie, And leave as the sign of faith A poppy upon your grave, Yes— A mountain poppy upon my grave!

1926

40

MARGARET WIDDEMER

Miss Widdemer, a native of Doylestown, Pennsylvania, was educated privately and later was graduated from the Drexel Institute Library School. She began writing during childhood, and since 1912 has contributed essays, reviews, poems, and short stories to various periodicals. In her first published poem, "The Factories," Miss Widdemer struck her most distinctive note, the dependence of those of one social level upon those of other levels. Such social sympathy has marked the work of many women poets, notably that of Mrs. Browning. Even in those of Miss Widdemer's lyrics that reflect no serious social purpose there is, characteristically, a poignant feminine quality. Besides her volumes of verse-Factories, 1915: The Old Road to Paradise, 1918, which divided the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry with Sandburg's Cornhuskers; Cross-Currents, 1921: Poems, Ballads and Lyrics, 1925-she has produced several light novels and popular stories for girls.

Criticism: Bookm. 42:458; 47:392-3; Poetry 7: 150; 14:273; Phelps (EP); Wilkinson (NV).

FACTORIES 1

I have shut my little sister in from life and light

(For a rose, for a ribbon, for a wreath across my hair).

I have made her restless feet still until the night,

Locked from sweets of summer and from

Locked from sweets of summer and from wild spring air;

I who ranged the meadowlands, free from sun to sun.

Free to sing and pull the buds and watch the far wings fly,

I have bound my sister till her playing time was done—

Oh, my little sister, was it I? Was it I?

I have robbed my sister of her day of maidenhood

(For a robe, for a feather, for a trinket's restless spark),

Shut from love till dusk shall fall, how shall she know good,

How shall she go scatheless through the sunlit dark?

I who could be innocent, I who could be gay,
I who could have love and mirth before the light went by,

I have put my sister in her mating-time away— Sister, my young sister, was it I? Was it I?

I have robbed my sister of the lips against her breast

(For a coin, for the weaving of my children's lace and lawn),

From Factories with Other Lyrics by Margaret Widdemer. Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Henry Holt and Company, publishers.

Feet that pace beside the loom, hands that cannot rest—

How can she know motherhood, whose strength is gone?

I who took no heed of her, starved and laborworn.

I, against whose placid heart my sleepy goldheads lie.

Round my path they cry to me, little souls

God of Life! Creator! It was I! It was I!

THE WATCHER 2

She always leaned to watch for us,
Anxious if we were late,
In winter by the window,
In summer by the gate;

And though we mocked her tenderly,
Who had such foolish care,
The long way home would seem more safe
Because she waited there.

Her thoughts were all so full of us,
She never could forget!

And so I think that where she is
She must be watching yet,

Waiting till we come home to her, Anxious if we are late— Watching from Heaven's window, Leaning from Heaven's gate.

1920

THE MODERN WOMAN TO HER LOVER 3

I shall not lie to you any more,
Flatter or fawn to attain my end—
I am what never has been before,
Woman—and Friend.

I shall be strong as a man is strong,
I shall be fair as a man is fair,
Hand in locked hand we shall pass along
To a purer air:

I shall not drag at your bridle-rein, Knee pressed to knee we shall ride the hill; 10 I shall not lie to you ever again— Will you love me still?

1914

From Cross Currents by Margaret Widdemer, copyright, 1921, by Harcourt, Brace and Company, Inc.
 From The Old Road to Paradise by Margaret Widdemer. Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Henry Holt and Company, publishers.

SARA TEASDALE 1884-

Of present-day American lyric poets, one of the most prominent is Sara Teasdale (Mrs. E. B. Filsinger). She is a native of St. Louis, Missouri. where she was educated in private schools. She has traveled much in America, Europe, and the Near East, and now lives in New York City. From her first volume of poems, Sonnets to Duse, and Other Poems, 1907, through Helen of Troy and Other Poems, 1911, Rivers to the Sea, 1915, Flame and Shadow, 1920, and Dark of the Moon, 1926, Miss Teasdale's work has steadily advanced both in workmanship and in lyric depth. Her poetry is spontaneous and direct, serious, sensuous vet delicate, and composed of the simplest of materials. In its poignancy and its revelation of woman's heart it is akin to Emily Dickinson's. In variety of forms and artistic technique it ranks notably high.

Criticism: Phelps (EP); also Bookm. 47:392; Untermeyer; Wilkinson (NV); also "Sara Teasdale's Poems," Forum 65:229-35; J. B. Rittenhouse, "Sara Teasdale," Bookm. 65:290-4; P. Colum, "Sara Teasdale's Poems," New Repub. 15:239-41; H. Monroe, "Sara Teasdale's Prize," Poetry 12: 264-9; see also Bookm. 42:365; 457-8; Poetry 7: 148-50; 17:272-5.

BLUE SQUILLS 1

How many million Aprils came Before I ever knew How white a cherry bough could be. A bed of squills, how blue!

And many a dancing April When life is done with me. Will lift the blue flame of the flower And the white flame of the tree.

Oh burn me with your beauty, then, Oh, hurt me, tree and flower. 10 Lest in the end death try to take Even this glistening hour.

O shaken flowers, O shimmering trees. O sunlit white and blue, Wound me, that I, through endless sleep, May bear the scar of you.

1920

AUGUST MOONRISE 1

The sun was gone, and the moon was coming Over the blue Connecticut hills; The west was rosy, the east was flushed. And over my head the swallows rushed This way and that, with changeful wills. I heard them twitter and watched them dart Now together and now apart

Like dark petals blown from a tree: The maples stamped against the west 10 Were black and stately and full of rest. And the hazy orange moon grew up And slowly changed to yellow gold While the hills were darkened, fold on fold To a deeper blue than a flower could hold. Down the hill I went, and then I forgot the ways of men. For night-scents, heady, and damp and cool Wakened ecstasy in me On the brink of a shining pool.

20 O Beauty, out of many a cup You have made me drunk and wild Ever since I was a child. But when have I been sure as now That no bitterness can bend And no sorrow wholly bow One who loves you to the end? And though I must give my breath And my laughter all to death. And my eyes through which joy came, 30 And my heart, a wavering flame; If all must leave me and go back Along a blind and fearful track So that you can make anew. Fusing with intenser fire. Something nearer your desire: If my soul must go alone Through a cold infinity. Or even if it vanish, too, Beauty, I have worshiped you.

Let this single hour atone For the theft of all of me

1920

40

ON THE DUNES 1

If there is any life when death is over. These tawny beaches will know much of me, I shall come back, as constant and as changeful As the unchanging, many-colored sea.

If life was small, if it has made me scornful. Forgive me; I shall straighten like a flame In the great calm of death, and if you want me Stand on the sea-ward dunes and call my name.

1920

THE UNSEEN 1

Death went up the hall Unseen by every one, Trailing twilight robes Past the nurse and the nun.

From Flame and Shadow by Sara Teasdale, by permission of The Macmillan Company, publishers.

He paused at every door And listened to the breath Of those who did not know How near they were to Death.

Death went up the hall Unseen by nurse and nun: He passed by many a door-But he entered one.

A STAR MAP 1

All of heaven in my hands— With one finger I can turn Till I sink Orion's bands. And the Lyre begins to burn.

I can make a night of spring, Shivering Spica, white Altair, And above me I can swing Slowly Berenice's Hair.

Winter evening, autumn dawn Man has charted; I can see How Midsummer Night moves on Tranquilly and terribly:

Light lost in light, death lost in death, Time without end, Space without bound-I, whose life is but a breath, Turn Infinity around.

1926

ROBERT HAVEN SCHAUFFLER 1879-

Mr. Schauffler, born in Austria of American parrents, received his education at Northwestern University, at Princeton, and at the University of Berlin. His activities and interests have lain in many fields: as an athlete and tennis champion he has taken part in the Olympic Games; he has been a musician and sculptor; he saw active service in the World War; he has edited many anthologies, notably the Poetry Cure (a "medicine-chest of verse, music, and pictures"), 1925; and he has contributed essays and poems to leading periodicals. His essays descriptive of travel and musical experiences (Romantic Germany, 1909; The Musical Amateur, 1911; Fiddler's Luck, 1920; Peter Pantheism, 1925) are in a light, familiar style, graced by spontaneous humor. His books of poetry are Scum o' the Earth, 1912; The White Comrade, 1920; Magic Flame and Other Poems, 1923; Hobnails in Eden, 1929.

Copyright. By permission of the author and of The Bookman, New York.
 A globe of the heavens (an astronomical globe); the names are those of constellations.

Mr. Schauffler's poetry is wholesomely optimistic. It shows a keen sensitiveness to social injustice, yet faith that men will be able to solve their social problems, and, given time, work out their spiritual destiny. His out-of-door poems, unusually graphic in details, reveal a healthy body and vigorous mind reacting with enthusiasm to the experiences of primitive forests and lakes.

Criticism: N. Y. Times Lit. Sup. Apr. 22, '23; Sat. R. Lit. 2:451, Dec. 26, '25; N. Y. Times p. 7, Apr. 22, '23; Outlook 135:113.

1920

"SCUM O' THE EARTH" 2

At the gate of the West I stand, On the isle where the nations throng. We call them "scum o' the earth";

Stay, are we doing you wrong, Young fellow from Socrates' land?— You, like a Hermes so lissome and strong-Fresh from the master Praxiteles' 3 hand? So you're of Spartan birth? Descended, perhaps, from one of the band-Deathless in story and song-Who combed their long hair at Thermopylae's 4 pass? . . .

Ah. I forget what straits, alas! More tragic than theirs, more compassionworth.

That have doomed you to march in our "immigrant class"

Where you're nothing but "scum o' the earth."

You Pole with a child on your knee,

What dower bring you to the land of the free? Hark! does she croon That sad little tune 20 That Chopin 5 once found on his Polish lea And mounted in gold for you and for me? Now a ragged young fiddler answers In wild Czeck melody That Dvořák 6 took whole from the dancers. And the heavy faces bloom In the wonderful Slavic way; The little, dull eyes, the brows a-gloom, Suddenly dawn like the day. While, watching these folks and their mystery, I forget that we, In our scornful mirth, Brand them as "Polacks"-and "scum o' the earth."

Copyright. By permission of Houghton Mifflin and Company, authorized publishers.
 famous Greek sculptor, fl. 340 B.C. a mountain pass in Greece, where the Greeks defeated the Persians 480 B.C.
 Polish-French pianist and composer, 1809-49
 [dvôr'zhāk] Bohemian composer, 1841-1904

771

Genoese boy of the level brow. Lad of the lustrous, dreamy eyes Astare at Manhattan's pinnacles now In the first, sweet shock of a hushed surprise; Within your far-rapt seer's eves I catch the glow of the wild surmise 40 That played on the Santa Maria's prow In that still gray dawn, Four centuries gone, When a world from the wave began to rise. Oh, it's hard to foretell what high emprise Is the goal that gleams When Italy's dreams Spread wing and sweep into the skies. Caesar dreamed him a world ruled well; Dante 1 dreamed Heaven out of Hell; 50 Angelo 2 brought us there to dwell: And you, are you of different birth?-You're only a "dago,"—and "scum o' the earth"!

ΙV

Stav, are we doing you wrong Calling you "scum o' the earth," Man of the sorrow-bowed head, Of the features tender yet strong,— Man of the eyes full of wisdom and mystery Mingled with patience and dread? Have I not known you in history. ßΩ Sorrow-bowed head? Were you the poet-king, 3 worth Treasures of Ophir 4 unpriced? Were you the prophet, perchance, whose art Foretold how the rabble would mock That shepherd of spirits, erelong, Who should carry the lambs on his heart And tenderly feed his flock? Man—lift that sorrow-bowed head... Behold the face of the Christ!

The vision dies at its birth.
You're merely a butt for our mirth.
You're a "sheeny"—and therefore despised
And rejected as "scum o' the earth."

V

Countrymen, bend and invoke Mercy for us blasphemers, For that we spat on these marvelous folk, Nations of darers and dreamers, Scions of singers and seers. Our peers, and more than our peers. 80 "Rabble and refuse" we name them, And "scum o' the earth," to shame them. Mercy for us of the few, young years. Of the culture so callow and crude. Of the hands so grasping and rude, The lips so ready for sneers At the sons of our ancient more-than-peers. Mercy for us who dare despise Men in whose loins our Homer lies; Mothers of men who shall bring to us The glory of Titian, 5 the grandeur of Huss; 6 Children in whose frail arms shall rest Prophets and singers and saints of the West.

Newcomers all from the eastern seas, Help us incarnate dreams like these. Forget, and forgive, that we did you wrong. Help us to father a nation, strong In the comradeship of an equal birth, In the wealth of the richest bloods of earth.

HELEN OF LAUGHING LEDGE?

Young Helen's beauty has its source
Within the tumbling water course
Where leagues of ripple, race and pool
Have put this woman-child to school
With rainbow streamers in the mist
Where rapids grind their feathery grist;
Woods mirrored upside down and wet,
The current's velvet clairionet,
The sob and chuckle of the eddy,
Cool river gusts—high-spiced and heady
With incense of bruised bark and tones
Of fluent log-drive xylophones—
Bearing the cataracts organ-shout
With every single stop pulled out.

Poised for a dive, she can compare With a young birch, and her crisp hair Centers the sun, as birch-leaves hold Something of all September's gold.

The blur of down upon her skin Suggests a muted violin That hums of melting frosts of dew On iris leaves when dawn is new.

Prisoned in city walls, I think Of her when thirsting for a drink Poured by the loveliness of Maine. Dreaming of her, I know again Iced runnels from Katahdin slides,

Italian painter, 1477-1576
 John Huss, Bohemian Protestant reformer, 1369-1415
 Copyright. By permission of the author.

20

great Italian poet, 1265-1321, author of the Divine

&lt;sup>2</sup> Michael Angelo, 1475-1564, Italian painter, sculptor, architect
<sup>3</sup> David

&lt;sup>4</sup> a country, possibly India or Arabia, frequently mentioned in the Bible as rich in gold, silver, jewels, ivory, and sandal wood

Shelves where the broody partridge hides, The hush of lappings in a cove Where herons wade and otters rove, The whole dear gamut of wild water That knows young Helen for its daughter.

1929

20

GOD'S-EYE VIEW 1

"Let us imagine the whole gradual and laborious attainments of mankind compressed into the compass of a single lifetime. Let us assume that a single generation of men have in fifty years managed to accumulate all that now passes for civilization. They would have to start, as all individuals do, absolutely uncivilized, and their task would be to recapitulate what has occupied the race for, let us guess, at least five hundred thousand years. Each year in the life of a generation would therefore correspond to ten thousand years in the progress of the race."

—James Harvey Robinson, The Mind in the Making

Т

Vexed by the distant,
Maddeningly persistent
Bangs of a little planetary war,
God said: "I'll stand no more!
This rascal Earth and his unruly child
Presume upon my fatherly predilection.
I've been too mild;
Now for correction!

"But there's one thing:
Before I swing
The sword I have in mind,
Perhaps I should endeavor to condone
These adolescent follies of mankind.
For one must own
That, on a model throne,
Calm study of each miscreant's way of life
Always precedes the knife.
So I'll review the human story
In every sorry category.

"But hold! I find
This vast historical agglomeration
Confusing to convenient contemplation."
Therefore, to make it bulk the less,
God placed all human history in a press
And diligently squeezed it to the span
Of the half-century life of mortal man.

п

After this condensation man appears, For nine and forty of his fifty years, <sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of the author.

Beneath God's altered sight,
A cave-brute, or a wandering savage bowman,
Before he starts to weave and till and sow.
Barely six moons ago
He learns to write—
Portentous omen!
Another three
Find poetry, sculpture and philosophy
Upon a height
Whose counterpart God vainly seeks
Through all of the remaining weeks.

For two months, now,
The Christian clan
Has decked its faith in creed and rite and vow
Fit to appal the simple Son of Man.

Li Po and Gutenberg are a fortnight old; Watt is a week; Rodin and Brahms, <sup>2</sup> a day; The wingèd man has hardly learned to play. A dawn ago astonished humans rolled Their words from land to land the ether way. And now, this dark night past, Dazed by the glory of his perfected toy, Man, like a half-wit boy, Set up war's cannon-cracker, red and vast, And gaily lit the fuse that might destroy, <sup>3</sup> In one magnificent blast, All the creations of his year of joy.

TT

God weighs the savage forty-nine Against the single year of grace; And a slow smile, half humorous, half divine, Steals on the angry face.

TRASH 1

Three moons I trekked the woods without a trail

And found no sign of man upon the earth;
My zest in solitude began to fail;
I longed for human speech and song and mirth,
Until I chanced on rubbish in a pile,
And beamed at broken saws, charred rabbit skin,

Hobnails, a nine of hearts, a flask, a file, And sweet lips on a crushed tobacco tin.

If I were driven from earth by a flaming lash, To roam the flinty rocks of Capricorn, I think no sorriest bit of human trash Would be abject enough to win my scorn;

Li Po, or Li Tai-Peh, a celebrated Chinese poet, c. 700-763; Gutenberg, the inventor of printing from movable type, 1307-1468; Watt, a Scotch inventor, 1736-1819; Rodin, a French sculptor, 1840-1917; Brahms. a German composer, 1833-1897.
 reference to the World War

I'd find the sodden hobo sage and clean. Own brother to the vagrant Nazarene.

1020

JOYCE KILMER 1886-1918

Kilmer was born in New Brunswick, New Jersev. After graduating from Rutgers College and Columbia University he became in turn teacher, editor, and writer. When the United States entered the World War he enlisted as a private and fell during the advance on the Marne. He had a love for homely, everyday things, and many of his poems show a simplicity that is both frank and penetrating. His books of verse include Summer and Love, 1911; Trees and Other Poems, 1914; Main Street and Other Poems, 1916.

Biography and criticism: Poems, 1916.

Biography and criticism: Poems, Essays and Letters, 2 vols., 1915, memoir by R. C. Holliday; Wilkinson (NV); R. Le Gallienne, "Joyce Kilmer," Bookm. 48:133-9; K. Bregy, "Joyce Kilmer: Poet and Patriot," Outlook 122:467-9; see also Poetry 11:281-2; 13:149-54; Lit. Digest 58:32-3, 42-6, Sept. 7, '18; R. of Rs. 58:431-2.

TREES 1

I think that I shall never see A poem lovely as a tree.

A tree whose hungry mouth is prest Against the earth's sweet flowing breast;

A tree that looks at God all day. And lifts her leafy arms to pray;

A tree that may in Summer wear A nest of robins in her hair;

Upon whose bosom snow has lain; Who intimately lives with rain.

Poems are made by fools like me. But only God can make a tree.

1914

ALAN SEEGER 1888-1916

Alan Seeger was one of many young men of his generation filled with a longing to express themselves in some artistic form, but whirled down in the maelstrom of the World War. He was born in New York City, passed some of his childhood in Mexico, spent a year in California, and was educated at various schools. After graduating from Harvard he lived for two years in New York unable to decide upon a profession. Then, feeling that Europe offered a more congenial atmosphere for artistic work, he went to Paris, where the opening of the war found him. He enlisted with the Foreign Legion of France and was in almost continuous service until he fell. His work is small in bulk: most of it was written in Paris and at the front. In the circumstances it is not surprising that, as Mr. Untermeyer remarks, "his literary promise was far greater than his poetic accom-plishment." Nevertheless, his best-known poem, quoted below, expresses in words that cannot be forgotten the spirit of millions of high-spirited men who fell in a struggle in which the individual was less than a pawn.

Poems, 1916, biographical and critical introduction by William Archer. Criticism: Phelps (EP); Wilkinson (NV); H. Reeves, "The Tragedy of Alan Seeger," New Repub. 10:160-2; W. A. Roberts, "The Alan Seeger I Knew," Bookm. 47:585-90; "Alan Seeger: America's Soldier Poet," Liv. Age 294:221-5; "Alan Seeger, Poet, Killed in France," Scrib. M. 61:123-5.

I HAVE A RENDEZVOUS WITH DEATH 2

I have a rendezvous with Death At some disputed barricade. When Spring comes back with rustling shade And apple-blossoms fill the air— I have a rendezvous with Death When Spring brings back blue days and fair.

It may be he shall take my hand And lead me into his dark land And close my eyes and quench my breath— It may be I shall pass him still. I have a rendezvous with Death On some scarred slope of battered hill. When Spring comes round again this year And the first meadow-flowers appear.

God knows 'twere better to be deep Pillowed in silk and scented down. Where love throbs out in blissful sleep, Pulse nigh to pulse, and breath to breath. Where hushed awakenings are dear. . . . But I've a rendezvous with Death At midnight in some flaming town. When Spring trips north again this year. And I to my pledged word am true. I shall not fail that rendezvous. 1916

FRANKLIN PIERCE ADAMS 1881-

Mr. Adams is pre-eminent among contemporary humorous poets. He has the gift of condensing criticism into trenchant and witty verse. He was

20

&lt;sup>1</sup> From Trees and Other Poems by Joyce Kilmer, copyright, 1914, George H. Doran Company, publishers.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Copyright. By permission of Mr. Charles L. Seeger and Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers.

10

born in Chicago. After attending the University of Michigan for a short time he took up the insurance business, and then newspaper work upon the Chicago Journal. Later he was upon the staff of the New York Mail, the New York Tribune, and the New York World. He served in France during the World War as an officer in the service of Military Intelligence.

Thousands of readers of the World turn first to F.P.A.'s "Conning Tower Colvum." and the news of the day waits upon their enjoyment of his satire. his puns, his imitations of Horace. Many of his thrusts are directed against the extremes of social folly, and among his aversions are "jazz" music and slovenly English. Both in subject-matter and style he often resembles Eugene Field, but he excels Field in variety of rhythms, meters, and stanzaic forms

His volumes of verse include Tobogganing on Parnassus, 1910, Weights and Measures, 1917, and So There!, 1922.

Criticism: Phelps (EP); also Bookm, 47:268-9; C. Van Doren, "Day In and Day Out." Cent. 107:308-15; "The Colyumists' Confessional (IV), F.P.A.," by Rupert Hughes, Everybody's 42: April, 52-53.

ERRING IN COMPANY 1

"If I have erred. I err in company with Abraham Lincoln."-THEODORE ROOSEVELT

> If e'er my riming be at fault, If e'er I chance to scribble dope, If that my meter ever halt. I err in company with Pope.

An 2 that my grammar go awry, An that my English be askew. Sooth, I can prove an alibi-The Bard of Avon did it, too.

If often toward the bottled grape My errant fancy fondly turns, Remember, leering jackanape, I err in company with Burns.

If now and then I sigh "Mine own!" Unto another's wedded wife, Remember, I am not alone-Hast ever read Lord Byron's LIFE?

If frequently I fret and fume, And absolutely will not smile, I err in company with Hume, Old Socrates and T. Carlyle.

If e'er I fail in etiquette, And foozle on The Proper Stuff Regarding manners, don't forget A. Tennyson's were pretty tough 3

Eke if I err upon the side Of talking overmuch of Me. I err, it cannot be denied. In most illustrious company.

1910

DE SENECTUTE 4

When as a young and budding pote I gazed upon the stuff I wrote, I knew that stuff so weak and poor Would never rank as Literature

And yet, I thought, what I have sung Is not so bad for one so young: When years and ripeness shall be mine, I may achieve the Mighty Line. 5

And in that withered yesteryear I used to take unwonted cheer In that De Morgan 6 was a man Of seventy when he began.

10

But now that years have bowed my bean And I am more than seventeen. I tell myself the bitter truth And know I was a lying youth.

Now of my verse so thin and cold I say. Not bad for one so old: When I was twenty-four or -five Then, then my verses were alive.

20

Now I, as creeping age defeats Me, think of Chatterton or Keats. And say, Look at the stuff he did, When he was nothing but a kid!

But Time has taught me this, to wit: That Age has naught to do with it, That plenty be the years or scant, Some can be poets, and some can't.

1922

Tennyson's behavior toward unwelcome guests was sometimes boorish.
 From So There! by Franklin Pierce Adams, copyright, 1923, by Doubleday, Page and Company. a reference to Ben Jonson's famous saying: "Marlowe's might provide New York of the Page 1980 and 1980 and 1980 artist and the provide New York of the Page 1980 and 1980 artist and 1980

William De Morgan, 1839-1917, an English artist and novelist, wrote his first novel, Joseph Vance, when he was seventy.

&lt;sup>1</sup> From Tobogganing on Parnassus by Franklin Pierce Adams, copyright, 1911, by Doubleday, Page and Company, publishers.

<sup>2</sup> Elizabethan usage: if

EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY 1892-

Miss Millay, one of the foremost American lyric poets, was born at Rockland, Maine, and spent her early life along the Maine coast. Before entering college she had written, at the age of nineteen, her remarkable "Renascence." After graduating from Vassar she settled in "Greenwich Village" in New York City, and for a time wrote for and acted with the Provincetown Players, who first produced her Aria da Capo, 1917. Besides Renascence and Other Poems, 1917, she has produced A Few Figs from Thistles, 1920; Second April, 1921; The Harp-Weaver and Other Poems, 1923, which won the Pulitzer Prize for poetry; The Buck in the Snow, 1929. Miss Millay's work is marked by originality of conception, and a use of fresh, untrammeled words and phrases that bring a series of concrete images before the mind.

Criticism: W. Bynner, "Edna St. Vincent Millay," New Repub. 41: Dec. 10, '24, sup. 14-5; C. Van Doren, "Youth and Wings," Cent. 106:310-6; C. W. Ferguson, Bookm. 65:83-5, 56:272-8; Poetry 13: 167-8; Outlook 145:268-70; Nation 124:263, 267-8; New Repub. 50:101-2; R. of Rs. 75:435-6; Lit.

Digest 92:27-8, Mar. 19, '27.

GOD'S WORLD 1

O World, I cannot hold thee close enough! Thy winds, thy wide gray skies! Thy mists, that roll and rise! Thy woods, this autumn day, that ache and sag And all but cry with color! That gaunt crag To crush! To lift the lean of that black bluff! World, World, I cannot get thee close enough!

Long have I known a glory in it all But never knew I this.

Here such a passion is
As stretcheth me apart. Lord, I do fear
Thou'st made the world too beautiful this year.
My soul is all but out of me—let fall
No burning leaf; prithee, let no bird call.

1917

JOURNEY 2

Ah, could I lay me down in this long grass And close my eyes, and let the quiet wind Blow over me—I am so tired, so tired Of passing pleasant places! All my life, Following Care along the dusty road, Have I looked back at loveliness and sighed; Yet at my hand an unrelenting hand Tugged ever, and I passed. All my life long

 From Renascence, published by Harper and Brothers, copyright, 1917, by Edna St. Vincent Mil'ay.
 From Second April, published by Harper and Brothers, copyright, 1921, by Edna St. Vincent Millay. Over my shoulder have I looked at peace; And now I fain would lie in this long grass And close my eyes.

Yet onward!

Cat-birds call Through the long afternoon, and creeks at dusk Are gutteral. Whip-poor-wills wake and cry, Drawing the twilight close about their throats. Only my heart makes answer. Eager vines Go up the ricks and wait; flushed apple-trees Pause in their dance and break the ring for me; Dim, shady wood-roads, redolent of fern And bayberry, that through sweet bevies thread Of round-faced roses, pink and petulant, Look back and beckon ere they disappear. Only my heart, only my heart responds. Yet, ah, my path is sweet on either side All through the dragging day-sharp underfoot, And hot, and like dead mist the dry dust hangs-

But far, oh, far as passionate eye can reach, And long, ah, long as rapturous eye can cling, The world is mine; blue hill, still silver lake, <sup>30</sup> Broad field, bright flower, and the long white road.

A gateless garden, and an open path: My feet to follow, and my heart to hold.

1921

10

TRAVEL<sup>2</sup>

The railroad track is miles away,
And the day is loud with voices speaking,
Yet there isn't a train goes by all day
But I hear its whistle shrieking.

All night there isn't a train goes by,

Though the night is still for sleep and dreaming,

But I see its cinders red on the sky, And hear its engine steaming.

My heart is warm with the friends I make, And better friends I'll not be knowing, Yet there isn't a train I wouldn't take, No matter where it's going.

1921

WOODROW WILSON 1856-1924

Woodrow Wilson, twenty-eighth President of the United States, was born at Staunton, Virginia, of Scotch and English ancestry, 1856. He was graduated from Princeton in 1875, studied law at the University of Virginia, and politics and history at Johns Hopkins University. For eight years he was president of Princeton. He was elected governor of New Jersey in 1910 and President of the United States in 1913. He brought to the office a scholarly knowledge of statesmanship unequaled by any other President. His vigorous domestic administration was interrupted by the Great War, at the close of which, largely through his statesmanship, the League of Nations was formed. He died in Washington.

President Wilson's writings include A History of the American People, 1902; Mere Literature, 1893; Constitutional Government in the United States, 1908; The New Freedom, 1913. President Wilson's state papers and speeches are notable among public documents for the discrimination they show in wording and for their clearness of exposition. His style is based upon a comprehensive knowledge of the best in literature. Conciseness and accuracy are its fundamentals, and much of its force lies in its restrained emotion.

Biography and criticism: R. S. Baker, Woodrow Wilson, Life and Letters, [first] 2 vols., 1927; W. E. Dodd, Woodrow Wilson and his Work, 1920; D. Lawrence, The True Story of Woodrow Wilson, 1924; J. P. Tumulty, Woodrow Wilson as I Know Him, 1921; Woodrow Wilson, the Man, his Times and his Task, 1924; Life and Letters of Walter Hines Page, 3 vols., 1922-5; The Intimate Papers of Colonel House, 4 vols., 1926, 1929; W. A. White, "The End of an Epoch," Scrib. M. 79:561-70; see also R. of Rs. 75:371-5; Atlan. 133:815-23; Liv. Age 320:537-40; Contemp. 125:282-9; Nation 118: 156-8.

FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS 1

There has been a change of government. It began two years ago, when the House of Representatives became Democratic by a decisive majority. It has now been completed. The Senate about to assemble will also be Democratic. The offices of President and Vice President have been put into the hands of Democrats. What does the change mean? That is the question uppermost in our minds to-day. That is the question I am going to try to answer, in order, if I may, to interpret the occasion.

It means much more than the mere success of a party. The success of a party means little except when the Nation is using that party for a large and definite purpose. No one can mistake the purpose for which the Nation now seeks to use the Democratic Party. It seeks to use it to interpret a change in its own plans and point of view. Some old things with which we had grown familiar, and which had begun to creep into the very habit of our thought and of our lives, have altered their aspect as we have latterly looked critically upon them, with fresh, awakened eyes; have dropped their disguises and shown themselves alien and sinister. Some new things, as we look frankly upon them, willing to comprehend their real character, have come to assume the aspect of things long believed in and familiar, stuff of our own convictions. We have been refreshed by a new insight into our own life.

We see that in many things that life is very great. It is incomparably great in its material aspects, in its body of wealth, in the diversity and sweep of its energy, in the industries which have been conceived and built up by the genius of individual men and the limitless enterprise of groups of men. It is great, also, very great, in its moral force. Nowhere else in the world have noble men and women exhibited in more striking forms the beauty and the energy of sympathy and helpfulness and counsel in their efforts to rectify wrong, alleviate suffering, and set the weak in the way of strength and hope. We have built up, moreover, a great system of government, which has stood through a long age as in many respects a model for those who seek to set liberty upon foundations that will endure against fortuitous change, against storm and accident. Our life contains every great thing and contains it in rich abundance.

But the evil has come with the good, and much fine gold has been corroded. With riches has come inexcusable waste. We have squandered a great part of what we might have used, and have not stopped to conserve the exceeding bounty of nature, without which our genius for enterprise would have been worthless and impotent, scorning to be careful, shamefully prodigal as well as admirably efficient. We have been proud of our industrial achievements, but we have not hitherto stopped thoughtfully enough to count the human cost, the cost of lives snuffed out, of energies overtaxed and broken, the fearful physical and spiritual cost to the men and women and children upon whom the dead weight and burden of it all has fallen pitilessly the years through. The groans and agony of it all had not yet reached our ears, the solemn, moving undertone of our life, coming up out of the mines and factories and out of every home where the struggle had its intimate and familiar seat. With the great Government went many deep secret things which we too long delayed to look into and scrutinize with candid, fearless eyes. The great Government we loved has too often been made use of for private and selfish purposes, and those who used it had forgotten the people.

&lt;sup>1</sup> This address was delivered by President Wilson at the Capitol, March 4, 1913.

At last a vision has been vouchsafed us of our life as a whole. We see the bad with the good, the debased and decadent with the sound and vital. With this vision we approach new affairs. Our duty is to cleanse, to reconsider, to restore, to correct the evil without impairing the good, to purify and humanize every process of our common life without weakening or sentimentalizing it. There has been something crude and heartless and unfeeling in our haste to succeed and be great. Our thought has been "Let every man look out for himself, let every generation look out for itself," while we reared giant machinery which made it impossible that any but those who stood at the levers of control should have a chance to look out for themselves. We had not forgotten our morals. We remembered well enough that we had set up a policy which was meant to serve the humblest as well as the most powerful, with an eye single to the standards of justice and fair play, and remembered it with pride. But we were very heedless and in a hurry to be great.

We have come now to the sober second thought. The scales of heedlessness have fallen from our eyes. We have made up our minds to square every process of our national life again with the standards we so proudly set up at the beginning and have always carried at our hearts. Our work is a work of restoration.

We have itemized with some degree of particularity the things that ought to be altered and here are some of the chief items: A tariff which cuts us off from our proper part in the commerce of the world, violates the just principles of taxation, and makes the Government a facile instrument in the hands of private interests: a banking and currency system based upon the necessity of the Government to sell its bonds fifty years ago and perfectly adapted to concentrating cash and restricting credits; an industrial system which, take it on all its sides, financial as well as administrative, holds capital in leading strings, restricts the liberties and limits the opportunities of labor, and exploits without renewing or conserving the natural resources of the country; a body of agricultural activities never yet given the efficiency of great business undertakings or served as it should be through the instrumentality of science taken directly to the farm, or afforded the facilities of credit best suited to its practical needs; watercourses undeveloped, waste places unreclaimed, forests untended, fast disappearing without plan or prospect of renewal, unregarded waste heaps at every mine. We have studied as perhaps no other nation has the most effective means of production, but we have not studied cost or economy as we should either as organizers of industry, as statesmen, or as individuals.

Nor have we studied and perfected the means by which government may be put at the services of humanity, in safeguarding the health of the Nation, the health of its men and its women and its children, as well as their rights in the struggle for existence. This is no sentimental duty. The firm basis of government is justice, not pity. These are matters of justice. There can be no equality of opportunity, the first essential of justice in the body politic, if men and women and children be not shielded in their lives, their very vitality, from the consequences of great industrial and social processes which they can not alter, control, or singly cope with. Society must see to it that it does not itself crush or weaken or damage its own constituent parts. The first duty of law is to keep sound the society it serves. Sanitary laws, pure food laws, and laws determining conditions of labor which individuals are powerless to determine for themselves are intimate parts of the very business of justice and legal effi-

These are some of the things we ought to do, and not leave the others undone, the old-fashioned, never-to-be-neglected, fundamental safeguarding of property and of individual right. This is the high enterprise of the new day: To lift everything that concerns our life as a Nation to the light that shines from the hearthfire of every man's conscience and vision of the right. It is inconceivable that we should do this as partisans; it is inconceivable we should do it in ignorance of the facts as they are or in blind haste. We shall restore, not destroy. We shall deal with our economic system as it is and as it may be modified, not as it might be if we had a clean sheet of paper to write upon; and step by step we shall make it what it should be, in the spirit of those who question their own wisdom and seek counsel and knowledge, not shallow self-satisfaction or the excitement of excursions whither they can not tell. Justice, and only justice, shall always be our motto.

And yet it will be no cool process of mere science. The Nation has been deeply stirred, stirred by a solemn passion, stirred by the knowledge of wrong, of ideals lost, of government too often debauched and made an instrument of evil. The feelings with which we face this new age of right and opportunity sweep across our heartstrings like some air out of God's own presence, where justice and mercy are reconciled and the judge and the brother are one. We know our task to be no mere task of politics but a task which shall search us through and through, whether we be able to understand our time and the need of our people, whether we be indeed their spokesmen and interpreters, whether we have the pure heart to comprehend and the rectified will to choose our high course of action.

This is not a day of triumph; it is a day of dedication. Here muster, not the forces of party, but the forces of humanity. Men's hearts wait upon us; men's lives hang in the balance; men's hopes call upon us to say what we will do. Who shall live up to the great trust? Who dares fail to try? I summon all honest men, all patriotic, all forward-looking men, to my side. God helping me, I will not fail them, if they will but counsel and sustain me!

ON ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S BIRTHPLACE <sup>1</sup>

No more significant memorial could have been presented to the nation than this. It expresses so much of what is singular and noteworthy in the history of the country; it suggests so many of the things that we prize most highly in our life and in our system of government. How eloquent this little house within this shrine is of the vigor of democracy! There is nowhere in the land any home so remote, so humble, that it may not contain the power of mind and heart and conscience to which nations yield and history submits its processes. Nature pays no tribute to aristocracy, subscribes to no creed of caste, renders fealty to no monarch or master of any name or kind. Genius is no snob. It does not run after titles or seek by preference the high circles of society. It affects humble company as well as great. It pays no special tribute to universities or learned societies or conventional standards of greatness, but serenely chooses its own comrades, its own haunts, its own cradle even, and its own life of adventure and of training. Here is proof of it. This little hut was the cradle of one of the great sons of men, a man of singular, delightful, vital genius who presently emerged upon the great stage of the nation's history, gaunt, shy, ungainly, but dominant and majestic, a natural ruler of men, himself inevitably the central figure of the great plot. No man can explain this, but every man can see how it demonstrates the vigor of democracy, where every door is open, in every hamlet and countryside, in city and wilderness alike, for the ruler to emerge when he will and claim his leadership in the free life. Such are the authentic proofs of the validity and vitality of democracy.

Here, no less, hides the mystery of democracy. Who shall guess this secret of nature and providence and a free polity? Whatever the vigor and vitality of the stock from which he sprang, its mere vigor and soundness do not explain where this man got his great heart that seemed to comprehend all mankind in its catholic and benignant sympathy, the mind that sat enthroned behind those brooding, melancholy eyes, whose vision swept many an horizon which those about him dreamed not ofthat mind comprehended what it had never seen, and understood the language of affairs with the ready ease of one to the manner born -or that nature which seemed in its varied richness to be the familiar of men of every way of life. This is the sacred mystery of democracy, that its richest fruits spring up out of soils which no man has prepared and in circumstances amidst which they are the least expected. This is a place alike of mystery and of reassurance.

It is likely that in a society ordered otherwise than our own, Lincoln could not have found himself or the path of fame and power upon which he walked serenely to his death. In this place it is right that we should remind ourselves of the solid and striking facts upon which our faith in democracy is founded. Many another man besides Lincoln has served the nation in its highest places of counsel and of action whose origins were as humble as his. Though the greatest example of the universal energy, richness, stimulation, and force of democracy, he is only one example among many. The permeating and all-pervasive virtue of the freedom which challenges us in America is to make the most of every gift and power we possess, every page of our history serves to emphasize and illustrate. Standing here in this place, it seems almost the whole of the stirring story.

Here Lincoln had his beginnings. Here the end and consummation of that great life seem remote and a bit incredible. And yet there was no break anywhere between beginning and end, no lack of natural sequence anywhere. Nothing really incredible happened. Lincoln was unaffectedly as much at home in the White House as he was here. Do you share with me the feeling, I wonder, that he was permanently at home nowhere? It seems to me that in the case of a man-I would rather sav of a spiritlike Lincoln the question where he was is of little significance, that it is always what he was that really arrests our thought and takes hold of our imagination. It is the spirit always that is sovereign. Lincoln, like the rest of us, was put through the discipline of the world—a very rough and exacting discipline for him, an indispensable discipline for every man who would know what he is about in the midst of the world's affairs; but his spirit got only its schooling there. It did not derive its character or its vision from the experiences which brought it to its full revelation. The test of every American must always be, not where he is, but what he is. That, also, is of the essence of democracy, and is the moral of which this place is most gravely expressive.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Mr. Wilson's address on the acceptance by the War Department of a Deed of Gift to the Nation of the Lincoln Farm at Hodgenville, Kentucky, September 4, 1916

We would like to think of men like Lincoln and Washington as typical Americans, but no man can be typical who is so unusual as these great men were. It was typical of American life that it should produce such men with supreme indifference as to the manner in which it produced them, and as readily here in this hut as amidst the little circle of cultivated gentlemen to whom Virginia owed so much in leadership and example. And Lincoln and Washingtons were typical Americans, in the use they made of their genius. But there will be few such men at best, and we will not look into the mystery of how and why they come. We will only keep the door open for them always, and a hearty welcome-after we have recognized

I have read many biographies of Lincoln; I have sought out with the greatest interest the many intimate stories that are told of him, the narratives of nearby friends, the sketches at close quarters, in which those who had the privilege of being associated with him have tried to depict for us the very man himself "in his habit as he lived"; but I have nowhere found a real intimate of Lincoln. I nowhere get the impression in any narrative or reminiscence that the writer had in fact penetrated to the heart of his mystery, or that any man could penetrate to the heart of it. That brooding spirit had no real familiars. I get the impressions that it never spoke out in complete selfrevelation, and that it could not reveal itself completely to anyone. It was a very lonely spirit that looked out from underneath those shaggy brows and comprehended men without fully communing with them, as if, in spite of all its genial efforts at comradeship, it dwelt apart, saw its visions of duty where no man looked on. There is a very holy and very terrible isolation for the conscience of every man who seeks to read the destiny in affairs for others as well as for himself, for a nation as well as for individuals. That privacy no man can intrude upon. That lonely search of the spirit for the right perhaps no man can assist. This strange child of the cabin kept company with invisible things, was born into no intimacy but that of its own silently assembling and deploying thoughts.

I have come here today, not to utter a eulogy on Lincoln: he stands in need of none, but to endeavor to interpret the meaning of this gift to the nation of the place of his birth and origin. Is not this an altar upon which we may forever keep alive the vestal fire of democracy as upon a shrine at which some of the deepest and most sacred hopes of mankind may from age to age be rekindled? For these hopes must constantly be rekindled, and only those who live can rekindle them. The only stuff that can retain the life-giving heat is the stuff of living hearts. And the hopes of mankind cannot be kept alive by words merely, by constitutions and doctrines of right and codes of liberty. The object of democracy is to transmute these into the life and action of society, the self-denial and self-sacrifice of heroic men and women willing to make their lives an embodiment of right and service and enlightened purpose. The commands of democracy are as imperative as its privileges and opportunities are wide and generous. Its compulsion is upon us. It will be great and lift a great light for the guidance of the nations only if we are great and carry that light high for the guidance of our own feet. We are not worthy to stand here unless we ourselves be in deed and in truth real democrats and servants of mankind, ready to give our very lives for the freedom and justice and spiritual exaltation of the great nation which shelters and nurtures us.

AGNES REPPLIER 1855-

Conservative attitudes toward modern social problems are dominant in the essays of Agnes Repplier whose work frequently appears in the best American magazines. Miss Repplier was born of French ancestry in Philadelphia and was educated at the Roman Catholic Convent of the Sacred Heart at Torresdale, Pennsylvania. The estimation in which her writing is held is shown by the honorary degrees she has received from the University of Pennsylvania and from Yale. She began writing early. Her first collection of essays, Books and Men, was published in 1888. Since then every few years has seen a new volume, including In the Dozy Hours, 1894; Compromises, 1904; Counter-Currents, 1915; and Under Dispute, 1924. Miss Repplier is clear-headed and analytical. She expresses her convictions urbanely yet strikingly and positively. Her common sense combined with her good humor keeps the spirit of her work in excellent balance

Criticism: F. Hackett, "Standing Pat," New Repub. 7:20-1; "A Plea for Reticence," Lit. Digest 48:827-8: "Miss Repplier's Essays," Spect. 117:105-6

THE CHILD 1

"I was not initiated into any rudiments 'till near four years of age."-TOHN EVELYN2

The courage of mothers is proverbial. There is no danger which they will not brave in behalf of their offspring. But I have always thought. that, for sheer foolhardiness, no one ever approached the English lady who asked Dr. Johnson 3 to read her young daughter's translation from Horace. He did read it, because the gods provided no escape; and he told his experience to Miss Reynolds, 4 who said soothingly, "And how was it, Sir?" "Why, very well for a young Miss's verses," was the contemptuous reply. "That is to say, as compared with excellence, nothing; but very well for the person who wrote them. I am vexed at being shown verses in that manner."

The fashion of focussing attention upon children had not in Dr. Johnson's day assumed the fell proportions which, a few years later, practically extinguished childhood. It is true that he objected to Mr. Bennet Langton's 5 connubial felicity, because the children were "too much about"; and that he betrayed an unworthy impatience when the ten little Langtons recited fables, or said their alphabets in Hebrew for his delectation. It is true also that he answered with pardonable rudeness when asked what was the best way to begin a little boy's education. He said it mattered no more how it was begun, that is, what the child was taught first, than it mattered which of his little legs he first thrust into his breeches,—a callous speech, painful to parents' ears. Dr. Johnson had been dead five years when Mrs. Hartley, daughter of Dr. David Hartley 6 of Bath, wrote to Sir William Pepys:—7

"Education is the rage of the times. Every body tries to make their children more wonder ful than any children of their acquaintance. The poor little things are so crammed with knowledge that there is scant time for them to obtain by exercise, and play, and vacancy of mind, that strength of body which is much more necessary in childhood than learning."

I am glad this letter went to Sir William. who was himself determined that his children should not, at any rate, be less wonderful than other people's bantlings. When his eldest son had reached the mature age of six, we find him writing to Miss Hannah More 8 and Mrs. Chapone, 9 asking what books he shall give the poor infant to read, and explaining to these august ladies his own theories of education. Mrs. Chapone, with an enthusiasm worthy of Mrs. Blimber, 10 replies that she sympathizes with the rare delight it must be to him to teach little William Latin; and that she feels jealous for the younger children, who, being yet in the nursery, are denied their brother's privileges. When the boy is ten, Sir William reads to him "The Faerie Queene," 11 and finds that he grasps "the beauty of the description and the force of the allegory." At eleven he has "an animated relish for Ovid and Vergil." And the more the happy father has to tell about the precocity of his child, the more Mrs. Chapone stimulates and confounds him with tales of other children's prowess. When she hears that the "sweet Boy" is to be introduced, at five, to the English classics, she writes at once about a little girl who, when "rather younger than he is" (the bitterness of that!), "had several parts of Milton by heart." These "she understood so well as to apply to her Mother the speech of the Elder Brother in 'Comus,' when she saw her uneasy for want of a letter from the Dean; and began of her own accord with advice which would have exasperated a normal parent to the boxing point.

'Peace, Mother, be not over exquisite To cast the fashion of uncertain evils' ":-

There were few normal parents left, however, at this period, to stem the tide of infantile precocity. Child study was dawning as a new and fascinating pursuit upon the English world; and the babes of Britain responded nobly to

Copyright. By permission of Houghton Mifflin Company, authorized publishers.
 1620-1707, English author and diarist
 Samuel Johnson, 1709-1784, a celebrated English author and critic, notorious for his gruff exterior 1723-1792, sister of the famous painter, Sir Joshua a member of Johnson's famous circle of friends called the Literary Club

the Literary Club

6 1705-1757, English physician and philosopher
7 1775-1856, English chemist and philosopher

 <sup>8 1745-1833,</sup> English didactic essayist
 9 1727-1801, English authoress
 10 a character in Dickens's Dombey and Son, who made a pretense of learning 11 a long allegorical poem by Edmund Spenser, 1552-

the demands made upon their incapacity. Miss Anne Seward 1 lisped Milton at three, "recited poetical passages, with eyes brimming with delight," at five, and versified her favorite psalms at nine. Her father, who viewed these alarming symptoms with delight, was so ill-advised as to offer her, when she was ten, a whole halfcrown, if she would write a poem on Spring; whereupon she "swiftly penned" twenty-five lines, which have been preserved to an ungrateful world, and which shadow forth the painful prolixity of future days. At four years of age, little Hannah More was already composing verses with ominous ease. At five, she "struck mute" the respected clergyman of the parish by her exhaustive knowledge of the catechism. At eight, we are told her talents "were of such a manifestly superior order that her father did not scruple to combine with the study of Latin some elementary instruction in mathematics; a fact which her readers might very naturally infer from the clear and logical cast of her argumentative writings."

It is not altogether easy to trace the connection between Miss More's early sums and her argumentative writings; but, as an illustration of her logical mind, I may venture to quote a "characteristic" anecdote, reverently told by her biographer, Mr. Thompson. young lady, whose sketches showed an unusual degree of talent, was visiting in Bristol; and her work was warmly admired by Miss Mary. Miss Sally, Miss Elizabeth, and Miss Patty Hannah alone withheld all word of More. commendation, sitting in stony silence whenever the drawings were produced; until one day she found the artist hard at work, putting a new binding on a petticoat. Then, "fixing her brilliant eyes with an expression of entire approbation upon the girl, she said: 'Now, my dear, that I find you can employ yourself usefully, I will no longer forbear to express my admiration of your drawings.'"

Only an early familiarity with the multiplication table could have made so ruthless a logician.

If Dr. Johnson, being childless, found other people's children in his way, how fared the bachelors and spinsters who, as time went on, were confronted by a host of infant prodigies; who heard little Anna Letitia Aikin-afterwards Mrs. Barbauld 2-read "as well as most women" at two and a half years of age; and little Anna Maria Porter <sup>2</sup> declaim Shakespeare "with precision of emphasis and firmness of

<sup>1</sup> 1747-1809, English poet
 <sup>2</sup> The first, 1743-1825, was an English poet; the second,
 c. 1780-1832, was an English novelist.

voice" at five; and little Alphonso Hayley 3 recite a Greek ode at six. We wonder if anvbody ever went twice to homes that harbored childhood; and we sympathize with Miss Ferrier's 4 bitterness of soul, when she describes a family dinner at which Eliza's sampler and Alexander's copy-book are handed round to the guests, and Anthony stands up and repeats "My name is Norval" from beginning to end, and William Pitt is prevailed upon to sing the whole of "God Save the King." It was also a pleasant fashion of the time to write eulogies on one's kith and kin. Sisters celebrated their brothers' talents in affectionate verse, and fathers confided to the world what marvelous children they had. Even Dr. Burney, 5 a man of sense, poetizes thus on his daughter Susan:-

Nor did her intellectual powers require The usual aid of labor to inspire Her soul with prudence, wisdom, and a taste Unerring in refinement, sound and chaste.

This was fortunate for Susan, as most young people of the period were compelled to labor hard. There was a ghastly pretence on the part of parents that children loved their tasks, and that to keep them employed was to keep them happy. Sir William Pepys persuaded himself without much difficulty that little William, who had weak eyes and nervous headaches, relished Ovid and Virgil. A wonderful and terrible letter written in 1786 by the Baroness de Bode. an Englishwoman married to a German and living at Deux-Ponts, lays bare the process by which ordinary children were converted into the required miracle of precocity. Her eldest boys, aged eight and nine, appear to have been the principal victims. The business of their tutor was to see that they were "fully employed," and this is an account of their day.

"In their walks he [the tutor] teaches them natural history and botany, not dryly as a task, but practically, which amuses them very much. In their hours of study come drawing, writing, reading, and summing. Their lesson in writing consists of a theme which they are to translate into three languages, and sometimes into Latin, for they learn that a little also. The boys learn Latin as a recreation, and not as a task, as is the custom in England. Perhaps one or two hours a day is at most all that is given to that study. 'T is certainly not so dry a study, when learnt like modern languages. We have bought

 <sup>3 1780-1800,</sup> English sculptor
 4 c. 1782-1854, Scotch novelist
 5 1726-1814, English musical composer, father of Fanny Burney (Madame D'Arblay), 1752-1840, celebrated novelist, author of Evelina them the whole of the Classical Authors, so that they can instruct themselves if they will: between ninety and a hundred volumes in large octavo. You would be surprised,—even Charles Auguste, who is only five, reads German well, and French tolerably. They all write very good hands, both in Roman and German texts. Clem and Harry shall write you a letter in English. and send you a specimen of their drawing. Harry (the second) writes musick, too. He is a charming boy, improves very much in all his studies, plays very prettily indeed upon the harpsichord, and plays, too, all tunes by ear. Clem will, I think, play well upon the violin; but 't is more difficult in the beginning than the harpsichord. He is at this moment taking his lesson, the master accompanying him on the pianoforte; and when Henry plays that, the master accompanies on the violin, which forms them both, and pleases them at the same time. In the evening their tutor generally recounts to them very minutely some anecdote from history, which imprints it on the memory, amuses them, and hurts no eves."

There is nothing like it on record except the rule of life which Frederick William the First <sup>1</sup> drew up for little Prince Fritz, when that unfortunate child was nine years old, and which disposed of his day, hour by hour, and minute by minute. But then Frederick William—a truth-teller if a tyrant—made no idle pretence of pleasing and amusing his son. The unpardonable thing about the Baroness de Bode is her smiling assurance that one or two hours of Latin a day afforded a pleasant pastime for children of eight and nine.

This was, however, the accepted theory of education. It is faithfully reflected in all the letters and literature of the time. When Miss More's redoubtable "Coelebs" 2 asks Lucilla Stanley's little sister why she is crowned with woodbine, the child replies: "Oh, sir, it is because it is my birthday. I am eight years old today. I gave up all my gilt books with pictures this day twelvemonth; and today I give up all my story-books, and I am now going to read such books as men and women read." Whereupon the little girl's father-that model father whose wisdom flowers into many chapters of counsel-explains that he makes the renouncing of baby books a kind of epoch in his daughters' lives; and that by thus distinctly marking the period, he wards off any return to the immature pleasures of childhood. have in our domestic plan several of these artificial divisions of life. These little celebrations are eras that we use as marking-posts from which we set out on some new course."

Yet the "gilt books," so ruthlessly discarded at eight years of age, were not all of an infantile character. For half a century these famous little volumes, bound in Dutch gilt paper-whence their name-found their wav into every English nursery, and provided amusement and instruction for every English child. They varied from the "histories" of Goody-Two-Shoes and Miss Sally Spellwell to the "histories" of Tom Jones 3 and Clarissa Harlowe, 4 "abridged for the amusement of youth"; and from "The Seven Champions of Christendom" to "The First Principles of Religion, and the Existence of a Deity; Explained in a Series of Conversations, Adapted to the Capacity of the Infant Mind." The capacity of the infant mind at the close of the eighteenth century must have been something very different from the capacity of the infant mind today. In a gilt-book dialogue (1792) I find a father asking his tiny son: "Dick, have you got ten lines of Ovid by heart?"

"Yes, Papa, and I've wrote my exercise."
"Very well, then you shall ride with me. The boy who does a little at seven years old, will do a great deal when he is fourteen."

This was poor encouragement for Dick, who had already tasted the sweets of application. It was better worth while for Miss Sally Spellwell to reach the perfection which her name implies, for she was adopted by a rich old lady with a marriageable son,--- 'a young Gentleman of such purity of Morals and good Understanding as is not everywhere to be found." In the breast of this paragon "strange emotions arise" at sight of the well-informed orphan; his mother, who sets a proper value on orthography, gives her full consent to their union; and we are swept from the contemplation of samplers and hornbooks 5 to the triumphant conclusion: "Miss Sally Spellwell now rides in her coach and six." Then follows the unmistakable moral:-

If Virtue, Learning, Goodness are your Aim, Each pretty Miss may hope to do the same;

an anticipation which must have spurred many a female child to diligence. There was no illadvised questioning of values in our greatgrandmothers' day to disturb this point of view.

hero of a novel of the same name by Henry Fielding, heroine of a novel of the same name by Samuel Richardson, 1689-1761

ardson, 1689-1761

8 a frame holding transparent sheets of horn protecting a copy of the alphabet

&lt;sup>1</sup> 1688-1740, King of Prussia <sup>2</sup> the hero of a novel, Coelehs in Search of a Wife

As the excellent Mrs. West observed in her "Letters to a young Lady," a book sanctioned by bishops, and dedicated to the Queen: "We unquestionably were created to be the wedded mates of man. Nature intended that man should sue, and woman covly vield."

The most appalling thing about the precocious young people of this period was the ease with which they slipped into print. Publishers were not then the adamantine race whose province it is now to blight the hopes of vouth. They beamed with benevolence when the first fruits of genius were confided to their Bishop Thirlwall's 1 first fruits, his hands. "Primitiae." were published when he was eleven years old, with a preface telling the public what a wonderful little boy Connop was:-how he studied Latin at three, and read Greek with ease and fluency at four, and wrote with distinction at seven. It is true that the parent Thirlwall appears to have paid the costs, to have launched his son's "slender bark" upon seas which proved to be stormless. It is true also that the bishop suffered acutely in later years from this youthful production, and destroyed every copy he could find. But there was no proud and wealthy father to back young Richard Polwhele, 2 who managed when he was a schoolboy in Cornwall, to get his first volume of verse published anonymously. It was called "The Fate of Llewellyn," and was consistently bad, though no worse, on the whole, than his maturer efforts. The title-page stated modestly that the writer was "a young gentleman of Truro School": whereupon an ill-disposed critic in the "Monthly Review" intimated that the master of Truro School would do well to keep his young gentlemen out of print. Dr. Cardew, the said master, retorted hotly that the book had been published without his knowledge, and evinced a lack of appreciation, which makes us fear that his talented pupil had a bad halfhour at his hands.

Miss Anna Maria Porter-she who delighted "critical audiences" by reciting Shakespeare at five—published her "Artless Tales" at fifteen; and Mrs. Hemans 3 was younger still when her "Blossoms of Spring" bloomed sweetly upon English soil. Some of the "Blossoms" had been written before she was ten. The volume was a "fashionable quarto," was dedicated to that hardy annual, The Prince Regent, 4 and appears to have been read by adults. It is recorded that an unkind notice sent the little girl crying to bed: but as her "England and Spain; or Valor and Patriotism" was published nine months later, and as at eighteen she "beamed forth with a strength and brilliancy that must have shamed her reviewer," we cannot feel that her poetic development was very seriously retarded.

And what of the marvelous children whose subsequent histories have been lost to the world? What of the two young prodigies of Lichfield, "Aonian 5 flowers of early beauty and intelligence," who startled Miss Seward and her friends by their "shining poetic talents," and then lapsed into restful obscurity? What of the wonderful little girl (ten years old) whom Miss Burney saw at Tunbridge Wells; 6 who sang "like an angel," conversed like "an informed, cultivated, and sagacious woman." played, danced, acted with all the grace of comédienne, wept tears of emotion without disfiguring her pretty face, and, when asked if she read the novels of the day (what a question!), replied with a sigh: "But too often! I wish I did not." Miss Burney and Mrs. Thrale 7 were so impressed—as well they might be—by this little Selina Birch, that they speculated long and fondly upon the destiny reserved for one who so easily eclipsed the other miraculous children of this highly miraculous

"Doubtful as it is whether we shall ever see the sweet Syren again," writes Miss Burney, "nothing, as Mrs. Thrale said to her" (this, too. was well advised), "can be more certain than that we shall hear of her again, let her go whither she will. Charmed as we all were, we agreed that to have the care of her would be distraction. 'She seems the girl in the world,' Mrs. Thrale wisely said, 'to attain the highest reach of human perfection as a man's mistress. As such she would be a second Cleopatra, and have the world at her command.'

"Poor thing! I hope to Heaven she will escape such sovereignty and such honors!"

She did escape scot-free. Whoever married -let us hope he married-Miss Birch, was no Mark Antony to draw fame to her feet. His very name is unknown to the world. Perhaps, as "Mrs.—Something—Rogers," 8 she illustrated

<sup>1</sup> Connop Thirlwall, 1797-1875, English bishop and histolian

&lt;sup>2</sup> 1759?-1839, English antiquarian and poet <sup>3</sup> 1794-1835, English poet <sup>4</sup> later George IV

&lt;sup>5</sup> from Aonia, an ancient name of Boeotia in Greece, the supposed home of the Muses

<sup>6</sup> a famous watering place in Kent 7 (Mrs. Piozzi) 1739-1821, English authoress and friend of Dr. Johnson

8 a phrase from "The Belle of the Ball Room," by Winthrop Mackworth Praed, 1802-1839 in her respectable middle age that beneficent process by which Nature frustrates the educator, and converts the infant Cleopatra or the infant Hypatia 1 into the rotund matron, of whom she stands permanently in need.

1008

(CHARLES) WILLIAM BEEBE

From the time that Mr. Beebe, a native of Brooklvn, was graduated from Columbia, 1898, he has been engaged in scientific research. He brought to a high degree of perfection the collection of living birds of the New York Zoölogical Society; he organized scientific expeditions to various parts of the globe; he secured many extraordinary specimens of marine fauna and flora; and he has extended man's knowledge of rare animal life in jungles and forests. Two Bird-lovers in Mexico, 1905; Tropical Wild Life, 1917; Jungle Peace, 1918; Galapagos, 1923; Jungle Days, 1925; The Arcturus Adventure, 1925; Pheasant Jungles, 1927, quite apart from their scientific value, are fascinating accounts of the work of an enthusiastic naturalist. According to Theodore Roosevelt, Mr. Beebe combines the true naturalist's essential qualifications: the ability to see, to understand what he sees, to interpret it in the light of wide knowledge, and to record it "with comprehensive vividness and charm no less than with accurate fidelity to fact." This last-mentioned gift makes Beebe known above most living writers upon nature. He imparts to his readers his own acute realization of what he sees, and the situations into which his work takes him, whether to the slopes of the Himalayas or to the floor of a sharkinfested bay of the tropics. Coolly scientific though he is, he responds to each new experience with unflagging zest, for each arouses his emotions and his imagination.

Criticism: "Beebe's Strange Cargo of Self-Lighted Fishes." Lit. Digest 86:34-6, Aug. 15, '25; E. Wilson, "A Conversation in the Galapagos: Mr. William Beebe and a Marine Iguana," Atlan. 136: 577-87: T. Roosevelt, "A Naturalist's Tropical Laboratory," Scrib. M. 61:46-64.

From THE EDGE OF THE JUNGLE 2

From a tropic garden 3

No month or day or hour fails to bring vital changes—tragedies and comedies—to the network of life of these tropical gardens; but as we drive along the broad paths of an afternoon,

1 a celebrated female philosopher and mathematician of the 4th century

From The Edge of the Jungle by William Beebe.
Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Henry Holt and Company, publishers.

The chapter refers to the Botanical Gardens of Georgetown, British Guiana.

the quiet vistas show only waving palms, weaving vultures, and swooping kiskadees with bursts of color from bougainvillea, flamboyant, and queen of the flowers. At certain times, however, the tide of visible change swelled into a veritable bore of life, gently and gradually, as quiet waters become troubled and then pass into the seething uproar of rapids. In late afternoon, when the long shadows of palms stretched their blue-black bars across the terra-cotta roads, the foliage of the green bamboo islands was dotted here and there with a scattering of young herons, white and blue and parti-colored. Idly watching them through glasses, I saw them sleepily preening their sprouting feathers, making ineffectual attempts at pecking one another, or else hunched in silent heron-dream. They were scarcely more alive than the creening, hour-hand tendrils about them, mere double-stemmed, fluffy petaled blossoms, no more strange than the nearest vegetable blooms —the cannon-ball mystery, the sand-box puzzle, sinister orchids, and the false color-alarms of the white-bracted silver-leaf. Compared with these, perching herons are right and seemly fruit.

As I watched them I suddenly stiffened in sympathy, as I saw all vegetable sloth drop away and each bird become a detached individual, plucked by an electric emotion from the appearance of a thing of sap and fiber to a vital being of tingling nerves. I followed their united glance, and overhead there vibrated, lightly as a thistledown, the first incoming adult heron, swinging in from a day's fishing along the coast. It went on and vanished among the fronds of a distant island; but the calm had been broken, and through all the stems there ran a restless sense of anticipation, a zeitgeist 4 of prophetic import. One felt that memory of past things was dimming, and content with present comfort was no longer dominant. It was the future to which both the baby herons and I were looking, and for them realization came quickly. The sun had sunk still lower, and great clouds had begun to spread their robes and choose their tints for the coming pageant.

And now the vanguard of the homing host appeared,—black dots against blue and white and salmon,-thin, gaunt forms with slowmoving wings which cut the air through half the sky. The little herons and I watched them come—first a single white egret, which spiralled down, just as I had many times seen the first returning Spad eddy downward to a cluster of great hump-backed hangars; then a trio of tricolored herons, and six little blues, and after that I lost count. It seemed as if these tiny islands were magnets drawing all the herons in the world Parrakeets whirl roostwards with machine-like synchronism of flight; geese wheel down in more or less regular formation; but these herons concentrated along straight lines, each describing its individual radius from the spot where it caught its last fish or shrimp to its nest or the particular branch on which it will spend the night. With a hemicircle of sufficient size, one might plot all of the hundreds upon hundreds of these radii, and each would represent a distinct line, if only a heron's width apart.

<sup>4</sup> literally, the spirit of the times

At the height of the evening's flight there were sometimes fifty herons in sight at once. beating steadily onward until almost overhead, when they put on brakes and dropped. Some. as the little egrets, were rather awkward; while the tricolors were the most skilful, sometimes nose-diving, with a sudden flattening out just in time to reach out and grasp a branch. Once or twice, when a fitful breeze blew at sunset, I had a magnificent exhibition of aeronautics. The birds came upwind slowly, beating their way obliquely but steadily, long legs stretched out far behind the tail and swinging pendulumlike whenever a shift of ballast was needed. They apparently did not realize the unevenness of the wind, for when they backed air, ready to descend, a sudden gust would often undercut them and over they would go, legs, wings, and neck sprawling in mid-air. After one or two somersaults or a short, swift dive, they would right themselves, feathers on end, and frantically grasp at the first leaf or twig within reach. Panting, they looked helplessly around, reorientation coming gradually.

At each arrival, a hoarse chorus went up from hungry throats, and every youngster within reach scrambled wildly forward, hopeful of a fish course. They received but scant courtesy and usually a vicious peck tumbled them off the branch. I saw a young bird fall to the water, and this mishap was from no attack, but due to his tripping over his own feet, the claws of one foot gripping those of the other in an insane clasp which overbalanced him. He fell through a thin screen of vines and splashed half onto a small Regia leaf. With neck and wings he struggled to pull himself up, and had almost succeeded when heron and leaf sank slowly, and only the bare stem swung up again. A few bubbles led off in a silvery path toward deeper water, showing where a crocodile swam slowly off with his prev.

For a time the birds remained still, and then crept within the tangles, to their mates or nests, or quieted the clamor of the young with warmstorage fish. How each one knew its own offspring was beyond my ken, but on three separate evenings scattered through one week, I observed an individual, marked by a wing-gap of two lost feathers, come, within a quarter-hour of six o'clock, and feed a great awkward youngster which had lost a single feather from each wing. So there was no hit-or-miss method from more than two of the returning parents.

Observing this vesper migration in different places. I began to see orderly segregation on a large scale. All the smaller herons dwelt together on certain islands in more or less social tolerance: and on adjoining trees, separated by only a few yards, scores of hawks concentrated and roosted, content with their snail diet, and wholly ignoring their neighbors. On the other side of the gardens, in aristocratic isolation, was a colony of stately American egrets, dainty and graceful. Their circumference of radiation was almost or quite a circle, for they preferred the ricefields for their daily hunting. Here the great birds, snowy white, with flowing aigrettes, and long, curving necks, settled with dignity, and here they slept and sat on their rough nests of sticks.

When the height of homing flight of the host of herons had passed, I noticed a new element of restlessness, and here and there among the foliage appeared dull-brown figures. There occurred the comic explanation of white herons who had crept deep among the branches, again emerging in house coat of drab! These were not the same, however, and the first glance through binoculars showed the thick-set, humped figures and huge, staring eyes of night herons.

As the last rays of the sun left the summit of the royal palms, something like the shadow of a heron flashed out and away, and then the import of these facts was impressed upon me. The egret, the night heron, the vampire—here were three types of organisms, characterizing the actions and reactions in nature. The islands were receiving and giving up. Their heart was becoming filled with the many day-feeding birds, and now the night-shift was leaving, and the very branch on which a night-heron might have been dozing all day was now occupied, perhaps, by a sleeping egret. With eyes enlarged to gather together the scanty rays of light, the night herons were slipping away in the path of the vampires—both nocturnal, but unlike in all other ways. And I wondered if, in the very early morning, infant night herons would greet their returning parents; and if their callow young ever fell into the dark waters, what awful deathly alternates would night reveal; or were the slow-living crocodiles sleepless, with cruel eyes which never closed so soundly but that the splash of a young night heron brought instant response?

1920

"PAUL BUNYAN"

It is impossible to tell where the Paul Bunyan stories arose. Every locality in pioneer America had its athletic woodsmen whose prowess with axe and saw passed into local legend together with the stories of their scarcely less famous teams of oxen and horses. The Paul Bunyan tales were current fifty years ago among the lumbermen of the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence regions; as the timber cutters moved to the West the stories went with them, modified to suit the locality, and increasing in fabulous nature. They form a loose legend around the figure of Paul Bunyan, a Herculean logging contractor, and Babe, his gigantic ox with halfhuman intelligence. There are some evidences of Canadian French origin in the stories, though the humor is full of the exaggeration which is thought characteristic of the United States. As they have been recounted by countless story-tellers of crude but vigorous imagination to groups about the redhot stoves of lumber camps, they have taken various forms, and the legend is still growing. The selection following is from a collection by Esther Shephard, Paul Bunyan, Seattle, 1924; another collection is by James Stevens, New York, 1925. See K. B. Stewart and H. A. Watt, "Legends of Paul Bunyan," Transactions of the Wisconsin Academy of Sciences 18:639-51.

PAUL BUNYAN 1

Collected by ESTHER SHEPHARD From THE BUCKSKIN HARNESS

I suppose everybody's seen pictures of the big log loads we used to haul in the woods in the old times. Loads piled up, ten or twelve rows of logs on top of each other, and the teamster standin' alongside the load, and the top log way up in the air there above his head, and I can tell you them pictures ain't no exaggeration nor nothin' out of the ordinary. Three or four times as high as a man's head I've seen them loads many times. Naturally you had to have a good top-loader to get 'em that high, but that was the top-loader's business to be a good top-loader, and if he knowed what he was about he knowed how to build 'em as high as you'd a mind to have 'em.

In Paul's camp, though, we had 'em higher'n any you could ever of seen in any of the pictures. They used to be so high we had to have a telephone to phone up to the loader, and noontime they always sent his dinner up to him in a balloon. Generally he used to write a letter before he went up in the mornin's to send to his mother in case he shouldn't never come down again.

Course they couldn't of drawed them big loads if it hadn't of been for the buckskin harness that was invented about that time. That come in just before Paul went into Minnesota to log in them big white pine woods there. He used to hitch up Babe by Lake Vermilion and then the logs would be drawed down to Duluth or Two Harbors in one pull.

Everybody knows how buckskin stretches when it gets wet, and then shrinks all up to nothin' almost when it gets dry and warm in the sun. Well, that's the principle the buckskin harness was invented on, and the same as with many inventions, I guess, it was invented practically by pure accident. Look at the way Watt invented the steam engine, just watchin' an old teakettle boil.

But I was goin' to tell about the buckskin harness, and the way that come to be invented was, one of the bull-cooks was goin' to haul the wood in for the cook-house stove. They'd used up all the wood that was nearby already, and so he had to go out a good ways out in the woods to get it. The cook was a pretty cranky feller and he' told him he'd better bring home something dry that would burn if he knowed what was good for him, and so the bull-cook took his ox and went away over to the south of the camp where the burnt-over land was. Figgured some of them burnt trunks would be dry on the inside anyway. It was rainin' pitchforks that mornin' and nothin' couldn't happen to be dry on the outside by any way or chance.

The ox he had was a big one, though of course not big like Babe, and he had a bran new buckskin harness on him.

And so when he got there he cut down a couple of dozen burnt trees and put the logs on the sled and then he starts out for home with 'em, over the trail. First part of it was just kind of a narrow sled-track through the woods, but about half way that road turned out on one of the big main loggin' roads. He was glad he hit that part of the road and from there on he drove a little faster, walkin' along beside the ox and not botherin' to look back any. And course it was rainin' all the time hard as ever.

&lt;sup>1</sup> From Paul Bunyan by Esther Shephard, copyright, 1924, by Harcourt, Brace and Company.

Well, when he got to camp it was about noon, and he drove his ox up right close to the door back of the cook-house, and then when he turned around he seen he didn't have no load at all, but the harness was stretched out all the way down the road to the big tree where the turn was, where the log trail went into the woods, and he knowed his load of stove wood must be somewheres down there behind the tree standin' there. He was just goin' to start back and get it when the dinnerhorn commenced to toot, and he calculated he might as well go in and eat his dinner and go and tend to his load afterwards.

"That'll be the best thing I can do," he says.
And then while he was eatin' his dinner and while all of the rest of us was eatin' dinner, the sun come out.

And so, in about fifteen minutes, when the bull-cook come back out again, there was his load of wood standin' there right in front of him, and pretty near climbin' up on the old ox's back, so he had to hurry and cut him loose before it went right up on top of him, and he had to holler for help and everythin'.

You know, what happened was, when the sun come out, that buckskin harness had begun to shrink. And that's how it had pulled the load up by itself, without the ox doin' no pullin' at all on his part.

One of the cookees called Paul to see it, and Paul took out a patent on the harness, and the buckskin harness was used for all long hauls in Paul's camp ever since. A fine invention, you see, that come about that way, only the sun hadn't dried out the wood enough, and the cook swore at the bull-cook just the same, like as if he hadn't tried to do his best.

Paul did some great loggin' in Minnesota. Them forests up there was sure fine forestsstretches of pine and spruce and hemlock, with sometimes some white birches in between. Get up on a rise and you could see them all below you like a great ocean, big dark waves where the spruce was, and light patches of jack pine climbin' up on the hills, and the red willows that used to grow along the cricks. Paul used to climb up on Tasper Point sometimes just to enjoy the sight of it, and at the same time to make sure that the three rivers that make their start there was doin' their job of keepin' his three loggin' operations apart—he'd put 'em in on purpose for that, so he wouldn't get 'em mixed up. They're the Nelson-Saskatchewan, you know, and the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi. Jasper Point is the height of land between 'em.

Paul always liked it in Minnesota, though. There was plenty of Swedes around all the time that he could get hold of to work for him whenever he wanted, and then the huntin' was good in them there woods too.

One time, I know, Paul went huntin' spruce patridges. And he hadn't got out in the woods very far yet and hadn't been lookin' around very long till all of a sudden he seen 540 of 'em sittin in a row on a spruce bough, and he begun figgurin' how was the best way to get 'em

Course he had his shotgun along and his rifle too, and with his shotgun he could of got 'em all, because there was just enough shot in the load for one shot for each patridge, but he didn't like to get 'em that way if he could help, because he knowed they would be so much trouble to pick up afterwards each one by itself that way.

So what he done was, he took his rifle and went over to the end of the limb and fired and sent the bullet right through the length of the limb and split it open all the way to the tree, and then, just as he figgured, the patridges all got their toes caught in the rebound in the crack he'd made and stuck fast. And then he reloaded his rifle, leavin' the ramrod in, and shot that right through all the patridges. That way he got all but four that he didn't get quite big enough a hold on to make 'em stick on the rod.

He'd finished that shot, and had just turned round, when he seen a fine big buck standin' there not so very far away. He fired his shotgun at him quick and he seen the buck tumble over the ledge just as he fired.

It was such a fine carcass he couldn't hardly wait to get there to get hold of it, so he run as fast as he could to the place where the buck had been. Well, he run too fast. Result was, he run faster than the load, and got ahead of it, and got the whole charge of buckshot in his own back. For the buck'd got scared to death when he sees Paul, and hadn't waited for the shot to reach him.

Ole the Blacksmith come out and helped Paul back to camp and carried the patridges and the buck in for him. The buck when dressed weighed nine hundred seventy-five pounds.

There in Minnesota, the Minneapolis millmen used to want peeled logs, and Paul never liked that much. Oh, there was some sense to it, I spose—would keep the logs from rottin' if they had to lay in the water a long time—but not much—Paul always said it was nothin' but fol-de-rol, and I think he was about right. Anyway, it used to make him all-fired plaguey mad. The way he'd peel 'em when he got mad, he'd just hitch the Blue Ox to 'em and jerk 'em out whole. Even, he didn't bother to cut the trees down sometimes but just pulled 'em out from the top, so he got the heart out and left the limbs and bark standin'. That way a good deal was wasted, of course, and it was a lot of trouble, because he couldn't do but one at a time. I don't know how mad he would of got, but they quit askin' for 'em after awhile—maybe the sawmill men heard how Paul felt about it, and thought they'd better not ask to get peeled logs no more.

What Paul liked best to do was a whole lot of trees at a time. There in Minnesota he got himself a long fallin' saw that would reach across half a mile or more. Of course if the country was a little hilly or there was a hollow or rise of ground, it didn't work so good, because they'd just get the tops of the trees that growed down in the hollows and up on the hills the saw would hit in the ground and get dulled on the rocks. Paul had to keep a gang of two hundred filers to keep that saw filed. And that was the saw that Paul always pulled one end of himself. He didn't care who pulled the other end, and he didn't care if they'd ride the saw, he said, if they felt like it, but what he didn't want was for 'em to drag their feethe drawed the line on that.

Paul always liked to do things on a big scale. One of his ways was just to hitch Babe onto a whole section of timber at a time and haul it into camp and clear it off. If he got one in about sundown, after the day's work was over, he'd generally get it all cleared before supper.

That was efficient so far as the time it took was concerned anyway. But he couldn't of done it without Babe to haul it in for him.

Like one of these here efficiency experts would say, the over-head cost and maintenance for Babe was high, but on account of low operatin' expense and great efficiency, he was pretty economical camp equipment. And Paul couldn't of done much without him, I know that.

Like the time when they drove the wrong logs down the river and over the St. Anthony Falls; Babe just drank the river dry above the falls and sucked 'em all back again.

WILLIAM McFEE 1881-

William McFee, the son of a sea captain, spent his childhood in England and was educated there. In 1905, after several years of engineering experience, he went to sea as a marine engineer. In this capacity he came to know and sympathize with working men, and to entertain socialistic ideas. He did an immense amount of reading as he traveled from port to port, and it was not long before he began to write, producing, in 1908, An Ocean Tramp. Three years later he came to America and settled here; he has since become a naturalized citizen. He writes both essays and novels; important titles are: Aliens, 1914; Casuals of the Sea, 1916; Harbors of Memory, 1921; Command, 1922.

McFee preaches the doctrine of self-realization and finds romance to be dependent on one's outlook. Believing that "what is one man's meat is another man's poison," he has a habit of contrasting two people's reactions to the same environment. Wilson Follett says of him that he "materializes the spiritual and gives the abstract a name," and this sums up admirably his ironic manner of uniting aesthetic sensations and concrete observations.

Criticism: Wilson Follett, "Casuals, Romance, and Little Brown Boxes," Bookm. 46:172-6; "The Marine Engineer Who Has Become a Novelist," Cur. Opinion 61:263; Arthur J. Elder, "William McFee—Engineer and Author," Bookm. 44:57-62.

THE MARKET 1

There is a sharp, imperative rap on my outer door; a rap having within its insistent urgency a shadow of delicate diffidence, as though the person responsible were a trifle scared of the performance and on tiptoe to run away. I roll over and regard the clock. Four-forty. One of the dubious by-products of continuous service as a senior assistant at sea is the habit of waking automatically about 4 A.M. This gives one several hours, when ashore, to meditate upon one's sins, frailties, and (more rarely) triumphs and virtues. For a man who gets up at say, four-thirty, is regarded with aversion ashore. His family express themselves with superfluous vigor. He must lie still and meditate, or suffer the ignominy of being asked when he is going away again.

But this morning, in these old Chambers in an ancient Inn buried in the heart of London City, I have agreed to get up and go out. The reason for this momentous departure from a life of temporary but deliberate indolence is a lady. "Cherchez la femme," 2 as the French say with the dry animosity of a logical race. Well, she is not far to seek, being on the outside of my heavy oak door, tapping, as already hinted, with a sharp insistent delicacy. To this romantic summons I reply with an articulate growl of acquiescence, and proceed to get ready. To relieve the anxiety of any reader who imagines an impending elopement it may be stated in succinct truthfulness that we are bound on no such desperate venture. We are going round the corner a few blocks up the Strand. 1 to Covent Garden Market, to see the arrival of the metropolitan supply of produce.

&lt;sup>1</sup>From Harbours of Memory by William McFee. Copyright, 1921, Doubleday, Page and Company. By permission of Messrs. Doubleday, Doran and Company.

<sup>2&</sup>quot;Look for the woman."

Having accomplished a hasty toilet, almost as primitive as that favored by gentlemen aroused to go on watch, and placating an occasional repetition of the tapping by brief protests and reports of progress, I take hat and cane, and drawing the huge antique bolts of my door, discover a young woman standing by the window looking out upon the quadrangle of the old Inn. She is a very decided young woman, who is continually thinking out what she calls "stunts" for articles in the press. That is her profession, or one of her professions—writing articles for the press. The other profession is selling manuscripts, which constitutes the tender bond between us. For the usual agent's commissions she is selling one of my manuscripts. Being an unattached and, as it were, unprotected male, she plans little excursions about London to keep me instructed and entertained. Here she is attired in the flambovant finery of a London flower-girl. She is about to get the necessary copy for a special article in a morning paper. With the exception of a certain expectant flash of her bright black Irish eyes, she is entirely businesslike. Commenting on the beauty of an early summer morning in town, we descend, and passing out under the ponderous ancient archway, we make our leisurely progress westward down the Strand.

London is always beautiful to those who love and understand that extraordinary microcosm; but at five of a summer morning there is about her an exquisite quality of youthful fragrance and debonair freshness which goes to the heart. The newly-hosed streets are shining in the sunlight as though paved with "patins of bright gold." 2 Early 'buses rumble by from neighboring barns where they have spent the night. And, as we near the new Gaiety Theater, thrusting forward into the great rivers of traffic soon to pour round its base like some bold Byzantine promontory, we see Waterloo Bridge thronged with wagons, piled high. From all quarters they are coming, past Charing Cross the great wains are arriving from Paddington Terminal, from the market-garden section of Middlesex and Surrey. Down Wellington Street come carts laden with vegetables from Brentwood and Coggeshall; and neat vans packed with crates of watercress which grows in the lush lowlands of Suffolk and Cambridgeshire; and behind us are thundering huge four-horse vehicles from the docks, vehicles with peaches from South Africa, potatoes from the Canary Islands, onions from France, apples from California, oranges from the West Indies, pineapples from Central America, grapes from Spain, and bananas from Colombia.

We turn in under an archway behind a theater and adjacent to the stage-door of the Opera The booths are rapidly filling with produce. Gentlemen in long alpaca coats and carrying formidable marbled notebooks walk about with an important air. A mountain range of pumpkins rises behind a hill of cabbages. Festoons of onions are being suspended from rails. The heads of barrels are being knocked in, disclosing purple grapes buried in cork-dust. Pears and figs, grown under glass for wealthy patrons, repose in soft tissue-lined boxes. A broken crate of Tangerine oranges has spilled its contents in a splash of ruddy gold on the plank runway. A wagon is driven in, a heavy load of beets, and the broad wheels crush through the soft fruit so that the air is heavy with the acrid sweetness.

We pick our way among the booths and stalls until we find the flowers. Here is a crowd of ladies—young, so-so, and some quite matronly. and all dressed in this same flambovant finery of which I have spoken. They are grouped about an almost overpowering mass of blooms. Roses just now predominate. There is a satisfying solidity about the bunches, a glorious abundance which, in a commodity so easily enjoyed without ownership, is scarcely credible. I feel no desire to own these huge aggregations of odorous beauty. It would be like owning a harem, one imagines. Violets, solid patches of vivid blue in round baskets, eglantine in dainty boxes, provide a foil to the majestic blazonry of the roses and the dew-spangled forest of maidenhair fern near by.

"And what are those things at all?" demands my companion, diverted for a moment from the She nods towards a mass of dullgreen affairs piled on mats or being lifted from big vans. She is a cockney and displays surprise when she is told those things are bananas. She shrugs and turns again to the musk-roses, and forgets. But to me, as the harsh, penetrating odor of the green fruit cuts across the heavy perfume of the flowers, comes a picture of the farms in distant Colombia or perhaps Costa There is nothing like an odor to stir memories. I see the timber pier and the long line of rackety open-slatted cars jangling into the dark shed, pushed by a noisy, squealing locomotive. I see the boys lying asleep between shifts, their enormous straw hats covering their faces as they sprawl. In the distance rise the blue mountains; behind is the motionless blue sea. I hear the whine of the elevators, the monotonous click of the counters, the harsh cries of irresponsible and argumentative natives. I feel the heat of the tropic day, and see the gleam of the white waves breaking on vellow sands below tall palms. I recall the mysterious impenetrable solitude of the jungle. a solitude alive. if one is equipped with knowledge, with a ceaseless warfare of winged and crawling hosts. And while my companion is busily engaged in getting copy for a special article about the Market. I step nimbly out of the way of a swarthy gentleman from Calabria, 1 who with his two-wheeled barrow is the last link in the immense chain of transportation connecting the farmer in the distant tropics and the cockney pedestrian who halts on the sidewalk and purchases a banana for a couple of pennies.

&lt;sup>1</sup> an important street in London <sup>2</sup> Merchant of Venice, V, i, 59

1021

WILLA SIBERT CATHER 1876-

Though born in the Shenandoah Valley, Miss Cather has lived mostly in the North. After she received her education at the University of Nebraska she spent some years in editorial work in Pittsburgh and New York City. Miss Cather's notable work in fiction began with O Pioneers, 1913, a story of pioneer life in the Middle West; My Antonia, 1918, has also the Middle West as its background; and the story, One of Ours, 1922, which obtained the Pulitzer prize, begins in Nebraska and ends in France. Although her memories of the prairie states figure so largely in Miss Cather's novels, she has won notable success in one of her latest stories, Death Comes for the Archbishop, 1927, by a flight far beyond the range of her own experiences. Sympathetic, penetrating characterization' by means of quiet, convincing scenes placed together almost without plot, is a distinctive feature of Miss Cather's work.

Criticism: Carl Van Doren, Contemporary American Novelists; "Willa Cather," Nation 113:92-3; Latrobe Carroll, "Willa Sibert Cather," Bookm. 53: 212-16; Lloyd Morris, "Willa Cather," No. Am. 219:641-52; E. S. Sergeant, "Willa Cather," New Repub. 43: 91-4; William Whitman, 3rd, "Eminence Comes for Miss Cather," Ind. 119:283; T. K. Whipple, "Willa Cather," Literary Review 4:331-2.

A WAGNER MATINÉE 2

I received one morning a letter, written in pale ink on glassy, blue-lined note-paper, and bearing the postmark of a little Nebraska village. This communication, worn and rubbed. looking as if it had been carried for some days in a coat pocket that was none too clean, was from my uncle Howard, and informed me that his wife had been left a small legacy by a bachelor relative, and that it would be necessary for her to go to Boston to attend to the settling of the estate. He requested me to meet her at the station and render her whatever services might be necessary. On examining the date indicated as that of her arrival. I found it to be no later than tomorrow. He had characteristically delayed waiting until, had I been away from home for a day. I must have missed my aunt altogether.

The name of my Aunt Georgiana opened before me a gulf of recollection so wide and deep that, as the letter dropped from my hand, I felt suddenly a stranger to all the present conditions of my existence, wholly ill at ease and out of place amid the familiar surroundings of my study. I became, in short, the gangling farmerboy my aunt had known, scourged with chilblains and bashfulness, my hands cracked and sore from the corn husking. I sat again before her parlor organ, fumbling the scales with my stiff, red fingers, while she, beside me, made canyas mittens for the huskers.

The next morning, after preparing my land-lady for a visitor, I set out for the station. When the train arrived I had some difficulty in finding my aunt. She was the last of the passengers to alight, and it was not until I got her into the carriage that she seemed really to recognize me. She had come all the way in a day coach; her linen duster had become black with soot and her black bonnet gray with dust during the journey. When we arrived at my boarding-house the landlady put her to bed at once and I did not see her again until the next morning.

Whatever shock Mrs. Springer experienced at my aunt's appearance, she considerately concealed. As for myself, I saw my aunt's battered figure with that feeling of awe and respect with which we behold explorers who have left their ears and fingers north of Franz-Joseph-Land, or their health somewhere along the Upper Congo. My Aunt Georgiana had been a music teacher at the Boston Conservatory, somewhere back in the latter sixties. summer, while visiting in the little village among the Green Mountains where her ancestors had dwelt for generations, she had kindled the callow fancy of my uncle, Howard Carpenter, then an idle, shiftless boy of twenty-When she returned to her duties in Boston. Howard followed her, and the upshot of this infatuation was that she eloped with him, eluding the reproaches of her family and the criticism of her friends by going with him to the Nebraska frontier. Carpenter, who, of course, had no money, took up a homestead in Red Willow County, fifty miles from the railroad. There they had measured off their land themselves, driving across the prairie in a wagon, to the wheel of which they had tied a red cotton handkerchief, and counting its revolutions. They built a dug-out in the red hillside, one of those cave dwellings whose inmates so often reverted to primitive conditions. Their water they took from the lagoons where the buffalo drank, and their slender stock of provisions was always at the mercy of bands of roving Indians. For thirty years my aunt had not been farther than fifty miles from the homestead.

<sup>1</sup> a province of southern Italy

&lt;sup>2</sup> Reprinted from Youth and The Bright Mcdusa by Willa Cather, by and with permission of and special arrangement with Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., authorized publishers.

I owed to this woman most of the good that ever came my way in boyhood, and had a reverential affection for her. During the years when I was riding herd for my uncle, my aunt, after cooking the three meals-the first of which was ready at six o'clock in the morning and putting the six children to bed, would often stand until midnight at her ironing-board, with me at the kitchen table beside her, hearing me recite Latin declensions and conjugations, gently shaking me when my drowsy head sank down over a page of irregular verbs. It was to her, at her ironing or mending, that I read my first Shakespeare, and her old text-book on mythology was the first that ever came into my empty hands. She taught me my scales and exercises on the little parlor organ which her husband had bought her after fifteen years during which she had not so much as seen a musical instrument. She would sit beside me by the hour, darning and counting, while I struggled with the "Joyous Farmer." She seldom talked to me about music, and I understood why. Once when I had been doggedly beating out some easy passages from an old score of Euryanthe 1 I had found among her music books, she came up to me and, putting her hands over my eyes, gently drew my head back upon her shoulder, saying tremulously, "Don't love it so well, Clark, or it may be taken from you."

When my aunt appeared on the morning after her arrival in Boston, she was still in a semi-somnambulant state. She seemed not to realize that she was in the city where she had spent her youth, the place longed for hungrilly half a lifetime. She had been so wretchedly train-sick throughout the journey that she had no recollection of anything but her discomfort. and, to all intents and purposes, there were but a few hours of nightmare between the farm in Red Willow County and my study on Newbury Street. I had planned a little pleasure for her that afternoon, to repay her for some of the glorious moments she had given me when we used to milk together in the straw-thatched cowshed and she, because I was more than usually tired, or because her husband had spoken sharply to me, would tell me of the splendid performance of the Huguenots 2 she had seen in Paris, in her youth.

At two o'clock the Symphony Orchestra was to give a Wagner program, and I intended to take my aunt; though, as I conversed with her, I grew doubtful about her enjoyment of it. I suggested our visiting the Conservatory and the Common before lunch, but she seemed altogether too timid to wish to venture out. She questioned me absently about various changes in the city, but she was chiefly concerned that she had forgotten to leave instructions about feeding half-skimmed milk to a certain weakling calf, "old Maggie's calf, you know, Clark," she explained, evidently having forgotten how long I had been away. She was further troubled because she had neglected to tell her daughter about the freshly-opened kit of mackerel in the cellar, which would spoil if it were not used directly.

I asked her whether she had ever heard any of the Wagnerian operas, and found that she had not, though she was perfectly familiar with their respective situations, and had once possessed the piano score of The Flying Dutchman. <sup>3</sup> I began to think it would be best to get her back to Red Willow County without waking her, and regretted having suggested the concert.

From the time we entered the concert hall, however, she was a trifle less passive and inert, and for the first time seemed to perceive her surroundings. I had felt some trepidation lest she might become aware of her queer, country clothes, or might experience some painful embarrassment at stepping suddenly into the world to which she had been dead for a quarter of a century. But, again, I found how superficially I had judged her. She sat looking about her with eyes as impersonal, almost as stony, as those with which the granite Rameses in a museum watches the froth and fret that ebbs and flows about his pedestal. I have seen this same aloofness in old miners who drift into the Brown hotel at Denver, their pockets full of bullion, their linen soiled, their haggard faces unshaven; standing in the thronged corridors as solitary as though they were still in a frozen camp on the Yukon.

&lt;sup>1</sup> an opera by Von Weber, first performed 1823

&lt;sup>2</sup> an opera by Meyerbeer <sup>3</sup> an opera by Wagner, 1843

The matinée audience was made up chiefly of women. One lost the contour of faces and figures, indeed any effect of line whatever, and there was only the color of bodices past counting, the shimmer of fabrics soft and firm, silky and sheer; red, mauve, pink, blue, lilac, purple, écru, rose, yellow, cream, and white, all the colors that an impressionist finds in a sunlit landscape, with here and there the dead shadow of a frock coat. My aunt Georgiana regarded them as though they had been so many daubs of tube-paint on a palette.

When the musicians came and took their places, she gave a little stir of anticipation, and looked with quickening interest down over the rail at that invariable grouping, perhaps the first wholly familiar thing that had greeted her eve since she had left old Maggie and her weakling calf. I could feel how all those details sank into her soul, for I had not forgotten how they had sunk into mine when I came fresh from plowing forever and forever between green aisles of corn, where, as in a treadmill, one might walk from daybreak to dusk without perceiving a shadow of change. The clean profiles of the musicians, the gloss of their linen, the dull black of their coats, the beloved shapes of the instruments, the patches of yellow light on the smooth, varnished bellies of the 'cellos and the bass viols in the rear, the restless, windtossed forest of fiddle necks and bows-I recalled how, in the first orchestra I ever heard, those long bow-strokes seemed to draw the heart out of me, as a conjurer's stick reels out yards of paper ribbon from a hat.

The first number was the Tannhauser 1 overture. When the horns drew out the first strain of the Pilgrims' Chorus, Aunt Georgiana clutched my coat sleeve. Then it was I first realized that for her this broke a silence of thirty years. With the battle between the two motives, with the frenzy of the Venusberg theme and its ripping of strings, there came to me an overwhelming sense of the waste and wear we are so powerless to combat; and I saw again the tall, naked house on the prairie, black and grim as a wooden fortress; the black pond where I had learned to swim, its margin pitted with sun-dried cattle tracks: the rain gullied clay banks about the naked house, the four dwarf ash seedlings where the dish-cloths were always hung to dry before the kitchen door. The world there was the flat world of the ancients; to the east, a cornfield that stretched to daybreak; to the west, a corral that reached to sunset: between, the conquests of peace, dearer-bought than those of war.

The overture closed, my aunt released my coat sleeve, but she said nothing. She sat staring dully at the orchestra. What. I wondered. did she get from it? She had been a good pianist in her day, I knew, and her musical education had been broader than that of most music teachers of a quarter of a century ago. She had often told me of Mozart's operas and Meyerbeer's, and I could remember hearing her sing, years ago, certain melodies of Verdi. When I had fallen ill with a fever in her house she used to sit by my cot in the evening—when the cool, night wind blew in through the faded mosquito netting tacked over the window and I lay watching a certain bright star that burned red above the cornfield-and sing "Home to our mountains, O let us return!" in a way fit to break the heart of a Vermont boy near dead of homesickness already.

I watched her closely through the prelude to Tristan and Isolde, 2 trying vainly to conjecture what that seething turmoil of strings and winds might mean to her, but she sat mutely staring at the violin bows that drove obliquely downward, like the pelting streaks of rain in a summer shower. Had this music any message for her? Had she enough left to at all comprehend this power which had kindled the world since she had left it? I was in a fever of curiosity, but Aunt Georgiana sat silent upon her peak in Darien. 3 She preserved this utter immobility throughout the number from The Flying Dutchman, though her fingers worked mechanically upon her black dress, as if, of themselves, they were recalling the piano score they had once played. Poor hands! They had been stretched and twisted into mere tentacles to hold and lift and knead with; -on one of them a thin, worn band that had once been a wedding ring. As I pressed and gently quieted one of those groping hands, I remembered with quivering eyelids their services for me in other days.

Soon after the tenor began the "Prize Song," 4 I heard a quick drawn breath and from Die Meistersinger, a comic opera by Wagner

<sup>1</sup> a romantic opera by Wagner

&lt;sup>2</sup> an opera by Wagner based upon an Arthurian legend <sup>3</sup> See Keats's sonnet, "On First Looking into Chapman's Homer"

turned to my aunt. Her eyes were closed, but the tears were glistening on her cheeks, and I think, in a moment more, they were in my eyes as well. It never really died, then—the soul which can suffer so excruciatingly and so interminably; it withers to the outward eye only; like that strange moss which can lie on a dusty shelf half a century and yet, if placed in water grows green again. She wept so throughout the development and elaboration of the melody.

During the intermission before the second half, I questioned my aunt and found that the "Prize Song" was not new to her. Some years before there had drifted to the farm in Red Willow County a young German, a tramp cowpuncher, who had sung in the chorus at Bayreuth 1 where he was a boy, along with the other peasant boys and girls. Of a Sunday morning he used to sit on his gingham-sheeted bed in the hands' bedroom which opened off the kitchen, cleaning the leather of his boots and saddle, singing the "Prize Song," while my aunt went about her work in the kitchen. She had hovered over him until she had prevailed upon him to join the country church, though his sole fitness for this step, in so far as I could gather, lay in his boyish face and his possession of this divine melody. Shortly afterward, he had gone to town on the Fourth of July, been drunk for several days, lost his money at a faro table, ridden a saddled Texas steer on a bet, and disappeared with a fractured collar-bone. All this my aunt told me huskily, wanderingly, as though she were talking in the weak lapses of illness.

"Well, we have come to better things than the old Trovatore at any rate, Aunt Georgie?" I queried, with a well meant effort at jocularity.

Her lip quivered and she hastily put her handkerchief up to her mouth. From behind it she murmured, "And you have been hearing this ever since you left me, Clark?" Her question was the gentlest and saddest of reproaches.

The second half of the program consisted of four numbers from the Ring, <sup>2</sup> and closed with Siegfried's funeral march. <sup>3</sup> My aunt wept quietly, but almost continuously, as a shallow vessel overflows in a rain-storm. From time to time her dim eyes looked up at the lights, burning softly under their dull glass globes.

The deluge of sound poured on and on; I never knew what she found in the shining current of it; I never knew how far it bore her, or past what happy islands. From the trembling of her face I could well believe that before the last number she had been carried out where the myriad graves are, into the gray, nameless burying ground of the sea; or into some world of death vaster yet, where, from the beginning of the world, hope has lain down with hope and dream with dream and, renouncing, slept.

The concert was over; the people filed out of the hall chattering and laughing, glad to relax and find the living level again, but my kinswoman made no effort to rise. The harpist slipped the green felt cover on his instrument; the flute-players shook the water from their mouth-pieces; the men of the orchestra went out one by one, leaving the stage to the chairs and music stands, empty as a winter cornfield.

I spoke to my aunt. She burst into tears and sobbed pleadingly, "I don't want to go, Clark, I don't want to go!"

I understood. For her, just outside the concert hall, lay the black pond with the cattle-tracked bluffs; the tall, unpainted house, with weather-curled boards, naked as a tower; the crook-backed ash seedlings where the dish-cloths hung to dry; the gaunt, molting turkeys picking up refuse about the kitchen door.

1920

CHRISTOPHER (DARLINGTON) MORLEY 1890-

After graduating from Haverford College at his birthplace in Pennsylvania, Mr. Morley was a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford. Since his return to this country he has been in the service of a number of publishing houses and newspapers as a literary editor and journalist. He has also been a constant contributor to critical reviews. Among the books he has written are Songs for a Little House, 1917, Mince Pie (essays), 1920, Travels in Philadelphia, 1920, Where the Blue Begins, 1922, Thunder on the Left (novel), 1925. Mr. Morley's essays are typical of the day: light, yet with a sound basis in humanity and good sense; suggesting, not explaining; passing with the quickness of caprice from topic to topic. Paradoxical, whimsical, entertaining, they are worthy successors to the essays of Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Vincent O'Sullivan, "America and the English Literary Tradition," Liv. Age 303:170-76; Ind. 108:49; Lit. Dig. 80:31, Jan. 17, '24; Carl Van Doren, "Day In and Day Out," Cent. 107:308-15; H. S. Canby, "C. Morley," Sat. R. Lit. 4:625-6; T. S. Matthews, "Christopher Morley," New Repub. 54:167-9.

Wagner's theater was at Bayreuth.
 The Ring of the Nibelung, a series of four musical dramas by Wagner, some of his most important from The Twilight of the Gods, one of the dramas of the Ring

10

20

NURSERY RHYMES FOR THE TENDER-HEARTED 1

Scuttle, scuttle, little roach-How you run when I approach: Up above the pantry shelf. Hastening to secrete yourself.

Most adventurous of vermin. How I wish I could determine How you spend your hours of ease, Perhaps reclining on the cheese.

Cook has gone, and all is dark-Then the kitchen is your park: In the garbage heap that she leaves Do you browse among the tea leaves?

How delightful to suspect All the places you have trekked: Does your long antenna whisk its Gentle tip across the biscuits?

Do you linger, little soul, Drowsing in our sugar bowl? Or, abandonment must utter, Shake a shimmy on the butter?

Do you chant your simple tunes Swimming in the baby's prunes? Then, when dawn comes, do you slink Homeward to the kitchen sink?

Timid roach, why be so shy? We are brothers, thou and I. In the midnight, like yourself, I explore the pantry shelf!

I knew a black beetle, who lived down a drain, And friendly he was, though his manners were

When I took a bath he would come up the pipe, And together we'd wash and together we'd

Though mother would sometimes protest with

That my choice of a tub-mate was wanton and queer,

A nicer companion I never have seen; He bathed every night, so he must have been clean.

From Hide and Seek by Christopher Morley. Copyright, 1917, by Doubleday, Page and Company. By permission of Doubleday, Doran and Company.

Whenever he heard the tap splash in the tub He'd dash up the drain-pipe and wait for a scrub.

And often, so fond of ablution was he. I'd find him there floating and waiting for me.

But nurse has done something that seems a great shame:

She saw him there, waiting, prepared for a

She turned on the hot and she scalded him sore And he'll never come bathing with me any more.

TO THE LITTLE HOUSE 2

Dear little house, dear shabby street, Dear books and beds and food to eat! How feeble words are to express The facets of your tenderness.

How white the sun comes through the pane! In tinkling music drips the rain! How burning bright the furnace glows! What paths to shovel when it snows!

O dearly loved Long Island trains! O well remembered joys and pains. How near the housetops Beauty leans Along that little street in Queens!

Let these poor rhymes abide for proof Joy dwells beneath a humble roof; Heaven is not built of country seats But little queer suburban streets!

WHAT MEN LIVE BY 3

What a delicate and rare and gracious art is the art of conversation! With what a dexterity and skill the bubble of speech must be maneuvered if mind is to meet and mingle with mind.

There is no sadder disappointment than to realize that a conversation has been a complete failure. By which we mean that it has failed in blending or isolating for contrast the ideas, opinions, and surmises of two eager minds. So often a conversation is ship-wrecked by the very eagerness of one member to contribute. There must be give and take, parry and thrust, patience to hear and judgment to utter. How uneasy is the qualm as one looks back on an

From Songs for a Little House, by Christopher Morley.
 Copyright, 1917, by Doubleday, Page and Company.
 By permission of Doubleday, Doran and Company.
 From Mince Pie by Christopher Morley. Copyright, 1919, by Doubleday, Page and Company. By permission of Doubleday, Doran and Company.

10

hour's talk and sees that the opportunity was wasted; the precious instant of intercourse gone forever: the secrets of the heart still incom-Perhaps we were too anxious to hurry the moment, to enforce our own theory, to adduce instance from our own experience. Perhaps we were not patient enough to wait until our friend could express himself with ease and happiness. Perhaps we squandered the dialogue in tangent topics, in a multitude of irrelevances.

How few, how few are those gifted for real There are fine merry fellows, full of mirth and shrewdly minded observation, who will not abide by one topic, who must always be lashing out upon some new by-road, snatching at every bush they pass. They are too excitable, too ungoverned for the joys of patient intercourse. Talk is so solemn a rite it should be approached with prayer and must be conducted with nicety and forbearance. steadiness and sympathy are needed if the thread of thought is to be unwound without tangles or snapping! What forbearance, while each of the pair, after tentative gropings here and yonder, feels his way toward truth as he sees it. So often two in talk are like men standing back to back, each trying to describe to the other what he sees and disputing because their visions do not tally. It takes a little time for minds to turn face to face.

Very often conversations are better among three than between two, for the reason that then one of the trio is always, unconsciously, acting as umpire, interposing fair play, recalling wandering wits to the nub of the argument, seeing that the aggressiveness of one does no foul to the reticence of another. Talk in twos may. alas! fall into speaker and listener; talk in threes rarely does so.

It is little realized how slowly, how painfully, we approach the expression of truth. We are so variable, so anxious to be polite, and alternately swayed by caution or anger. Our mind oscillates like a pendulum: it takes some time for it to come to rest. And then, the proper allowance and correction has to be made for our individual vibrations that prevent accuracy. Even the compass needle doesn't point the true north, but only the magnetic north. Similarly our minds at best can but indicate magnetic truth, and are distorted by many things that act as iron filings do on the compass. The necessity of holding one's job: what an iron filing that is on the compass card of a man's brain!

We are all afraid of truth: we keep a battalion of our pet prejudices and precautions ready to throw into the argument as shock troops, rather than let our fortress of Truth be stormed. We have smoke bombs and decov ships and all manner of cunning colorizations by which we conceal our innards from our friends, and even from ourselves. How we fume and fidget, how we bustle and dodge rather than commit ourselves.

In days of hurry and complication, in the incessant pressure of human problems that thrust our days behind us, does one never dream of a way of life in which talk would be honored and exalted to its proper place in the sun? What a zest there is in that intimate unreserved exchange of thought, in the pursuit of the magical blue bird of joy and human satisfaction that may be seen flitting distantly through the branches of life. It was a sad thing for the world when it grew so busy that men had no time to talk. There are such treasures of knowledge and compassion in the minds of our friends, could we only have time to talk them out of their shy quarries. If we had our wav. we would set aside one day a week for talking. In fact, we would reorganize the week altogether. We would have one day for Worship (let each man devote it to worship of whatever he holds dearest); one day for Work; one day for Play (probably fishing); one day for Talking; one day for Reading, and one day for Smoking and Thinking. That would leave one day for Resting, and (incidentally) interviewing employers.

The best week of our life was one in which we did nothing but talk. We spent it with a delightful gentleman who has a little bungalow on the shore of a lake in Pike County. He had a great many books and cigars, both of which are conversational stimulants. We used to lie out on the edge of the lake, in our oldest trousers, and talk. We discussed ever so many subjects; in all of them he knew immensely more than we did. We built up a complete philosophy of indolence and good will, according to Food and Sleep and Swimming their proper share of homage. We rose at 10 in the morning and began talking; we talked all day and until 3 o'clock at night. Then we went to bed and regained strength and combativeness for the coming day. Never was a week better spent. We committed no crimes, planned no secret treaties, devised no annexations or indemnities. We envied no one. We examined the entire world and found it worth while. Meanwhile our wives, who were watching (perhaps with a little quiet indignation) from the veranda, kept on asking us, "What on earth do you talk about?"

Bless their hearts, men don't have to have anything to talk about. They just talk.

And there is only one rule for being a good talker: learn how to listen.

1920

ON UNANSWERING LETTERS 1

There are a great many people who really believe in answering letters the day they are received, just as there are people who go to the movies at 9 o'clock in the morning; but these people are stunted and queer.

It is a great mistake. Such crass and breathless promptness takes away a great deal of the pleasure of correspondence.

The psychological didoes involved in receiving letters and making up one's mind to answer them are very complex. If the tangled process could be clearly analyzed and its component involutions isolated for inspection we might reach a clearer comprehension of that curious bag of tricks, the efficient Masculine Mind.

Take Bill F., for instance, a man so delightful that even to contemplate his existence puts us in good humor and makes us think well of a world that can exhibit an individual equally comely in mind, body, and estate. Every now and then we get a letter from Bill, and immediately we pass into a kind of trance, in which our mind rapidly enunciates the ideas, thoughts, surmises, and contradictions that we would like to write to him in reply. We think what fun it would be to sit right down and churn the inkwell, spreading speculation and cynicism over a number of sheets of foolscap to be wafted Billward.

Sternly we repress the impulse for we know that the shock to Bill of getting so immediate a retort would surely unhinge the well-fitted panels of his intellect.

We add his letter to the large delta of unanswered mail on our desk, taking occasion to turn the mass over once or twice and run through it in a brisk, smiling mood, thinking of all the jolly letters we shall write some day.

After Bill's letter has lain on the pile for a fortnight or so it has been gently silted over by about twenty other pleasantly postponed manuscripts. Coming upon it by chance, we reflect that any specific problems raised by Bill in that manifesto will by this time have settled themselves. And his random speculations upon household management and human destiny will probably have taken a new slant by now, so that to answer his letter in its own tune will not be congruent with his present fevers. We had better bide a wee until we really have something of circumstance to impart.

We wait a week.

By this time a certain sense of shame has begun to invade the privacy of our brain. We feel that to answer that letter now would be an indelicacy. Better to pretend that we never got it. By and by Bill will write again and then we will answer promptly. We put the letter back in the middle of the heap and think what a fine chap Bill is. But he knows we love him, so it doesn't really matter whether we write or not.

Another week passes by, and no further communication from Bill. We wonder whether he does love us as much as we thought. Still—we are too proud to write and ask.

A few days later a new thought strikes us. Perhaps Bill thinks we have died and he is annoyed because he wasn't invited to the funeral. Ought we to wire him? No, because after all we are not dead, and even if he thinks we are, his subsequent relief at hearing the good news of our survival will outweigh his bitterness during the interval. One of these days we will write him a letter that will really express our heart, filled with all the grindings and gearwork of our mind, rich in affection and fallacy. But we had better let it ripen and mellow for a while. Letters, like wines, accumulate bright fumes and bubblings if kept under cork.

Presently we turn over that pile of letters again. We find in the lees of the heap two or three that have gone for six months and can safely be destroyed. Bill is still on our mind, but in a pleasant, dreamy kind of way. He does not ache or twinge us as he did a month ago. It is fine to have old friends like that and keep in touch with them. We wonder how he is and whether he has two children or three. Splendid old Bill!

By this time we have written Bill several letters in imagination and enjoyed doing so, but the matter of sending him an actual letter has begun to pall. The thought no longer has the savor and vivid sparkle it had once. When one feels like that it is unwise to write. Letters should be spontaneous outpourings: they should never be undertaken merely from a sense of duty. We know that Bill wouldn't want to get a letter that was dictated by a feeling of obligation.

Another fortnight or so elapsing, it occurs to us that we have entirely forgotten what Bill said to us in that letter. We take it out and con it over. Delightful fellow! It is full of his own felicitous kinks of whim, though some of it sounds a little old-fashioned by now. It seems a bit stale, has lost some of its freshness and surprise. Better not answer it just yet, for Christmas will soon be here and we shall have to write then anyway. We wonder, can Bill hold out until Christmas without a letter?

&lt;sup>1</sup> From Mince Pie by Christopher Morley. Copyright, 1919, by Doubleday, Page and Company. By permission of Doubleday, Doran and Company.

We have been rereading some of those imaginary letters to Bill that have been dancing in our head. They are full of all sorts of fine stuff. If Bill ever gets them he will know how we love him. To use O. Henry's immortal joke, we have days of Damon and Knights of Pythias writing those uninked letters to Bill. A curious thought has come to us. Perhaps it would be better if we never saw Bill again. It is very difficult to talk to a man when you like him so much. It is much easier to write in the sweet fantastic strain. We are so inarticulate when face to face. If Bill comes to town we will leave word that we have gone away. Good old Bill! He will always be a precious memory.

A few days later a sudden frenzy sweeps over us, and though we have many pressing matters on hand, we mobilize pen and paper and literary shock troops and prepare to hurl several battalions at Bill. But, strangely enough, our utterance seems stilted and stiff. We have nothing to say. My dear Bill, we begin, it seems a long time since we heard from you. Why don't you write? We still love you, in spite of all your shortcomings.

That doesn't seem very cordial. We muse over the pen and nothing comes. Bursting with affection, we are unable to say a word.

Just then the phone rings. "Hello?" we say. It is Bill, come to town unexpectedly.

"Good old fish!" we cry, ecstatic. "Meet you at the corner of Tenth and Chestnut in five minutes."

We tear up the unfinished letter. Bill will never know how much we love him. Perhaps it is just as well. It is very embarrassing to have your friends know how you feel about them. When we meet him we will be a little bit on our guard. It would not be well to be betrayed into any extravagance of cordiality.

And perhaps a not altogether false little story could be written about a man who never visited those most dear to him, because it panged him so to say good-bye when he had to leave.

1920

WITTER BYNNER 1881-

Mr. Bynner has been engaged in literary work during all his active life. He was born in Brooklyn, graduated from Harvard, and was for twelve years or more on the staff of New York publishing houses. His work includes the following plays: Tiger, 1913; Iphigenia ix Tauris, 1915; A. Book of Plays, 1922. Among his volumes of verse are The New World, 1915; A Canticle of Praise, 1919; The Beloved Stranger, 1919; Caravan, 1925. Although much of Mr. Bynner's work is simple and direct, some of it is highly figurative. In such cases we must interpret it through the idea it suggests or the mood it arouses; especially since it is liable to be over-lavish in figure and in phrasing.

Criticism: William M. Reedy in preface to The Beloved Stranger; R. M. Alden, Dial 59:275; O. M.

Firkins, Nation 101:406.

A FORTUNE-TELLER 1

Turning the secrets from her pack of cards, Warning of sickness, tracing out a theft, Guarding from danger as an omen guards, Her hand grew withered as it grew more deft. . . .

Till in the stuffy parlor where she lies.

Now to these clients, neighbors, debtors, friends,

Truest is proven of her prophecies, "I shall be dead before December ends."

That old man, facing us, who many years Carried the marvellous message of her art, Now hear him how he tells us with his tears The simpler larger wisdom of her heart.

For she was quick to share the good that came, So that young mothers turned at last and slept And loafers gruffly reverenced her name— Yet more than all she gave away she kept,

Kept red geraniums on her window-sill And a gay garden in that narrow plot Fenced-in behind her house. You'll find there still

Her hoe, her rake, her rusty watering-pot. 20

Bright, in the midst of all these dingy yards, Her roses, hollyhocks, and pansies grew; As if some happy jester in the cards Whispered the gayest secret that he knew.

1917

TRAIN-MATES 1

Outside hove Shasta, snowy height on height, A glory; but a negligible sight, For you had often seen a mountain peak

Reprinted from Grenstone Poems by Witter Bynner by and with permission of and special arrangement with Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., authorized publishers But not my paper. So we came to speak . . . A smoke, a smile,—a good way to commence The comfortable exchange of difference! You a young engineer, five feet eleven, Forty-five chest, with football in your heaven, Liking a road-bed newly built and clean, Your fingers hot to cut away the green 10 Of brush and flowers that bring beside a track The kind of beauty steel lines ought to lack,—And I a poet, wistful of my betters, Reading George Meredith's 1 high-hearted letters, Joining betweenwhile in the mingled speech Of a drummer, circus-man, and parson, each Absorbing to himself—as I to me And you to you—a glad identity!

After a time, when others went away,
A curious kinship made us choose to stay,
Which I could tell you now; but at the time
You thought of baseball teams and I of rhyme,
Until we found that we were college men
And smoked more easily and smiled again;
And I from Cambridge cried, the poet still:
"I know your fine Greek theater on the hill
At Berkeley!" With your happy Grecian head
Upraised, "I never saw the place," you said—
"Once I was free of class, I always went Out to the field."

Young Engineer, you meant
As fair a tribute to the better part
As ever I did. Beauty of the heart
Is evident in temples. But it breathes
Alive where athletes quicken curly wreaths,
Which are the lovelier because they die.
You are a poet quite as much as I.
Though differences appear in what we do,
And I an athlete quite as much as you.
Because you half-surmise my quarter-mile
And I your quatrain, we could greet and smile.
Who knows but we shall look again and find 41
The circus-man and drummer, not behind
But leading in our visible estate—
As discus-thrower and as laureate?

1917

ROOFS 2

I don't know what it is That sets me flying Over the roofs this morning Swift on tiptoe,

<sup>1</sup> English novelist, 1828-1909 <sup>2</sup> Reprinted from The Beloved Stranger by Witter Bynner by and with permission of and special arrangement with Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., authorized publishers.

Touching the chimneys and railings. Not even the middle of roofs. Only the edges. I don't know why it is So many dancers Dance in my dawn, 10 Hailing this hard city. For most of the dancers that lead me Point in directions daily Of mountain and of sea. Toward little villages And houses nestling. Rivers. Hills. I don't know what it is 20 That sets me flying Over the roofs this early morning Swift on tiptoe . . .

You!

1919

WILLIAM ROSE BENÉT 1886-

Mr. Benét was born at Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor. Though he comes of a military family, and was graduated from the Sheffield Scientific School, Yale, he turned to literature, beginning his career as a free lance writer in California. Then he was successively reader for the Century Magazine, second lieutenant in the U. S. Air Service, assistant editor of the New York Evening Post, and in 1924 co-founder and editor of The Saturday Review of Literature.

He has published several volumes of poems: Merchants from Cathay, 1913; The Falconer of God, 1914; The Great White Wall, 1917; The Burglar of the Zodiac, 1918; Moons of Grandeur, 1920; a finely drawn romance, First Person Singular, 1921; and many critical essays.

Mr. Benét's vigor in the conception and treatment of a poetic theme is a marked trait of his verse. A strong and sometimes fantastic imagination often develops his germ idea into a structure of original and unfamiliar beauty. Frequent use of allegory makes his work sometimes difficult to understand.

Criticism: M. Wilkinson (NV); also "Mirrors of the Renaissance," Bookm. 53:168-70; Phelps (EP); also Bookm. 47:557; W. M. Payne, "Recent Poetry," Dial 56:67-8; "The Literary Spotlight," Bookm. 58:135-9; Poetry 5:91; 9:322-4; 15:48-51.

THE FALCONER OF GOD 3

I flung my soul to the air like a falcon flying. I said: "Wait on, wait on, while I ride below!

Reprinted from The Falconer of God and Other Poems by William Rose Benét, published by the Yale University Press. I shall start a heron soon

In the marsh beneath the moon-

A strange white heron rising with silver on its wings.

Rising and crying

Wordless, wondrous things;

The secret of the stars, of the world's heart-strings

The answer to their woe.

Then stoop 1 thou upon him, and grip and hold him so!"

My wild soul waited on as falcons hover.

I beat the reedy fens as I trampled past.

I heard the mournful loon

In the marsh beneath the moon.

And then, with feathery thunder, the bird of my desire

Broke from the cover

Flashing silver fire.

High up among the stars I saw his pinions spire.

The pale clouds gazed aghast

As my falcon stooped upon him, and gripped and held him fast.

My soul dropped through the air—with heavenly plunder?—

Gripping the dazzling bird my dreaming knew? Nay! but a piteous freight.

A dark and heavy weight

Despoiled of silver plumage, its voice forever stilled—

All of the wonder Gone that ever filled

Its guise with glory. O bird that I have killed.

How brilliantly you flew

Across my rapturous vision when first I dreamed of you!

Yet I fling my soul on high with new endeavor, And I ride the world below with a joyful mind.

I shall start a heron soon

In the marsh beneath the moon—

A wondrous silver heron its inner darkness fledges!

I beat forever

The fens and the sedges.

The pledge is still the same—for all disastrous pledges,

All hopes resigned!

My soul still flies above me for the quarry it shall find!

1914

THE HORSE THIEF 2

There he moved, cropping the grass at the purple canyon's lip.

His mane was mixed with the moonlight that silvered his snow-white side.

For the moon sailed out of a cloud with the wave of a spectral ship.

I crouched and I crawled on my belly, my lariat coil looped wide.

Dimly and darkly the mesas broke on the starry sky.

A pall covered every color of their gorgeous glory at noon.

I smelt the yucca and mesquite, and stifled my heart's quick cry,

And wormed and crawled on my belly to where he moved against the moon!

Some Moorish barb was that mustang's sire. His lines were beyond all wonder.

From the prick of his ears to the flow of his tail he ached in my throat and eyes.

Steel and velvet grace! As the prophet <sup>8</sup> says, God had "clothed his neck with thunder."

Oh, marvelous with the drifting cloud he drifted across the skies!

And then I was near at hand—crouched, and balanced, and cast the coil;

And the moon was smothered in cloud, and the rope through my hands with a rip!

But somehow I gripped and clung, with the blood in my brain aboil—

With a turn round the rugged tree-stump there on the purple canyon's lip.

Right into the stars he reared aloft, his red eye rolling and raging.

He whirled and sunfished and lashed, and rocked the earth to thunder and flame.

He squealed like a regular devil horse. I was haggard and spent and aging—

Roped clean, but almost storming clear, his fury too fierce to tame.

And I cursed myself for a tenderfoot moondazzled to play the part;

But I was doubly desperate then, with the posse pulled out from the town,

Or I'd never have tried it. I only knew I must get a mount and a start.

The filly had snapped her foreleg short—I had had to shoot her down.

<sup>2</sup> Reprinted from The Burglar of the Zodiac and Other Poems by William Rose Benét, published by the Yale University Press.
<sup>3</sup> Tob

<sup>1</sup> a term used in falconry; to swoop down

So there he struggled and strangled, and I snubbed him around the tree.

Nearer, a little nearer—hoofs planted, and lolling tongue—

Till a sudden slack pitched me backward. He reared right on top of me.

Mother of God—that moment! He missed me . . . and up I swung.

Somehow, gone daft completely and clawing a bunch of his mane,

As he stumbled and tripped in the lariat, there
I was—up and astride

And cursing for seven counties! And the mustang? Just insane!

Crack-bang! went the rope; we cannoned off the tree; then—gods, that ride!

A rocket—that's all, a rocket. I dug with my teeth and nails.

Why, we never hit even the high spots (though I hardly remember things):

But I heard a monstrous booming like a thunder of flapping sails

When he spread—well, call me a liar!—when he spread those wings, those wings!

So white that my eyes were blinded; thick feathered and wide unfurled.

They beat the air into billows. We sailed and the earth was gone.

Canyon and desert and mesa withered below, with the world.

And then I knew that mustang; for I was Bellerophon! 1 40

Yes, glad as a Greek, and mounted on a horse of the elder gods,

With never a magic bridle or a fountain-mirror nigh!

My chaps and spurs and holster must have looked it! What's the odds?

I'd a leg over lightning and thunder, careening across the sky!

And forever streaming before me, fanning my forehead cool,

Flowed a mane of molten silver; and just before my thighs

(As I gripped his velvet-muscled ribs, while I cursed myself for a fool),

The steady pulse of those pinions—their wonderful fall and rise!

The bandanna I bought in Bowie blew loose and whipped from my neck.

<sup>1</sup> a hero of Greek mythology who rode the winged horse, Pegasus My shirt was stuck to my shoulders, and ribboning out behind.

The stars were dancing and wheeling and glancing, dipping with smirk and beck.

The clouds were flowing, dusking and glowing.
We rode a roaring wind.

We soared through the silver starlight to knock at the planets' gates.

New shimmering constellations came whirling into our ken.

Red stars and green and golden swung out of the void that waits

For man's great last adventure; the Signs <sup>2</sup> took shape—and then

I knew the lines of that Centaur the moment
I saw him come!

The musical-box of the heavens all around us

That tinkled and chimed and trilled with silver sounds that struck you dumb.

As if some archangel were grinding out the music of the moon.

Melody-drunk on the Milky Way, as we swept and soared hilarious.

Full in our pathway, sudden he stood—the Centaur of the Stars,

Flashing from head and hoof and breast! I knew him for Sagittarius. 8

He reared, and bent and drew his bow. He crouched as a boxer spars.

Flung back on his haunches, weird he loomed; then leapt—and the dim void lightened.

Old White Wings shied and swerved aside, and fled from the splendor-shod.

Through a flashing welter of worlds we charged.

I knew why my horse was frightened.

He had two faces,—a dog's and a man's—that Babylonian god!

Also, he followed us real as fear. Ping! went an arrow past.

My broncho buck-jumped, humping high. We plunged . . . I guess that's all!

I lay on the purple canyon's lip, when I opened my eyes at last—

Stiff and sore and my head like a drum, but I broke no bones in the fall.

So you know—and now you may string me up. Such was the way you caught me.

Thank you for letting me tell it straight, though you never could greatly care.

<sup>2</sup> of the Zodiac

<sup>3</sup> a southern constellation pictured as a centaur

For I took a horse that wasn't mine! . . . . But there's one the heavens brought me,

And I'll hang right happy because I know he is waiting for me up there.

From creamy muzzle to cannon-bone, by God. he's a peerless wonder!

He is steel and velvet and furnace-fire, and death's supremest prize;

And never again shall be roped on earth that neck that is "clothed with thunder"....

String me up, Dave! Go dig my grave! I rode him across the skies!

1916

STEPHEN VINCENT BENÉT 1898-

Stephen Benét, brother of William Benét, produced his first volume of verse. Five Men and Pompev, in 1915 before he had entered college. He was born at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, received both his bachelor's and master's degrees at Yale, and before he graduated was given the first John Masefield poetry prize. Since then he has continued to win poetry prizes, and has published Heavens and Earth, 1920, and Tiger Joy, 1925, in verse; and The Beginning of Wisdom, 1921, and The Spanish Bayonet, 1926, both novels. Mr. Benét's work is full of vigorous realism, of clear sense impressions, whether the record of his own experiences or of his imagination. Much of it is inspired by American life; his most ambitious poem, John Brown's Body, 1928, is a long narrative poem of the Civil War, beginning with the remote causes of the conflict. By many critics this poem is reckoned one of the most notable of the decade.

Criticism: Untermeyer; Phelps; Dial 71:597-600; Poetry 16:53-4; Sat. R. Lit. 2:903; Lit. Digest 98: 37, Sept. 29, '28; Sat. R. Lit. 5: Sept. 29, '28.

PORTRAIT OF A BOY 1

After the whipping he crawled into bed, Accepting the harsh fact with no great weeping. How funny uncle's hat had looked striped red! He chuckled silently. The moon came, sweep-

A black, frayed rag of tattered cloud before In scorning; very pure and pale she seemed, Flooding his bed with radiance. On the floor Fat motes danced. He sobbed: closed his eyes and dreamed.

Warm sand flowed around him. Blurts of crimson light

Splashed the white grains like blood. Past the cave's mouth

Reprinted from Young Adventure by Stephen V. Benét, published by the Yale University Press.

Shone with a large, fierce splendor, wildly hright.

The crooked constellations of the South:

Here the Cross 2 swung; and there, affronting Mars.

The Centaur 3 stormed aside a froth of stars. Within, great casks like wattled aldermen Sighed of enormous feasts, and cloth of gold Glowed on the walls like hot desire. Again, Beside webbed purples from some galleon's

A black chest bore the skull and bones in white Above a scrawled "Gunpowder!" flames.

Decked out in crimson, gemmed with syenite, Hailing their fellows with outrageous names. The pirates sat and diced. Their eyes were moons.

"Doubloons!" they said. The words crashed gold. "Doubloons!"

1917

THE BALLAD OF WILLIAM SYCAMORE 4

(1790-1880)

My father he was a mountaineer, His fist was a knotty hammer: He was quick on his feet as a running deer. And he spoke with a Yankee stammer.

My mother she was merry and brave And so she came to labor. With a tall green fir for her doctor grave, And a stream for her comforting neighbor.

And some are wrapped in the linen fine, And some like a godling's scion; But I was cradled on twigs of pine In the skin of a mountain lion.

And some remember a white, starched lap And a ewer with silver handles: But I remember a coonskin cap And the smell of bayberry candles!

The cabin logs with the bark still rough, And my mother who laughed at trifles. And the tall, lank visitors, brown as snuff, With their long, straight squirrel-rifles.

2 Southern Cross, a constellation in the southern hemisphere

3 a southern constellation <sup>4</sup> From Tiger Joy by Stephen Vincent Benet, copyright, 1925, Doubleday, Doran and Company, Inc., publishers.

10

20

40 '

60

I can hear them dance, like a foggy song, Through the deepest one of my slumbers, The fiddle squeaking the boots along And my father calling the numbers.

The quick feet shaking the puncheon-floor, <sup>1</sup> And the fiddle squeaking and squealing, Till the dried herbs rattled above the door And the dust went up to the ceiling.

There are children lucky from dawn till dusk, But never a child so lucky! 30 For I cut my teeth on "Money Musk" In the Bloody Ground of Kentucky!

When I grew tall as the Indian Corn, My father had little to lend me, But he gave me his great old powder-horn And his woodsman's skill to befriend me.

With a leather shirt to cover my back, And a redskin nose to unravel Each forest sign, I carried my pack As far as a scout could travel.

Till I lost my boyhood and found my wife, A girl like a Salem clipper! A woman straight as a hunting-knife With eyes as bright as the Dipper!

We cleared our camp where the buffalo feed, Unheard-of streams were our flagons, And I sowed my sons like the apple-seed On the trail of the Western wagons.

They were right, tight boys, never sulky or slow,
A fruitful, a goodly muster!

50

The eldest died at the Alamo. <sup>2</sup> The youngest fell with Custer. <sup>3</sup>

The letter that told it burned my hand. Yet we smiled and said, "So be it!"
But I could not live when they fenced the land, For it broke my heart to see it.

I saddled a red, unbroken colt
And rode him into the day there,
And he threw me down like a thunderbolt
And rolled on me as I lay there.

The hunter's whistle hummed in my ear As the city-men tried to move me,

<sup>1</sup> made from broad, flat pieces of rough timber
 <sup>2</sup> a fortified mission at San Antonio, Texas, taken by Mexicans, 1836, after all the defenders were killed
 <sup>3</sup> an American general, 1839-1876, killed in battle with the Sioux Indians

And I died in my boots like a pioneer With the whole wide sky above me.

Now I lie in the heart of the fat, black soil Like the seed of a prairie-thistle; It has washed my bones with honey and oil And picked them clean as a whistle.

And my youth returns, like the rains of Spring, And my sons, like the wild geese flying,

And I lie and hear the meadow-lark sing

And have much content in my dying.

Go play with the towns you have built of blocks, The towns where you would have bound me! I sleep in my earth like a tired fox, And my buffalo have found me.

1922

NATHALIA (RUTH CLARA) CRANE 1913-

Nathalia Crane was born in New York City. but now lives in Brooklyn. She was brought up in a home of good books and intelligent conversation, and began very early to write. Her books thus far have been The Janitor's Bov. 1924: Lava Lane and Other Poems, 1925; The Singing Crow and Other Poems, 1926; The Sunken Garden (prose romance), 1926; Venus Invisible and Other Poems, 1928. Some of her poems show a maturity of thought far beyond her years; others record in simple, naïve verse what is generally a closed book, the real, inner emotion aroused in children by ordinary experiences. A writer in The Nation sees her as "a sort of double personality, one half of which is a child quite frankly absorbed in childish things, and the other half an adult who smiles at the immaturity of her twin." Her later work shows, of course, an increasing maturity of thought.

Criticism: Untermeyer; "The Infant Muse," Nation 121:589; W. R. Benét, "Nathalia Crane," Sat. R. Lit. 2:350; L. Untermeyer, "The Mystery of a Poet," Sat. R. Lit. 3:857-8; "A Poet at Twelve," Lit. Digest 87:29, Oct. 10, '25; "Who Wrote Nathalia's Verses?" Lit. Digest 87:29, Dec. 5, '25; G. S. Hubbell, "A Little Girl's Utopia," Bookm. 64: 306-9.

THE FLATHOUSE ROOF 4

I linger on the flathouse roof, the moonlight is divine.

But my heart is all a-flutter like the washing on the line.

I long to be a heroine, I long to be serene,

<sup>4</sup> From The Janitor's Boy by Nathalia Crane, copyright, 1924, Thomas Seltzer, Inc., by permission of Messrs. Albert and Charles Boni, Inc. But my feet, they dance in answer to a distant

And, oh! the dreams of ecstasy. Oh! Babylon and Troy!

I've a hero in the basement, he's the janitor's red-haired boy.

There's the music of his mallet and the jigging of his saw;

I wonder what he's making on that lovely cellar floor?

He loves me, for he said it when we met upon the stair.

And that is why I'm on the roof to get a breath of air.

He said it! Oh! He said it! And the only thing I said

Was, "Roger Jones, I like you, for your hair is very red."

We parted when intruders came a-tramping through the hall:

He's got my pocket handkerchief, and I have got his ball.

And so it is I'm on the roof. Oh! Babylon and Troy!

I'm very sure that I'm in love with someone else's boy.

Alone, upon the starry heights, I'm dancing on a green.

To the jingling and the jangling of a distant tambourine,

To the stamping of a hammer and the jigging of a saw.

And the secret sort of feeling I'm in love forever more, 20

Do you think it's any wonder, with the moonlight so divine,

That my heart is all a-flutter, like the washing on the line?

1924

THE POE COTTAGE 1

There they dwelt in the wrennet's cot
Just as it was to be;
Paced the halls of a miniature—
Poe and Annabel Lee

<sup>1</sup> From Venus Invisible and Other Poems by Nathalia Crane, copyright, 1928, Coward-McCann, Inc. He was garbed in a courtly suit,
She in Colonial low;
Heads together they walked the halls—
Annabel Lee and Poe.

These indeed were particular hours;
No one tells of their glee,
How they laughed in the wrennet's cot—
Poe and Annabel Lee.

What if all of the snow that fell
Never was really snow;
What if all of their griefs were thus—
Annabel Lee and Poe.

What if all of the shadows there
Merely an imagery;
Nothing to do with the wrennet's cot—
Poe and Annabel Lee.

20
1928

ARTHUR GUITERMAN 1871-

Mr. Guiterman seems to be notoriously free of the affectations of the poet's trade. His fine sense of humor is evidently a charm against the various fopperies which he has cleverly brought together in a set of "Don'ts for Poets." He was born of American parents in Vienna, but has lived the greater part of his life in New York, where he has done editorial work, given lectures on journalism, and become a member of several societies for authors. He has turned from the short story to verse exclusively, and has produced, among other volumes, The Laughing Muse, 1915; The Mirthful Lyre, 1918; Chips of Jade, 1920; The Light Guitar, 1923; I Sing the Pioneer, 1926. His rhymed reviews are excellent.

Guiterman's work has steadily gained in meatiness. There is a solidity about his later verse that gives his generous fun a philosophical foundation. We find in him a practical and clever yet idealistic American.

Criticism: Joyce Kilmer, "The Most American of Poets," Ind. 88:312-13; Edmund Pearson, "I Sing the Pioneer," Outlook 145:154-6.

AFTERNOON TEA<sup>2</sup>

A SONNET SEQUENCE

As wildly raged the tea-imbibing throng
About the urn, with measured step and slow,
The mighty spirits of the realm of song
(At some weird séance on the floor below Materialized), among them moved, amazed
At what they heard. A teacup dropped and broke,

&lt;sup>2</sup> Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Harper and Brothers, publishers.

All unregarded, when, with hand upraised, Full solemnly the shade of Milton spoke:

T

RESIGNATION

When I consider how my time is spent At gatherings to meet some tender bride. Or "Just a few dear friends," or, woe betide! Some foreign super-person, eloquent, Whom women rave about, or, ill-content. Some bashful English poet, wistful-eved. Who yearns, I know, to run away and hide-Rebelliously I question, "Was I meant To hear this talk that runs around in rings? And must I waste the blessed afternoon?" Then, "Hush!" says Patience; "Think upon the fate Of those who needs must pass the tea and things-Who may not say, 'Good-by,' as you shall Who have to serve, and, likewise, stand

Backed up against a shelf whereon reposed
His works (with leaves uncut, I sadly fear),
Stood Wordsworth. Intermittently he dozed,
The solitary bard of Windermere;
Then, waking from a pleasant forty winks,
He drew about his shape its cloak of gray,
And, borrowing a sonnet-form, methinks
Employed by Shelley, thus he said his say:

and wait!"

п

SOME FOLKS ARE TOO MUCH WITH US

Some folks are too much with us-much too much.

"Yes," sighed the lady with the gems galore, "One's life in Europe puts one out of touch With matters here; but then, this dreadful war

Just fairly drove us back. And we had such A weary hunt to find a house before We took that spacious, fine old Tudor place, Or mansion, rather. Then the coal, you know!

We burn twelve tons a week in any case;
But no one would deliver it, and so
We had to send the touring-cars, with Brace,
Our second-man, the five chauffeurs, and Fred,
To load and fetch it home and store it!" "Oh,
I'm glad you are so rich!" said I, and fled.

1 a lake in Westmoreland, England

The ablest critics working at the trade,
As poets know, are often much mistaken;
So was it Shakespeare's self that next essayed
The lofty strain—or was it only Bacon?

TTT

SONNET XXX

When to these sessions, more of speech than thought,

By custom urged, reluctantly I come,
I know that I converse not as I ought
In courtesy. Yet, better far be dumb Than prate like these, "Yes, Youth will have its fling!"

Or, "Isn't it a small world, after all?" Or, haply, "Money isn't everything."

The sugar in my cup is turned to gall
When one declares, "I never bear a grudge,"
Or lauds his "sense of humor," save the mark!

Or proses how, "It isn't right to judge
By mere appearances." But hark! oh, hark!
What cultured wight is yon that says, "My friend,

All Art is but a Means to reach an End!"

"One lump, or two?" the hostess breathed again;

Light laughter rippled up and down the scale; The tea-urn bubbled musically, when The shade of Shelley told its wondrous tale:

īν

GARGANTUA OF GOTHAM

I met a traveler from an antique land, Who said: "The finest pilaf <sup>2</sup> ever known I ate in Cairo at the Hotel Grand;

The chef is excellent, though overprone To use of garlic. But the ablest hand For flavoring a goulash 3 to a dot,

Is Samovarovitch of Budapest.

Then, if you're fond of ices (I am not; Those fancy dishes don't appeal to me), Remember, you will always get the best

At Andrea's in Rome. But, with your tea Or coffee, in the Kilmenoff Café

In Petrograd, they serve you pirozhkí <sup>4</sup>
That melt upon the tongue and die away!"

As gabbling tongues the deafened ear assailed With vapid eloquence in every key,
The gentle Keats inordinately railed—
Intoxicated on a cup of tea:

&lt;sup>2</sup> a dish of rice cooked with meat, dried fruits, or spices,

much relished by Mohammedans a stew of meat and vegetables highly seasoned small pies filled with meat or vegetables

ON FIRST LOOKING IN ON A TEA RIOT

Much having travailed over weighty schemes,
To lighter chat I lend a ready ear;
Yet, even so, I would not choose to hear
Soft adolescents tell their silly dreams,
Nor would I give a brace of chocolate creams
To learn "what Willie said, the little dear!"
While operations, more or less severe,
Are palpably unpardonable themes.
I do not care about your family ties,
And "Fashion" is a word I fain would ban.
Oh, ye that chatter on, while Chronos flies,
Of babies, dress and servants, futile clan,

Recovering a square of buttered toast From off the rug where, right side down, it fell.

Silence!-I'd rather speak with Mary Ann!

I stare upon ye all in pained surprise.

In kindly words the ever-gracious ghost
Of Mrs. Browning sighed a sad farewell:

VI

SONNET FROM THE PORTUGUESE

I lift my brimming teacup solemnly
As once Electra her sepulchral urn,
For I do fear that it would overturn
If I should set it sudden on my knee
As skilful jugglers do. I like your tea;
It has a pleasant hint of wildwood fern;
Where do you get it? And I fain would learn
Just how you brown your toast so daintily.
A food on which a fairy might be fed,
Your angel-cake is soft and light as snow.

These cookies are delicious! Have you read
The "Bacchae" of Euripides? I know
You have! But, mercy! how the day has fled!
A lovely time! but I must really go!

STRICTLY GERM-PROOF 1

The Antiseptic Baby and the Prophylactic Pup Were playing in the garden when the Bunny gamboled up;

They looked upon the Creature with a loathing undisguised;—

It wasn't Disinfected and it wasn't Sterilized.

They said it was a Microbe and a Hotbed of Disease;

They steamed it in a vapor of a thousand-odd degrees;

<sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of Messrs. Harper and Brothers, publishers. They froze it in a freezer that was cold as Banished Hope

And washed it in permanganate with carbolated soap:

In sulphureted hydrogen they steeped its wiggly

They trimmed its frisky whiskers with a pair of hard-boiled shears:

They donned their rubber mitten and they took it by the hand

And 'lected it a member of the Fumigated Band.

There's not a Micrococcus in the garden where they play:

They bathe in pure iodoform a dozen times a

And each imbibes his rations from a Hygienic

The Bunny and the Baby and the Prophylactic Pup.

1915

ELINOR WYLIE 1885-1928

Elinor Wylie was born in New Jersey of a family who had long been residents of Pennsylvania. She was educated at schools in Pennsylvania and in Washington, D.C., and afterwards spent several years in Europe. In 1923 she married William Rose Benét. Mrs. Wylie's novels include Jennifer Lorn, 1923; The Venetian Glass Nephew, 1925; and The Orphan Angel, 1927, which deals with Shelley, whom she idealized. Her books of poems were chiefly Nets to Catch the Wind, 1921; Black Armour, 1923; and Trivial Breath, 1928. Her distinction lies in her condensation and restraint; her poetry seems to be the crystallized product of quiet yet intense thought resulting from a complex personality. Her typical work is extremely figurative, a pattern of simple, sharply-cut images forming a highly-colored, symbolic picture.

Criticism: H. S. Gorman, "Daughter of Donne," No. Am. 219:679-86; E. S. Sergeant, "Elinor Wylie," New Repub. 49:36-9; "Black Armour," Sat. R. Lit. 5, Dec. 29, '28; Harriet Monroe, Poetry 33:266-72; Rebecca West, Bookm. 69:55-6; W. R. Benét, Commonweal 9:432; C. Van Doren, Bookm.

68:609-11.

ATAVISM<sup>2</sup>

I always was afraid of Somes's Pond:
Not the little pond, by which the willow stands,
Where laughing boys catch alewives in their hands

In brown, bright shallows; but the one beyond.

<sup>2</sup> Reprinted from Nets to Catch the Wind by Elinor Wylie, by and with permission of and special arrangement with Alfred A. Knopf, Inc., authorized publishers; and by permission of Poetry; a Magazine of Verse, Chicago. 10

20

There, where the frost makes all the birches

Yellow as cow-lilies, and the pale sky shines Like a polished shell between black spruce and pines.

Some strange thing tracks us, turning where we

You'll say I dream it, being the true daughter Of those who in old times endured this dread. Look! Where the lily-stems are showing red A silent paddle moves below the water. A sliding shape has stirred them like a breath;

A sliding shape has stirred them like a breath; Tall plumes surmount a painted mask of Death.

CASTILIAN 1

Velasquez took a pliant knife And scraped his palette clean; He said, "I lead a dog's own life Painting a king and queen."

He cleaned his palette with oily rags And oakum from Seville wharves; "I am sick of painting painted hags And bad ambiguous dwarves.

"The sky is silver, the clouds are pearl, Their locks are looped with rain. I will not paint Maria's girl For all the money in Spain."

He washed his face in water cold, His hands in turpentine; He squeezed out color like coins of gold And color like drops of wine.

Each color lay like a little pool On the polished cedar wood; Clear and pale and ivory-cool Or dark as solitude.

He burnt the rags in the fireplace And leaned from the window high; He said, "I like that gentleman's face Who wears his cap awry."

This is the gentleman, there he stands, Castilian, sombre-caped, With arrogant eyes, and narrow hands Miraculously shaped.

DU BOSE HEYWARD 1885-

Mr. Heyward, lecturer and writer, comes of English and French Huguenot stock; he was born in <sup>1</sup> From Black Armour by Elinor Wylie. Copyright, 1923, by George H. Doran Company, and reprinted by special permission of the publishers, Doubleday, Doran and Company. Charleston, South Carolina, where he now lives. His first publication was Carolina Chansons, 1922, in which he collaborated with Hervey Allen. In 1924 appeared Skylines and Horizons, a book of verse; and in 1925 a novel, Porgy, a study of contemporary Negro life, which has been successfully dramatized. In his poems Mr. Heyward reflects the South of today somewhat as Frost represents the New England of today. His virile treatment of tragic themes growing out of local social conditions is particularly noticeable.

Biography: H. Allen, Du Bose Heyward. For selections from Porgy, see Bookm. 61:629-35; 62:165-71.

THE MOUNTAIN WOMAN 2

Among the sullen peaks she stood at bay And paid life's hard account from her small store.

Knowing the code of mountain wives, she bore The burden of the days without a sigh; And, sharp against the somber winter sky, I saw her drive her steers afield each day.

Hers was the hand that sunk the furrows deep Across the rocky, grudging southern slope. At first youth left her face, and later, hope; Yet through each mocking spring and barren fall

She reared her lusty brood, and gave them all That gladder wives and mothers love to keep.

And when the sheriff shot her eldest son Beside his still, so well she knew her part, She gave no healing tears to ease her heart; But took the blow upstanding, with her eyes As drear and bitter as the winter skies. Seeing her then, I thought that she had won.

But yesterday her man returned too soon
And found her tending, with a reverent touch,
One scarlet bloom; and having drunk too much,
He snatched its flame and quenched it in the dirt.

Then, like a creature with a mortal hurt, She fell, and wept away the afternoon.

1924

DUSK IN THE LOW COUNTRY 3

A league of broomgrass, rose, and mauve, and umber,

Gashed by a road into the setting sun; Three heavy laden carts that groan and lumber Toward the woods, then vanish one by one.

<sup>2</sup> From Skylines and Horizons by Du Bose Heyward, by permission of The Macmillan Company, publishers. <sup>3</sup> Copyright. By permission of The Bookman, New York.

A line of scarlet, and a blur of madder Behind the trees. The resting earth exhales Warm, humid dusk; and infinitely sadder Than death or birth, a lone marsh creature wails.

Land of wide beauty, and eternal waiting, You have made loveliness a thing to seek. <sup>10</sup> How small our loving seems, how little hating, How less than breath the scattered words we speak.

Here where the aeons pass, and seasons flutter Like sun and shade across your ample breast, Your silence thunders down the songs I utter, Who come to be your singer, and your guest.

PRODIGAL 1

Some day, when the stern seeker in my brain Has ceased to drive me stumbling through the dark.

Dropping dead cinders for each faint new spark, Only to see the new one wax and wane; When all my dreams are numbered with the slain:

And wisdom, that egregious patriarch, Has told his last half truth, and left me stark; I shall go home, I shall go home again.

Laughter will greet me, waiting in the hall; And friendships will come trooping down the stairs.

Sweet as old rose leaves wrinkled in a jar. Battles and loves will move me not at all. There will be juleps, billiards, family prayers, And a clean passport for another star.

1925

THE HALF PINT FLASK 2

I picked up the book and regarded it with interest. Even its format suggested the author: the practical linen covered boards, the compact exact paragraphing. I opened the volume at random. There he was again: "There can be no doubt," "An undeniable fact," "I am prepared to assert." A statement in the preface leaped from the context and arrested my gaze:

"The primitive American Negro is of a deeply religious nature, demonstrating in his constant attendance at church, his fervent prayers, his hymns, and his frequent mention of the Deity that he has cast aside the last vestiges of his pagan background, and has unreservedly espoused the doctrine of Christianity."

I spun the pages through my fingers until a paragraph in the last chapter brought me up standing:

"I was hampered in my investigation by a sickness contracted on the island that was accompanied by a distressing insomnia, and in its final stages, extreme delirium. But I already had sufficient evidence in hand to enable me to prove—"

Yes, there it was, fact upon fact. I was overwhelmed by the permanence, the unanswerable last word of the printed page. In the face of it my own impressions became fantastic, discredited even in my own mind. In an effort at self justification I commenced to rehearse my impressions of that preposterous month as opposed to Barksdale's facts; my feeling for effects and highly-developed fiction-writer's imagination on the one hand; and on the other, his cold record of a tight, three dimensional world as reported by his five good senses.

Sitting like a crystal gazer, with the book in my hand, I sent my memory back to a late afternoon in August, when, watching from the shore near the landing on Ediwander Island, I saw the "General Stonewall Jackson" slide past a frieze of palmetto trees, shut off her steam, and nose up to the tenuous little wharf against the ebb.

Two barefooted Negroes removed a section of the rail and prepared to run out the gang plank. Behind them gathered the passengers for Ediwander landing: ten or a dozen Negroes back from town with the proceeds of a month's labor transformed into flaming calico, amazing bonnets, and new, flimsy, yellow luggage; and trailing along behind them, the single white passenger.

I would have recognized my guest under more difficult circumstances and I experienced that inner satisfaction that comes from having a new acquaintance fit neatly into a preconceived pattern. The obstinacy of which I had been warned was evident in the thin immobile line of the mouth over the prognathous jaw. The eyes behind his thick glasses were a bright hard blue and moved methodically from object to object, allowing each its allotted time for classification then passing unhurriedly on to the next. He was so like the tabloid portrait in the letter of the club member who had sent him down that I drew the paper from my pocket and refreshed my memory with a surreptitious glance.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Copyright. By permission of The Bookman, New York.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Copyright. By kind permission of the author and The Bookman.

"He's the museum, or collector type," Spencer had written: "spends his time collecting facts—some he sells—some he keeps to play with. Incidentally his hobby is American glass, and he has the finest private collection in the state"

We stood eveing each other over the heads of the noisy landing party without enthusiasm. Then when the last Negro had come ashore he picked up his bag with a meticulousness that vaguely exasperated me, and advanced up the gangplank.

Perfunctory introductions followed: "Mr. Courtney?" from him, with an unnecessarily rising inflection: and a conventional "Mr. Barksdale, I presume," from me in reply.

The buckboard had been jogging along for several minutes before he spoke.

"Very good of Mr. Spencer to give me this opportunity," he said in a close clipped speech. "I am doing a series of articles on Negroid Primates, and I fancy the chances for observation are excellent here."

"Negroid Primates!" The phrase annoyed me. Uttered in that dissecting voice, it seemed to strip the human from the hundred or more Negroes who were my only company except during the duck season when the club members dropped down for the shooting.

"There are lots of Negroes here," I told him a little stiffly. "Their ancestors were slaves when the island was the largest rice plantation in South Carolina, and isolation from modern life has kept them primitive enough, I guess."

"Good!" he exclaimed. "I will commence my studies at once. Simple souls, I fancy. I should have my data within a month."

We had been traveling slowly through deep sand ruts that tugged at the wheels like an undertow. On either side towered serried ranks of virgin long-leaf pine. Now we topped a gentle rise. Before us was the last outpost of the forest crowning a diminishing ridge. The straight columned trees were bars against a released splendor of sunset sky and sea.

Impulsively I called his attention to it: "Rather splendid, don't you think?"

He raised his face, and I was immediately cognizant of the keen methodical scrutiny that passed from trees to sea, and from sea back to that last wooded ridge that fell away into the tumble of dunes.

Suddenly I felt his wire-tight grasp about my

"What's that?" he asked, pointing with his free hand. Then with an air of authority, he snapped: "Stop the cart. I've got to have a look at it."

"That won't interest you. It's only a Negro burying ground. I'll take you to the quarters tomorrow, where you can study your 'live primates.' "

But he was over the wheel with surprising alacrity and striding up the slight ascent to the scattered mounds beneath the pines.

The sunset was going quickly, dragging its color from the sky and sea, rolling up leagues of delicately tinted gauze into tight little bales of primary color, then draping these with dark covers for the night. In sharp contrast against the light the burying ground presented its pitiful emblems of the departed. Under the pine needles, in common with all Negro graveyards of the region, the mounds were covered with a strange litter of half emptied medicine bottles, tin spoons, and other futile weapons that had failed in the final engagement with the last dark enemy.

Barksdale was puttering excitedly about among the graves, peering at the strange assortment of crockery and glass. The sight reminded me of what Spencer had said of the man's hobby and a chill foreboding assailed me. I jumped from the buckboard.

"Here," I called, "I wouldn't disturb those things if I were vou."

But my words went unheeded. When I reached Barksdale's side, he was holding a small flat bottle, half filled with a sticky black fluid, and was rubbing the earth from it with his coat sleeve. The man was electric with excitement. He held the flask close to his glasses, then spun around upon me.

"Do you know what this is?" he demanded. then rushed on triumphantly with his answer: "It's a first issue, half pint flask of the old South Carolina state dispensary. It gives me the only complete set in existence. Not another one in America. I had hoped that I might get on the trail of one down here. But to fall upon it like this!"

The hand that held the flask was shaking so violently that the little palmetto tree and single X that marked it described small agitated circles. He drew out his handkerchief and wrapped it up tenderly, black contents and all.

"Come," he announced, "we'll go now."

"Not so fast," I cautioned him. "You can't carry that away. It simply isn't done down here. We may have moral lapses but there are certain things that-well-can't be thought of. The graveyard is one. We let it alone."

He placed the little linen covered package tenderly in his inside pocket and buttoned his coat with an air of finality; then he faced me truculently

"I have been searching for this flask for ten years," he asserted. "If you can find the proper person to whom payment should be made I will give a good price. In the meantime I intend to keep it. It is certainly of no use to anyone, and I shan't hesitate for a silly superstition."

I could not thrash him for it and I saw that nothing short of physical violence would remove it from his person. For a second I was tempted to argue with him; tell him why he should not take the thing. Then I was frustrated by my own lack of a reason. I groped with my instinctive knowledge that it was not to be done, trying to embody the abstract into something sufficiently concrete to impress him. And all the while I felt his gaze upon me, hard, very blue, a little mocking, absolutely determined.

Behind the low crest of the ridge sounded a single burst of laughter, and the ring of a trace chain. A strange panic seized me. Taking him by the arm I rushed him across the short distance to the buckboard and into his seat; then leaped across him and took up the lines.

Night was upon us, crowding forward from the recesses of the forest, pushing out beyond us through the last scattered trees, flowing over the sea and lifting like level smoke into the void of sky. The horse started forward, wrenching the wheels from the clutching sand.

Before us, coming suddenly up in the dusk, a party of field Negroes filled the road. A second burst of laughter sounded, warm now, volatile and disarming. It made me ashamed of my panic. The party passed the vehicle, dividing and flowing by on both sides of the road. The last vestiges of day brought out high lights on their long earth-polished hoes. Teeth were a white accent here and there. Only eyes, and fallen sockets under the brows of the very old, seemed to defy the fading glimmer, bringing the night in them from the woods. Laughter and soft Gullah words <sup>1</sup> were warm in the air about us.

"Howdy Boss."
"Ebenin' Boss."

The women curtised in their high tucked-up skirts; the men touched hat brims. Several mules followed, grotesque and incredible in the thickening dark, their trace chains dangling and chiming faintly.

The party topped the rise, then dropped behind it.

Silence, immediate and profound, as though a curtain had been run down upon the wheels of the last.

"A simple folk," clipped out my companion. "I rather envy them starting out at zero, as it were, with everything to learn from our amazing civilization."

"Zero, hell!" I flung out. "They had created a Congo art before our ancestors drugged and robbed their first Indian."

Barksdale consigned me to limbo with his mocking, intolerable smile.

The first few days at the club were spent by my guest in going through the preliminary routine of the systematic writer. Books were unpacked and arranged in the order of study, looseleaf folders were laid out, and notes made for the background of his thesis. He was working at a table in his bedroom which adjoined my own, and as I also used my sleeping apartment as a study for the fabrication of the fiction which, with my salary as manager of the club, discharged my financial obligations, I could not help seeing something of him.

On the morning of the second day I glanced in as I passed his door, and surprised him gloating over his find. It was placed on the table before him, and he was gazing fixedly at it. Unfortunately, he looked up; our glances met and, with a self-consciousness that smote us simultaneously, remained locked. Each felt that the subject had better remain closed—yet there the flask stood evident and unavoidable.

After a strained space of time I managed to step into the room, pick up a book and say casually:

"I am rather interested in Negroes myself. Do you mind if I see what you have here?"

While I examined the volume he passed behind me and put the flask away, then came and looked at the book with me. "African Religions and Superstitions," he said, reading the title aloud; then supplemented:

"An interesting mythology for the American Negro, little more. The African Gullah Negro, from whom these are descended, believed in a God you know, but he only created, then turned his people adrift to be preyed upon by malign spirits conjured up by their enemies. Really a religion, or rather a superstition, of senseless terror."

"I am not so sure of the complete obsoleteness of the old rites and superstitions," I told him, feeling as I proceeded that I was engaged in a useless mission. "I know these Negroes pretty well. For them, Plat-eye, for instance, is a very actual presence. If you will notice the cook you will see that she seems to get along without a prayer book, but when she goes home after dark she sticks a sulphur match in her hair. Sulphur is a charm against Plat-eye."

&lt;sup>1</sup> the dialect of the sea-island negroes of South Carolina and Georgia, descendants of "Gullah" slaves of unknown African origin

"Tell me," he asked with a bantering light in his hard eyes, "just what is Plat-eye?"

I felt that I was being laughed at and floundered ahead at the subject, anxious to be out of it as soon as possible.

"Plat-eye is a spirit which takes some form which will be particularly apt to lure its victims away. It is said to lead them into danger or lose them in the woods and, stealing their wits away, leave them to die alone."

He emitted a short acid laugh.

"What amusing rot. And I almost fancy you believe it."

"Of course I don't," I retorted but I experienced the feeling that my voice was over-emphatic and failed to convince.

"Well, well," he said, "I am not doing folk lore but religion. So that is out of my province. But it is amusing and I'll make a note of it. Plat-eye, did you say?"

The next day was Thursday. I remember that distinctly because, although nearly a week's wages were due, the last servant failed to arrive for work in the morning. The club employed three of them: two women and a man. Even in the off season this was a justifiable expense, for a servant could be hired on Ediwander for four dollars a week. When I went to order breakfast the kitchen was closed, and the stove cold.

After a makeshift meal I went out to find the yard boy. There were only a few Negroes in the village and these were women hoeing in the small garden patches before the cabins. There were the usual swarms of lean mongrel hounds, and a big sow lay nourishing her young in the warm dust of the road. The women looked up as I passed. Their soft voices, as they raised their heads one after another to say "Mornin' Boss," seemed like emanations from the very soil, so much a part of the earth did they appear.

But the curs were truculent that morning: strange, canny, candid little mongrels. If you want to know how you stand with a Negro, don't ask him—pat his dog.

I found Thomas, the hired boy, sitting before his cabin watching a buzzard carve half circles in the blue.

"When are you coming to work?" I demanded. "The day's half done."

"I gots de toot' ache. Boss. I can't git ober 'fore termorrer." The boy knew that I did not believe him. He also knew that I would not take issue with him on the point. No Negro on the island will say "no" to a white man. Call it "good form" if you will, but what Thomas had said to me was merely the code for "I'm through." I did not expect him and I was not disappointed.

Noon of the following day I took the buckboard, crossed the ferry to the mainland, and returned at dark with a cheerful, wholesome Negress, loaned me by a plantation owner, who answered for her faithfulness and promised that she would cook for us during the emergency. She got us a capital supper, retired to the room adjoining the kitchen that I had prepared for her, as I did not wish her to meet the Negroes in the village, and in the morning had vanished utterly. She must have left immediately after supper, for the bed was undisturbed.

I walked straight from her empty room to Barksdale's sanctum, entered, crossed to the closet where he had put the flask, and threw the door wide. The space was empty. I spun around and met his amused gaze.

"Thought I had better put it away carefully.

It is too valuable to leave about."

Our glances crossed like the slide of steel on steel. Then suddenly my impotence to master the situation arose and overwhelmed me. I did not admit it even to myself, but that moment saw what amounted to my complete surrender.

We entered upon the haphazard existence inevitable with two preoccupied men unused to caring for their own comfort; impossible makeshift meals, got when we were hungry; beds made when we were ready to get into them; with me, hours put into work that had to be torn up and started over the next day; with Barksdale, regular tours of investigation about the island and two thousand words a day, no more, no less, written out in longhand, and methodically filed. We naturally saw less and less of each other—a fact which was evidently mutually agreeable.

It was therefore a surprise to me one night in the second week to leap from sleep into a condition of lucid consciousness and find myself staring at Barksdale who had opened the door between our rooms. There he stood like a bird of ill omen, tall and slightly stooping, with his ridiculous nightshirt and thin slightly bowed shanks.

"I'll leave this open if you don't mind," he said with a new note of apology in his voice. "Haven't been sleeping very well for a week or so, and thought the draft through the house might cool the air."

Immediately I knew that there was something behind the apparently casual action of the man. He was the type who could lie through conviction; adopt some expedient point of view, convince himself that it was the truth, then assert it as a fact; but he was not an instinctive liar, and that new apologetic note gave him away. For a while after he went back to bed, I lay wondering what was behind his request.

Then for the first time I felt it; but hemmed in by the appalling limitations of human speech, how am I to make the experience plain to others!

Once I was standing behind the organ of a great cathedral when a bass chord was pressed upon the keys; suddenly the air about me was all sound and movement. The demonstration that night was like this a little, except that the place of the sound was taken by an almost audible silence, and the vibrations were so violent as to seem almost a friction against the nerve terminals. The wave of movement lasted for several minutes, then it abated slowly. But this was the strange thing about it: the agitation was not dissipated into the air; rather it seemed to settle slowly, heavily, about my body, and to move upon my skin like the multitudinous crawling of invisible and indescribably loathsome vermin.

I got up and struck a light. The familiar disorder of the room sprang into high relief, reassuring me, telling me coolly not to be a fool. I took the lamp into Barksdale's room. There he lay, his eyes wide and fixed, braced in his bed with every muscle tense. He gave me the impression of wrenching himself out of invisible bonds as he turned and sat up on the edge of his bed.

"Just about to get up and work," he said in a voice that he could not manage to make casual. "Been suffering from insomnia for a week, and it's beginning to get on my nerves."

The strange sensation had passed from my body but the thought of sleep was intolerable. We went to our desks leaving the door ajar, and wrote away the four hours that remained until daylight.

And now a question arises of which due cognizance must be taken even though it may weaken my testimony. Is a man quite sane who has been without sleep for ten days and nights? Is he a competent witness? I do not know. And yet the phenomena that followed my first startled awakening entered into me and became part of my life experience. I live them over shudderingly when my resistance is low and memory has its way with me. I know that they transpired with that instinctive certainty which lies back of human knowledge and is immune from the skepticism of the cynic.

After the first night the house was filled with the vibrations. I closed the door to Barksdale's room, hoping a superstitious hope that I would be immune. After an hour I opened it again, glad for even his companionship. Only while I was wide awake and driving my brain to its capacity did the agitation cease. At the first drowsiness it would commence faintly, then swell up and up, fighting sleep back from the tortured brain, working under leaden eyelids upon the tired eyes.

Ten days and nights of it! Terrible for me: devastating for Barksdale. It wasted him like a jungle fever.

Once when I went near him and his head had dropped forward on his desk in the vain hope of relief, I made a discovery. He was the center. The moment I bent over him my nerve terminals seemed to become living antennae held out to a force that frayed and wasted them away. In my own room it was better. I went there and sat where I could still see him for what small solace there was in that.

I entreated him to go away, but with his insane obstinacy he would not hear of it. Then I thought of leaving him, confessing myself a coward—bolting for it. But again, something deeper than logic, some obscure tribal loyalty, held me bound. Two members of the same race; and out there the palmetto jungle, the village with its fires bronze against the midnight trees, the malign, beleaguering presence. No, it could not be done.

But I did slip over to the mainland and arrange to send a wire to Spencer telling him to come and get Barksdale, that the man was ill.

During that interminable ten days and nights the fundamental difference between Barksdale and myself became increasingly evident. He would go to great pains to explain the natural causes of our malady.

"Simple enough," he would say, while his bloodshot eyes, fixed on me, shouted the lie to his words. "One of those damn swamp fevers. Livingstone complained of them you will remember, and so did Stanley. Here in this subtropical belt we are evidently subject to the plague. Doubtless there is a serum. I should have inquired before coming down."

To this I said nothing, but I confess now, at risk of being branded a coward, that I had become a victim of a superstitious terror. Frequently when Barksdale was out I searched for the flask without finding the least trace of it. Finally I capitulated utterly and took to carrying a piece of sulphur next to my skin. Nothing availed.

The strange commotion in the atmosphere became more and more persistent. It crowded over from the nights into the days. It came at noon; any time that drowsiness fell upon our exhausted bodies it was there, waging a battle with it behind the closed lids. Only with the muscles tense and the eyes wide could one inhabit a static world. After the first ten days I lost count of time. There was a nightmare quality to its unbreakable continuity.

I remember only the night when I saw her in Barksdale's doorway, and I think that it must have been in the third week. There was a full moon. I remember, and there had been unusual excitement in the village. I have always had a passion for moonlight and I stood long on the piazza watching the great disc change from its horizon copper to gold, then cool to silver as it swung up into the immeasurable tranquillity of the southern night. At first I thought that the Negroes must be having a dance, for I could hear the syncopation of sticks on a cabin floor, and the palmettos and mossdraped live oaks that grew about the buildings could be seen the full quarter of a mile away, a ruddy bronze against the sky from a brush fire. But the longer I waited listening the less sure I became about the nature of the celebration. The rhythm became strange, complicated; and the chanting that rose and fell with the drumming rang with a new, compelling quality, and lacked entirely the abandon of dancers.

Finally I went to my room, stretched myself fully dressed on the bed, and almost achieved oblivion. Then suddenly I was up again, my fists clenched, my body taught. The agitation exceeded anything that I had before experienced. Before me, across Barksdale's room, were wide open double doors letting on the piazza. They molded the moonlight into a square shaft that plunged through the darkness of the room, cold, white, and strangely substantial among the half obliterated familiar objects. I had the feeling that it could be touched. That hands could be slid along its bright surface. It possessed itself of the place. It was the one reality in a swimming nebulous cube. Then it commenced to tremble with the vibrations of the apartment.

And now the incredible thing happened. Incredible because belief arises in each of us out of the corroboration of our own life experience; and I have met no other white man who has beheld Plat-eye. I have no word, no symbol which can awaken recognition. But who has not seen heat shaking upward from hot asphalt, shaking upward until the things beyond it wavered and quaked? That is the nearest approach in the material world. Only the thing that I witnessed was colored a cold blue, and it was heavy with the perfume of crushed jasmine flowers.

I stood, muscle locked to muscle by terror.

The center of the shaft darkened; the air bore upon me as though some external force exerted a tremendous pressure in an effort to render an abstraction concrete: to mold moving unstable elements into something that could be seen—touched.

Suddenly it was done—accomplished. I looked—I saw her.

The shock released me, and I got a flare from several matches struck at once. Yellow light bloomed on familiar objects. I got the fire to a lamp wick, then looked again.

The shaft of moonlight was gone. The open doors showed only a deep blue vacant square. Beyond them something moved. The lamp light steadied, grew. It warmed the room like fire. It spread over the furniture, making it real again. It fell across Barksdale's bed, dragging my gaze with it. The bed was empty.

I got to the piazza just as he disappeared under a wide armed live oak. The Spanish moss fell behind him like a curtain. The place was a hundred yards away. When I reached it, all trace of him had vanished.

I went back to the house, built a rousing fire, lit all the lamps, and stretched myself in a deep chair to wait until morning.

Then! an automobile horn on Ediwander Island. Imagine that! I could not place it at first. It crashed through my sleep like the trump of judgment. It called me up from the abysses into which I had fallen. It infuriated me. It reduced me to tears. Finally it tore me from unutterable bliss, and held me blinking in the high noon, with my silly lamps still burning palely about me.

"You're a hell of a fellow," called Spencer.
"Think I've got nothing to do but come to this jungle in summer to nurse you and Barksdale."

He got out of a big muddy machine and strode forward laughing. "Oh, well," he said, "I won't row with you. It gave me a chance to try out the new bus. That's why I'm late. Thought I'd motor down. Had a hell of a time getting over the old ferry; but it was worth it to see the negroes when I started upon Ediwander. Some took to trees—one even jumped overboard."

He ended on a hearty burst of laughter. Then he looked at me and broke off short. I remember how his face looked then, close to mine, white and frightened.

"My God, man!" he exclaimed, "what's wrong? You aren't going to die on me, are you?"

"Not today," I told him. "We've got to find Barksdale first."

We could not get a Negro to help us. They greeted Spencer, who had always been popular with them, warmly. They laughed their deep laughter—were just as they had always been with him. Mingo, his old paddler, promised to meet us in half an hour with a gang. They never showed up; and later, when we went to the village to find them, there was not a human being on the premises. Only a pack of curs there that followed us as closely as they dared and hung just out of boot reach, snapping at our heels.

We had to go it alone: a stretch of jungle five miles square, a large part of it accessible only with bush hooks and machetes. We dared not take the time to go to the mainland and gather a party of whites. Barksdale had been gone over twelve hours when we started and he would not last long in his emaciated condition.

The chances were desperately against us. Spencer, though physically a giant, was soft from office life. I was hanging on to consciousness only by a tremendous and deliberate effort. We took food with us, which we ate on our feet during breathing spells, and we fell in our tracks for rest when we could go no farther.

At night, when we were eating under the high, white moon, he told me more of the man for whom we were searching.

"I ought to have written you more fully at the start. You'd have been more sorry for him then, not angry with him. He does not suggest Lothario now, but he was desperately in love once.

"She was the most fantastically imaginative creature, quick as light, and she played in circles around him. He was never dull in those days. Rather handsome, in the lean Gibson manner; but he was always—well—matter-offact. She had all there was of him the first day, and it was hers to do as she pleased with. Then one morning she saw quite plainly that he would bore her. She had to have someone who could play. Barksdale could have died for her, but he could not play. Like that," and Spencer gave a snap of his fingers, "she jugged him. It was at a house party. I was there and saw it. She was the sort of surgeon who believes in amputation and she gave it to Barksdale there without an anaesthetic and with the crowd looking on

"He changed after that. Wouldn't have anything he couldn't see, feel, smell. He had been wounded by something elusive, intangible. He was still scarred; and he hid behind the defences of his five good senses. When I met him five years later he had gone in for facts and glass."

He stopped speaking for a moment. The August dark crowded closer, pressing its low, insistent nocturne against our ears. Then he resumed in a musing voice: "Strange the obsession that an imaginative woman can exercise over an unimaginative man. It is the sort of thing that can follow a chap to the grave. Celia's living in Europe now, married—children—but I believe that if she called him today he'd go. She was very beautiful, you know."

"Yes," I replied, "I know. Very tall, blonde, with hair fluffed and shining about her head like a madonna's halo. Odd way of standing, too, with head turned to one side so that she might look at one over her shoulder. Jasmine perfume, heavy, almost druggy."

Spencer was startled: "You've seen her!"
"Yes, here. She came for Barksdale last night. I saw her as plainly as I see you."

"But she's abroad. I tell you."

I turned to Spencer with a sudden resolve: "You've heard the Negroes here talk of Plateye?"

He nodded.

"Well, I've got to tell you something whether you believe it or not. Barksdale got in wrong down here. He stole a flask from the grave-yard. There's been hell turned loose ever since: fires and singing every night in the village and a lot more. I am sure now what it all meant—conjuring, and Plat-eye, of course, to lead Barksdale away and do him in, at the same time emptying the house so that it could be searched for the flask."

"But Celia; how could they know about her?"

"They didn't. But Barksdale knew. They had only to break him down and let his old obsession call her up. I probably saw her on the reflex from him, but I'll swear she was there."

Spencer was leaning toward me, the moon shining full upon his face. I could see that he believed.

"Thank God you see it," I breathed. "Now you see why we've got to find him soon."

In the hour just before dawn we emerged from the forest at the far side of the island. The moon was low and reached long fingers of pale light through the trees. The east was a swinging nebula of half light and vapor. A flight of immense blue heron broke suddenly into the air before us, hurling the mist back into our faces from their beating wings. Spencer, who was ahead of me, gave a cry and darted forward, disappearing behind a palmetto thicket

I grasped my machete and followed.

Our quest was ended. Barksdale lay face downward in the marsh with his head toward the east. His hands flung out before him were already awash in the rising tide.

We dragged him to high ground. He was breathing faintly in spasmodic gasps, and his pulse was a tiny thread of movement under our finger tips. Two saplings and our coats gave us a makeshift litter, and three hours of stumbling, agonizing labor brought us with our burden to the forest's edge.

I waited with him there, while Spencer went for his car and some wraps.

When he returned his face was a study.

"Had a devil of a time finding blankets," he told me, as we bundled Barksdale up for the race to town. "House looks as though a tornado had passed through it; everything out on the piazza, and in the front yard."

With what strength I had left I turned toward home. Behind me lay the forest, dark even in the summer noon; before me, the farthest hill, the sparse pines, and tumble of mounds in the gravevard.

I entered the clearing and looked at the mound from which Barksdale had taken the flask. There it was again. While it had been gone the cavity had filled with water; now this had flooded out when the bottle had been replaced and still glistened gray on the sand, black on the pine needles.

I regained the road and headed for the club. Up from the fields came the hands, dinner bound; fifteen or twenty of them; the women taking the direct sun indifferently on their bare heads. Bright field hoes gleamed on shoulders. The hot noon stirred to deep laughter, soft Gullah accents:

"Mornin' Boss-howdy Boss."

They divided and flowed past me, women curtseying, men touching hat brims. On they went: topped the ridge: dropped from view.

Silence, immediate and profound.

1927

KEY TO REFERENCES AND ABBREVIATIONS USED IN THE HEADNOTES THROUGHOUT THE TEXT OF THE VOLUME

| Am. Mercury          | American Mercury, New York                 | A  |
|----------------------|--|----|
| And. Rev.            | Andover Review, Boston                     |    |
| Atlan.               | Atlantic Monthly, Boston                   | A  |
| Blackw.              | Blackwood's Magazine, Edinburgh            |    |
| Bookm.               | Bookman, New York                          | I  |
| Canad. M.            | Canadian Magazine, Toronto                 | (  |
| Cath. World          | Catholic World, New York                   |    |
| Cent.                | Century, New York                          | ŀ  |
| Commonweal           | Commonweal, New York                       | Ē  |
| Contemp.             | Contemporary Review, London                | 1  |
| Craftsman            | Craftsman, New York                        |    |
| Critic               | Critic, New York                           | F  |
| Cur. Lit.            | Current Literature, New York               |    |
|                      | Current Opinion, New York                  | (  |
| Cur. Opinion         | Dial, New York                             | _  |
| DialFaranchada'a | Everybody's Magazine, New York             | ŀ  |
| Everybody's          | Fortnightly Review, London                 |    |
| Fortn.               | Forum, New York                            | F  |
| Forum                | Harper's Magazine, New York                |    |
| Harper               | Independent, New York                      | 1  |
| Ind.                 | Literary Digest, New York                  |    |
| Lit. Digest          | Literary Review New York Eve-              | 7. |
| Lit. Rev.            | Literary Review Ivew 10th Ede-             | ľ  |
| 7. 4                 | ning Post, New York                        | S  |
| Liv. Age             | Living Age, Boston                         |    |
| Nation               | Nation, New York                           | S  |
| New Eng. M. ns       | New England Magazine, Boston               | ~  |
| New Repub.           | New Republic, New York                     |    |
| 19th Cent.           | Nineteenth Century, New York               |    |
| $No.\ Am.$           | North American Review, New                 | ť  |
|                      | York                                       | a  |
| Outlook              | Outlook, New York                          |    |
| Overland ns          | Overland Monthly, San Francisco            |    |
| Poet Lore            | Poet Lore, Boston                          | ti |
| Poetry               | Poetry, Chicago                            | t  |
| R. of Rs.            | Review of Reviews, New York                | d  |
| Sat. R. Lit.         | Saturday Review of Literature,New York | li |
| Scrib. M.            | Scribner's Magazine, New York              | g  |
| Sewanee $R$ .        | Sewanee Review, Sewanee, Ten-              |    |
|                      | nessee                                     | t) |
| Spect.               | Spectator, London                          |    |
| Sunset               | Sunset Magazine, San Francisco             | r  |
| World's Work         | World's Work, New York                     |    |
| $Yale\ R.\ ns$       | Yale Review, New Haven, Con-               |    |
|                      |  | 9. |

The following abbreviations are used to identify more quickly certain volumes or series of volumes:

necticut

AML American Men of Letters [Series]
AN The American Novel, Carl Van
Doren

| AP    | American Portraits, GamalielBradford                  |
|-------|---|
| AS    | American Statesmen [Series]                               |
| BB    | Beacon Biographies [Series]                               |
| CAN   | Contemporary American Novel-ists, Carl Van Doren      |
| EB    | Essays on Books, W. L. Phelps                             |
| EN    | The Advance of the English Novel, W. L. Phelps            |
| EP    | The Advance of English Poetry, W. L. Phelps               |
| GW    | Great Writers [Series]                                    |
| HKA   | How to Know the Authors [Series]                          |
| HL    | Hours in a Library, Sir Leslie Stephen                    |
| LJ    | Little Journeys to the Homes of American Authors [Series] |
| NV    | New Voices, Marguerite Wilkinson                          |
| Shel. | Shelburne Essays [Numbered in series], P. E. More         |
| SMN   | Some Modern Novelists, HelenFollett                   |

- 1. The headnotes under each author throughout the volume contain references to books, magazine articles, and critical essays, or chapters in books.
- 2. When, in the headnotes, a single critic is mentioned, e.g., Bradford, More, not followed by the title of a book, the student may locate the criticism desired by looking under the critic's name in the list of Miscellaneous Critical Works at the beginning of the Bibliography.
- 3. Additional references may be found under the title General History, and also in the bibliography of the period to which the author belongs.
- 4. Many references to books and bibliographical and critical articles concerning authors will be found in the bibliographical sections of The Cambridge History of American Literature. (See page 880.)
- 5. Special attention is called to articles in the Encyclopaedia Britannica and the Dictionary of American Biography (first volume, 1928).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

MISCELLANEOUS CRITICAL WORKS

- The Encyclopaedia Britannica, 12th ed.-London and New York, 1922
- The New International Cyclopaedia, 2nd ed.—New York, Dodd Mead, 1925
- The Dictionary of American Biography—New York, Scribner's, (first volume 1928)
- BAKER, ERNEST A. History of the English Novel. The age of romance; from the beginnings to the Renaissance-London, Witherby, 1924
- Bradford, Gamaliel American Portraits (1875-1900)—Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1922
  Brownell, Wm. C. American Prose Masters—New York, Scribner's, 1923
- BRUCE, PHILIP A. The Rise of the New South-
- Philadelphia, Barrie, 1905

  The Social Life of Virginia in the 17th Century-Richmond, Va., Whittet and Shepperson, 1907
- BURTON, RICHARD Literary Leaders of America-New York, Chautaugua Press, 1903
- CHUBB, EDWIN WATTS Stories of Authors, British and American-New York, Macmillan, 1926
- COX, JOHN H. Folk Songs of the South-Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1925
- CROSS, WILBUR LUCIUS The Development of the
- English Novel—New York, Macmillan, 1899 DICKINSON, THOS. H. Playwrights of the New American Theatre-New York, Macmillan, 1925
- EASTMAN, MAX Enjoyment of Poetry-New York, Scribner's, 1914
- ELTON, OLIVER Modern Studies-London, Arnold, 1907
- Erskine, John Leading American Novelists— New York, Holt, 1910
- GARNETT, EDWARD Friday Nights-London, Cape, 1922
- GRISWOLD, R. W. The Poets and Poetry of America, 9th ed.—Philadelphia, Carey & Hart. 1848
- HARKINS, EDWARD F. Famous Authors (Women) -Boston, Page, 1906
- HAZARD, LUCY L. The Frontier in American Literature—New York, Crowell, 1927 Higginson, Thos. W. Short Studies of American
- Authors, enlarged edition—Boston, Lee and Shepard, 1888
- LOWELL, AMY Tendencies in Modern American Poetry-New York, Macmillan, 1917
- Lowes, John L. Convention and Revolt in Poetry -Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1919
- MACY, JOHN A. The Spirit of American Literature-Garden City, Doubleday Page, 1913
- MITCHELL, D. G. American Lands and Letters (first and second series)—New York, Scribner's, 1897 and 1899
- More, Paul Elmer Shelburne Essays (eleven series)-New York, Putnam's 1904-1921

- Moses, Montrose J. The American Dramatist. 2nd rev. ed.-Boston, Little Brown, 1917
- NOYES, ALFRED Some Aspects of Modern Poetry-New York, Stokes, 1924
- Overton, Grant American Nights Entertainment
  —New York, Appleton, 1923
  - Cargoes for Crusoes-New York, Appleton, 1924
  - When Winter Comes to Main Street-New York, Doran, 1922
  - The Women Who Make Our Novels-New York, Moffat Yard, 1918
  - Authors of the Day-New York, Doran,
- PARRINGTON, VERNON L. Main Currents in American Thought: Vol. 1, The Colonial Mind; Vol. 2. The Romantic Revolution in America: Vol. 3. The Beginnings of Critical Realism in America (in preparation)-New York, Harcourt
- Brace, 1927

  PATTEE, F. L. The Development of the American Short Story, 1st ed.—New York, Harper, 1923

  PAYNE, W. M. Leading American Essayists—New
- York, Holt, 1910
- PERRY. BLISS The American Mind-Boston. Houghton Mifflin, 1912
  - The American Spirit in Let Haven, Yale University Press, 1918 Letters-New
  - A Study of Poetry-Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1920.
- PHELPS, W. L. The Advance of the English Novel -New York, Dodd Mead, 1916. Essays on Books-New York, Macmillan, 1914.
- RITTENHOUSE, JESSIE B. The Younger American
- Poets—Boston, Little Brown, 1913 SHERMAN, STUART P. Americans—I Americans-New York, Scribner's, 1922.
  - On Contemporary Literature-New York.
  - H. Holt, 1917 Points of View-New York, Scribner's, 1924.
- STEDMAN, EDMUND C. Poets of America-Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1899
- STEPHEN, SIR LESLIE Hours in a Library, 4 vols. -New York, Putnam's, 1904
  - Studies of a Biographer, 4 vols.—New York, Putnam's, 1907
- TRENT, W. P. and ERSKINE, J. Great American Writers-New York, Holt, 1912
- UNDERWOOD, JOHN CURTIS Literature and Insurgency-New York, Kennerley, 1914
- VAN DOREN, CARL The American Novel-New York, Macmillan, 1921
- WALLINGTON, NELLIE U. American History by American Poets, 2 vols.-New York, Duffield, 1911
- WHARTON, EDITH The Writing of Fiction-New York, Scribner's, 1925
- WILSON, RUFUS R. New England in Letters—New York, Wessels, 1904

WOLFE, THEO. F. Literary Shrines-Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1895

WOOD, CLEMENT Poets of America-New York.

Dutton, 1925 Woodberry, Geo. E. Makers of Literature—New York, Macmillan, 1900

GENERAL HISTORY

- The Cambridge History of American Literature, edited by W. P. Trent, John Erskine, Stuart Sherman, and Carl Van Doren, 3 vols. in four. New York, Putnam's, 1917-1921
- A Short History of American Literature. (based on the above) one vol. Putnam's, 1922

Adams, Oscar Fay A Dictionary of American Authors—Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1905

ALLIBONE, SAMUEL A. A Critical Dictorary of English Literature and of British and American Authors-Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1891

CAIRNS, W. B. A History of American Literature— New York, Oxford University Press, 1912

DUYCKINCK, EVERT A. Cyclopaedia of American Literature, revis. ed. in 2 vols.—Philadelphia, Zell, 1875

RICHARDSON, CHAS. F. American Literature, 1607-1885—New York, Putnam's, 1889

STANTON, THEODORE A Manual of American Literature-New York, Putnam's, 1909

TRENT, WILLIAM P. A History of American Literature, 1607-1865-New York, Appleton, 1903 WENDELL, BARRETT A Literary History of America, 7th ed.-New York, Scribner's, 1914 WHITCOMB, SELDEN L. Chronological Outlines of American Literature-New York, Macmillan,

BIBLIOGRAPHY OF PERIODS THE COLONIAL AND PROVINCIAL PERIODS

ADAMS, JAMES T. The Founding of New England -Boston, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1921 Revolutionary New England (1691-1776)— Boston, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1923

MARBLE, ANNIE R. Heralds of American Literature—Chicago, University of Chicago Press,

MURDOCK, KENNETH B. Increase Mather, the Foremost American Puritan-Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1925

TRENT, W. P. and WELLS, B. W. Colonial Prose and Poetry, 1607-1775, 3 vols.-New York, Crowell, 1901

Tyler, Moses Coit, A History of American Literature, 1607-1765-New York, Putnam's, 1878 The Literary History of the American Revolution-New York, Putnam's, 1897

Three Men of Letters-New York, Putnam's. 1805

WINSOR, JUSTIN The Memorial History of Boston (1630-1680), including Suffolk Co., Mass., (1630-1880), 4 vols.—Boston, Osgood, 1880-81

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

Ellsworth, W. W. A Golden Age of Authors-Boston, Houghton Mifflin Co., 1919 Helen H. Jackson, W. D. Howells, B. Harte, W. Whitman, J. Burroughs, A. Lincoln, M. Wilkins, E. A. Poe, John Hay, R. H. Dana, S. Lanier, John Muir, Mark Twain

FOERSTER, NORMAN Nature in American Literature

-New York, Macmillan, 1923

Howells, W. D. Literary Friends and Acquaint-ance—New York, Harper, 1921

Hubbard, Elbert Little Journeys to the Homes of American Authors, 6th ed.—New York, Putnam's, 1896

PATTEE, FRED L. A History of American Literature Since 1870-New York, Century, 1915

OUINN, A. H. A History of the American Drama from the Civil War to the Present, 2 vols .-New York, Harper, 1927

RUSK, R. L. The Literature of the Middle Western Frontier, 2 vols.—New York, Columbia University, 1925

THE EARLY TWENTIETH CENTURY

BOYNTON, PERCY H. Some Contemborary Americans-Chicago, University of Chicago Press,

COOPER, FRED. T. Some American Story Tellers-New York, Holt, 1911

FOLLETT, HELEN T. and FOLLETT, WILSON. Some Modern Novelists-New York, Holt, 1918

FOLLETT, WILSON The Modern Novel-New York. Knopf, 1918

LEISY, ERNEST E. American Literature: An Interpretative Survey-New York, Crowell, 1929

MANLY, I. M. and RICKERT, EDITH Contemporary American Literature-New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1922.

PHELPS, W. L. The Advance of the English Novel -New York, Dodd, Mead, 1916

The Advance of English Poetry in the Twentieth Century-New York, Dodd, Mead, 1919 Lindsay, Frost, Robinson, Lowell, Masters, Untermeyer, Teasdale, Widdemer, Sandburg, Neihardt, Bynner, Seeger, S. V. Benét, W. R. Benét

ROBERTS, CARL E. B. The Literary Renaissance in America-London, Heinemann, 1923

UNTERMEYER, LOUIS American Poetry Since 1000 -New York, Holt, 1923

The New Era in American Poetry-New York, Holt, 1919.

Modern American Poetry-New York, Harcourt revised edition, 1925

VAN DOREN, CARL and VAN DOREN, MARK American and British Literature Since 1890-New York, Century, 1925

Contemporary American Novelists, 1900-1920—New York, Macmillan, 1922. Many Minds—New York, Knopf, 1924 Frost, Sherman, Millay, Mencken, Sandburg,

Lindsay

WEIRICK, BRUCE From Whitman to Sandburg in American Poetry—New York, Macmillan, 1924 WILKINSON, MARGUERITE New Voices; an Introduction to Contemporary Poetry—New York,

Macmillan, 1919

Contemporary Poetry—New York, Macmillan. 1924

BIOGRAPHICAL SERIES

American Men of Letters Ed. by Charles Dudley Warner—Boston, Houghton Mifflin Co.

(Frothingham, O. B.) G. Ripley (Ogden, Rollo) W. H. Prescott Nath. P. Willis (Beers, Henry A.) Wm. C. Bryant (Bigelow, John) John G. Whittier (Carpenter, G. R.) G. W. Curtis (Carv. Edward) H. W. Longfellow (Higginson, T. W.) (Higginson, T. W.) M. Fuller Ossoli R. W. Emerson (Holmes, O. W.) H. D. Thoreau (Sanborn, F. B.) Noah Webster (Scudder, H. E.) Francis Parkman (Sedgwick, H. D. (Smyth, Albert H.) (Trent, W. P.) Bayard Taylor Wm. G. Simms W. Irving (Warner, C. D.) E. A. Poe (Woodberry, G. E.) (Woodberry, G. E.) (Lounsbury, T. R.) (McMaster, J. B.) N. Hawthorne J. F. Cooper B. Franklin

American Statesmen Ed. by John T. Morse, Jr.— Boston, Houghton Mifflin Co.

Calhoun (H. E. Von Holt)
Webster (H. C. Lodge)
Washington (H. C. Lodge)
Lincoln (J. T. Morse, Jr.)
Franklin (J. T. Morse, Jr.)
Jefferson (J. T. Morse, Jr.)
Sumner (M. Storey)
Henry (M. C. Tyler)

English Men of Letters Ed. by John Morley—New York, The Macmillan Co.

Whitman (G. R. Carpenter)
Whitman (John Bailey)
Emerson (G. E. Woodberry)
Melville (John Freeman)
Bryant (W. A. Bradley)
Whittier (T. W. Higginson)
Prescott (H. T. Peck)
Poe (E. Shanks)

Great Writers Ed. by E. S. Robertson—London, W. Scott. Contains biographies of:

Whittier (W. J. Linton)

Hawthorne (M. D. Conway)
Emerson (R. Garnett)
Longfellow (E. S. Robertson)
Thoreau (H. S. Salt)

How to Know the Authors Series Ed. by Will D. Howe—Indianapolis, Bobbs, Merrill Co.

Emerson (Crothers, S.)
Poe (Smith, C.)
Whitman (Whitlock, B.)
Hawthorne (Woodberry, G.)

Little Journeys to Homes of American Authors, 6th ed. Ed. by Elbert Hubbard—New York, Putnam's

Emerson (G. W. Curtis) Bryant (C. H. Kirkland) Prescott (G. S. Hilliard) Lowell (C. F. Briggs) Whitman (E. Hubbard) Hawthorne (G. W. Curtis) (H. T. Tuckerman) Irving Longfellow (G. W. Curtis) Everett (G. S. Hilliard) (G. W. Greene) (W. C. Bryant) Bancroft Simms

National Studies in American Letters Ed. by George E. Woodberry—The Macmillan Co.

Old Cambridge (T. W. Higginson)
Brook Farm (L. Swift)
The Hoosiers (M. Nicholson)
The Clergy in American Life and Letters (D. D. Addison)

ANTHOLOGIES

ALDEN, RAYMOND MACDONALD Poems of the English Race—New York, Scribner's, 1921

BOYNTON, PERCY HOLMES American Poetry—New York, Scribner's, 1921

BRONSON, WALTER COCHRANE American Poems (1625-1892)—Chicago, University of Chicago

Press, 1912
Brown, Sharon Poetry of Our Times—Chicago,

Scott, Foresman & Co., 1928
COOKE, GEORGE W. The Poets of Transcendentalism—Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1903

FOERSTER, NORMAN American Poetry and Prose (1607-1916)—Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1925 MONROE, HARRIET and HENDERSON, ALICE The

New Poetry—New York, Macmillan, 1923 Le Gallienne, Richard The Le Gallienne Book of American Verse—New York, Boni & Liveright, 1925

LOUNSBURY, THOS. R. The Yale Book of American Verse—New Haven, Yale University Press, 1912

PAGE, CURTIS HIDDEN The Chief American Poets
—Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1905

STEDMAN, EDMUND C. An American Anthology (1787-1900)—Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1900 STEVENSON, BURTON E. The Home Book of Verse (1580-1920)—New York, Holt, fifth ed., 1923

The Home Book of Modern Verse—New York, Holt, 1925

Poems of American History—Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1908

IMPORTANT PERIODICALS

Atlantic Monthly, Boston Bookman, New York Century, New York Forum, New York
Harper's Magazine, New York
Independent, New York
Literary Digest, New York
New Republic, New York
Nineteenth Century, New York
North American Review, New York
Poetry, Chicago
Saturday Review of Literature, New York
Yale Review ns. New Haven

CHRONOLOGY

From American literature, the works noted are chiefly those represented by selections in the book. and from English literature those especially interesting in relation to American writings. The dates are those of publication, unless otherwise noted. In the case of American poems especially, the titles of the works in which they appeared are usually given rather than the titles of the selections themselves.

AMERICAN

ENGLISH

1601-1610

1602 Shakespeare: Hamlet: Twelfth Night (acted)

1603 Tonson: Sejanus

1603 Elizabeth died: Tames I

1605 Bacon: Advancement of Learning

1607 Tamestown founded

1608 J. Smith: A True Relation

1620 Plymouth Colony founded

1610 Beaumont and Fletcher: Knight of the Burning Pestle

1610 Shakespeare: Macbeth (acted)

1611-1620

1611 Shakespeare: Winter's Tale (acted)

1611 Bible, Authorized Version, printed

1612 Bacon: Essays (first edition, 1597)

1614 Raleigh: History of the World

1616 Shakespeare died

1620 Bacon: Novum Organum

1621-1630

1623 Shakespeare: Plays (first folio edition)

1624 Webster: Duchess of Malfi

1624 J. Smith: The General History of Virginia 1625 Strachey: A True Reportory of the Wrack 1625 Purchas: Hakluyt's Posthumus, or Purchas

His Pilerimes

1625 Charles I

1627 Drayton: Battle of Agincourt

1630 Quarles: Divine Poems

1630 Massachusetts Bay Colony founded

1630 Bradford: History of Plimoth Plantation begun about this time

1630 Winthrop: Journal begun, ended 1649

1631-1640

1633 Massinger: New Way to Pay Old Debts

1634 Crashaw: Epigrammata Sacra

1634 Milton: Comus (acted)

1636 Harvard College established

1636 Providence founded

1637 Anne Hutchinson banished

1638 New Haven founded

1638 Trial of John Hampden

1638 Milton: Lycidas

1639 Webster: Appius and Virginia

1639 Printing press established, Cambridge, Massachusetts

1640 The Bay Psalm Book [The first book printed in British North America 1

AMERICAN

ENGLISH

1641-1650

1644 Williams: The Bloudy Tenent [Liberal Puritanism]

1647 N. Ward: The Simple Cobler [Crabbed Puritanism]

1650 A. Bradstreet: Poems

1642 Browne: Religio Medici 1644 Milton: Areobagitica 1644 Battle of Marston Moor

1645 Waller: Poems

1647 Taylor: Liberty of Prophesying

1648 Herrick: Hesperides

1649 Charles I executed; The Commonwealth 1650 Baxter: The Saints' Everlasting Rest

1651-1660

1651 Taylor: Holy Dying

1653 Walton: The Complete Angler 1656 Davenant: The Siege of Rhodes 1660 The monarchy restored; Charles II 1660 Pepys: Diary begun, ended 1669

1660 Dryden: Astrea Redux

1661-1670

1662 Wigglesworth: The Day of Doom

The most popular poem of the time; retained its vogue for a century]

1663 Butler: Hudibras. Pt. I 1663 Dryden: The Wild Gallant

1666 London Fire

1667 Milton: Paradise Lost 1667 Dryden: Annus Mirabilis

1671-1680

1671 Milton: Paradise Regained 1671 Milton: Samson Agonistes 1672 Dryden: Conquest of Granada

1673 Sewall: Diary begun, ended 1729

1674 Milton died

1676 King Philip's War, New England, Indian Wars in Virginia: English supremacy in the colonies confirmed

1676 Tompson: New-Englands Crisis

[First book of poems published in the English colonies]

1678 Bunyan: The Pilgrim's Progess

1681-1690

1681 C. Mather: Diary begun 1682 Philadelphia founded

The New England Primer probably first published in this decade

1681 Dryden: Absalom and Achitothel

1682 Dryden: MacFlecknoe 1682 Otway: Venice Preserved

1685 James II

1687 Newton: Principia

1688 The English Revolution; William and Mary

1689 King William's War

1690 Locke: Essay Concerning the Human Understanding

AMERICAN

ENGLISH

1691-1700

1602 Salem witchcraft trials

1697 Congreve: The Mourning Bride

1697 Dryden: Alexander's Feast

1698 Collier: Short View of the Immorality and

Prophaneness of the Stage 1700 Congreve: The Way of the World

1701 Defoe: The True-Born Englishman

1702-13 The War of the Spanish Succession

1701-1710

1701 Yale College established 1702-13 Oueen Anne's War

1702 C. Mather: Magnalia Christi Americana

1704 Boston News Letter established [First newspaper in America (weekly)] 1704-05 S. Knight: Journal (written)

1704 Swift: Tale of a Tub

1704 Clarendon: History of the Great Rebellion

1709 Pope: Pastorals

1709 Steele and Addison: The Tatler begun

1711-1720

1711 Steele and Addison: The Spectator begun

1712 Pope: The Rape of the Lock

1713 Addison: Cato 1714 George I 1715 Gav: Poems

1715 Pope: Translation of the Iliad

1716 Church: King Philip's War

1718 Prior: Poems

1719 Defoe: Robinson Crusoe

1721-1730

1721 Ramsav: Poems

1722 Defoe: Journal of the Plague Year 1722 Edwards: Diary begun

1725 Pope: Edition of Shakespeare 1726 Swift: Gulliver's Travels

1726 Thomson: Winter

1727 George II

1728 Gay: Beggar's Opera 1728 Byrd: History of the Dividing Line (written)

1728 Pope: Dunciad

1731-1740

1732 Byrd: Progress to the Mines (written)

1733 Franklin: Poor Richard's Almanac (begun)

1732 Pope: Essay on Man

1737 Shenstone: The Schoolmistress

1738 Johnson: London 1740 Richardson: Pamela

1741-1750

1741 Edwards: Sinners in the Hands of an Angry

God

1741 Hume: Essays, Moral and Political

1742 Fielding: Joseph Andrews 1742 Young: Night Thoughts

1743 Blair: The Grave

1744 Pope dies

APPENDIX ጸጸጸ

AMERICAN

ENGLISH

1745 Swift dies

1747 Grav: Ode on Eton College 1748 Richardson: Clarissa Harlowe

1749 Fielding: Tom Jones

[The beginning of the modern English novel]

1750 Tohnson: The Rambler (begun)

1751-1760

1751 Gray: Elegy . . Country Churchyard 1753 Smollett: Ferdinand, Count Fathom

1753 Hume: Essays and Treatises 1755 Johnson: English Dictionary

1756 Woolman: Journal (begun)

1758 Franklin: The Way to Wealth in Poor Richard's Almanac

1759 Sterne: Tristram Shandy

1759 Tohnson: Rasselas

1760 George III

1761-1770

1763 End of the French and Indian War

1762 Macpherson: The Poems of Ossian

[British domain in America extended]

1764 Walpole: The Castle of Otranto [Gothic novel]

1765 Godfrey: Juvenile Poems (with the Prince

1765 Percy: Reliques of Ancient Poetry of Parthia, the first American drama) 1765 The Stamp Act

1765 Watt's steam engine begins the industrial revolution

1766 Goldsmith: The Vicar of Wakefield 1768 Sterne: Sentimental Journey 1770 Goldsmith: The Deserted Village

1771-1780

1771 Franklin: Autobiography, first part, written [The first American book of wide European circulation 1

1772 Trumbull: Progress of Dulness, part I

1773 P. Wheatlev: Poems

1771 Encyclopaedia Britannica, first edition

1775 Trumbull: M'Fingal

1773 Goldsmith: She Stoops to Conquer 1774 Chesterfield: Letters to his Son

1775 Henry: Speech in the Virginia Convention

1775 Burke: Speech on Conciliation 1775 Sheridan: The Rivals

1775 The fight at Lexington and Concord

[Comedy of manners]

1776 The Declaration of Independence 1776 Paine: Common Sense

1776 Gibbon: History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire

1778 F. Hopkinson: Battle of the Kegs

1779 Johnson: Lives of the Poets

1780 Franklin: Dialogue between Franklin and the

Gout

1781-1790

1783 The Treaty of Paris

1783 Crabbe: The Village 1784 Beckford: Vathek

AMERICAN

ENGLISH

1785 Dwight: The Conquest of Canaan 1785 Cowper: The Task 1786 Freneau: Poems 1786 Rurns Poems 1788 Dwight: The Triumph of Infidelity 1789 Franklin: Autobiography, second part, writ-1789 French Revolution ton 1789 Blake: Songs of Innocence 1789 The Constitution established 1790 Burke: Thoughts on the Revolution in France 1791-1800 1791 Boswell: Life of Dr. Johnson 1792 Whitney invents the cotton gin 1793 Godwin: Inquiry concerning Political Justice 1794 Radcliffe: Mysteries of Udolpho 1705 Lewis . The Monb 1796 Barlow: Hasty Pudding 1796 Washington: Farewell Address 1798 Brown: Wieland 1798 Wordsworth and Coleridge: Lyrical Ballads 1798 J. Hopkinson: Hail Columbia [First important publication of the Romantic schooll 1801-1810 1801 Jefferson: Inaugural Address 1803 Louisiana purchased 1804 Napoleon Emperor 1805 Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel 1806 Franklin: Works 1808 Scott: Marmion 1809 Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers 1809 Irving: Knickerbocker's History of New York 1809 Edgeworth: Tales of Fashionable Life 1810 Scott: Ladv of the Lake 1811-1820 1811 Austen: Sense and Sensibility 1812 Byron: Childe Harold, I, II 1812-1814 War with England 1814 Scott: Waverley 1814 Kev: Star-Spangled Banner [Romantic fiction established] 1814 Wordsworth: Excursion 1815 Battle of Waterloo 1815 Freneau: Poems 1815 Wilde: My Life is like the Summer Rose 1816 Coleridge: Christabel 1817 Bryant: Thanatopsis 1817 Moore: Lalla Rookh 1819 Byron: Don Juan, I, II 1819 Irving: Sketch Book 1819 Drake: The American Flag 1820 Keats: Poems

1821-1830

1821 Bryant: Poems 1821 De Quincey: Confessions of an Opium Eater

1821 Scott: Kenilworth 1821 Shelley: Adonais

1820 George IV

1822 Irving: Bracebridge Hall 1823 Payne: Home, Sweet Home

1823 Cooper: The Pilot

1824 Lamb: Essays of Elia

1820 Shelley: Prometheus Unbound

AMERICAN

ENGLISH

| AMERICAN  | ENGLISH  |
|---|--|
| 1825 Pinckney: Rodolph and Other Poems 1825 Erie Canal, unites the Great Lakes and the Atlantic   | 1824 Landor: Imaginary Conversations1825 Macaulay: Essay on Milton |
| 1826 Woodworth: Old Oaken Bucket 1827 Cooper: The Prairie 1827 Simms: Lyrical and Other Poems 1827 R. H. Dana: Poems                            | 1827 A. and C. Tennyson: Poems by Two Brothers                         |
| 1827 Drake: Alnwick Castle and Other Poems1829 Jefferson: Correspondence and Miscellaneous1829 First steam railway in the United States | 1830 Tennyson: Poems Chiefly Lyrical                                   |
| 2-100 000000 000000   | 1830 William IV  |
| 1831  | -1840  |
| 1831 Poe: Poems   |  |
| 1832 Irving: The Alhambra   | 1020 C. 44 3'-1 1 . 6 . 1  |
| 1832 S. Smith: America  | 1832 Scott died; end of the romantic era 1833 Carlyle: Sartor Resartus |
|   | 1833 Tennyson: Poems   |
| 1834 McCormick's reaper   | 1834 Bulwer-Lytton; Last Days of Pompeii                               |
| 1834 Bancroft: History of the United States, Vol. I   |  |
| 1835 Drake: The Culprit Fay and Other Poems 1835 Simms: The Yemassee  | 1835 Browning: Paracelsus  |
| 1835 Willis: Pencilings by the Way  |  |
| 1836 Holmes: Poems  | 1836 Dickens: Pickwick Papers  |
| 1836 Franklin: Works, Sparks ed.  | 1836 Marryat: Mr. Midshipman Easy                                      |
| 1837 Hawthorne: Twice-Told Tales  | 1837 Carlyle: French Revolution  |
| 1837 Whittier: Poems  | 1837 Queen Victoria  |
| 1839 Poe: Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque 1839 Longfellow: Voices of the Night   |  |
| 1839 Very: Essays and Poems   |  |
| 1840 R. H. Dana, Jr.: Two Years Before the Mast1840 Furness: Manual of Domestic Worship   | 1840 Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop                                       |
| 1841-   | -1850  |
| 1841 Cooper: Deerslayer .   | 1841 Carlyle: Heroes and Hero-Worship                                  |
| 1841 Emerson: Essays, first series  |  |
| 1841 Longfellow: Ballads and Other Poems  | 1942 Provenings Degraphic Lamica                                       |
| 1843 Willis: Poems of Passion   | 1842 Browning: Dramatic Lyrics1843 Macaulay: Essays                |
| 1843 Prescott: Conquest of Mexico   | 1843 Ruskin: Modern Painters, I  |
| 1844 Emerson: Essays, second series   | 1844 E. B. Browning: Poems   |
| 1844 Lowell: Poems  |  |
| 1845 Sumner: The True Grandeur of Nations1845 Poe: The Raven and Other Poems  |  |
| 1846 Hawthorne: Mosses from an Old Manse  | 1846 Dickens: Dombey and Son   |
| 1846-1848 The War with Mexico   | 2010 23010127 2011009 4114 2011  |
| 1846 Taylor: Views Afoot  |  |
| 1846 Melville: Typee  | 1047 Commence Ch. Daine  |
| 1847 Emerson: Poems 1847 Longfellow: Evangeline   | 1847 Tennyson: The Princess 1847 Thackeray: Vanity Fair                |
| 1847 O'Hara: Bivouac of the Dead  | 1847 C. Bronté: Jane Eyre  |
| 1848 Lowell: Biglow Papers, I   | 1848 Macaulay: History of England, I, II                               |
| 1848 Lowell: Vision of Sir Launfal  |  |
| 1848 Lowell: A Fable for Critics  |  |

AMERICAN

1871 Miller: Songs of the Sierras 1871 Lowell: My Study Windows

ENGLISH

1871 Swinburne: Songs before Sunrise 1871 Tennyson: The Last Tournament

| AMERICAN   | ENGLISH  |
|--|--|
| 1849 G. Ticknor: History of Spanish Literature1850 Whittier: Songs of Labor1850 Longfellow: The Seaside and the Fireside1850 Hawthorne: The Scarlet Letter | 1849 Thackeray: Pendennis1850 Tennyson: In Memorian  |
| 1851-  | -1860  |
| 1851 Hawthorne: The House of the Seven Gables1851 Parkman: The Conspiracy of Pontiac1851 Taylor: Romances, Lyrics and Songs                                    | 1851 E. B. Browning: Casa Guidi Windows  |
|  | 1852 Thackeray: Henry Esmond 1852 Wallace: Travels on the Amazon   |
| 1853 Calhoun: Works  |  |
| 1853 Thoreau: Walden   |  |
|  | 1854 Thackeray: The Newcomes   |
| 1855 Whitman: Leaves of Grass  | 1855 R. Browning: Men and Women  |
| 1855 Longfellow: Hiawatha  | 1855 Tennyson: Maud  |
| 1856 Story: Poems  | 1856 E. B. Browning: Aurora Leigh  |
| 1856 Stoddard: Songs of Summer   |  |
| 1856 Motley: The Rise of the Dutch Republic  |  |
| 1856 Curtis: Prue and I  |  |
| 1858 Holmes: The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table   | 1858 Carlyle: History of Friedrich The Great, I,   |
| 1859 Everett: Orations and Speeches  | 1859 Darwin: The Origin of Species1859 G. Eliot (M. Evans): Adam Bede1860 Morris: Poems  |
| 1861-  | -1870  |
| 1061 Halman, Samas in Manny Kens   | 1861 Reade: The Cloister and the Hearth  |
| 1861 Holmes: Songs in Many Keys  | 1001 110010 1100 |
| 1861-1865 The Civil War1862-1866 Lowell: Biglow Papers, II  |  |
|  |  |
| 1862 Choate: Works   | 1863 G. Eliot (M. Evans): Romola   |
| 1863 Bryant: Thirty Poems  | 2000 0. 2 (  |
| 1863 Longfellow: Tales of a Wayside Inn  |  |
| 1863 Thompson: Music in Camp   | 1864 R. Browning: Dramatis Personæ   |
| 1864 Boker: Poems of the War   | 1864 Newman: Apologia pro Vita Sua   |
|  | 1864 Swinburne: Atalanta in Calydon  |
|  | 1864 Tennyson: Enoch Arden   |
| 1865 M. Preston: Beechenbrook  |  |
| 1865 Whitman: Drum Taps  |  |
| 1866 Read: Poems   | 1866 Ruskin: A Crown of Wild Olive   |
| 1866 Whittier: Snow-Bound  |  |
| 1866 J. Howe: Later Lyrics   |  |
| 1867 Longfellow: Divina Commedia (translated)  | 1867 Arnold: The Study of Celtic Literature  |
| 1867 Parsons: Inferno (translated)   | ·  |
| 1868 Whittier: Among the Hills   | 1868 R. Browning: The Ring and the Book  |
| 1868 Hale: The Man Without a Country and Other Tales   |  |
| 1868 Harte. The Luck of Roaring Camp   |  |
| 1869 Transcontinental railroad joins Atlantic and  | 1869 Arnold: Culture and Anarchy   |
| Pacific  |  |
|  | 1870 D. G. Rossetti: Poems   |
| 1871-  | 1880   |

AMERICAN

ENGLISH

1872 Havne: Legends and Lyrics 1873 Arnold: Literature and Dogma 1873 Timrod: Poems

1874 Green: A Short History of the English People 1875 R. Browning: Aristophanes' Apology

1875 Hope: Elegiac Ode and Other Poems 1875 Meredith: Beauchamb's Career 1876 Morris: Sigurd the Volsung 1876 Mark Twain: Tom Sawver

1876 Spencer: Principles of Sociology 1876 Bell's telephone 1877 Tennyson: Harold 1877 Tames: The American

1877 Lanier: Poems

1879 Arnold: Mixed Essays 1879 F. Ticknor: Poems 1879 R. Browning: Dramatic Idyls 1879 Stockton: Rudder Grange

1879 Burroughs: Locusts and Wild Honey 1880 Rvan: Poems

1881-1890

1881 Rossetti: Ballads and Sonnets 1881 Whittier: The King's Missive 1882 Swinburne: Tristram of Lyonesse

1883 Stevenson · Treasure Island 1883 Harris: Nights with Uncle Remus 1883 Mark Twain: Life on the Mississippi

1884 Mark Twain: Huckleberry Finn

1884 Burroughs: Fresh Fields 1885 Meredith: Diana of the Crosswavs

1886 Stevenson: Kidnapped 1886 H. Jackson: Sonnets and Lyrics

1886 Tennyson: Locksley Hall Sixty Years After 1887 Kipling: Plain Tales from the Hills

1887 M. Wilkins: A Humble Romance 1887 L. Reese: A Branch of May

1888 A. Repplier: Books and Men 1889-1896 Roosevelt: The Winning of the West 1889 Barrie: A Window in Thrums

1889 Pater: Appreciations 1889 Browning dies

1890 Hay: Poems

1873 Pike: Poems

1890 E. Dickinson: Poems, first series 1890-1898 Garland · Main Traveled Roads

1891-1900

1891 Wilkins: A New England Nun

1891 Whitman: Goodbye, My Fancy 1892 Hardy: Tess of the D'Urbervilles

1892 Tennyson: The Death of Oenone

1892 Tennyson died

1892 The Celtic revival in Ireland gains force 1893 Wilson: Mere Literature

1894 Field: Songs of Childhood 1894 Yeats: The Land of Heart's Desire

1894 Muir: The Mountains of California 1894 Kipling: The Jungle Book

1894-1896-1900 Carman and Hovey: Songs from

Vagabondia

1895 van Dyke: Little Rivers 1895 Conrad: Aylmer's Folly

1895 Crane: The Red Badge of Courage 1896 Wister: Red Men and White 1896 Housman: A Shropshire La.!

1897 Robinson: The Children of the Night 1898 Dunne: Mr. Dooley in Peace and War 1898 Wilde: Ballad of Reading Gaol

AMERICAN

ENGLISH

1898 Dunne: Mr. Dooley in the Hearts of his Countrymen

1899 van Dyke: Fisherman's Luck 1899 Markham: The Man with the Hoc

1900 Conrad: Lord Jim

1903 Conrad: Typhoon

1904 Barrie: Peter Pan

1909 Wells: Tono Bungay

1910 Galsworthy: Justice

1906 Noves: Drake

1904 Hardy: The Dynasts, I

1905 Synge: Riders to the Sea

1901-1910

1901 Moody: Poems 1901 Kipling: Kim

1902 James: The Wings of a Dove 1902 Masefield: Salt-Water Ballads

1902 Wister: The Virginian

1902 Wilson: A History of the American People

1903 Wright Brothers airplane 1904 James: The Golden Bowl 1904 Moving pictures established

1904 Moody: The Fire-Bringer

1907 E. Wharton: The House of Mirth

1907 Wilson: Constitutional Government

1909 L. Reese: A Wayside Lute

1909 Peary reaches the North Pole

1910 Roosevelt: African Game Trails 1910 Dunne: Mr. Doolev Savs

1910 The automobile in general use

1911-1920

1911 Sterling: The House of Orchids 1911 Masefield: The Everlasting Mercy

1911 Noves: Robin Hood

1912, 1917 E. Millay: Renascence

1913 Lindsay: General Booth Enters into Heaven

1913 W. Cather: O Pioneers 1914 The World War begins

1914 Frost: North of Boston 1914 W. Benét: The Falconer of God

1914 A. Lowell: Sword Blades and Poppy Seeds

1915 Bynner: The New World

1915 Markham: The Shoes of Happiness

1915 Masters: Spoon River Anthology 1915 Teasdale: Rivers to the Sea

1916 Sandburg: Chicago Poems

1916 Robinson: The Man Against the Sky

1916 Frost: Mountain Interval

1917 Garland: A Son of the Middle Border 1917 A. Lowell: Men. Women, and Ghosts

1917 The United States enters the World War

1918 Beebe: Jungle Peace

1919 The Atlantic crossed by air

1919 Neihardt: The Song of Three Friends

1920 Sandburg: Smoke and Steel

1920 S. Teasdale: Flame and Shadow

1920 Morley: Mince Pie

1920 Eugene O'Neill: Beyond the Horizon

1012 de la Mare: Collected Poems

1913 Masefield: Dauber

1913 Bridges: Poetical Works 1914 "A.E.": Collected Poems

1915 Brooke: Poems

1916 Davies: Collected Poems

1916 Lawrence: Amores

1917 Hodgson: New Poems

1918 Drinkwater: Abraham Lincoln

1918 Stephens: Reincarnations

1918 Sassoon: Counter-Attack

1919 Masefield: Reynard the Fox

AMERICAN

1927 Beebe: Pheasant Jungles

1929 Frost: West-Flowing Brook

ENGLISH

1921-1930

1921 Fletcher: Breakers and Granite
1922 E. Wharton: Glimpses of the Moon
1922 Morley: Where the Blue Begins
1923 Frost: New Hampshire
1924 Masters: New Spoon River Anthology
1924 Heyward: Skylines and Horizons
1921 Chesterton: The Uses of Diversity
1922 "A.E." Russell: The Interpreters
1922 Galsworthy: Loyalties
1923 Stephen: Deirdre
1924 Galsworthy: Old English

1925 Neihardt: The Song of the Indian Wars
1925 Beebe: The Arcturus Adventure

1925 Drinkwater: The Pilgrim of Eternity

1926 S. Teasdale: Dark of the Moon
1926 Wells: The World of William Clissold
1927 Robinson: Tristram
1927 Masefield: The Midnight Folk

1927 W. Cather: Death Comes for the Archbishop

1928 S. Benét, John Brown's Body 1928 V. Woolf: Orlando 1928 The Pacific crossed by air

INDEX TO AUTHORS, TITLES, AND FIRST LINES

| A beautiful and happy girl471                     | An old man bending I come among new faces        | 69.            |
|---|--|----------------|
| Above the pines the moon was slowly drifting736   | APRIL  | 80             |
| ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S BIRTHPLACE, ON837               | Ariel in the Cloven Pine                         | 640            |
| ABRAHAM LINCOLN WALKS AT MIDNIGHT825              | Arm'd year-year of the struggle                  | 688            |
| A close, gray sky806                              | ARROW AND THE SONG, THE                          | 509            |
| ADAMS, FRANKLIN PIERCE832                         | ARSENAL AT SPRINGFIELD, THE                      | 50             |
| ADDRESS IN INDEPENDENCE HALL, PHILADEL-           | As at thy Portals also Death                     | 68             |
| рніа  | As at thy portals also death                     | 685            |
| Adsum   | As a twig trembles, which a bird                 | 599            |
| ADVENTURES OF TOM SAWYER, From THE728             | A score of years had come and gone               | 493            |
| A.E.F823  | Ashes of Soldiers                                | 69.            |
| Afternoon Tea                                     | Ashes of soldiers South or North                 | 694            |
| AFTER THE BURIAL                                  | A SIGHT IN CAMP IN THE DAYBREAK GRAY AND         |                |
| After the whipping he crawled into bed860         | DIM  | 690            |
| A gold fringe on the purpling hem496              | A sight in camp in the daybreak gray and dim.    | 690            |
| A Grand attempt some Amazonian Dames 35           | A slant of sun on dull brown walls               | 809            |
| Ah, could I lay me down in this long grass834     | As Life's unending column pours                  | 555            |
| Ah! what pleasant visions haunt me523             | ASPECTS OF THE PINES                             | 67-            |
| ALDRICH, THOMAS BAILEY                            | As Tollsome I Wander'd Virginia's Woods          | 691            |
| A league of broomgrass, rose, and mauve, and      | As toilsome I wander'd Virginia's woods 6        | 691            |
| umber865  | ASTRAEA  | 389            |
| ALHAMBRA, From THE                                | "AS WEARY PILGRIM"                               | 29             |
| A line in long array where they wind betwixt      | As weary pilgrim, now at rest                    | 29             |
| green islands                                     | As wildly raged the tea-imbibing throng          | 862            |
| A LITTLE WHILE I FAIN WOULD LINGER YET 675        | A tale half told and hardly understood           | 738            |
| A little while (my life is almost set!)675        | ATAVISM  | 864            |
| All are architects of Fate509                     | At Eutaw Springs the valiant died                | 166            |
| All of heaven in my hands 829                     | At last the hird that sang so long               | 797            |
| All overgrown with bush and fern557               | At last the four year storm of fratricide        | 813            |
| ALL QUIET ALONG THE POTOMAC TONIGHT665            | AT MAGNOLIA CEMETARY                             | 671            |
| "All quiet along the Potomac," they say665        | At midnight, death's and truth's unlocking time. | 712            |
| Along a river-side, I know not where604           | At midnight, in his guarded tent                 | 209            |
| Aloof within the day's enormous dome802           | At midnight, in the month of June                | 285            |
| ALTER? WHEN THE HILLS Do                          | At the gate of the West I stand                  | 829            |
| Alter? When the hills do                          | At the king's gate the subtile noon              | /1/            |
| ALWAYS RIGHT                                      | At the last, tenderly                            | /01            |
| A march in the ranks hard-prest, and the road     | AUF WIEDERSEHEN                                  | 599            |
| unknown   | AUGUST MOONRISE                                  | 528            |
| AMBROSE   | AUTHOR'S ACCOUNT OF HIMSELF, THE                 | 180            |
| AMERICA413  | AUTOBIOGRAPHY, From his (Franklin)               | 88             |
| AMERICANI FLAG THE                                | AUTOBIOGRAPHY, From his (Jefferson)1             | 15/            |
| Amid the immense, broad brownness of the          | AUTOCRAT OF THE BREAKFAST-TABLE, From            | 260            |
| sands   | THE  | 302710     |
| A mist was driving down the British Channel531    | AUTUMN   | 1 177 7 1  |
| Among the sullen peaks she stood at bay805        | A word is dead                                   | 1 4 15 5 0 |
| AN ARMY CORPS ON THE MARCH                        | Ay, tear her tattered ensign down!               | 330            |
| An everywhere of silver                           | - 36 1   | 712            |
| A newspaper is a collection of half-injustices808 | BALLAD OF TREES AND THE MASTER, A                | 6 Y U          |
| ANCELS OF BUENA VISTA, THE                        | BALLAD OF WILLIAM SYCAMORE, THE                  | 177            |
| ANORT SONS THE'                                   | BARCLAY OF URY                                   | 170            |
| ANNARET LEE                                       | BAREFOOT BOY, THE                                | rı 71 3 7  |
| A TOTAL DISTRICT                                  | BARLOW, JOEL                                     | 7 0 4   |
| Appropried by all the trumpets of the sky380      | Barnacles  | 257            |
| A noiseless natient spider                        | BATTLE-FIELD, THE                                | 522            |
| Another four I've left yet to bring on 28         | BATTLE HYMN OF THE REPUBLIC                      |                |
|   |  |                |

|  | 700   |
|--|---|
| BATTLE OF THE KEGS, THE                      | CARMAN, (WILLIAM) BLISS798                        |
| BAY PSALM BOOK, THE 18                       | CASK OF AMONTILLADO, THE                          |
| BEAT! BEAT! DRUMS!                           | CASTILIAN865                                      |
| Beat! beat! drums!—blow! bugles! blow!695    | CAT AND THE PAIN-KILLER, THE                      |
| Beautiful lily, dwelling by still rivers548  | CATHER, WILLA SIBERT849                           |
| BEAVER BROOK                                 | CATV-DID. TO A                                    |
| Because he was a butcher and thereby818      | CAVATRY CROSSING A FORD                           |
| Because they thought his doctrines were not  | Celestial Choir! enthroned in realms of light 120 |
| just672                                      | CERTAIN CIVILIAN, TO A                            |
| Just   | CHAMBERED NAUTILUS, THE                           |
| BEDDUIN SONG                                 | CHARLESTON  |
| BEEBE, (CHARLES) WILLIAM843                  | CHICAGO823  |
| BELLS, THE                                   | CHILD, THE839                                     |
| Bending above the spicy woods which blaze717 | CHILD, THE  |
| BENÉT, STEPHEN VINCENT860                    | CHILDREN'S HOUR, THE                              |
| BENÉT, WILLIAM ROSE857                       | CHILDREN'S HOUR, THE                              |
| Benjamin Franklin Hazard                     | CHURCH, BENJAMIN                                  |
| Beside a massive gateway built up in years   | CHURCH, BENJAWIN                                  |
| gone by                                      | CITY IN THE SEA, THE                              |
| Retween the dark and the daylight539         | CLEAN CURTAINS                                    |
| Beyond the sunset and the amber sea672       | CLEMENS, SAMUEL LANGHORNE725                      |
| BIG-HORN SHEEP, THE754                       | CLIPPER SHIPS, THE816                             |
| BIGLOW PAPERS, From THE                      | Close his eyes; his work is done!                 |
| BTRDS  | Coliseum, The                                     |
| Birds are singing round my window650         | COLONIAL PERIOD, THE 1                            |
| BIT OF AUTOBIOGRAPHY, From A 73              | COLUMBIA121                                       |
| BIVOUAC OF THE DEAD, THE                     | Columbia, Columbia, to glory arise                |
| BIVOUAC ON A MOUNTAIN SIDE                   | Come. I will make the continent indissoluble685   |
| BIXBY, LETTER TO MRS470                      | Come! let Mirth our hours employ                  |
| BLACK RIDERS, THE808                         | Come, my tan-faced children                       |
| Black riders came from the sea808            | Come to me. O ye children!                        |
| Black Vulture, The802                        | COME UP FROM THE FIELDS FATHER689                 |
| BLACE VULTURE, THE                           | Come up from the fields, father, here's a letter  |
| Blessings on thee, little man479             | from our Pete                                     |
| BLOODY TENET OF PERSECUTION, From THE 25     | COMMON SENSE, From140                             |
| BLUE SQUILLS828                              | Compensation (Essay)                              |
| BOKER, GEORGE HENRY649                       | Compensation                                      |
| Boston Common—Three Pictures557              | CONDUCTOR BRADLEY494                              |
| Boston Hymn                                  | Conductor Bradley (always may his name494         |
| Bowed by the weight of centuries he leans801 | CONQUERED BANNER, THE                             |
| Bowed by the weight of centuries he leans    | CONQUEROR WORM, THE                               |
| Boys, The558                                 | Conquest of Mexico, From History of the .414      |
| BRADFORD, WILLIAM 9                          | Conspiracy of Pontiac, From The                   |
| BRADSTREÉT, ANNE                             | Constitution not a Compact Between Sov-           |
| Вганма                                       | EREIGN STATES, THE                                |
| BRIDGE, THE508                               | CONTENTMENT                                       |
| Bring from the Big Creek a huge boulder816   | CONTENTMENT                                       |
| BROWN, CHARLES BROCKDEN170                   | COOPED TARGE FENTIMORE 216                        |
| BRYANT, WILLIAM CULLEN248                    | COOPER, JAMES FENIMORE                            |
| BUCKET, THE412                               | COPY OF OMAR KHAYYAM, IN A                        |
| BUCKSKIN HARNESS, From THE845                | CORN  |
| BUILDERS, THE509                             | CORONATION  |
| BUILDING OF THE SHIP, THE                    | COTTON BALL, THE                                  |
| "Build me straight, O worthy Master!"526     | COURTIN', THE                                     |
| RIINVAN PATIT                                | CRANE, NATHALIA (RUTH CLARA)861                   |
| Burly, dozing humblebee                      | CRANE, STEPHEN808                                 |
| Burns (Halleck)267                           | CROSSING BROOKLYN FERRY                           |
| Burns (Whittier)                             | CRYSTAL, THE                                      |
| BURROUGHS, JOHN744                           | CULPRIT FAY, THE260                               |
| BYNNER, WITTER856                            | CURTIS, GEORGE WILLIAM651                         |
| BVRD. WILLIAM 61                             |   |
| By the rude bridge that arched the flood385  | DANA, RICHARD HENRY412, 413                       |
|  | DANA, IR., RICHARD HENRY612                       |
| CALHOUN, JOHN CALDWELL445                    | Dandelion, To the584                              |
| Calm as that second summer which precedes668 | DANTE549  |
| Cann as man second summer winer proceeds     |   |

| DAREST THOU NOW O SOUL                      | ETHIOPIA SALUTING THE COLORS701                 |
|---|---|
| Darest thou now O soul                      | EVANGELINE, From                                |
| Danies Chou now O soul                      |   |
| DARING DEED, A                              | EVENING HYMN413                                 |
| Das Ewig-weibliche                          | EVENING SONG                                    |
| DAY, A719                                   | EVENING WIND, THE254                            |
| DAY OF DOOM, From THE                       | Everyday brings a ship                          |
| DAY OF SUNSHINE, A                          | Examples a simp                                 |
|   | EXCELSIOR506                                    |
| DEACON'S MASTERPIECE, THE 555               | Exodus for Oregon                               |
| DEAD, THE                                   | EXPERIENCE                                      |
| Dear common flower, that grow'st beside the |   |
| way584                                      | FABLE   |
|   |   |
| Dear little house, dear shabby street853    | FABLE FOR CRITICS, From A590                    |
| DEATH OF JOSEPH RODMAN DRAKE, ON THE 267    | FACTORIES827                                    |
| DEATH OF THE FLOWERS, THE                   | Fair flower, that dost so comely grow167        |
| DEATH OF THE HIRED MAN, THE820              | FALCONER OF GOD, THE857                         |
| Death, thou'rt a cordial old and rare707    | FALL OF THE HOUSE OF USHER, THE                 |
| Death went up the hall                      |   |
|   | Family Portrait, A                              |
| DE CRÈVECOEUR, HECTOR ST. JOHN 114          | FAREWELL Address149                             |
| DEERSLAYER, From THE                        | FAREWELL ADDRESS AT SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS .468  |
| DESCENT INTO THE MAELSTROM, A301            | FAULKS, THEODOSIA GARRISON804                   |
| DE SENECTUTE833                             | FIELD, EUGENE                                   |
|   |   |
| Desolate and lone824                        | First Inaugural Address                         |
| DIALOGUE BETWEEN FRANKLIN AND THE GOUT.112  | First Snow-Fall, The599                         |
| DIARY, From his                             | Fisher's Boy, The411                            |
| DIARY OF COTTON MATHER, From THE 46         | FLATHOUSE ROOF, THE861                          |
| DICKENS IN CAMP                             | FLETCHER, JOHN GOULD811                         |
|   | Flood-tide below me! I see you face to face 679 |
| DICKINSON, EMILY717                         | Thood-tide below life: I see you take to face   |
| DICKSON, SAMUEL HENRY275                    | FLOWER-DE-LUCE                                  |
| Did you ask dulcet rimes from me?694        | FLYING SPIDER, THE                              |
| DIEDRICH KNICKERBOCKER                      | Fog824  |
| DIRGE FOR A SOLDIER                         | Fools laugh at dreamers, and the dreamers       |
|   | smile   |
| DISCOVERER OF THE NORTH CAPE, THE537        | Sittle  |
| DITHYRAMBIC ON WINE, A119                   | Fool's Prayer, The741                           |
| DIVINA COMMEDIA549                          | Forbearance                                     |
| DIXIE                                       | FORBIDDEN FRUIT I, II                           |
| DOOLEY, MR                                  | Forbidden fruit a flavor has                    |
|   | Force Bill, Speech on the445                    |
| DOROTHY Q559                                | FORERUNNERS                                     |
| DOWN THE MISSISSIPPI811                     | FORERUNNERS                                     |
| Down the world with Marna!800               | Forest Hymn, A251                               |
| Dull masses of dense green811               | For sixty days and upwards674                   |
| DUNNE, FINLEY PETER (Mr. Dooley)780         | FORTIFICATION, ON A                             |
| DUSK IN THE LOW COUNTRY865                  | FORTUNE-TELLER, A                               |
| DUSK IN THE LOW COUNTRY                     | FOR YOU, O DEMOCRACY                            |
| DRAKE, JOSEPH RODMAN239                     | TOR 100, O DEMOCRACI                            |
| Dreamers                                    | FOUR SEASONS OF THE YEAR, From THE 28           |
| Dreamers, The                               | "Francisco de Verulamio sic Cogitavit"610       |
| DR. HEIDEGGER'S EXPERIMENT323               | FRANCIS S. OSGOOD, To286                        |
| DWIGHT, TIMOTHY121                          | FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN 87                           |
| DWIGHT, HIMOTHI                             | FREEMAN, MARY E. WILKINS766                     |
|   | FRENEAU, PHILIP                                 |
| EACH AND ALL                                | English Committee To many 254                   |
| Each the herald is who wrote                | FRINGED GENTIAN, TO THE254                      |
| EARLY TWENTIETH CENTURY, THE807             | FROM THE CIVIL WAR TO THE END OF THE            |
| Edge of the Jungle, From The843             | CENTURY   |
| EDWARDS, JONATHAN                           | From the Desert I come to thee645               |
| EDWARDS, JOHATTHAN                          | FROM THE FLATS707                               |
| EIGHTEEN SIXTY-ONE                          | FROST, ROBERT819                                |
| ELDORADO                                    | End that Danner for His weeker 667              |
| EMERSON, RALPH WALDO362                     | Furl that Banner, for 'tis weary                |
| ENDYMION                                    | FURNESS, WILLIAM HENRY412,413                   |
| ENTERTAINING PASSAGES RELATING TO PHILIP'S  |   |
| WAR, From                                   | Gallants, attend, and hear a friend             |
| 70 AK, FIOIII                               | GARLAND, HAMLIN                                 |
| Eros  | Gayly bedight292                                |
| ERRING IN COMPANY                           | GENERAL HISTORY OF VIRGINIA, From THE 3         |
| ETERNAL GOODNESS, THE                       | GENERAL DISTURY OF VIRGINIA, PIONI I DE 5       |
| ETEDNITY                                    | GETTYSBURG ADDRESS, THE469                      |

| GIOTTO'S TOWER ,  | Helen, To  |  |
|---|--|--|
| GIVE ALL TO LOVE  | HENRY COGDAL   |  |
| Give all to love  | HENRY, O (William Sydney Porter)   | .775   |
| GIVE ME THE SPLENDID SILENT SUN692  | HENRY, PATRICK   |  |
| Give me the splendid silent sun with all his  | HENRY ZOLL, THE MILLER   | . 815  |
| beams full-dazzling   | Here is the place; right over the hill   | .481   |
| "Give us a song!" the soldiers cried647   | HER PRIVATE JOURNAL, From (Knight)   | . 49   |
| Glooms of the live-oaks, beautiful-braided and  | He was not armed like those of eastern clime   | 611  |
| woven   | HEYWARD, DU BOSE   | .865   |
| God bless our Father's Land!558   | HIDING OF BLACK BILL, THE  | .775   |
| GODFREY, THOMAS118  | HIS AUTOBIOGRAPHY, From (Franklin)   |  |
| God mades sech nights, all white an' still602   | His Diary, From (Sewall)   | . 56   |
| God sends his teachers unto every age582  | HIS EXCELLENCY GENERAL WASHINGTON  | .120   |
| God's-Eye View831   | HISTORY OF NEW ENGLAND, From   | . 13   |
| God's World   | HISTORY OF NEW YORK, From A  |  |
| GOOD FRIDAY NIGHT   | HISTORY OF THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO, From  |  |
| Good is the Saxon speech! clear, short, and   | HISTORY OF THE DIVIDING LINE, From   | 61   |
| strong  | HOC BUTCHER FOR THE WORLD  |  |
| Grandmother's mother: her age, I guess559   | HOLMES, OLIVER WENDELL   |  |
| GRASS824  | Home, Sweet Home!  |  |
| Great God! I ask thee for no meaner pelf411   | HONEY BEE, ON A  |  |
| Green be the turf above thee267   | HOPE, JAMES BARRON   |  |
| GREEN RIVER   | HOPKINSON, FRANCIS   |  |
| Guiliemus Rex   | HOPKINSON, JOSEPH  |  |
| GUINEY, LOUISE IMOGEN803  | Horse Thief, The   |  |
| GUITERMAN, ARTHUR862  | House of Night, From The   |  | |   | House of the Seven Gables, From The  |  |
| HAIL COLUMBIA170  | House of Usher, The Fall of the  |  |
| Hail, Columbia! happy land!   | House on the Hill, The   |  |
| Hail, happy day, when, smiling like the morn, .120  | HOVEY, RICHARD   |  |
| HALE, EDWARD EVERETT623   | How beautiful it was, that one bright day  |  |
| HALE IN THE BUSH .:   | How dear to this heart are the scenes of my  |  |
|   |  |  |
| Half of my life is gone, and I have let50/  | childhood  |  |
| Half of my life is gone, and I have let507 HALF PINT FLASK THE866   | childhood  |  |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE866   | HOWE, JULIA WARD   | 622  |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE  | HOWE, JULIA WARD   | 622720   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE         866           HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE         266           HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE         204   | HOWE, JULIA WARD   | 622720548  |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE  | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  | .622.720.548.828   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE  | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR.  | .622.720.548.828   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE       866         HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE       266         HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE       204         Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician       701         HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE       708   | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR  Fox  | .622.720.548.828.742   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE       866         HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE       266         HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE       204         Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician       701         HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE       708         HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER       742   | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR  FOX  HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET   | .622.720.548.828.742   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE       866         HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE       266         HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE       204         Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician       701         HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE       708         HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER       742         HARTE, FRANCIS BRET       730   | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How Mr. Rabbit Was too Sharp for Mr.  Fox  How the Old Horse Won the Bet  How was I worthy so divine a loss   | . 622. 720. 548. 828   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE  | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How Mr. Rabbit Was too Sharp for Mr.  Fox  How the Old Horse Won the Bet  How was I worthy so divine a loss  HUMBLEBEE, The   | 720548828742560385   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the   | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How Mr. Rabbit Was too Sharp for Mr.  Fox  How the Old Horse Won the Bet  How was I worthy so divine a loss  HUMBLEBEE, THE  HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY  | . 622. 720. 548. 828742  |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys? 558   | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How Mr. Rabbit Was too Sharp for Mr.  Fox  How the Old Horse Won the Bet  How was I worthy so divine a loss  HUMBLEBEE, THE  HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY  Hush'd be the camps today   | 548828548828560385695  |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys? 558 Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? 387  | HOWE, JULIA WARD How happy is the little stone How many lives, made beautiful and sweet How many million Aprils came How MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR. FOX HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET HOW WAS I WORTHY SO divine a loss HUMBLEBEE, THE HUSH'O BE THE CAMPS TODAY Hush'd be the camps today Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill  | 622720548828742560600385695  |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE  | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR.  FOX  HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET  HOW WAS I WORTHY SO divine a loss  HUMBLEBEE, THE  HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY  Hush'd be the camps today  Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill  HYMN   | 622720548828   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE  | HOWE, JULIA WARD How happy is the little stone How many lives, made beautiful and sweet How many million Aprils came How MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR. FOX HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET HOW WAS I WORTHY SO divine a loss HUMBLEBEE, THE HUSH'O BE THE CAMPS TODAY Hush'd be the camps today Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill  | 622720548828   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys? 558 Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? 387 HASTY PUDDING, THE 132 HAUNTED PALACE, THE 296 Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days 815   | HOWE, JULIA WARD How happy is the little stone How many lives, made beautiful and sweet How many million Aprils came How Mr. Rabbit Was too Sharp for Mr. Fox How the Old Horse Won the Bet How was I worthy so divine a loss Humblebee, The Hush'd be the camps Today Hush'd be the camps today Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill Hymn Hymn to the Nicht   | . 622.720.548.828.742.560.605.695.598.598.503  |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys? 558 Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? 387 HASTY PUDDING, THE 132 HAUNTED PALACE, THE 296 Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days 815   | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How Mr. Rabbit Was too Sharp for Mr.  Fox  How the Old Horse Won the Bet  How was I worthy so divine a loss  HUMBLEBEE, THE  HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY  Hush'd be the camps today  Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill  HYMN  HYMN  HYMN  I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or  | .622.720.548.828.742.560.600.385.695.598.598   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys? 558 Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? 387 HASTY PUDDING, THE 132 HAUNTED PALACE, THE 296 Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days 815 Have you heard of the wonderful one-hoss-   | HOWE, JULIA WARD How happy is the little stone How many lives, made beautiful and sweet How many million Aprils came How MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR. FOX HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET HOW WAS I WORTHY SO divine a loss HUMBLEBEE, THE HUSH'O BE THE CAMPS TODAY Hush'd be the camps today Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill HYMN HYMN TO THE NIGHT I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or worms, or mice  | 622720548828742560695695385503   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys? 558 Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? 387 HASTY PUDDING, THE 132 HAUNTED PALACE, THE 296 Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days 815 Have you heard of the wonderful one-hoss-shay? 555  | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR.  FOX  HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET  HOW WAS I WORTHY SO divine a loss  HUMBLEBEE, THE  HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY  HUSH'D Be THE CAMPS TODAY  HUSH'D Be the camps today  HUSHED with broad sunlight lies the hill  HYMN  HYMN  HYMN TO THE NICHT  I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or worms, or mice  I always was afraid of Somes's Pond:   | 622720548828742560600385695385740864   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys? 558 Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? 387 HASTY PUDDING, THE 132 HAUNTED PALACE, THE 296 Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days 815 Have you heard of the wonderful one-hoss-shay? 558 Have you read in the Talmud of old 538 HAWTHORNE 547   | HOWE, JULIA WARD How happy is the little stone How many lives, made beautiful and sweet How many million Aprils came How Mr. Rabbit Was too Sharp for Mr. Fox How the Old Horse Won the Bet How was I worthy so divine a loss HUMBLEBEE, THE HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY HUSH'D be the camps today Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill HYMN HYMN TO THE NIGHT  I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or worms, or mice I always was afraid of Somes's Pond: I am fevered with the sunset   | .622.726.828.742.560.695.598.598.598.740.740.740   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys? 558 Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? 387 HASTY PUDDING, THE 132 HAUNTED PALACE, THE 296 Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days 815 Have you heard of the wonderful one-hoss-shay? 558 Have you read in the Talmud of old 538 HAWTHORNE 547   | HOWE, JULIA WARD How happy is the little stone How many lives, made beautiful and sweet How many million Aprils came How Mr. Rabbit Was too Sharp for Mr. Fox How the Old Horse Won the Bet How was I worthy so divine a loss HUMBLEBEE, THE HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY Hush'd be the camps today Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill HYMN HYMN TO THE NIGHT  I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or worms, or mice I always was afraid of Somes's Pond: I am fevered with the sunset I cannot live with you  | .622.726.828.742.600.385.695.598.598.740.740.7718  |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys? 558 Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? 387 HASTY PUDDING, THE 132 HAUNTED PALACE, THE 296 Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days 815 Have you heard of the wonderful one-hoss-shay? 555 Have you read in the Talmud of old 538 HAWTHORNE 547 HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL 323  | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR.  FOX  HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET  HOW WAS I WORTHY SO divine a loss  HUMBLEBEE, THE  HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY  Hush'd be the camps today  Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill  HYMN  HYMN  I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or  worms, or mice  I always was afraid of Somes's Pond:  I am fevered with the sunset  I cannot live with you  I cannot spare water or wine  | .622.726.828.742.560.600.385.508.508.740.740.740.740.740.740.740.740                         |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys? 558 Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? 387 HASTY PUDDING, THE 132 HAUNTED PALACE, THE 296 Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days 815 Have you heard of the wonderful one-hoss-shay? 555 Have you read in the Talmud of old 538 HAWTHORNE 547 HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL 322 HAY, JOHN 737  | HOWE, JULIA WARD How happy is the little stone How many lives, made beautiful and sweet How many million Aprils came How Mr. Rabbit Was too Sharp for Mr. Fox How the Old Horse Won the Bet How was I worthy so divine a loss HUMBLEBEE, THE HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY Hush'd be the camps today Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill HYMN HYMN TO THE NIGHT  I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or worms, or mice I always was afraid of Somes's Pond: I am fevered with the sunset I cannot live with you  | .622.726.828.742.560.600.385.508.508.740.740.740.740.740.740.740.740                         |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE       866         HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE       266         HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE       204         Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician       701         HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE       708         HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER       742         HARTE, FRANCIS BRET       730         Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid!       118         Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys?       558         Hast thou named all the birds without a gun?       387         HASTY PUDDING, THE       132         HAUNTED PALACE, THE       296         Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days       815         Have you heard of the wonderful one-hoss-shay?       555         Have you read in the Talmud of old       538         HAWTHORNE       547         HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL       323         HAY, JOHN       737         HAYNE, PAUL HAMILTON       672   | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR.  FOX  HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET  HOW WAS I WORTHY SO divine a loss  HUMBLEBEE, THE  HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY  Hush'd be the camps today  Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill  HYMN  HYMN  I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or  worms, or mice  I always was afraid of Somes's Pond:  I am fevered with the sunset  I cannot live with you  I cannot spare water or wine  | .622.720.548.828.742.560.600.385.695.598.598.598.740.740.740.740.740.740.740.740 |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE       866         HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE       266         HALL OF AMBASSADORS, FrOM THE       204         Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician       701         HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE       708         HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER       742         HARTE, FRANCIS BRET       730         Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid!       118         Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys?       558         Hast thou named all the birds without a gun?       387         HASTY PUDDING, THE       132         HAUNTED PALACE, THE       296         Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days       815         Have you heard of the wonderful one-hosssshay?       555         Have you read in the Talmud of old       538         HAWTHORNE       547         HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL       323         HAY, JOHN       737         HAYNE, PAUL HAMILTON       672         HEALTH, A       274   | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How Mr. Rabbit Was too Sharp for Mr.  Fox  How the Old Horse Won the Bet  How was I worthy so divine a loss  HUMBLEBEE, The  HUSH'D Be the Camps Today  Hush'd be the camps today  Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill  HYMN  I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or  worms, or mice  I always was afraid of Somes's Pond:  I am fevered with the sunset  I cannot live with you  I cannot spare water or wine  I cannot think of any word  | .622.720.548   |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE       866         HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE       266         HALL OF AMBASSADORS, FrOM THE       204         Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician       701         HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE       708         HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER       742         HARTE, FRANCIS BRET       730         Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid!       118         Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys?       558         Hast thou named all the birds without a gun?       387         HASTY PUDDING, THE       132         HAUNTED PALACE, THE       296         Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days       815         Have you heard of the wonderful one-hosssshay?       555         Have you read in the Talmud of old       538         HAWTHORNE       547         HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL       323         HAY, JOHN       737         HAYNE, PAUL HAMILTON       672         HEALTH, A       274         Hear the sledges with the bells       290 | HOWE, JULIA WARD  How happy is the little stone  How many lives, made beautiful and sweet  How many million Aprils came  How Mr. Rabbit Was too Sharp for Mr.  Fox  How the Old Horse Won the Bet  How was I worthy so divine a loss  HUMBLEBEE, The  HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY  Hush'd be the camps today  Hushed with broad sunlight lies the hill  HYMN  HYMN  I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or  worms, or mice  I always was afraid of Somes's Pond:  I am fevered with the sunset  I cannot live with you  I cannot spare water or wine  I cannot think of any word  I can wade grief  | 622720548828.742560600385503.5987407718864799718888720678                                |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys? 558 Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? 387 HASTY PUDDING, THE 132 HAUNTED PALACE, THE 296 Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days 815 Have you heard of the wonderful one-hoss-shay? 558 Have you read in the Talmud of old 538 HAWTHORNE 547 HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL 323 HAY, JOHN 737 HAYNE, PAUL HAMILTON 672 HEALTH, A 274 Hear the sledges with the bells 290 Heaven is what I cannot reach! 721  | HOWE, JULIA WARD How happy is the little stone How many lives, made beautiful and sweet How many million Aprils came How MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR. FOX HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET HOW WAS I WORTHY SO divine a loss HUMBLEBEE, THE HUSH'O BE THE CAMPS TODAY HUSH'O BE THE CAMPS TODAY HUSHON WITH DIVINITY I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or worms, or mice I always was afraid of Somes's Pond: I am fevered with the sunset I cannot live with you I cannot spare water or wine I cannot think of any word I can wade grief I celebrate myself, and sing myself   | . 622. 720. 548. 828. 742. 560. 605. 598. 385. 503. 740. 718. 388. 720. 678. 476. 476        |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys? 558 Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? 387 HASTY PUDDING, THE 132 HAUNTED PALACE, THE 296 Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days 815 Have you heard of the wonderful one-hoss-shay? 558 HAWTHORNE 547 HAWTHORNE 547 HAWTHORNE 747 HEALTH, A 274 Hear the sledges with the bells 290 Heaven is what I cannot reach! 721 HEBE 585  | HOWE, JULIA WARD How happy is the little stone How many lives, made beautiful and sweet How many million Aprils came How MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR. FOX HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET HOW WAS I WORTHY SO divine a loss HUMBLEBEE, THE HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY HUSH'd be the camps today HUSHed with broad sunlight lies the hill HYMN HYMN TO THE NIGHT  I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or worms, or mice I always was afraid of Somes's Pond: I am fevered with the sunset I cannot live with you I cannot spare water or wine I cannot think of any word I can wade grief I celebrate myself, and sing myself ICHABOD I don't know what it is | 622720548828. 742560600385695695385718806718806476857  |
| HALF PINT FLASK, THE 866 HALLECK, FITZ-GREENE 266 HALL OF AMBASSADORS, From THE 204 Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician 701 HARLEQUIN OF DREAMS, THE 708 HARRIS, JOEL CHANDLER 742 HARTE, FRANCIS BRET 730 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming maid! 118 Has there any old fellow got mixed with the boys? 558 Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? 387 HASTY PUDDING, THE 132 HAUNTED PALACE, THE 296 Have you ever noticed the mill pond in the dog days 815 Have you heard of the wonderful one-hoss-shay? 558 Have you read in the Talmud of old 538 HAWTHORNE 547 HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL 323 HAY, JOHN 737 HAYNE, PAUL HAMILTON 672 HEALTH, A 274 Hear the sledges with the bells 290 Heaven is what I cannot reach! 721  | HOWE, JULIA WARD How happy is the little stone How many lives, made beautiful and sweet How many million Aprils came How MR. RABBIT WAS TOO SHARP FOR MR. FOX HOW THE OLD HORSE WON THE BET HOW WAS I WORTHY SO divine a loss HUMBLEBEE, THE HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY HUSH'D BE THE CAMPS TODAY HUSHED with broad sunlight lies the hill HYMN HYMN HYMN TO THE NICHT  I ain't afeard uv snakes, or toads, or bugs, or worms, or mice I always was afraid of Somes's Pond: I am fevered with the sunset I cannot live with you I cannot spare water or wine I cannot think of any word I can wade grief I celebrate myself, and sing myself ICHABOD                    | 622726828742560600385695385718808720678808720678808  |

| If e'er my riming be at fault833   | I saw in Louisiana a live-oak growing 685  |
|--|--|
| If I could ever sing the songs649  | I saw the twinkle of white feet  |
| I fill this cup to one made up   | I see before me now a traveling army halting .689                                    |
| I flung my soul to the air like a falcon flying .857   | I see them,—crowd on crowd they walk the earth                                       |
| If the red slayer think he slays   | I shall not lie to you any more  |
| If with light head erect I sing412   | I shot an arrow into the air509  |
| I gazed upon the glorious sky253   | I SIGH FOR THE LAND OF THE CYPRESS AND   |
| I HAD NO TIME TO HATE  | PINE275  |
| I had no time to hate, because   | I sigh for the land of the cypress and pine275                                       |
| I HAVE A RENDEZVOUS WITH DEATH832  | ISRAFEL  |
| I have a rendezvous with Death832  | I stood on the bridge at midnight  |
| I have shut my little sister in from life and  | ITALIAN MUSIC IN DAKOTA         .703           I think it is over, over         .675 |
| light  | I think that I shall never see   |
| I hear America singing, the varied carols, I   | It is a sultry day; the sun has drunk250   |
| hear   | It is portentous, and a thing of state825  |
| I heard a voice that cried510  | I to the hills life up mine eyes, from whence  |
| I heard the trailing garments of the Night503  | shall come mine aid  |
| I hear in my heart, I hear in its ominous pulses. 803  | It was many and many a year ago291   |
| I knew a black beetle, who lived down a drain. 853   | It was the schooner Hesperus501 It was three slim does and a ten-tined buck in       |
| I KNOW NOT WHY BUT ALL THIS WEARY  | the bracken lay  |
| DAY  | I walk down the garden paths   |
| I like a church; I like a cowl   | I wandered lonely where the pine-trees made .497                                     |
| I linger on the flathouse roof, the moonlight is   |  |
| divine   | JACKSON, HELEN HUNT  |
| I'll tell you how the sun rose   | JAMES, HENRY   |
| I love the old melodious lays  | JEFFERSON, THOMAS       .156         "JIM"       .736                                |
| I love thy kingdom, Lord   | JIM BLUDSO OF THE PRAIRIE BELLE  |
| I love to hear thine earnest voice   | JOHN UNDERHILL   |
| I'm Nobody! Who are you?   | TOSEPH RODMAN DRAKE, ON THE DEATH OF 267   |
| I must be mad, or very tired   | TOURNAL OF JOHN WOOLMAN, From A 78   |
| In a branch of willow hid  | JOURNEY834   |
| IN A COPY OF OMAR KHAYYÀM  | JOY, SHIPMATE, JOY!  |
| INAUGURAL ADDRESS, FIRST (Wilson)835   | Joy, shipmate, joy!       .701         Joys of the Road, The       .798              |
| INAUGURAL ADDRESS, THE SECOND (Lincoln)470   | JUNE   |
| IN BUTTERFLY TIME  |  |
| I Never Saw a Moor   | KEY, FRANCIS SCOTT273  |
| I never saw a moor   | KILLED AT THE FORD548  |
| IN HARBOR  | KILMER, JOYCE832   |
| IN HEAVEN  | KING ROBERT OF SICILY  |
| In Heaven a spirit doth dwell  | King Witlaf's Drinking Horn  |
| In May, when sea-winds pierced our solitudes .384In my sleep I was fain of their fellowship, | KNIGHT, SARAH KEMBLE   |
| fain713  |  |
| Insect, To an  | LADDER OF SAINT AUGUSTINE, THE530  |
| INSPIRATION 412  | LADY ELEANORE'S MANTLE   |
| In spite of all the learned have said167   | LADY OR THE TIGER, THE   |
| INTERNATIONAL ODE  | LANDLORD'S TALE, THE   |
| In the greenest of our valleys   | LANTER, SIDNEY 806   |
| In the night   | LAST DAVS THE  |
| Into the woods my Master went713   | LAST INVOCATION. THE   |
| IN VAIN  | TACT TEAR THE  |
| I READ My SENTENCE STEADILY  | LAUGHING CORN  |
| I read my sentence steadily  | LEGEND OF THE MOOR'S LEGACY  |
| TRUTNO WASHINGTON  | LENDING A PUNCH-BOWL, ON   |
| T saw a war yet none the trumpet blew oll  | Terres   |
| I saw him once before,   | LETTERS FROM AN AMERICAN FARMER, From 115  |
| I L'ATTE TOT I OTTTOTANTA A I IVENIAK ITRUVING OUS   |  |

| Letter to Mrs. Bixby470                         | Mezzo Cammin507                                |
|---|--|
| LIFE ON THE MISSISSIPPI, From                   | M'FINGAL, From                                 |
| Like a blind spinner in the sun                 | Mid pleasures and palaces though we may        |
| LINCOLN, ABRAHAM468                             | roam272  |
| LINCOLN, THE MAN OF THE PEOPLE801               | MILLAY, EDNA ST. VINCENT834                    |
| LINDSAY, NICHOLAS VACHEL824                     | MILLER, JOAQUIN738                             |
| Listen, my children, and you shall hear 543     | Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of |
| Listen! the somber foliage of the Pine675       | the Lord622                                    |
| LITTLE BEACH-BIRD, THE413                       | MINIVER CHEEVY                                 |
| LITTLE BOY BLUE                                 | Miniver Cheevy, child of scorn                 |
| LITTLE GIFFEN                                   | MINOR LYRIC POETS412                           |
| Little I ask; my wants are few578               | MISS GUNTON OF POUGHKEEPSIE                    |
| Little thinks, in the field, you red-cloaked    | MITHRIDATES                                    |
| clown   | Mocking Bird, To the                           |
| Lo! Death hath reared himself a throne 284      | Mocking Bird, The                              |
| LONGFELLOW, HENRY WADSWORTH500                  | Mocking-Birds, The                             |
| Long I followed happy guides388                 | MODERN WOMAN TO HER LOVER, THE827              |
| Look Down, Fair Moon                            | Moment Musicale                                |
| Look down, fair moon, and bathe this scene693   | MOODY, WILLIAM VAUGHAN795                      |
| Look off, dear Love, across the sallow sands706 | Moor's Legacy, Legend of the                   |
|   | MORLEY, CHRISTOPHER (DARLING-                  |
| Lost824   | TON)852  |
| Lost Occasion, The                              | MORRIS, GEORGE POPE273                         |
| Lo! 'tis a gala night                           | Mosses from an Old Manse, From335              |
| Low and mournful be the strain                  | MOST MEN KNOW LOVE BUT AS A PART OF            |
|   | LIFE   |
| LOWELL, AMY                                     | Most men know love but as a part of life668    |
|   | MOTLEY, JOHN LOTHROP421                        |
| Lyric Poets, Minor412                           | Mountains of California, From The              |
|   | Mountain Woman, The                            |
| McFEE, WILLIAM847                               | Mr. Dooley Says, From                          |
| Magnalia Christi Americana, From 40             | MUIR, JOHN747                                  |
| MAGNOLIA CEMETERY, AT                           | MUSIC IN CAMP                                  |
| Maidenhood                                      | My Aunt  |
| Maiden! with the meek, brown eyes505            | My aunt! my dear unmarried aunt!551            |
| Man Without a Country, The                      | My Boyhood, From                               |
| MAN WITH THE HOE, THE801                        | My country,—'tis of thee                       |
| March in the Ranks Hard-prest and the           | My father he was a mountaineer860              |
| Road Unknown, A                                 | My grandsire sailed three years from home803   |
| Marco Bozarris                                  | My Last Walk with the Schoolmistress579        |
| MARION'S MEN, SONG OF                           | My life closed twice before its close721       |
| MARKET, THE                                     | My life is like a stroll upon the beach411     |
| MARKHAM, EDWIN                                  | "My Life is Like the Summer Rose"274           |
| MARK TWAIN (Samuel L. Clemens)725               | My life is like the summer rose                |
| Marshes of Glynn, The                           | My Lost Youth536                               |
| Mary sat musing on the lamp-flame at the        | My Playmate                                    |
| table820  | My Readers, To                                 |
| MASQUE OF THE RED DEATH, THE308                 | My soul is sailing through the sea704          |
| MASTER MARINER, THE                             | Mysterious Chambers, The205                    |
| MASTERS, EDGAR LEE815                           | Mysterious flood,—that through the silent      |
| MATHER, COTTON                                  | sands  |
| MAUD MULLER                                     | Mystic Trumpeter, The                          |
| Maud Muller on a summer's day 477               | Му Тишмрн                                      |
| MEETING-HOUSE HILL                              |  |
| ME IMPERTURBE                                   | Nay, blame me not; I might have spared559      |
| Me imperturbe, standing at ease in Nature 684   | NEIHARDT, JOHN G                               |
| MELVILLE, HERMAN                                | Never, surely, was holier man                  |
| Memories  | New Bedford and Nantucket launched the trad-   |
| Memory of the Brave Americans, To the .166      | ers and the whalers                            |
| Menagerie, The                                  | New England Primer, The                        |
| Mending Wall                                    | New-Englands Crisis                            |
| MERLIN  | New neighbors came to the corner house at      |
| Merrily swinging on brier and weed257           | Congress and Green Streets823                  |

| Newspaper, A  | Out of the focal and foremost fire  |
|---|---|
| No more these simple flowers belong476 Non-Resistance | Out of the Rolling Ocean the Crowd693 Out of the rolling ocean the crowd came a drop gently to me |
| Nor to Keep   | Outside hove Shasta, snowy height on height .856  |
| Now the joys of the road are chiefly these798         | OUT TO SEA  |
| Now warm with ministerial ire                         | Over his keys the musing organist   |
| NURSERY RHYMES FOR THE TENDER-HEARTED853              | O World, I cannot hold thee close enough!834  |
| NORSERI KIIIWES FOR THE TEMPER HERRISSOO              | 5 17 52.22) 11 22.22.22 22.22.2  |
| O CAPTAIN, MY CAPTAIN!                                | PADRE IGNACIO   |
| O Captain! My Captain! our fearful trip is            | PAINE, THOMAS140  |
| done699   | PALACE OF THE ALHAMBRA, From  | | OCTOBER717  | PARADISE, TO ONE IN   |
| ODE394  | PARKMAN, FRANCIS  |
| ODE RECITED AT THE HARVARD COMMEMORA-                 | Parting   |
| TION  | PARTING GLASS, THE  |
| ODE TO SLEEP  | PAST, THE (Bryant)         253           PAST, THE (Emerson)         398                          |
| "O, FAIREST OF THE RURAL MAIDS"251                    | PATTERNS  |
| O, fairest of the rural maids!                        | PAUL BUNYAN   |
| Of all the rides since the birth of time480           | PAUL REVERE'S RIDE  |
| OF PLIMOTH PLANTATION, From                           | PAYNE, JOHN HOWARD  |
| Often I think of the beautiful town536                | PEAKS. THE  |
| Oft have I seen at some cathedral door549             | PENCILINGS BY THE WAY, From   |
| O gift of God! O perfect day539                       | PENSIVE ON HER DEAD GAZING  |
| Oh, all day long they flood with song673              | Pensive on her dead gazing I heard the Mother   |
| O'HARA, THEODORE                                      | of All695   |
| O. HENRY (William Sydney Porter)775                   | Perhaps too far in these considerate days554  |
| Oh for one hour of youthful joy!554                   | PIKE, ALBERT  |
| Oh tenderly the haughty day                           | Pile the bodies high at Austerlitz and Water-   |
| OLD CLOCK ON THE STAIRS, THE508                       | loo   |
| OLD IRONSIDES550                                      | PINE'S MYSTERY, THE   |
| OLD MAN DREAMS, THE554                                | PINKNEY, EDWARD COATE   |
| Old Saul806OLIVER, THADDEUS661,665                | PIONEERS! O PIONEERS!   |
| On a Fortification                                    | PLIMOTH PLANTATION, From OF   |
| Once there was a cabin here, and once there           | POR COTTAGE THE   |
| was a man818  | POE EDGAR ALLAN283  |
| Once this soft turf, this rivulet's sands257          | POETS TO COME   |
| Once upon a midnight dreary, while I pondered         | Poets to come; orators, singers, musicians to   |
| weak and weary  | come!   |
| One autumn night, in Sudbury town540                  | POOR VOTER ON ELECTION DAY, THE   |
| ONE'S-SELF I SING                                     | PORTER, WILLIAM SYDNEY  |
| One's-self I sing, a simple separate person700        | POSTHUMOUS WRITING OF DIEDRICH KNICKER-   |
| ON LENDING A PUNCH BOWL                               | BOCKER, A   |
| On this wondrous sea                                  | PRATRIES. THE   |
| On Unanswering Letters855                             | PRAIRIE. From THE   |
| Opportunity 741                                       | PRAVED  |
| O say, can you see by the dawn's early light 273      | PRESCOTT, WILLIAM HICKLING414   |
| OSCOOD TO FRANCIS S                                   | PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS, TO THE   |
| O TAN-FACED PRAIRIE-BOY693                            | PRESTON, MARGARET JUNKIN661, 663  |
| A tan-faced prairie-boy                               | PROBLEM, THE  |
| Othere the old sea-captain                            | PRODIGAL         866           PROEM         472  |
| OTTO ANGLO-SAXON TONGUE                               | PROGRESS TO THE MINES IN THE YEAR 1732,   |
| Our band is few but true and tried255                 | From A  |
| OUR SHARE OF NIGHT TO BEAR                            | PROVINCIAL PERIOD, THE  |
| Our share of night of bear                            | Prite and I From  |
| Out of me unworthy and unknown815                     | PSATME 24 18  |
| OVER OF THE CRADIT ENDLESSLY ROCKING081               | PSATME 121  |
| Out of the cradle endlessly rocking681                | PSALM OF LIFE, A500   |
| Out 01  |   |

| PURLOINED LETTER, THE311  | SIGHT IN CAMP IN THE DAYBREAK GRAY AND                                    |
|---|---|
|   | DIM, A  |
| QUICKSAND YEARS694  | SILENT SONGS  |
| Quicksand years that whirl me I know not                        | SILL, EDWARD ROWLAND  |
| whither694  | SIMMS, WILLIAM GILMORE275   |
|   | SIMPLE COBLER OF AGGAVVAMM IN AMERICA,                                    |
| RANCH LIFE AND THE HUNTING TRAIL, From751                       | From THE 20   |
| RAVEN, THE  | SIMPLICITY  |
| READ, THOMAS BUCHANAN 648                                       | SINNERS IN THE HANDS OF AN ANGRY GOD,                                     |
| REAPER AND THE FLOWERS, THE501                                  | From the sermon   |
| RECONCILIATION  | SIR HUMPHREY GILBERT  |
| REESE, LIZETTE WOODWORTH805                                     | SKELETON IN ARMOR, THE  |
| RENUNCIATION719   | SKETCH-BOOK, From THE186  |
| REPPLIER, AGNES838  | SKETCHES OF EIGHTEENTH CENTURY AMERICA,                                   |
| RESIGNATION   | From116   |
| Reuben Bright818  | Skipper Ireson's Ride480  |
| REVENCE OF HAMISH710  | Sky, The650   |
| REVOLUTION TO THE CIVIL WAR, From THE145                        | SLANT OF SUN, A809  |
| RHEA, TO  | SLEEPER, THE  |
| RHODORA, THE  | Sleep sweetly in your humble graves671                                    |
| RHOECUS582  | Slowly by God's hand unfurled413  |
| RIGHT HONORABLE WILLIAM, TO THE120                              | SMITH, JOHN 1   |
| RIP VAN WINKLE  | SMITH, SAMUEL FRANCIS412, 413   |
| RISE OF THE DUTCH REPUBLIC, From THE421                         | Snow-Bound483   |
| ROBERT OF LINCOLN   | SNOW-STORM, THE   |
| Robert of Sicily, brother of Pope Urbane545                     | So fallen! so lost! the light withdrawn476                                |
| ROBINSON, EDWIN ARLINGTON817                                    | SOLDIERS, THE   |
| ROMANY GIRL, THE394   | So Long!  |
| Roofs857  | Some day, when the stern seeker in my brain866                            |
| ROOSEVELT, THEODORE   | Some die too late and some too soon497                                    |
| Rose and Thorn, The   | Some keep the Sabbath going to church719                                  |
| RYAN, ABRAM JOSEPH661,667                                       | Something tapped on my window-pane804                                     |
|   | Something there is that doesn't love a wall819                            |
| Sail fast, sail fast  | Somewhat back from the village street508                                  |
| Saint Augustine! well hast thou said530                         | Song, A552  |
| SANDALPHON  | Song of Hiawatha, From The531   |
| SANDBURG, CARL822   | Song of Marion's Men  |
| Say there! P'r'aps  | Song of Myself, From  |
| SCARLET LETTER, From THE  | Song of the Camp, The647  |
| SCHAUFFLER, ROBERT HAVEN829                                     | Song of the Chattahoochee   |
| SCHOOL-DAYS, IN   | Song of the Future, A   |
| "Scum o' the Earth"   | Song of the Indian Wars, From The813                                      |
| Scuttle, scuttle, little roach                                  | Son of the Middle Border, A   |
| SEA, THE (Stoddard)   | SOUTHERN LYRICS   |
| SEA, THE (Dickinson)       .720         SEA DREAM, A       .495 | Southern Lyrics of the Civil War  |
| SEA GYPSY, THE  | Southward with float of ice   |
| SECRET OF THE SEA, THE  | Southward with fleet of ice   |
| SECRETS   |   |
| SEEGER, ALAN832   | Speak and tell us, our Ximena, looking north-                             |
| SEEGER, ALAN  | ward far away   |
| Self Reliance   | Speak: speak: thou learner guest:   |
| Service of Song, A  | Speech on the Force Bill, The   |
| SEWALL, SAMUEL  | SPINNING  |
| SHADE OF THE TREES, THE   |   |
| She always leaned to watch for us827                            | Spirit that breathest through my lattice, thou. 254 Spring (Wigglesworth) |
| She Came and Went   | SPRING (Wigglesworth)   |
| SHELLEY   | Spring, with that nameless pathos in the air                              |
| SHERIDAN'S RIDE   | Stafford's Cabin  |
| She's loveliest of the festal throng674                         | STAINS  |
| Should you ask me, whence these stories?531                     | STANZAS   |
| Show, The   | STAR MAP, A   |
| Sicilian's Tale, The  | STAR-SPANGLED BANNER. THE   |
|   |   |

| STERLING, GEORGE802   | There he moved, cropping the grass at the pur-     |
|---|--|
|   | -la  |
| Still sits the school-house by the road491  | ple canyon's lip858                                |
| Still was the night, serene and bright 29   | There is a Reaper whose name is Death501           |
| STIRRUP-CUP, THE  | There is no flock, however watched and tended .524 |
| STOCKTON, FRANK R   | There is sensething in the automorphist is noticed |
|   | There is something in the autumn that is native    |
| STODDARD, RICHARD HENRY649  | to my blood  |
| STORM FEAR822   | There smiled the smooth Divine, unused to          | | STRACHEY, WILLIAM   | wound  |
|   | wound122   |
| STRICTLY GERM-PROOF864  | There they dwelt in the wrennet's cot862           |
| SUMMER WIND   | There was a high majestic fooling824               |
| SUMNER, CHARLES462  |  |
|   | There will be a rusty gun on the wall, sweet-      |
| SUNRISE—A HYMN OF THE MARSHES713  | heart823   |
| SUNSET ON THE BEARCAMP496   | The rising moon has hid the stars505               |
| Superb and sole, upon a plumed spray708   | The round moon hangs above the rim798              |
|   |  |
| SURGEONS MUST BE VERY CAREFUL720  | The russet leaves of the sycamore802               |
| Surgeons must be very careful   | These are the gardens of the Desert, these255      |
| SWAMP FOX, THE  | THESE ARE THE YOUNG825                             |
|   |  |
| Swift, through some trap mine eyes have never   | The sense of the world is short                    |
| found   | These pearls of thought in Persian gulfs were      |
|   | bred610  |
| TALES OF A WAYSIDE INN, From540   | The shades of night were falling fast506           |
| Orall and have an included that the control of the |  |
| Tall, somber, grim, against the morning sky674  | The shadows lay along Broadway270                  |
| TAYLOR, BAYARD642   | The show is not the show                           |
| TEARS805  | The skies can't keep their secret                  |
| TEASDALE, SARA828   | The skies they were ashen and sober289             |
|   |  |
| TEGNER'S DRAPA510   | The sky is a drinking cup650                       |
| TELLING THE BEES481   | The snow had begun in the gloaming599              |
| Tell me not, in mournful numbers500   | The South-wind brings                              |
|   |  |
| TEST, THE720  | The sun goes down and with him takes394            |
| Thanatopsis248  | The sun that brief December day483                 |
| Thank God my brain is not inclined to cut 795   | The sun was gone, and the moon was coming828       |
|   | The sun went down in flame and smoke666            |
| That's a rather bold speech, my Lord Bacon610   |  |
| The Angel came by night   | The Sun, who never stops to dine125                |
| The Antiseptic Baby and the Prophylactic Pup. 864   | The three ghosts on the lonesome road804           |
| The autumn-time has come492   | The times wherein old Pompion was a Saint 34       |
| T D 27 127  | The wind is blowing east                           |
| THE BATTLE OF THE KEGS  |  |
| The breezes went steadily through the tall  | The wings of Time are black and white375           |
| pines136  | The word of the Lord by night                      |
| The days grow short; but though the falling   | They are all gone away818                          |
|   | They sent him back to her. The letter came822      |
| sun   |  |
| The debt is paid398   | This ancient silver bowl of mine, it tells of      |
| The earth Jehovah's is, and the fulnesse of it 18   | good old times553                                  |
| Thee, dear friend, a brother soothes387   | This I beheld, or dreamed it in a dream:741        |
|   | This is he, who felled by foes395                  |
| The fog comes   |  |
| The folk who lived in Shakespeare's day739  | This is my letter to the world                     |
| The groves were God's first temples251  | This is the Arsenal. From floor to ceiling507      |
| The gypsies passed her little gate804   | This is the forest primeval. The murmuring         |
| The little and a recorded at last 500   | pines and the hemlocks511                          |
| The little gate was reached at last599  |  |
| The little toy dog is covered with dust740  | This is the ship of pearl, which, poets feign 565  |
| The lords of life, the lords of life  | THOMPSON, JOHN R                                   |
| The man that joins in life's career168  | THOREAU, HENRY DAVID398                            |
| The man that joins in lives career  | Thou blossom bright with autumn dew254             |
| The melancholy days have come, the saddest  |  |
| of the year   | Thou, born to sip the lake or spring168            |
| The morns are meeker than they were719  | Thou little bird, thou dweller by the sea413       |
| The mountain and the squirrel   | Thou unrelenting Past!                             |
| The modificant and the squitter   | Thou wast all that to me, love                     |
| The muffled drum's sad roll has beat  |  |
| The pines were dark on Ramoth Hill482   | Thou who hast slept all night upon the storm703    |
| The proudest now is but my peer475  | Thou wouldst be loved? then let thy heart 286      |
| The railroad track is miles away834   | Thrash away, you'll hev to rattle601               |
| Trenen Ann Carre non Arr Over Tocche AEA  | THREE BEST THINGS, THE805                          |
| THERE ARE GAINS FOR ALL OUR LOSSES650   | Three moons I trekked the woods without a          |
| There are gains for all our losses650   |  |
| There came a day at summer's full719  | trail831   |
| There comes Emerson first, whose rich words   | THRENODY   |
| every one   | Through the night, through the night649            |
|   |  |

| Through the soft evening air enwinding all703    | VERDICT, THE                                  |
|--|---|
| Thy love thou sentest oft to me584               | VERY, JONES611                                |
|  | Vexed by the distant831                       |
| Thy trivial harp will never please               | Vexed by the distant                          |
| TICKNOR, FRANCIS ORRAY661, 664                   | VICKSBURG674                                  |
| TIMROD, HENRY                                    | VICTOR GALBRAITH535                           |
| 'Tis the middle watch of a summer's night260     | VIEWS A-FOOT, From642                         |
|  | VILLAGE BLACKSMITH, THE502                    |
| To a Certain Civilian                            | VILLAGE DEACKSWITH, THE                       |
| To an Insect                                     | VIRGINIANS OF THE VALLEY, THE                 |
| To conclude, I announce what comes after me685   | Vision of Sir Launfal, The                    |
| Today the woods are trembling through and        | Voiceless, The557                             |
|  | Voluntaries                                   |
| through  | VOLUNTARIES                                   |
| To him who in the love of Nature holds248        |   |
| To Make a Prairie                                | Wagner Matinée, A849                          |
| To make a prairie it takes a clover and one      | WAITING BY THE GATE258                        |
| bee  | WALDEN, From                                  |
| To mix the food by vicious rules of art134       | Wall no! I can't tell whar he lives           |
|  | Wander-Lovers, The                            |
| TOMPSON, BENJAMIN                                |   |
| To My Readers559                                 | WAR, THE                                      |
| To One in Paradise                               | WARD, NATHANIEL 19                            |
| To the Dandelion                                 | WARDEN OF THE CINQUE PORTS, THE531            |
| To the Little House                              | Washers of the Shroud, The                    |
| To the Man-of-War Bird                           | WASHINGTON, GEORGE146                         |
|  | WATCHER, THE                                  |
| TO THE NILE                                      |   |
| To the President of Congress                     | Waterfowl, To a249                            |
| To the Right Honorable William120                | WAY TO WEALTH, THE108                         |
| Trailing Arbutus, The497                         | Weak-winged is song                           |
| Train-Mates                                      | WEAVE IN, MY HARDY LIFE693                    |
| TRANSFORMATION, From THE                         | Weave in, weave in, my hardy life693          |
| Trash  | WEBSTER, DANIEL453                            |
| TRAVEL   | We count the broken lyres that rest557        |
|  |   |
| Trees  | We follow where the swamp fox guides276       |
| Trembling I write my dream, and recollect162     | WE NEVER KNOW WE GO721                        |
| TRIUMPH OF INFIDELITY, From THE122               | We never know we go,—when we are going 721    |
| TROPIC GARDEN, From A843                         | WE PLAY AT PASTE                              |
| TRUE GRANDEUR OF THE NATIONS, From THE462        | We play at paste                              |
| TRUE RELATION, From A                            | We saw the slow tides go and come495          |
|  |   |
| TRUE REPORTORY, From A                           | We will have angels and men for sons826       |
| TRUMBULL, JOHN                                   | WHARTON, EDITH761                             |
| Turning the secrets from her pack of cards856    | What are the thoughts that are stirring his   |
| Tuscan, that wanderest through the realms of     | breast?                                       |
| gloom549   | What heartache—ne'er a hill!                  |
| 'Twas on the famous trotting ground560           | What Inn Is This?                             |
| TWICE-TOLD TALES, From                           | What inn is this?                             |
|  |   |
| Two Armies, The                                  | WHAT MEN LIVE BY853                           |
| Two armies covered hill and plain                | "What new mob disturbs the days?825           |
| Two Years Before the Mast, From612               | WHAT SOFT, CHERUBIC CREATURES721              |
| Typee, From                                      | What soft, cherubic creatures721              |
| Types of the antique Rome! Rich reliquary 285    | WHEATLEY, PHILLIS120                          |
| ,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,          | When as a young and budding poet833           |
| ULALUME  | When breezes are soft and skies are fair249   |
|  |   |
| Uncle Remus, From                                | When Freedom from her mountain height259      |
| Under a spreading chestnut tree502               | When I consider Life and its few years805     |
| Under One Blanket                                | WHEN LILACS LAST IN THE DOORYARD BLOOM'D. 696 |
| Under the great hill sloping bare498             | When lilacs last in the dooryard bloom'd 696  |
| Under the walls of Monterey535                   | WHEN THE NORN MOTHER SAW THE WHIRL-           |
| Unseen, The                                      | WIND HOUR                                     |
| UNSEEN SPIRITS                                   | When the Puritans came over                   |
|  |   |
| Up from the south, at break of day               | When the wind works against us in the dark822 |
| Upon the Plymouth shore the wild rose blooms.611 | When Yankees, skilled in martial rule123      |
| Up the streets of Aberdeen472                    | Where now these mingled ruins lie             |
|  | While I recline                               |
| VAGABOND SONG, A                                 | Whither, midst falling dew249                 |
| VAN DYKE, HENRY804                               | WHITMAN, WALT                                 |
| Velasquez took a pliant knife865                 | WHITTIER, JOHN GREENLEAF                      |
|  |   |

| Who are you dusky woman, so ancient hardly human       701         WHY MR. POSSUM LOVES PEACE       743         Why should I keep holiday       387         WIDDEMER, MARGARET       826         WIELAND, From       171         WIGGLESWORTH, MICHAEL       29         WILDE, RICHARD HENRY       274         WILD HONEYSUCKLE, THE       167         WILD RIDE, THE       803         Wild Rose of Alloway! my thanks       267 | Witlaf, a king of the Saxons       525         WOODMAN, SPARE THAT TREE!       273         WOODMORTH, SAMUEL       412         WOOLMAN, JOHN       77         Word, A       721         Word over all, beautiful as the sky       693         WORSHIP       395         WOUND-DRESSER, THE       691         WRECK, THE       813         WRECK OF THE HESPERUS, THE       501 |
|---|--|
| WILD ROSE OF PLYMOUTH, THE  | WYLIE, ELINOR864   |
| WILLIS, NATHANIEL PARKER       270         WILSON, WOODROW       834         WIND, THE EVENING       254         WIND-STORM IN THE FORESTS, A       748         Winged mimic of the woods! thou motley fool!274       WINTHROP, JOHN       12   | Ye Alps audacious, through the heavens that rise   |
| WISTER, OWEN  | Youth, Day, Old Ace, and Night   |

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY